In this yeare was an exceeding great dearth, in ſo much that a quarter of wheat was ſold at London for foure and twentie ſhillings, whereas within two or three yeares before, a quarter was ſold at two ſhillings. It had beene more deerer, if great ſtore had not come out of Almaine, for in France and in Normandie it likewiſe failed. But there came fiftie great ſhips fraught with wheat and barlie, with meale and bread out of Dutchland, by the procurement of Richard king of Almaine, which greatlie releeued the poore; for proclamation was made, and order taken by the king, that none of the citizens of London ſhould buy any of that graine to laie it vp in ſtore, whereby it might be ſold at an higher price vnto the needie. But though this prouiſion did much eaſe, yet the want was great ouer all the realme. For it was certeinelie affirmed, that in three ſhires within the realme, there was not found ſo much graine of that yeares growth, as came ouer in thoſe fiftie ſhips. The proclamation was ſet forth, to reſtreine the Londoners from ingroſſing vp that graine, and not without cauſe: for the wealthie citizens were euill ſpoken of in that ſeaſon, bicauſe in time of ſcarſitie they would either ſtaie ſuch ſhips as fraught with vittels were comming towards the citie, and ſend them ſome other way forth; or elſe buy the whole, that they might ſell it by retaile at their pleſure to the needie. By means of this great dearth and ſcarſitie, the common people were conſtreined to liue vpon hearbs & roots, and a great number of the poore people died through famine, which is the moſt miſerable calamitie that can betide mortall men, and was well marked euen of the heathen, but notablie by Ouid, who making a deſcription of famine, ſetteth hir forth in moſt ouglie and irkeſome ſort, intending therby the dreadfulnes of that heauie plague, saieng:

Ouid. lib. 8. Meta. fab. 11.

A parlement. Matth. Paris.

Hurtred, a meſſenger frõ the pope.

The welſhmen ſpoile Penbrokeſhire.

This yeare after Eaſter a parlement was holden at London, in the which manie weightie matters were intreated of touching the kings cauſes, namelie, about the conqueſt of the realme of Naples, the pope hauing ſent a meſſenger named Hurtred for the diſcharge of monie, which the pope had receiued of merchants, as it were to the kings vſe, and entred bonds for the paiment thereof. Alſo, whereas the king was ſore diſquieted for the warre which the Welſhmen made againſt him, he aſked aduiſe of the ſtates, how he might proceed to ſeeke his iuſt reuenge of them, who by reaſon of their good hap were become verie ſtout and loftie, and had of late by the expiring of a truce which had beene accorded betwixt them, ſpoiled and waſted the moſt part of Penbrokeſhire, of which iniurie the earle of Penbroke, namelie William de Valence, ſore complained.

Variance betwixt the earle of Penbroke and others.

But whereas the king knowing him to be rich, willed him to lay out ſome great portion of monie, towards the maintenance of his wars, the erle tooke great diſpleaſure therewith, as though the king had made that requeſt by the ſuggeſtion and ſetting on of ſome of the Engliſh lords, in ſomuch that words paſſed in diſpleaſant ſort betwixt him and the earles of Gloceſter and Leiceſter, ſo far forth, that the earle of Penbroke called the earle of Leiceſter traitor, who therewith made towards him, to haue reuenged the iniurie, and ſo would haue doone indeed, if the king had not beene moderator betwixt them. Finallie at this parlement the lords told the king that they might not aid him with any great ſummes of monie, except it ſhould redound to their great impoueriſhment: they told him alſo, that he had not doone wiſelie to enter into couenants, for the purchaſe of the kingdome of Naples for his ſonne, without their conſents.

The archbiſhop of Yorke depriued of his croſſe.

Manſuetus the popes Nuncio.

They alſo declared to him, what articles it ſhould be good for him to propone vnto the pope, if he would haue him to continue in bearing the charges of the wars againſt Manfred. But when thoſe articles were afterwards preſented to the pope, he allowed them not, & ſo the matter remained without any certeine aſſurance of the promiſes, which had beene and ſtill were from time to time made to ſet the king on dotage. The archbiſhop of Yorke had his croſſe taken from him by the popes commandement, but the archbiſhop would not yet bow his knee vnto Baall, to beſtow the benefices of his church vpon aliens, and ſuch as were vnworthie perſons, as it had beene to caſt pearles vnto ſwine. ¶ There came from the pope as his Nuncio, vnto king Henrie, a frier minor named Manſuetus, furniſhed with great power and authoritie, in ſomuch that he tooke vpon him to abſolue men for changing their vowes, and to iuſtifie thoſe that were excõmunicated perſons, falſe periured, and ſuch like. Whereupon, manie of euill diſpoſition preſumed to offend: for eaſineſſe to purchaſe pardon bred boldneſſe in manie, howbeit the wiſe ſeemed to laugh at ſuch doings.

The parlement ſtill continued, till the ſundaie after the Aſcenſion day, with hard hold betwixt the king and the lords, who laid it ſore to his charge, that he had not performed the promiſes which he made touching the obſeruing of the liberties conteined in the great charter. They alſo complained greatlie of his miſgouernance, in that he ſo much aduanced the Poictouins and other ſtrangers, to the impoueriſhment of himſelfe and the whole realme, and further, mainteined them ſo far foorth, that they were readie to offer wrong vnto other, vpon preſumption of his fauour and bearing with them, he hauing by commandement reſtreined that no proceſſe ſhould paſſe out of the chancerie againſt certeine of them that were his coſins, as the earle of Penbroke and others. Finallie, when the lords were in doubt which way to worke for their owne ſafeties, they cauſed the parlement to be proroged, till the feaſt of ſaint Barnabe, then to begin againe at Oxford. In the meane time the lords of the realme, as the earles of Gloceſter, Leiceſter, Hereford and Northfolke, with other, did confederate themſelues togither, bicauſe they ſtood in feare to be intrapped by the kings ſubtill ſleights, and by the craftie wiles of thoſe ſtrangers whom he reteined againſt them.

The parlemẽt proroged.

In the ſame yeare by the wind, which continuallie certeine months togither kept northerlie, the flours, with other growing things, were ſo hindered, that ſcarſelie they appeared to anie purpoſe, till the moſt part of Iune was paſt, wherevpon the hope of receiuing the fruits of the earth was quite taken awaie, & ſo vpon the great dearth that happened, a ſore death and mortalitie followed, for want of neceſſarie food to ſuſteine the pining bodies of the poore people. They died ſo thicke, that there were great pits made in churchyards to laie the dead bodies in one vpon an other.

A late growth

A dearth accompanied with a death.

About the feaſt of the Aſcenſion, Seuall the archbiſhop of Yorke departed this life, who conſtantlie had reſiſted the tyrannie of the court of Rome, in defenſe of his church, ſuffering in this world manie greeuous tribulations, but now was remoued from thenſe vnto the kingdome of heauen, to be crowned with the elect for his good deſeruings, as was then certenlie beleeued. About this time, a great number of Poictouins were come into England, by reaſon of their aliance and coſinage to the king, the which by the kings fauour being highlie aduanced, began to wax proud thereof, and to require to be reſtored vnto ſuch lands and liuings as before time they had poſſeſſed: namelie the kings halfe brethren, Athelmare or Odomare, that was a preeſt, with William, Geffrey and Guie, theſe were the ſonnes of Hugh le Brun earle of Marſh, by his wife queene Iſabell, the mother of king Henrie, and being come into England, they ſhewed themſelues verie loftie & high-minded, partlie, bicauſe of their coſinage to the king, & partlie by reaſon of his courteous interteining of them, inſomuch that forgetting themſelues, they began to deſpiſe (vpon a preſumptuous pride) the Engliſh nobilitie, looking ſtill for preferment of honor aboue all other. And ſuerlie Odomare obteined at the firſt a great peece of his purpoſe, being made by the kings gift biſhop of Wincheſter, and by that means bare a ſtout port, and greatlie holpe and mainteined his other brethren.

Seuall archb. of Yorke departeth this life.

Matth. Paris.

The kings halfe brethren.

The Engliſh barons not well able to ſuffer ſuch preſumption in ſtrangers, who ſeemed to haue them in deriſion, complained to the king, in ſo much that at length, as well for a reformation hereof, as in other things, a parlement was called (as before you haue heard) firſt at London, and after reiorned to Oxenford, there to be aſſembled about the feaſt of ſaint Barnabe in the moneth of Iune. This (of ſome writers) is named Inſanum parliamentum, that is to ſay, The mad parlement; for at this parlement (to the which the lords came with great retinues of armed men, for the better ſafegard of their perſons) manie things in the ſame yeare were enacted contrarie to the K. pleaſure, and his roiall prerogatiue. For the lords at the firſt determined to demand the confirmation of the ancient charter of liberties, which his father king Iohn had granted, and he himſelfe had ſo often promiſed to obſerue and mainteine, ſignifieng plainelie, that they meant to purſue their purpoſe and intent herein, not ſparing either for loſſe of life, lands or goods, according to that they had mutuallie giuen their faiths by ioining of hands, as the manner in ſuch caſes is accuſtomed. Beſides the grant of the great charter, they required other things neceſſarie for the ſtate of the common-wealth, to be eſtabliſhed and enacted.

Inſanum parliamentum.

The demand of the lords.

It was therefore firſt enacted, that all the Poictouins ſhould auoid the land, togither with other ſtrangers, and that neither the king nor his ſonne prince Edward ſhould in anie ſecret manner aid them againſt the people. Moreouer, that the king & his ſonne ſhould receiue an oth, to ſtand vnto the decrees and ordinances of that parlement, and withall ſpeed to reſtore the ancient lawes and inſtitutions of the realme, which they both did, rather conſtreined therevnto by feare, than of anie good will. Thus not onelie the king himſelfe, but alſo his ſonne prince Edward receiued an oth, to obſerue the ordinances of that parlement. But Iohn earle Warren, and the kings halfe brethren, namelie the earle of Penbroke refuſed that oth; and likewiſe the lord Henrie, ſonne to the king of Almaine, excuſed himſelfe by his fathers abſence, without whoſe conſent he would not receiue it, vnto whome this anſwer was made, that if his father would not conſent to the agreement of the baronage, he ſhould not poſſeſſe one furrowe of land within this realme.

Ordinances made.

An oth exacted of the king

Alſo, whereas the earle of Leiceſter reſigned the caſtels of Killingworth and Odiham into the kings hands, which he had latelie receiued by his gift, and newlie repaired, the earle of Penbroke and his other brethren ſware deepelie, that they would for no mans pleaſure giue ouer ſuch caſtels, rents, and wardſhips of theirs, as they had of the kings gift. But the earle of Leiceſter told the earle of Penbroke flatlie and plainlie, that he ſhould either render them vp, or elſe he ſhould be ſure to loſe his head. This ſaieng was confirmed by the generall voices of all other the barons, bicauſe it was a ſpeciall article concluded amongſt other in that parlement. The kings halfe brethren, perceiuing which waie the world went, ſtood in doubt of themſelues, and ſecretlie therevpon departing from Oxenford, firſt withdrew vnto Wincheſter, where Odomare, one of the ſame brethren was biſhop, through whoſe ſupport, and by reaſon of the ſtrength of ſuch caſtels as he held, they truſted to be in more ſafetie: but finallie, perceiuing themſelues not to be ſo out of danger, ſith the barons minded to purſue them, about the eighteenth daie of Iulie they departed the realme with a great number of other of their countriemen; and amongeſt thoſe, William de ſaint Herman the kings caruer was one.

They depart the Realme.

Henrie Montfort, ſonne to the earle of Leiceſter, vnderſtanding of their departure out of the realme, followed; and hearing that they were arriued at Bullogne, he landed in thoſe parts, & by ſuch freendſhip as he found there amongſt thoſe that bare good will vnto his father, he got togither a power, and after a manner beſieged the Poictouins within Bullogne, laieng watch for them in ſuch ſort, both by ſea and land, that there was no waie left for them to eſcape. When they ſaw themſelues in that danger, they ſent a meſſenger with all poſt haſt to the French king, requiring his ſafe conduct, to paſſe freelie through his his realme, as they truſted he would be content to grant vnto ſuch, as for refuge and ſafegard of life ſhould repaire vnto him for comfort. The French king courteouſlie granted their requeſt, and ſo they were in ſafetie permitted to paſſe quietlie through the countrie. In the meane while one Richard Gray, chatellaine of Douer caſtell, a right valiant man and a faithfull, ſuffered no man to paſſe that waie vnſearched, according to that which he had in commandement: wherevpon he tooke & ſeized into his hands a great portion of treaſure, which was brought thither to be tranſported ouer to the Poictouins that were fled out of the realme. Alſo, there was found a great quantitie of treaſure in the new temple at London, which they had gathered & hoorded vp there, which alſo was ſeized to the kings vſe.

Foure and twentie gouernours.

The abuſes of thoſe gouernours.

But now to returne vnto the doings in the parlement holden at Oxford. It was ordeined (as ſome write) that the king ſhould chooſe twelue perſons of the realme, and the communaltie of the land ſhould chooſe other twelue, the which hauing regall authoritie in their hands, might take in charge the gouernance of the realme vpon them, & ſhould from yeare to yeare prouide for the due election of iuſtices, chancellors, treaſurors, and other officers, and ſee for the ſafe kéeping of the caſtels which belonged to the crowne. Theſe foure and twentie gouernours appointed as prouiders for the good gouernement of the realme, began to order all things at their pleaſure, in the meane time not forgetting to vſe things chéeflie to their owne aduantages, as well in prouiding eſchets and wards for their ſonnes and kinſfolks, as alſo in beſtowing patronages of churches (belonging to the kings gift) at their pleaſures, ſo that theſe prouiders ſéemed to prouide all for themſelues, inſomuch that neither king nor Chriſt could receiue ought amongſt them: and as for iuſtice they regarded nothing leſſe, their minds were ſo rauiſhed with deſire of priuat wealth; which who ſo hunteth after, being in place of magiſtracie, he muſt néeds neglect the law and courſe of equitie, and therefore this counſell is good which a good writer giueth in this behalfe, ſaieng;

There be that write, how there were but twelue of theſe gouernours choſen; whoſe names were as followeth. Firſt, the archbiſhop of Canturburie, the biſhop of Worceſter, Roger Bigod earle of Northfolke and marſhall of England, Simon de Mountfort earle of Leiceſter, Richard de Clare earle of Gloceſter, Humfrey Bohun earle of Hereford, the earles of Warwike and Arundell, ſir Iohn Manſell chéefe iuſtice of England, ſir Roger lord Mortimer, ſir Hugh Bigod, ſir Peter de Sauoy, ſir Iames Audeley, and ſir Peter de Mountfort. To theſe was authoritie onelie giuen to puniſh and correct all ſuch as offended in breaking of any the ordinances at this parlement eſtabliſhed.

Contention betwixt the earles of Leiceſter and Gloceſter.

The lords come to the Guildhall to haue their ordinances confirmed.

It was not long after the finiſhing of this parlement, but that ſtrife and variance began to kindle betwéene the king and the earles of Leiceſter and Gloceſter, by reaſon of ſuch officers as the ſaid earles had remooued, and put others in their roomes: among the which Iohn Manſell was diſcharged of his office, and ſir Hugh Bigod, brother to earle Marſhall, admitted in his roome. Alſo bicauſe the foreſaid gouernours had knowledge that the king minded not to performe the ordinances eſtabliſhed at Oxford, they thought to make their part as ſtrong as was poſſible for them to doo, and therefore vpon the morrow after the feaſt of Marie Magdalene, the king as then being at Weſtminſter, the earle Marſhall, the earle of Leiceſter, and diuerſe other came to the Guildhall of London, where the maior and aldermen, with the commons of the citie were aſſembled, and there the lords ſhewed the inſtrument or writing ſealed with the kings ſeale, and with the ſeales of his ſonne prince Edward, and of manie other lords of the land, conteining the articles of thoſe ordinances which had béene concluded at Oxford, willing the maior and aldermen to ſet alſo therevnto their common ſeale of the citie. The maior and aldermen vpon aduiſe amongſt them taken, required reſpit till they might know the kings pleaſure therein, but the lords were ſo earneſt in the matter, and made ſuch inſtance, that no reſpit could be had; ſo that in the end the common ſeale of the citie was put to that writing, and the maior with diuerſe of the citie ſworne to mainteine the ſame, their allegiance ſaued to the king, with their liberties and franchiſes, according to the accuſtomed manner.

Vpon the ninth day of Auguſt, proclamation was made in diuerſe places of the citie, that none of the kings takers ſhould take any thing within the citie, without the will of the owner, except two tunnes of wine, which the king accuſtomablie had of euerie ſhip comming from Burdeaux, paieng but 40 ſhillings for the tun. By meanes of this proclamation, nothing was taken by the kings officers within the citie and liberties of the ſame, except readie paiment were made in hand, which vſe continued not long. Herevpon the king held a parlement at Weſtminſter, and another at Wincheſter, or elſe prorogued and remoued the ſame thither. Alſo ſir Hugh Bigod lord chéefe iuſtice, with Roger Turkſey, and other called Itinerarij, kept the terme for plées at ſaint Sauiours: for you muſt vnderſtand, that in thoſe daies they were kept in diuerſe places of the realme, which now are holden altogither at Weſtminſter, and iudges ordeined to kéepe a circuit, as now they kéepe the aſſiſes in time of vacation. The foreſaid iudges ſitting on that maner at ſaint Sauiours, puniſhed bailiffes, and other officers verie extremelie, which were conuict afore them for diuerſe treſpaſſes, and ſpeciallie for taking of merciaments otherwiſe than law gaue them. After this, the ſame ſir Hugh came vnto the Guildhall, and there ſat in iudgement, and kept plées without order of law; yea contrarie to the liberties of the citie, he puniſhed bakers for lacke of true ſize, by the tumbrell; where before they were puniſhed by the pillorie, & manie other things he vſed after ſuch manner, more by will than good order of law.

The Poictouins ſuſpected to haue poiſoned ẏ Engliſh lords.

Walter Scotonie arreigned and condemned.

There was a bruite raiſed (whether of truth or otherwiſe we leaue to the credit of the authors) that the Poictouins had practiſed to poiſon the moſt part of the Engliſh nobilitie. Indéed diuers of them were gréeuouſlie tormented with a certeine diſeaſe of ſwelling and breaking out, ſome died, and otherſome verie hardlie eſcaped, of which number the earle of Gloceſter was one, who laie ſicke a long time at Sunning a place beſides Reading. At length he recouered: but his brother William died of the ſame diſeaſe, and vpon his death-bed laid the fault to one Walter Scotenie, as the occaſioner of his death, which afterwards coſt the ſaid Walter his life. For although he was one of the chéefe councellors, and ſteward alſo to the ſaid earle of Gloceſter, yet being had in ſuſpicion, and thervpon apprehended and charged with that crime, when in the yeare next following in Iune he came to be arreigned at Wincheſter, and put himſelfe to be tried by a iurie, the ſame pronounced him guiltie: and when thoſe that were impanneled vpon that iurie were aſked by the iudges how they vnderſtood that he ſhould be giltie, they anſwered, bicauſe that where the ſaid Walter was neuer indebted, that they could heare of, either to William de Valence, or to any of his brethren, they were fullie certified that he had late receiued no ſmall ſum of monie of the ſaid W. de Valence to poiſon both his maiſter and other of the Engliſh nobilitie as was to be thought, ſith there was no other apparant cauſe why he ſhould receiue ſuch a gift at the hands of their enimie the ſaid William de Valence, and ſo was the ſaid Walter executed at Wincheſter aforeſaid.

A late harueſt

The harueſt was verie late this yeare, ſo that the moſt part of the corne rotted on the ground, and that which at length was got in, remained yet abrode till after Alhallowentide, ſo vntemperate was the weather, with exceſſiue wet and raine beyond all meaſure. Hereupon the dearth ſo increaſed, that euen thoſe which had of late releeued other, were in danger to ſtarue themſelues. Finallie ſolemne faſts and generall proceſſions were made in diuerſe places of the realme to appeaſe Gods wrath, and (as it was thought) their praiers were heard, for the weather partlie amended, and by reaſon the ſame ſerued to get in ſome ſuch corne as was not loſt, the price thereof in the market fell halfe in halfe. A good and memorable motiue, that in ſuch extremities as are aboue the reach of man to redreſſe, we ſhould by and by haue recourſe to him that can giue a remedie againſt euerie caſualtie. For Erlotus the popes Nuncio perceiuing the trouble that was like to inſue within the realme would no longer tarie, but wiſelie departed and got him home. Herewith certeine wiſe perſonages were ſent to Rome on the part of the king and baronage, to informe the pope in what ſtate the realme ſtood, and to giue him to vnderſtand how greeuouſlie the people had beene handled by the practiſe of certeine Romane prelats promoted in this land.

Matth. Paris. The lord of Kedwellie ſlaine.

Matth. Paris.

This yeare neere to Carmardin Patrike of Chauton lord of Kedwelli, Hugh de Viun, and diuerſe other both horſmen and footmen were ſlaine through treaſon by the Welſhmen: yet it ſhould appeare by Matthew Paris that the Engliſhmen procured this miſcheefe to light on their owne heads, through their diſloiall dealing. For where they were come to the place to talke of an agreement, ſome of the marchers ſuppoſing they had beene too ſtrong for the Welſhmen, perſuaded the ſaid lord of Kedwellie to aſſaile them vpon the ſudden, in hope to haue deſtroied them all: but in the end the Engliſhmen were diſtreſſed through the valiancie of Dauid one of the ſonnes of the great Leolin and other capteines of the Welſh nation. Neuertheleſſe Matthew Weſtminſter ſaith brieflie, that the Engliſh men were treaſonablie ſlaine: ſo that it ſeemeth that Matthew Paris ſpeaketh rather of an affection and good will which he bare to the Welſh proceedings in thoſe daies, than otherwiſe.

Matth. Paris not well affected towards the gouernement of the realme as it then ſtood.

For who ſo marketh the courſe of his hiſtorie, ſhall perceiue that he had no good liking of the ſtate in thoſe daies, neither concerning the eccleſiaſticall nor temporall policie, in ſomuch that he ſticketh not to commend the Welſhmen greatlie for their holding togither, againſt the oppreſſion (as he meaneth it) of the Engliſh gouernement, and no doubt there was cauſe that mooued him to ſuch miſliking, namelie the often paiments and collections of monie by the popes agents, and other ſuch miſorders as dailie were permitted or rather mainteined to the impoueriſhing of both eſtates ſpirituall and temporall.

Godfrey de Kinton archbiſhop of Canturburie.

Godfrey de Kinton was conſecrated archbiſhop of Canturburie at Rome, about the feaſt of Chriſtmaſſe laſt paſt, and ſo returned from thence home to his cure. There was an ordinance made about this time, for puniſhment to be had of the extortion of ſhiriffes, ſo that aſwell the receiuer as the giuer of bribes was puniſhable. Which law if it were now executed vpon all officers & occupiers whatſoeuer, there would not be ſo much wealth and ſubſtance, ſo great riches and treaſure raked vp togither in the poſſeſſion of ſome few men, as the old ſage ſaieng importeth, Anno Reg. 43. Ambaſſadors ſent to the councell at Cambrey.

The biſhops of Worceſter and Lincolne, with the earles of Norfolke and Leiceſter, were ſent ouer in ambaſſage vnto a councell holden at Cambrey, for a league and peace to be concluded betwixt the kingdoms of England and France, and alſo the empire: but bicauſe the French king looked to haue the king of England there, when he heard that the ſame king came not, he alſo ſtaied at home, and ſo no concluſion followed at that aſſemblie.

Jone counteſſe of Penbroke.

Jone counteſſe of Penbroke, the wife of William de Valence the kings halfe brother, demanded hir right of dower, in ſuch lands as belonged to hir by title of inheritance. At length ſhe had to the value of fiue hundred marks aſſigned hir of the ſame lands, notwithſtanding hir heritage amounted to the ſum of a thouſand marks and aboue of yearelie reuenues, but for that ſhe ſhould not aid hir huſband with part thereof, the one halfe was thought ſufficient for hir maintenance. About Aduent next inſuing, ſhe went ouer vnto hir huſband, either for the deſire ſhe had to inioy his perſonall preſence, or for that ſhe thought hirſelfe not well dealt with, to be abridged of thoſe reuenues, which by right of inheritance were hir owne. In the firſt night of December, there chanced a maruellous ſore tempeſt of lightning and thunder, with mightie winds and raine, as a token and ſigne of the troubles that after followed, the more noted, for that thunder in the winter ſeaſon is not commonlie heard of. Guy de Rochford a Poictouin, to whom about two yeares before the king had giuen the caſtell of Rocheſter, was now baniſhed the realme, and depriued of all that he held in this land. About this ſeaſon there roſe great variance amongſt the ſcholers of Oxford being of ſundrie countries, as Scottiſhmen, Welſhmen, Northern men, and Southern men: who fell ſo farre at ſquare, that they raiſed baners one againſt an other, and fought togither, in ſomuch that diuerſe were ſlaine, and manie hurt on both parties. ¶ The Welſhmen this yeare, notwithſtanding their good ſucceſſe had in theſe late wars, conſidered with themſelues, that if the barons of England did once ioine in one knot of freendſhip, they would with maine force eaſilie ſubdue them, wherefore to preuent that which might chance vnto them by ſtubborne reſiſtance, they made ſuit to be receiued into the kings peace, offering to giue vnto him the ſumme of foure thouſand markes, and to his ſonne the lord Edward three hundred marks, and to the queene two hundred marks. Yet the king would not accept thoſe offers, and ſo the matter depended in doubtfull balance a certeine time. The Welſhmen in the meane ſeaſon attempted not any exploit, but rather ſate ſtill in hope to come at length to ſome reaſonable agreement. ¶ The moonks of Wincheſter meaning to prouide themſelues of a biſhop, now that Athelmare alias Odomare the kings halfe brother was baniſhed the realme, elected one Henrie de Wingham the kings chancellor, in hope that the K. would be contented with his election, and ſo he was, but yet conditionallie, that if the pope would allow his ſaid halfe brother for biſhop, then ſhould the other giue place.

him the biſhop of Worceſter, the abbat of ſaint Edmundſburie, Peter de Sauoy, and John Manſell, as ambaſſadours from the baronage and communaltie of the realme, to require of him an oth, to ſtand vnto and obeie the ordinances of the late parlement holden at Oxenford. When the ſaid ambaſſadors came before his preſence, and declared to him the effect of their meſſage, he beheld them with a ſterne looke, and frowning countenance, ſaieng (and binding it with an oth) that he would neither be ſworne, nor kéepe any ſuch ordinances as had béene made without his conſent; neither would he make them of counſell how long his purpoſe was to ſtaie within the realme, which the ambaſſadours required alſo to vnderſtand. Hereunto he further added, that he had no péere in England, for he was the ſonne of the deceaſed king, and brother of the king that now reigned, and alſo earle of Cornewall, and therefore if the barons of England ment to reforme the ſtate of the kingdome, their duetie had béene firſt to haue ſent for him, and not to haue procéeded ſo preſumptuouſlie in ſuch a weightie cauſe, without his preſence or conſent. When one of the ambaſſadours was about to haue made anſwer ſomewhat roundlie, and alſo nippinglie vnto this ſpéech vttered by the king of Almaine, he was ſtaied by one of his aſſociats. And ſo the ambaſſadours vnderſtanding his mind, returned with all conuenient ſpéed.

He changeth his purpoſe and commeth ouer into England.

He receiueth an oth not to infringe the ſtatutes of Oxford.

The king of Almaine had aſſembled a great hoſt of men on the further ſide the ſea, meaning with all expedition to haue paſſed hither into England: but when he had aduertiſement giuen that there was a power raiſed in England, and beſtowed both by ſea and land to reſiſt him, he changed his purpoſe by aduiſe of his fréends, ſo that he conſented to receiue ſuch manner of oth as the barons required, and herewith taking the ſea, he arriued at Douer on ſaint Julians daie with his owne houſhold-ſeruants, bringing with him no traine of ſtrangers, except onelie two earles of Almaine, which brought with them but onelie thrée knights, and he himſelfe had but eight knights: his brother king Henrie was readie to receiue him, and brought him from Douer vnto Canturburie, for neither of them was ſuffered to enter into the caſtell of Douer, the lords hauing them in a gelouſie, leaſt they ſhould be about to breake the ordinances which were concluded. On the morow after, the king of Almaine receiued the oth in the preſence of Richard earle of Gloceſter and others, within the chapter houſe of Canturburie. And on the day of the Purification of our ladie, the two kings with their quéenes and a great number of noble perſonages made their entrie and paſſage into the citie of London.

A parlement.

A peace concluded vpon betwixt the kings of England & France

The counteſſe of Leiceſter.

Contention betwixt the earles of Gloceſter and Leiceſter.

In the octaues of the ſaid Purification, the parlement began at London, to the which came the earle of Leiceſter from the parts of beyond the ſea, where he had for a certeine time remained. There came alſo an ambaſſador from the French king, one that was deane of Burges, and ſo there was an earneſt treatie had touching a peace to be concluded betwixt the two kings of England and France, which on the day of ſaint Valentine was accorded and put in articles, with condition that the ſame ſhould remaine firme and ſtable, if the kings would aſſent to that which had béene talked of and agréed vpon by their ſpeciall and ſolemne agents. For the further perfecting of this agréement and finall peace betwixt the kings of England and France, about the begining of Aprill, the earls of Gloceſter and Leiceſter, John Manſell, Peter de Sauoy, and Robert Walerane were ſent ouer into France, hauing alſo with them letters of credence, to conclude in all matters as had béene talked of by their agents. But when the counteſſe of Leiceſter would not conſent to quite claime and releaſe hir right in ſuch parcels of Normandie as belonged to hir, which king Henrie had couenanted with the reſidue to reſigne vnto the French king. The earle of Gloceſter fell at words with the earle of Leiceſter, about the ſtubborne demeanor which his wife ſhewed in that matter, and ſo by reaſon that either of them ſtood at defiance with the other (although by meane of fréends they ſtaied from further inconuenience) they returned backe without concluding any thing in that whereabout they were ſent.

The friers preachers begin to inhabit at Dunſtable.

The moonks hindred by the the comming of the friers.

About the ſame time there was a certeine manſion houſe by waie of deuotion giuen vnto the friers that are called preachers within the towne of Dunſtable, ſo that certeine of them thruſting themſelues in there, began to inhabit in that place, to the great annoiance of the prior and conuent of Dunſtable, & as it were by the example of the other order called minors (which in the laſt préceding yeare, at ſaint Edmundſburie in Suffolke had practiſed the like matter againſt the willes of the abbat and conuent there) they began to build verie ſumptuous houſes, ſo that in the eies of the beholders ſuch chargeable workes of building, ſo ſuddenlie aduanced by them that profeſſed voluntarie pouertie, cauſed no ſmall woonder. The ſaid friers building them a church with all ſpéed, and ſetting vp an altar, immediatlie began to celebrate diuine ſeruice, not once ſtaieng for the purchaſe of anie licence. And ſo building from day to day, they obteined great aid of ſuch as inhabited néere vnto them, of whome the prior and conuent ought to haue receiued the reuenues that were now conuerted to be imploied on the ſaid friers towards their maintenance. Thus by how much more their houſe increaſed, by ſo much more did the prior and conuent decreaſe in ſubſtance and poſſeſſions: for the rents which they were accuſtomed to receiue of the meſſuages and houſes giuen to the friers, were loſt, and likewiſe the offerings (which were woont to come to their hands) now theſe friers being newlie entred by occaſion of their preachings, vſurped to themſelues.

Richard Graie conſtable of the caſtell of Douer, and lord warden of the cinque ports was this yeare remooued by the lord chéefe iuſtice Hugh Bigod, who tooke into his owne hands the cuſtodie of the ſaid caſtell and ports. The cauſe whie the ſaid Richard Graie was diſcharged, we find to haue fallen out by this means. He ſuffered a frier minor called Walaſcho, comming from the pope (bicauſe he had the kings letters vnder the great ſeale) to enter the land, not ſtaieng him, nor warning the lords of his comming, contrarie (as it was interpreted) vnto the articles of their prouiſions enacted at Oxenford. This frier indéed was ſent from the pope to haue reſtored Athilmarus or Odomarus (as ſome write him) the kings halfe brother, vnto the poſſeſſions of the biſhoprike of Wincheſter, to the which he had béene long before elected. But the lords were ſo bent againſt him, that vpon ſuch ſuggeſtions as they laid forth, Walaſcho refrained from dooing that which he had in commandement, and returned to make report what he vnderſtood, ſo that Odomarus was now as farre from his purpoſe as before.

In the fortie and fourth yeare of king Henries reigne, the fridaie following the feaſt of Simon and Iude, in a parlement holden at Weſtminſter, were read in preſence of all the lords and commons, the acts and ordinances made in the parlement holden at Oxenford, with certeine other articles by the gouernours thereunto added and annexed. After the reading whereof the archbiſhop of Canturburie being reueſted with his ſuffragans to the number of nine biſhops, beſides abbats and others, denounced all them accurſſed that attempted in word or déed to breake the ſaid ſtatutes, or anie of them. In the ſame parlement was granted to the king a taſke called ſcutagium, or eſcuage, that is to ſaie, fortie ſhillings of euerie knights fée throughout England, the which extended to a great ſumme of monie. He compoundeth all differences with the French k.

Upon the ſixt day of Nouember the king came vnto Paules, where by his commandement was the folkemote court aſſembled, and the king (according to the former ordinances made) asked licence of the communaltie of the citie to paſſe the ſea, and promiſed there in the preſence of a great multitude of people, by the mouth of Hugh Bigod his chéefe iuſtice, to be good and gratious lord vnto the citie, and to mainteine the liberties thereof vnhurt. Herewith the people for ioy made a great ſhout. The eight day of Nouember he rode through the citie towards the ſea ſide, and vpon the thirtéenth daie of Nouember, he tooke the ſea at Douer and arriued at Whitſand, and ſo from thence he rode vnto Paris, where, of the French king he was moſt honorablie receiued. The cauſe of his going ouer was chéefelie to conclude ſome aſſured peace with the French king, that he ſhould not néed to doubt any forren enimies, if he ſhould come to haue warre with his owne people, whereof he ſaw great likelihoods, and therefore he made ſuch agréement with king Lewes (as in the French hiſtorie more at large appeareth) which (to be ſhort) I here omit.

This one thing is here to be noted, that beſides the monie which king Henrie had in hand, amounting to the ſumme of an hundred and fiftie thouſand crownes for his reſignation then made vnto Normandie, Aniou and Maine, it was accorded, that he ſhould receiue yearelie in name of a tribute the ſum of ten thouſand crownes. ¶ Others write that he had thrée hundred thouſand pounds of ſmall Turon monie, which he receiued in readie paiment, and was promiſed reſtitution of lands to the value of twentie thouſand pounds of yearelie rent: and that after the deceaſe of the French king, that then was, the countrie of Poictou ſhould returne vnto the Engliſh dominion. Some write that immediatlie after king Henrie had concluded his agréement, he began to repent himſelfe thereof, and would neuer receiue penie of the monie, nor leaue out in his ſtile the title of duke of Normandie. But it is rather to be thought that ſuch an agréement was at point to haue béene concluded, or at the leaſtwiſe was had in talke, but yet neuer concluded nor confirmed with hands and ſeales, as it ought to haue béene, if they had gone through with it.

Diſſention betwixt prince Edward and the earle of Gloceſter.

Prince Edward and th earle of Gloſter are not ſuffered to come with the citie of London.

In the meane time that king Henrie was thus occupied in France, diſſention fell in England betwéene prince Edward and Richard earle of Gloceſter, for the appeaſing whereof a parlement was called at Weſtminſter, to the which the lords came with great companies, and ſpeciallie the ſaid prince and earle. They intended to haue lodged within the citie: but the maior going vnto the biſhop of Worceſter, to ſir Hugh Bigod, and to ſir Philip Baſſet (vnto whome, and to the archbiſhop of Canturburie, the K. had committed the rule of the land in his abſence) required to know their pleaſure herein. Whervpon they thought it good to haue the aduiſe of Richard the king of Almaine, and therevpon went to him, where they concluded, that neither the ſaid prince nor earle nor anie of their partakers ſhould come within the citie, the gates whereof were by the maiors appointment cloſed and kept with watch and ward both day and night. Soone after alſo, for the more ſafegard of the citie, the gates were by the maiors appointment cloſed and kept with diligent watch and ward both day and night. Soone after alſo for the more ſafegard of the ſaid citie, and ſure keeping of the peace, the king of Almaine with the ſaid ſir Hugh and ſir Philip came and lodged in the citie with their companies, and ſuch other as they would aſſigne, to ſtrengthen the citie if néed required. Wherin their prouident conſent to withſtand ſo foule a miſchéefe as ſedition might haue bred in the citie, deſerueth high commendation, for it was the next waie to preſerue the ſtate thereof againſt all occaſions of ruine, to vnite harts and hands in ſo ſwéet an harmonie, which the law of nature teacheth men to doo, and as by this ſage ſentence is inſinuated and giuen to vnderſtand, Shortlie after, the king returned out of France, and about the feaſt of S. Marke came to London, and lodged in the biſhops palace. And bicauſe of certeine rumors that were ſpred abroad ſounding to ſome euill meaning, which prince Edward ſhould haue againſt his father, the king brought ouer with him a great power of men in armes being ſtrangers, howbeit he brought them not into the citie, but left them beyond the bridge in the parts of Surrie, notwithſtanding being entred the citie, he ſo kept the gates and entries, that none was permitted to enter, but ſuch as came in by his ſufferance. The earle of Gloceſter by his appointment alſo was lodged within the citie, and the prince in the palace at Weſtminſter. Shortlie after by the kings commandement he remoued to S. Iohns, & all the other lords were lodged without the citie, and the king of Almaine remoued againe to Weſtminſter. In which time a direction was taken betwéene the ſaid parties, and a new aſſemblie and parlement aſſigned to be kept in the quindene of S. Iohn Baptiſt, and after deferred or proroged till the feaſt of ſaint Edward, at the which time all things were pacified a while, but ſo as the earle of Gloceſter was put beſide the roome which he had amongſt other the péeres, and ſo then he ioined in fréendſhip with the earle of Leiceſter, as it were by way of confederacie againſt the reſidue, and yet in this laſt contention, the ſaid earle of Leiceſter tooke part with the prince againſt the earle of Gloceſter.

But now touching the barons, they proceeded in their buſineſſe which they had in hand with all earneſt diligence, of whome theſe were the cheefe that vndertooke this matter: yoong Humfrie de Boun, the lord Henrie ſon to the king of Almaine, Henrie Montford, Hugh Spenſer, Baldwin Wake, Gilbert Gifford, Richard Gray, Iohn Ros, William Marmion, Henrie Haſtings, Haimon le Strange, Iohn Fitz Iohn, Godfrey Lucie, Nicholas Segraue, Roger de Leiborne, Iohn Veſie, Roger de Clifford, Iohn de Vaus, Gilbert de Clare, Gilbert de Lacie, and Robert Vepont, the which with one generall conſent elected for their cheefe capteins and generall gouernours, Simon de Mountfort earle of Leiceſter, Gilbert of Clare earle of Gloceſter, and Robert Ferreis earle of Darbie, and Iohn earle of Warren. On the kings part theſe perſons are named to ſtand with him againſt the other. Firſt, Roger Bigod erle of Norffolke and Suffolke, Humfrie de Boun earle of Hereford, Hugh Bigod lord cheefe iuſtice, Philip Baſſet, William de Valence, Geffrey de Lucignan, Peter de Sauoy, Robert Walrand, Iohn Manſell, Geffrey Langley, Iohn Gray, William Latimer, Henrie Percie, and manie other. The barons notwithſtanding hauing aſſembled their powers, reſolued to go through with their purpoſe.

The barons that tooke pa with the kin

The barons make hauo

The firſt enterpriſe they made was at Hereford, where they tooke the biſhop of that ſee named Iohn Breton, and as manie of his canons as were ſtrangers borne. After this they tooke ſir Matthew de Bezilles ſhiriffe of Gloceſter, a ſtranger borne; and keeping on their waie towards London with baners diſplaied, ſo manie as came within their reach, whom they knew to be againſt the maintenance of the ſtatutes of Oxford, they ſpoiled them of their houſes, robbed them of their goods, and impriſoned their bodies, hauing no regard whether they were ſpirituall men or temporall. In diuerſe of the kings caſtels they placed ſuch capteins and ſoldiers as they thought conuenient, and diſplaced others whom they either knew or ſuſpected to be aduerſaries to their purpoſe.

About Midſummer when they drew neere to London, they ſent a letter to the maior and aldermen vnder the ſeale of the earle of Leiceſter, willing to vnderſtand whether they would obſerue the acts and ſtatutes eſtabliſhed at Oxford, or elſe aid and aſſiſt ſuch perſons as meant the breach of the ſame. And herewith they ſent vnto them a copie of thoſe articles, with a prouiſo, that if any of them were preiudiciall, or in any wiſe hurtfull to the realme and commonwealth, that then the ſame by the aduiſe of diſcreet perſons ſhould be amended and reformed. The maior bare this letter and the copie of the articles vnto the king, who in this meane time remained in the tower of London, togither with the queene and the king of Almaine, latelie returned out of Almaine; alſo his ſonne prince Edward, and manie other of his councell. The king aſked of the maior what he thought of thoſe articles? Who made ſuch anſwer as the king ſeemed well pleaſed therewith, and ſo permitted the maior to returne againe into the citie, who tooke much paine in keeping the citie in good quiet now in that dangerous time.

The diligence of the lord maior of London.

All ſuch the inhabitants as were ſtrangers borne, and ſuſpected to fauour either of the parties, were baniſhed the citie, but within a while after, prince Edward ſet them or the moſt part of them in offices within the caſtell of Windſore. On the ſaturdaie next after the tranſlation of ſaint Benet, as the queene would haue paſſed by water from the tower vnto Windſore, a ſort of lewd naughtipacks got them to the bridge, making a noiſe at hir, and crieng; Drowne the witch, threw downe ſtones, cudgels, dirt, and other things at hir, ſo that ſhe eſcaped in great danger of hir perſon, fled to Lambeth, and through feare to be further purſued, landed there, and ſo ſhe ſtaied till the maior of London with much adoo appeſing the furie of the people, repaired to the queene and brought hir backe againe in ſafetie vnto the tower. And (as ſome write) bicauſe the king would not ſuffer hir to enter againe into the tower, the maior conueied hir vnto the biſhop of Londons houſe by Paules, and there lodged hir.

The barons in this meane time hauing got the citie of Worceſter and Bridgenorth, with other places, were come into the ſouth parts, to the end that they might win the caſtell of Douer, and find ſome meanes to ſet the lord Henrie (ſonne to the king of Almaine that was priſoner beyond the ſeas) at libertie. In the meane time the biſhops of Lincolne, London and Cheſter, trauelled betwixt the king and barons for a peace; but the barons would not agree, except that the king and queene would firſt cauſe the lord Henrie to be ſet at libertie, and deliuer into their hands the caſtels of Windſore, Douer, and other fortreſſes, and ſend awaie all the ſtrangers, and take ſuch order that the prouiſions of Oxenford might be obſerued, as well by the king as others.

Chron. Dunſt.
Biſhops trauell to make peace.

The king although theſe conditions ſeemed verie hard and diſpleaſant to his mind, yet was he driuen to ſuch an extremitie that he granted to accept them, and ſo an agreement was made and had betwixt him and the lords. But now all the difficultie was to appeaſe the lord Edward, and to remoue the ſtrangers which he had placed in the caſtell of Windſore, which they had not onelie fortified, but alſo in manner deſtroied the towne, and doone much hurt in the countrie round about them. There were to the number of an hundred knights or men of armes (as I may call them) beſide a great number of other men of warre. But now after that the king had agreed to the peace, the barons entred the citie on the ſundaie before S. Margarets daie; and ſhortlie after the king came to Weſtminſter with the queene, and thoſe of his councell. And immediatlie herevpon, by conſent of the king and the barons, ſir Hugh Spenſer was made cheefe iuſtice and keeper of the tower. During the time that the lords remained in London, manie robberies and riots were doone within the citie, and ſmall redreſſe had in correcting the offendors, they were ſo borne out and mainteined by their maiſters and others.

Strangers keepe the caſtell of Windſore.

The great diſorder in the citie of London.

The commons of the citie were farre out of order, for in the aſſemblies and courts, as well at Guildhall as in other places, the matters and iudgement of things went by the voices of the ſimple and vndiſcreet multitude, ſo that the ſubſtantiall and worſhipfull citizens were not regarded. The barons on the morrow following the feaſt of ſaint Iames, departed from London toward Windſore, in which meane while prince Edward was gone to Briſtow, & there thinking himſelfe to be out of danger, by miſhap there roſe variance betwixt the citizens & his men, ſo that the whole citie reuolted from him, and prepared to beſiege him in the caſtell, not doubting but eaſilie to win it. When he ſaw how the world went, he ſent to the biſhop of Worceſter that was of the barons ſide, promiſing that he would agree with the barons, if he would helpe to deliuer him out of the Briſtow mens hands. The biſhop taking his promiſe conueied him foorth in ſafetie toward the court; but when he came neere vnto Windſore, he turned thither, greatlie to the miſliking of the biſhop: yet neuertheleſſe when the barons came forward to beſiege that caſtle, the lord Edward met them not farre from Kingſton, offering them conditions of peace. Some write that he was ſtaied and not ſuffered to returne againe to Windſore, after he had ended his talke with the barons: but howſoeuer it was, the caſtell was ſurrendred, with condition that thoſe that were within it ſhould ſafelie depart, and ſo they did, and were conducted to the ſea by Humfrey de Bohun the yoonger. ¶ About the ſame time, Leolin prince of Wales deſtroied the lands of prince Edward in Cheſhire, and the marſhes thereabouts. The two caſtels of Diſard and Gannoc he tooke and deſtroied, being two verie faire fortreſſes.

A parlement.

Abington.

About the feaſt of the Natiuitie of our ladie, there was a parlement holden at London, at the which all the nobles of the realme both ſpirituall and temporall were preſent; and then the citie of London, and the cinque ports ioined in league as confederats with the barons: but the king plainlie proteſted before all the aſſemblie, that by the ſtatutes and prouiſions (as they termed them) made at Oxenford, he was much deceiued. For contrarie to that which the barons had promiſed, he felt himſelfe rather charged with more debt than anie thing releeued: and therefore ſith he had obteined of the pope an abſolution of the oth both for himſelfe and his people, his requeſt was to be reſtored vnto his former eſtate of all ſuch prerogatiues as in time paſt he had inioied. The barons on the other ſide ſtiffelie mainteined, that they could not with ſafe conſciences go againſt their oth, and therefore they meant to ſtand in defenſe of the articles aforeſaid euen ſo long as they had a daie to liue.

The kings proteſtation againſt the articles at Oxenford.

Thus whileſt both parts kept ſo farre from all hope of agreement, and were now in point to haue departed in ſunder, through mediation of ſome biſhops that were preſent a peace was concluded, and the parties ſo agreed, that all matters in controuerſie touching the articles, prouiſions, and ſtatutes made at Oxenford ſhould be ordered and iudged by the French king, whom they choſe as arbitrator betwixt them. Herevpon, on the thirteenth of September, both the king and queene, with their ſonnes, and diuerſe other of the nobles of this land, tooke ſhipping, and ſailed ouer to Bullongne, where the French king as then was at a parlement, with a great number of the nobles and peeres of France. The earle of Leiceſter alſo with diuerſe of his complices went thither, and there the matter was opened, argued, and debated before the French king, who in the end vpon due examination, and orderlie hearing of the whole proceſſe of all their controuerſies, gaue expreſſe ſentence, that all and euerie of the ſaid ſtatutes and ordinances deuiſed at Oxford, ſhould be from thenceforth vtterlie void, and all bonds and promiſes made by king Henrie, or anie other for performance of them, ſhould likewiſe be adnihilated, fordoone, and clearelie cancelled.

Matth.Weſtm.

Edward, the king and the barons eftſoones met at London, holding a new parlement at Weſtminſter, but no good could be doone. Then when the king of Almaine and prince Edward, with others of the kings councell ſaw that by rapine, oppreſſion, and extortion practiſed by the barons againſt the kings ſubiects, as well ſpirituall as temporall, the ſtate of the realme and the kings honour was much decaied, and brought in manner vnto vtter ruine, they procured the king to withdraw ſecretlie from Weſtminſter vnto Windſore caſtell, of which his ſonne prince Edward had gotten the poſſeſſion by a traine. From Windſore he went to Reading, and from thence to Wallingford, and ſo to Oxford, hauing a great power with him.

The lords that reuolted to the king.

At his being at Oxford there came vnto him the lord Henrie, ſon to the king of Almaine, Iohn earle Warren, Roger Clifford, Roger Leiborne, Haimond le Strange, and Iohn de Vaux, which had reuolted from the barons to the kings ſide, Iohn Gifford alſo did the like: but he ſhortlie after returned to the barons part againe. The kings ſonne the lord Edward had procured them thus to reuolt, promiſing to euerie of them in reward by his charter of grant fiftie pounds lands to aid the king his father and him againſt the barons.

After this the king went to Wincheſter, and from thence came backe vnto Reading, and then he marched forth with his armie vnto Douer, where he could not be ſuffered to come into the caſtell, being kept out by the lord Richard Gray that was capteine there. Hervpon he returned to London, where the barons againe were entred, through fauour of the commoners, againſt the will of the cheefe citizens, and here they fell eftſoones to treat of agreement, but their talke profited nothing. And ſo in the Chriſtmaſſe weeke the king, with his ſonne prince Edward and diuerſe other of the councell ſailed ouer againe into France, and went to Amiens, where they found the French king, and a great number of his Nobles. Alſo for the barons, Peter de Montford, and other were ſent thither as commiſſioners, and as ſome write, at that preſent, to wit on the 24 daie of Ianuarie, the French king ſitting in iudgement, pronounced his definitiue ſentence on the behalfe of king Henrie againſt the barons: but whether he gaue that ſentence now, or the yeare before, the barons iudged him verie parciall, and therefore meant not to ſtand vnto his arbitrement therein.

The king hauing ended his buſineſſe with the French king, returned into England, and came to London the morrow after S. Valentines day. And about ſeuen or eight daies after, the lord Edward his eldeſt ſonne returned alſo, and hearing that the barons were gone to the marſhes of Wales (where ioining with the Welſhmen, they had begun to make warre againſt the kings freends, and namelie againſt his lieutenant Roger lord Mortimer, whome they had beſieged in the caſtell of Wigmore) the lord Edward thervpon, with ſuch power as he could get togither, marched thitherwards to raiſe their ſiege: but the lord Mortimer perceiuing himſelfe in danger, fled priuilie out of the caſtell, and got to Hereford, whither the prince was come. The barons inforced their ſtrength in ſuch wiſe that they wan the caſtell. Prince Edward on the other ſide tooke the caſtels of Haie and Huntington that belonged vnto the earle of Hereford yoong Henrie de Boun.

Matth.We The citie Gloceſter p coured, an put to fine.

The caſtell of Brecknoc was alſo deliuered into his hands, which he betooke to the keeping of the lord Roger de Mortimer, with all the territorie thereto belonging. Robert earle of Darbie that tooke part with the barons, beſieged the citie of Worceſter, and tooke it by the old caſtell, ſacked the citizens goods, and conſtreined the Iewes to be baptiſed. The citie of Gloceſter alſo was taken by the barons: but prince Edward following them and reparing the bridge ouer Seuerne, which the barons had broken downe after they were come ouer, he entred the caſtell of Gloceſter with his people. The next day by procurement of Walter biſhop of Worceſter, a truce was taken betwixt prince Edward and the barons that had taken the towne, during the which truce the barons left the towne, and the burgeſſes ſubmitted themſelues vnto prince Edward: and ſo he hauing the caſtell and towne in his hands, impriſoned manie of the burgeſſes, & fined the towne at the ſumme of a thouſand pounds. Then he drew towards his father lieng at Oxford, or at Woodſtoke, gathering people togither on ech hand.

The manou Thiſtlewo ſpoiled.

The chaf cauſe that the K. of A maine ſe ſo againſt the barons.

In the meane time the lords drew towards London, and the new aſſurance by writing indented was made betweene the communaltie of the citie and the barons, without conſent of any of the rulers of the citie. The commoners herewith appointed of themſelues two capteins, which they named conſtables of the citie, that is to ſaie, Thomas Piwelſdon & Stephan Bukerell, by whoſe commandement and tolling of the great bell of Paules all the citie was warned to be readie in harneſſe, to attend vpon the ſaid two capteins. About the beginning of Lent the conſtable of the towre ſir Hugh Spenſer, with the ſaid two capteins, and a great multitude of the citizens and others went to Thiſtleworth, and there ſpoiled the manour place of the king of Almaine, and then ſet it on fire, and deſtroied the water milles, and other commodities which he there had. This deed was the cauſe (as ſome haue iudged) of the warre that after inſued. For where before this time the ſaid king of Almaine had beene, by reaſon of the alliance betwixt him and the earle of Gloceſter, continuallie an intreater for peace, he was now euer after this time an vtter enimie vnto the barons, and vnto their ſide, ſo farre as laie in his power.

The lords that follow the king.

The king hearing of this riotous act, and being informed that Peter de Mountfort was at Northampton, aſſembling people to ſtrengthen the barons part, he got togither ſuch men of warre as he could from all places, and ſo he had with him his brother Richard king of Almaine, his eldeſt ſonne the lord Edward, William de Valence his halfe brother on the mothers ſide, & Iohn Comin of Ward in Scotland with a great number of Scots, Iohn Balioll lord of Gallowaie, Robert Bruis lord of Annandale, Roger Clifford, Philip Marmion, Iohn Vaux, Iohn Leiborne, Henrie Percie, Philip Baſſet, and Roger Mortimer.

Northampt taken by fo

Thus the king hauing theſe Noble men about him, with his armie ſped him towards Northampton, and comming thither tooke the towne by force, ſlue diuerſe, and tooke priſoners Peter Mountfort, and Simon Mountfort the earle of Leiceſters ſon, William Ferries, Baldwin Wake, with Nicholas his brother, Berengarius de Wateruile, Hugh Gubiun, Robert Buteuilein, Adam of Newmarch, Robert Newton, Philip Dribie, Grimbald Pauncefoet, Roger Beltram, Thomas Manſell, and diuerſe other, to the number of 80 knights (or as Matthew Weſtminſter hath 15 barons, and 60 knights) beſides a great number of eſquires and burgeſſes, the which were beſtowed abroad in ſundrie priſons. The towne (as ſome write) was taken by this meanes. Whileſt diuerſe of the capteins within were talking with the king on the one ſide of the towne towards the medowes, the lord Philip Baſſet approched the walles neere vnto the monaſterie of S. Andrew, and there with his people hauing ſpades, mattocks, and other inſtruments prouided for the purpoſe, vndermined a great paine of the wall, and reuerſed the ſame into ditches, making ſuch a breach, that fortie horſſemen might enter afront. Some put the blame in ſuch moonks of the abbeie as were ſtrangers, as though they ſhould prepare this entrie for the enimie: but howſoeuer it was, the king got the towne out of his enimies hands.

Scholers fight againſt the king.

This alſo is to be remembred, that where by reaſon of variance, which had chanced that yere betwixt the ſcholers of Oxford and the towneſmen, a great number of the ſame ſcholers were withdrawen to Northampton and there ſtudied. They had raiſed a banner to fight in defenſe of the towne againſt the king, and did more hurt to the aſſailants than anie other band; wherevpon the king threatned to hang them all, and ſo had he doone indeed, if by the perſuaſion of his councell he had not altered his purpoſe, doubting to procure the hatred of their freends, if the execution ſhould haue beene ſo rigorouſlie proſecuted againſt them: for there were amongſt them manie yoong gentlemen of good houſes and noble parentage. Thus was the towne of Northampton taken on a ſaturdaie being Paſſion ſundaie euen, and the morrow after the daie of S. Ambroſe which is the fift of Aprill. On the monday following, the king led his armie towards Leiceſter, where the burgeſſes receiued him into the towne at his comming thither. From thence he marched to Notingham, burning and waſting the houſes and manors of the barons and other of his enimies, and ſpeciallie thoſe that belonged to the earle of Leiceſter. Here he alſo gathered more people, and ſo increaſed his power: in ſomuch that diuerſe Noblemen, as Roger Clifford, Henrie Percie, Richard Gray, Philip Baſſet, Richard Sward, and Hubert earle of Kent, doubting the lacke of power in their companions, reuolted incontinentlie to the kings ſide.

Some write that Iohn de Balioll and Robert de Brus, and Peter de Brus, came to him here and not before Mat. VVeſt.

The caſtell of Tutburie defaced.

He ſent his ſonne prince Edward into Darbiſhire and Staffordſhire with a ſtrong power, where he waſted the manours and poſſeſſions of Robert de Ferrers earle of Darbie, and namelie he ouerthrew and defaced the caſtell of Tutburie. Whereſoeuer the kings armie, or that which his ſonne prince Edward led, chanced to come, there followed ſpoiling, burning and killing. The barons on the other ſide ſate not ſtill, for the lord Iohn Gifford, with others that were appointed by the earle of Leiceſter to keepe Killingworth caſtell (which was furniſhed with all things neceſſarie, maruellouſlie, and with ſuch ſtrange kind of engines as had not beene lightlie heard of nor ſeene in theſe parts) tooke by a policie the caſtell of Warwike, and William Manduit earle of Warwike, with his wife and familie within it; and leading them to Killingworth, there cōmitted them to priſon. The cauſe was, for that they ſuſpected him that he would take part with the king againſt them. The caſtell of Warwike they raced downe, leaſt the kings people ſhould take it for their refuge. In the Paſſion weeke the Iewes that inhabited in London being detected of treaſon, which they had deuiſed againſt the barons and citizens, were ſlaine almoſt all the whole number of them, and great riches found in their houſes, which were taken and caried awaie by thoſe that ranſacked the ſame houſes.

After Eaſter the erle of Leiceſter, hauing London at his commandement, went to Rocheſter and beſieged that citie, but the capteine thereof Iohn earle of Warren did manfullie reſiſt the enimies; till the king aduertiſed thereof, with the power of the marſhes of the north parts and other came and remoued the ſiege. This doone, he left a conuenient garriſon within the citie to defend it, and comming to Tunbridge, wan the caſtell, and taking the counteſſe of Gloceſter that was within it, permitted hir to depart. This doone, he repaired to the ſea ſide towards France, to ſtaie there till his brethren, Geffrey and Guie, the ſonnes of the earle of Marſh ſhould arriue with ſome band of ſouldiers, for whom he had now ſent and reuoked into the realme, being latelie before baniſhed by the Nobles, as before yee haue heard. They ſhortlie after landed, wherevpon the king hauing his power increaſed, came to Lewes, and pight downe his field not farre from that towne.

The kings halfe brethren come out of France to his aid.

The king incampeth at Lewes.

In the end of Aprill the barons hearing where the king was, departed from London with a great multitude of the citizens, whom they placed in the vantward, and marched foorth towards the king, and comming neere to the place where he was lodged, ſet downe their tents, and incamped themſelues a little beſide him. Either here or by the waie as they came forward, the barons deuiſed a letter, and ſent it vnto the king, conteining an excuſe of their doings, and a declaration of their well meanings, both towards him, and the wealth of the realme; and heerewith accuſed thoſe that were about him, and with euill counſell miſinformed him, both againſt them, againſt the publike wealth of the land, and his owne honor. This letter was dated the tenth of Maie, and ſubſcribed with the names of a great number of noble men, of the which the more part doo here inſue, but yet not all; Sir Simon de Montfort earle of Leiceſter and high ſteward of England, ſir Gilbert de Clare earle of Gloceſter, Robert Ferrers earle of Darbie, Hugh Spenſer lord cheefe iuſtice, & Henrie Montfort ſonne and heire to the earle of Leiceſter, Richard Grey, Henrie Haſtings, Iohn Fitz Iohn, Robert de Veepont, Iohn Giuuile, Robert Roos, William Marmion, Baldwine Wake, Gilbert Gifford, Nicholas de Segraue, Godfrey de Lucie, Iohn de Veiſie, William de Mountchenſie, with other. The king anſwered this letter, in charging them with rebellion, and mouing of open war againſt him, to the great diſquieting of the realme. Alſo he laid vnto their charge, the burning of the manours, houſes and places of his nobles and councellors; and herewith defied them by the ſame anſwer, which was dated at Lewes aforeſaid on the twelfth of Maie.

Alſo the king of Romanes, and prince Edward ſent their defiance to the barons at the ſame time in writing vnder their ſeales, for that the barons in their letter to the king, had burthened them and other with miſleading the king with vntrue informations and ſiniſter counſell. Thus as they writ to and fro ſuch nipping letters, all the treatie of peace was forgotten and laid aſide, ſo that they prepared to battell. The king had indeed the greater number of armed men, but manie of them were vnfaithfull, and cared not greatlie though the loſſe fell to his ſide, and ſo whileſt they went to it without order, & vnaduiſedlie, they fought at aduenture, & continued but faintly. His capteines made three battels of their armie, the lord Edward led the foreward, and with him William de Valence earle of Penbroke, and Iohn de Warren erle of Surrey and Suſſex. Herevpon prince Edward now to be reuenged of them, after they began to flie, moſt egerlie following them, chaſed & ſlue them by heaps. But whileſt he ſeparated himſelfe by ſuch earneſt following of the Londoners tóo farre from the reſidue of the kings armie, he was the onelie cauſe of the loſſe of that field: for the earle of Leiceſter, perceiuing that the prince with the chiefeſt force of the kings armie was thus gone after the Londoners (of whom he made no great account) he exhorted his people to ſhew their valiancie at that inſtant, and ſo comming vpon his aduerſaries with great courage, in a moment put them to flight. There were taken the king of Almaine, the lords Iohn de Burgh and Philip Baſſet with all other the chiefeſt that were about the king, but the king himſelfe retired with thoſe few about him that were left, into the priorie of Lewes, and other there were that withdrew into the caſtell. The barons purſuing them, entered the towne, and tóoke or ſlue ſo manie as they found within the caſtell and priorie. At length, prince Edward returned from the chaſe of the Londoners, whom he had purſued for the ſpace of foure miles, and finding the field loſt, began a new battell: but the earle of Surrie, William de Valence, and Guy de Lucignan, with Hugh Bigod and others, hauing with them thrée hundred armed men, ſtreightwaies fled vnto the caſtell of Pemſie. Prince Edward then perceiuing ſlaughter to be made on each hand, caſt about the towne, and with his companie got into the priorie to his father.

Friers ſuborned to treat a peace.

In the meane time the barons gaue aſſault to the caſtell, but they within valiantlie defended themſelues, with whoſe hardie dóings prince Edward incouraged, gathered his people togither againe, and meant eftſóones to giue battell; but the ſubtill head of the earle of Leiceſter beguiled them all, for he cauſed certeine friers to take in hand to be intreators betwixt them, which comming to the king and to the prince his ſonne, declared that the barons, to auoid that more chriſtian bloud ſhould not be ſpilt, would be contented to haue the matter put in compromiſe of indifferent perſons; but if it were ſo, that the king and his ſonne would néeds ſtand to the vttermoſt triall of battell, they would not faile but ſtrike off the heads of the king of Almaine and other priſoners, which they would ſet vpon the ends of their ſpeares in ſtéed of ſtandards.

The king and his people hauing the reſpect of pitie before their eies, changed their purpoſed intent to fight, and falling to a parle (which continued for the moſt part of all the night next following) at length it was agréed vpon, that the French king with thrée prelats and thrée other noble men of the temporaltie, ſhould chóoſe forth and name two noble men of France, which comming into England ſhould take a third perſon to them whom they thought góod, and they thrée ſhould haue the hearing of all controuerſies betwixt the king and the barons, and what order ſo euer they tóoke therein, the ſame ſhould ſtand, and be receiued for a perfect concluſion and ſtable decrée. This agréement was confirmed, and prince Edward and Henrie ſonne to the king of Almaine were appointed to remaine as hoſtages with the barons.

Lords ta on the ki ſide.

¶ Other write otherwiſe of this battell at Lewes, affirming, that not onelie the king of Romans, but alſo king Henrie himſelfe, hauing his owne horſſe thruſt through on both ſides, was taken, and likewiſe his ſonne prince Edward with other on their ſide, to the number of fiue and twentie barons and bannerets: and that moreouer, there died on the kings ſide that day in the battell and chaſe, ſix thouſand and fiue hundred men, as Polydor noteth: howbeit, Richard Southwell ſaith, there died on both parts onlie 3400. But Matth. Weſtminſter writeth, that as the report went, there died fiue thouſand on both ſides, and amongſt other, theſe he nameth as chéefe, William de Wilton one of the kings iuſtices, & the lord Fouke Fitz Waren a baron that tóoke the kings part. On the barons ſide, the lord Raſe Heringander a baron alſo, and William Blunt the earles ſtandardbearer. Of them that were taken on the kings ſide, beſide ſuch as before are recited, we find theſe named, Humfrie de Bohun earle of Hereford, William lord Bardolfe, Robert lord of Tatſhale, Roger lord Somerie, Henrie lord Percie, Iohn de Balioll, Robert de Bruis, and Iohn Comin, with other barons of Scotland, hauing loſt all their footmen whom they had brought with them to the kings aid.

Moreouer, it ſhould appeare by ſome writers, that the king being thus in captiuitie, was conſtreined to make a new grant, that the ſtatutes of Oxford ſhuld ſtand in force, and if any were thought vnreaſonable, the ſame ſhould be reformed by foure Noble men of the realme of France, two of the ſpiritualtie and two of the temporaltie. And if thoſe foure could not agrée, then the earle of Aniou and the duke of Burgoigne ſhuld be iudges in the matter. ¶ But if either thoſe or the other were appointed to be arbitrators, like it is, that the former report touching the ſucceſſe of the battell is true; for if both the king and his ſonne had béene taken priſoners in the field, the barons would ſuerlie haue conſtreined him to haue conſented to the obſeruance of the ſtatutes, without putting the ſame in compromiſe, to be altered at the diſcretion of any arbitrators, and namelie ſtrangers.

Peace p claimed.

A new o of the bar

But howſoeuer it was, on the tueſday before the Aſcenſion day, peace was proclaimed in London, betwéene the king and the barons; and wheras the king either by conſtreint for ſafegard of himſelfe or his fréends, either vpon aſſurance of the barons promiſe, committed himſelfe vnto the companie of the ſame barons, at their comming with him to London they went from this laſt agréement, and forthwith deuiſed other ordinances as thus. They ordeined, that two earles and a biſhop, which being elected out by the communaltie, ſhould chóoſe to them nine other perſons, and of theſe, thrée of them ſhould ſtill remaine about the king, and by their order and the other nine, all things ſhould be gouerned both in the court and in the realme. They conſtreined the king and his ſonne prince Edward (menacing to depoſe the one, and to kéepe the other in perpetuall priſon) to conſent and agrée to this laſt ordinance: and ſo the earles of Leiceſter and Gloceſter, and the biſhop of Chicheſter were ordeined there the chéefe rulers, and letters ſent with all ſpéed vnto the cardinall Sabinenſis the popes legat, and to the king of France, to ſignifie to them, that the compromiſe agréed vpon at Lewes was vtterlie reuoked, and that a new peace in fréendlie wiſe was concluded.

But although the biſhops of London, Wincheſter, and Worceſter inſtantlie required the ſaid legat, that he would helpe to further the ſame peace, yet he ſore rebuked them, in that they would giue their conſent, ſo much to abaſe and bring vnder the kings roiall power. And bicauſe he might not be ſuffered to enter the realme, he firſt cited them to appeare before him at Bullongne. And whereas they ſéemed to contemne his authoritie, and appeared not, he both ſuſpended the ſaid thrée biſhops, and excommunicated the ſaid earles of Leiceſter and Gloceſter, and their complices, with the citie of London, and the cinque ports: but the foreſaid biſhops, earles and barons, feigning to make their appeales to the popes conſiſtorie, or if néed were, vnto a generall councell and ſo forth, though indéed truſting more to the temporall ſword, than fearing the ſpirituall, they did not forbeare to ſaie and heare diuine ſeruice in churches and elſe-where, as before they had doone, till the comming of the cardinall Othobone.

The Londoners ſpoiled at Croidon.

The capteines and men of warre, whom the king had left at Tunbridge, immediatlie vpon the agréement concluded betwixt the king and the barons, were commanded by the K. to depart, & repaire euerie man to his home; but they fearing the malice of their enimies, would not breake in ſunder, but kéeping togither, went ſtrait to Briſtowe, and there remained, till the lord Edward the kings ſonne was eſcaped out of captiuitie. But this is to be remembred, that before their departure from Tunbridge, when by report of William de Saie, who eſcaping from the battell at Lewes, was come thither, they vnderſtood how the matter had paſſed on both ſides, and that the Londoners being chaſed out of the field, were lodged at Croidon, about the euening tide they came thither, and aſſailing them in their lodgings, ſlue manie, and wan a great ſpoile. The earle of Leiceſter and the barons hauing the rule of the king and realme in their hands, ſought to oppreſſe all ſuch as they knew to be againſt them, and not to like of their procéedings; namelie, the northerne lords, and thoſe of the marſhes of Wales, as the lord Mortimer and others: but waxing herewith wilfull, they vſed things with ſmall diſcretion, which at length brought them to confuſion. For the foure ſonnes of the earle of Leiceſter, Henrie, Guie, Simon, and an other Henrie, which had ſerued right worthilie indéed on the daie of the battell, began to waxe ſo proud, that in compariſon of themſelues, they deſpiſed all others.

Matt. West.

The earle of Darbie commeth to Cheſter with 20 thouſand men.

The lords of the marſhes of Wales, as Roger de Mortimer, James de Audelie, Roger de Clifford, Roger de Leiborne, Haimon le Strange, Hugh Turberuile, and other that had eſcaped from the battell at Lewes, began to make againſt them that had thus vſurped the rule of the land, vnder colour of hauing the king in their hands. The earle of Leiceſter aduertiſed hereof, ioined in league with Leolin prince of Wales, and comming with the king into thoſe parts, entered into the caſtell of Hereford, into the which he remoued the lord Edward from Douer, where he was firſt kept in ward, after he had yéelded himſelfe at Lewes. After this, the earle of Leiceſter recouered the caſtell of Haie, and waſting the lands and manours of the lord Mortimer, conſtreined Hugh Mortimer to yéeld himſelfe, ſo that his caſtell called Richar, and other his poſſeſſions, were committed to the kéeping of the lord John Fitz John. Robert de Ferrers earle of Darbie, with a great puiſſance of horſſemen and footmen came to Cheſter, in fauour of the earle of Leiceſter, againſt whome although William de Couſche, and Dauid brother to the prince of Wales, taking the contrarie part with the lord James Audelie and other, came to incounter, yet they durſt not abide him, but fled, and loſt an hundred of their men.

Chr. Dunſtab.

In the meane time, the earle of Leiceſter procéeding in his buſineſſe, wan the caſtell of Ludlow, and after marching towards Montgomerie, whither the lords Roger de Mortimer, and James Audelie were withdrawne, he conſtreined them at length to a feigned agréement, ſo that they gaue hoſtages, promiſing to come to the next parlement that was appointed to be holden, where they were baniſhed the land for a twelue moneths, and all the caſtels on the marſhes, in manner from Briſtow to Cheſter, were deliuered to the earle. After this (as by Nicholas Triuet it appeareth) there was a great aſſemblie of men of warre made out of all parts of the realme, to reſiſt ſuch ſtrangers as the quéene (remaining in the parts beyond the ſeas) had got togither, meaning to ſend them into England to aid the king againſt the barons, and for that purpoſe had cauſed a great number of ſhips to be brought into the hauen of Dam. But now that the king was in the barons hands, and that ſuch a multitude of horſſemen and footmen were aſſembled on Barham-downe (as a man would not haue thought had béene poſſible to haue found within the whole relme) to reſiſt the landing of thoſe ſtrangers, the ſaid ſtrangers were ſent home againe, without hauing doone anie pleaſure to the quéene, other than ſpent hir monie. The king held his Chriſtmas at Woodſtoke; and the earle of Leiceſter, who ſéemed then to rule the whole realme, kept his Chriſtmaſſe at Killingworth.

After this, a parlement was holden at London in the octaues of ſaint Hilarie, and manie things were concluded, couenants accorded, and oths taken for performance by the K. and his ſonne prince Edward, which ſhortlie after came to little effect. Yet prince Edward, and Henrie the ſonne and heire of the king of Almaine, which had béene kept as pledges about the tearme of nine moneths and od daies, were in the Lent following ſet at libertie, vpon aſſurance made, that the ſaid prince Edward ſhould remaine in the kings court, and not depart from thence without licence of the king and certeine of the barons. He was alſo conſtreined to giue vnto the earle of Leiceſter the countie Palantine of Cheſter, before he might obteine to haue ſo much libertie. Betwéene Eaſter and Whitſuntide, the earles of Leiceſter and Gloceſter fell at variance, through the preſumptuous demeanour of the earle of Leiceſters ſonnes, and alſo bicauſe the earle of Leiceſter would not deliuer the king of Almaine and other priſoners vnto the earle of Gloceſter, requiring to haue the cuſtodie of them, bicauſe he had taken them in the battell at Lewes.

Prince Edward eſcapeth awaie.

Matth. West.

The earle of Gloceſter, perceiuing himſelfe not well vſed, ſecretlie entred into confederacie with the lord Mortimer, and other of the marſhes: wherevpon the earle of Leiceſter hauing thereof ſome inkeling, came to Hereford, in purpoſe to haue taken the earle of Gloceſter, and to haue put him in ſafe kéeping, as latelie before he had ſerued the earle of Darbie. But by the practiſe of the lord Mortimer, ſhortlie after the lord Edward or prince Edward (whether yée liſt to call him) aſſaieng abroad in the fields an horſſe or two, ſuch as he ſhould vſe at iuſts and tornies, which were appointed to be holden, he mounted at length vpon a light courſer, which the ſaid lord Mortimer had ſent to him; and bidding the lord Robert Roos and other (that were appointed to attend on him, as his kéepers) farewell, he galloped from them, and could not be ouertaken of them that purſued him, till at length he came to the lord Mortimer, who with a great troope of men was come forth of his caſtell of Wigmore to receiue him. This was on the thurſdaie in Whitſunwéeke.

About the ſame time, the earle of Warren, with William de Valence earle of Penbroke, the kings halfe brother, and others, who (as yée haue heard) fled from the battell at Lewes, were now returned into the realme, landing firſt in Southwales with a power of croſſebowes and other men of warre, the which hearing that the lord Edward was thus eſcaped out of captiuitie, came to Ludlow, and there ioined with him, and ſo likewiſe did the earle of Gloceſter. Now after they had communed togither, and were made freends and confederats, they cauſed all the bridges to be broken, that the enimies ſhould not come to oppreſſe them, till they had aſſembled all their forces, and paſſing forward towards Gloceſter, wan the citie, and ſtill came people vnto them from all ſides, namelie thoſe lords and capteins, which all the time ſince the battell of Lewes had laine in Briſtow. After this they came to Worceſter, and entred there alſo. When the earle of Leiceſter was hereof aduertiſed (who in all this meane time by order taken, was about the king, and ruled all things in the court) he ſent in all haſt vnto his ſonne Simon de Montfort to raiſe a power of men, the which accordinglie aſſembled to him much people, and comming with the ſame vnto Wincheſter, wan the citie by ſurrender, ſpoiled it, and ſlue the more part of the Iewes that inhabited there. Then he laid ſiege to the caſtell, but hearing a feined rumor that prince Edward was comming thither with his power, he departed from thence with his companie, and went to Killingworth.

On the laſt day of Iulie, prince Edward with his hoſt came to Killingworth aforeſaid, and there fighting with the ſaid Simon de Montfort and his armie, with little ſlaughter diſcomfited the ſame, and tooke priſoners the erle of Oxford, the lords William de Montchenſie, Adam de Newmarch, Baldwine Wake, and Hugh Neuill, with diuerſe others: the lord Simon himſelfe fled into the caſtell, and ſo eſcaped. In this meane while the earle of Leiceſter hauing raiſed his power, came to the caſtell of Monmouth, which the earle of Gloceſter had latelie taken and fortified: but they that were within it being driuen to yéeld, it was now raced downe to the ground. This doone, the earle of Leiceſter entring into Glamorganſhire, and ioining his power with the prince of Wales, waſted and burned the lands of the ſaid earle of Gloceſter: but hearing what his aduerſaries went about in other places, he returned from thence, and came forward towards the ſaid prince Edward, who likewiſe made towards him, and at Eueſham they met on the ſixt day of Auguſt, where was fought a verie fierce and cruell battell betwixt the parties.

¶ Some write, that the earle of Leiceſter placed king Henrie in the front of his battell, whom he had there with him as captiue, and had arraied him in his owne cote-armour, that if fortune went againſt him, whileſt the enimies ſhould be earneſt to take the king bearing the ſemblance of the chéefe capteine, he might himſelfe eſcape: but king Henrie, when they came to ioine, fought not, but called to his people, and declared who he was, whereby he eſcaped the danger of death, for being knowne of them he was ſaued. The Welſhmen which in great numbers the earle of Leiceſter had there on his ſide, at the firſt onſet fled and ran awaie; which their demeanor, when the earle ſaw, he exhorted thoſe that were about him to plaie the men, and ſo ruſhing forth into the preaſe of his enimies, he was incloſed about and ſlaine, togither with his ſonne Henrie. Herevpon, his death being knowne, his people tooke them to flight as men vtterlie diſcomfited. There died in that battell about 4000 men (as Polydor ſaith.) But Richard Southwell ſaith, there were killed of knights or rather men of armes 180, and of yeomen or rather demilances 220, of Welſhmen 5000, and of ſuch footmen as were of the earle of Leiceſters owne retinue 2000, ſo that there died in all to the number of ten thouſand men, as the ſame Southwell affirmeth. Among whom of noblemen, theſe are reckoned, Hugh Spenſer lord chéefe iuſtice, the lord Raſe Baſſet, the lord Peter de Montfort, the lord Iohn Beauchampe, ſir William Yorke, the lord Thomas de Eſterlie, the lord Walter de Creppings, Guie de Balioll a Frenchman, the lord William de Mandeuill, the lord Roger S. The earle of Leiceſter ſlaine.

Math. Weſt.

This ruine fell to the barons by the diſcord which was ſprong latelie before, betwixt the earles of Leiceſter and Gloceſter, through the inſolencie and pride of the earle of Leiceſters ſonnes, who (as I ſaid before) deſpiſing other of the nobilitie, and forgetting in the meane time the nature of true and vnſtained nobleneſſe, whereof it is ſaid and trulie remembred, that

Nobilitas morum plus ornat quàm genitorum, ſpake manie reprochfull words by the ſaid earle of Gloceſter, and vſed him in ſuch euill ſort, that he vpon diſpleaſure thereof, had not onelie procured the ſcape of prince Edward, but ioined with him in aid, againſt the ſaid earle of Leiceſter, and other of the barons, to the vtter confuſion, both of them and of their cauſe. The bodie of the ſame earle was ſhamefullie abuſed & cut in peeces, his head and his priuie members were cut off, and faſtened on either ſide of his noſe, and preſented vnto the wife of the lord Roger Mortimer.

The pride of the earle of Leiceſters ſons bringeth the barons to confuſion.

The people conceiued an opinion, that this earle being thus ſlaine, fighting in defenſe of the liberties of the realme, & performance of his oth, as they tooke it, died a martyr: which by the bruted holineſſe of his paſſed life and miracles aſcribed to him after his death, was greatlie confirmed in the next age. But the feare of the kings diſpleaſure ſtaied the people from haſtie honouring him as a ſaint at this time, where otherwiſe, they were inclined greatlie thereto, reputing him for no leſſe in their conſcience, as in ſecret talke they would not ſticke to vtter. There were wounded & taken, beſides the other that were ſlaine at that battell of Eueſham, Guie de Montfort, the earle of Leiceſters ſonne, the lords Iohn Fitz Iohn, Henrie de Haſtings, Humfrie de Bohun the yoonger, Iohn de Veſcie, Peter de Montfort the yoonger, and Nicholas de Segraue with others. The king being deliuered out of his aduerſaries hands, and likewiſe the king of Romans, went vnto Warwike, and there increaſing his power, determined to purſue his enimies.

But firſt, about the Natiuitie of our ladie was a parlement holden at Wincheſter, where the ſtatuts of Oxford were cléerelie repealed. Alſo, all ſuch as had fauoured the barons, and were as then either in priſon or abroad, ſhould be diſherited. It was alſo ordeined at this parlement, that the wealthieſt citizens of London ſhould be caſt into priſon, and that the citie ſhould be depriued of hir liberties. Alſo, that the ſtulps and cheins, wherewith the ſtréets were fenſed, ſhould be had awaie, bicauſe that the citizens had aided the earle of Leiceſter againſt the king and his realme. All this was doone, for the chéefe citizens were committed to ward within the caſtle of Windſor, till they had paid no ſmall ſummes of monie for their fines. The liberties of the citie were ſuſpended, and the towre of London was made ſtronger by the ſtulps and cheins which were brought into it out of the citie. The cheefeſt of them was Robert erle of Ferrers, who neuertheleſſe was reſtored to his lands, but yet with condition, that if afterwards he fell into the like crime, he ſhould forfeit his earldome for euer. The Londoners with much adoo, at length, obteined pardon of the king. The maior and aldermen of the citie were glad to ſubmit themſelues, though the commons, without conſideration of the great perill which they were in, would haue ſtood ſtill at defiance with the king, and defended the citie againſt him. It was no maruell though they were of diuerſe and contrarie opinions, for in thoſe daies, the citie was inhabited with manie and ſundrie nations which then were admitted for citizens. At length, vpon their ſubmiſſion, the king tooke them to mercie, vpon their fine, which was ſeized at twentie thouſand marks.

Cardinall Othobone the popes legat.
Fabian.

About Alhallowentide, cardinall Othobone came from the pope into England as his legat, to helpe towards ſome agreement to be had betwixt the king and his barons. He was committed to priſon (as ſome write) by the Londoners, for that he ſpake againſt their doings, when they ſhut their gates againſt the king; but he was ſhortlie releaſed as ſhould appeare. On the ſixt day of Nouember in the fiftith yeare of his reigne, king Henrie came to Weſtminſter, and ſhortlie after, he gaue awaie the number of threeſcore houſes, with the houſhold ſtuffe in the ſame conteined, ſo that the owners were compelled to redeeme them againe of thoſe his ſeruants, to whome he had giuen the ſaid houſes, togither with all ſuch lands, goods and cattels, as the ſame citizens had within any part of England. Then was one called ſir Othon made cuſtos or gardian of the citie, who was alſo coneſtable of the tower, he choſe to be bailiffes, and to be accomptable to the kings vſe, John Adrian, and Walter Henrie, citizens of the ſame citie. The king alſo tooke pledges of the beſt mens ſonnes of the citie, which pledges he cauſed to be put in the tower, and there kept at the coſts of their parents. ¶ The king by aduiſe of his councell ordeined, that within euerie ſhire of the relme, there ſhould be a capteine or lieutenant appointed with neceſſarie allowance of the king for his charges, the which, with the aſſiſtance of the ſhiriffe, ſhould puniſh and keepe downe the wicked outrage of theeues and robbers, which in time of the late ciuill warres were ſprong vp in great numbers, and growen to exceeding great boldneſſe; but now, through feare of deſerued puniſhment, they began to ceaſſe from their accuſtomed rapine, and the kings power came againe in eſtimation, ſo that peace after a manner tooke new root and increaſe.

Vpon S. Nicholas euen, the king departed from Weſtminſter, towards Northampton, where the cardinall Othobone held a ſynod, and according to that he had in commandement, pronounced all the kings aduerſaries accurſſed, and namelie all the biſhops which had aided the barons againſt the king, in time of the late warres, of whome afterward he abſolued the moſt part. But John biſhop of Wincheſter, Henrie biſhop of London, and Stephan biſhop of Chicheſter were ſent to Rome, to purchaſe their abſolution of pope Clement the fourth, as well for other points of diſobedience, as cheeflie for that, where the queene had procured a curſſe of pope Vrbane the fourth, that was predeceſſor to this Clement, to accurſſe all the barons and their ſupporters, which warred againſt the king hir huſband: the ſaid biſhops (to whome the commiſſion was ſent to denounce that curſſe) for feare of the barons deferred the execution. Walter biſhop of Worceſter, chancing to fall ſicke at that time, died about the beginning of Februarie, confeſſing firſt, that he had greeuouſlie erred, in mainteining the ſide of the erle of Leiceſter againſt the king, and therefore directed his letters to the popes legat, requiring to be abſolued, which his petition the legat granted. Whileſt the king laie at Northampton, the lord Simon de Montfort put himſelfe vpon the doome and order of the legat Othobone, and was therefore permitted to be at large in the kings court: but at the kings comming to London, he ſuddenlie departed out of the court, and rode to Winchelſie, where he aſſociated himſelfe with rouers, and after ſome prices taken, departed from them, and went into France, where he offered his ſeruice to the French king, and was receiued. Thus ſaith Matthew Weſtminſter, and other. But Polydor ſaith, that by Othobons means, he was reconciled to the kings fauour; and therevpon to auoid occaſion of further diſpleaſure, he commanded, that the caſtell of Killingworth ſhould be reſtored vnto the king, which the capteine refuſed to deliuer, hauing fortified it with all manner of prouiſion, and things neceſſarie to defend a ſiege.

The wardens of the cinque ports, which (during the time of the barons warre) had doone manie roberies on the ſea, as well againſt the Engliſhmen as other, were at length reconciled to the king, who was faine to agree with them vpon ſuch conditions as they thought good, bicauſe at that time (as the cōmon fame went) they had the dominion of the ſea in their owne hands. But in ſome writers we find it thus recorded, that when certeine priſoners which were kept by the barons of the cinque ports in the caſtell of Douer, heard how all things proſpered on the kings ſide, they got poſſeſſion of a tower within the ſame caſtell, and tooke vpon them to defend it againſt their keepers; whereof when aduertiſement was giuen to the king and to his ſonne the lord Edward, they haſted forth to come & ſuccour their freends. The keepers of the caſtell, perceiuing themſelues beſet with their enimies, ſent to the king for peace, who granting them pardon of life and limme, with horſſe, armour and other ſuch neceſſaries, the caſtell was yeelded vnto his hands. From thence, prince Edward departing, viſited the ſea coaſts, puniſhing diuerſe of the inhabitants within the precinct of the cinque ports, and putting them in feare, receiued diuerſe to the king

Prince Edward in paſſing through the forreſt of Aulton, got ſight of ſir Adam Gurdon one of the diſherited men, with whome he coped and tooke him priſoner with his owne hand, yet ſauing him, and pardoning the offenſe of rebellion, in reſpect of the valiancie which he tried by proofe to reſt in him: but his ſoldiers and complices being there taken, he cauſed to be hanged vpon trees within the ſame forreſt. Robert earle Ferrers contrarie to his oth of late receiued, accompanied with the lord d'Euille and others, did much hurt by way of open war againſt the kings freends in the north parts. Againſt whom the lord Henrie, ſonne to the king of Almaine was ſent with a great power: the which comming to Cheſterfield fell vpon his enimies in ſuch wiſe on the ſudden, that they had not time to arme themſelues, and ſo were diſtreſſed and ouercome.

Yet the lord Iohn d'Euille brake out, and incountring with ſir Gilbert Hanſard, ouerthrew him, and eſcaped out of danger. Great ſlaughter was made on ech hand, and in the meane while the Nobles and gentlemen ſought to get out of perill by flight. The earle of Darbie got into a church, but he was deſcried by a woman, and ſo was taken. There were manie other alſo taken: & amongſt them the lord Baldwine Wake, and ſir Iohn de la Haie with much paine eſcaped. This battell was foughten about the midſt of Maie, or vpon Whitſun eeue, as the Chronicle of Dunſtable ſaith. Thoſe that eſcaped, as the lord Iohn d'Euille and others, gaue not ouer yet, but aſſembling themſelues togither in companies, keeping within woods and other deſert places, brake out oftentimes, and did much miſcheefe. On the ninth of Auguſt they tooke the Ile of Elie, and ſo ſtrengthned it, that they held it a long time after, ſpoiling and robbing the countries round about them, as Norffolke, Suffolke, and Cambridgeſhire.

The biſhop of Elie had vndertaken to keepe the Ile to the kings vſe, but being now diſpoſſeſſed thereof, he got him awaie, and fell to curſing them that were thus entred againſt his will, but they ſeemed to paſſe litle vpon his thundering excommunications. On the 16 of December, they came to the citie of Norwich; and ſpoiling it, tooke manie of the wealthie citizens, and ranſomed them at great ſummes of monie. The lord Henrie Haſtings and Simon de Pateſhull, with diuerſe others, got them into the caſtell of Killingworth, and dailie went forth at their pleaſures, ſpoiling and waſting the townes about them, or cauſing them to fine with them to be ſpared. And this they forced not to doo, although the lord Edmund the kings ſonne laie in Warwike, to cut them ſhort of ſuch their licentious doings. The king therfore mening to haue the ſaid caſtels of Killingworth by force, began his ſiege about the ſame vpon the eeuen of S. Iohn Baptiſt. But the lord Henrie Haſtings, the capteine of that caſtell, and other his complices defended it ſo ſtronglie, that though the king inforced his power to the vttermoſt to win it of them, yet could he not anie thing preuaile, till at length vittels began to faile them within, and then vpon the eeuen of ſaint Thomas the apoſtle before Chriſtmaſſe, the lord Henrie Haſtings deliuered the ſaid caſtell into the kings hands, vpon condition that he and all other ſhould haue life and limme, horſſe and armour, with all things within the place to them belonging. And thus this ſiege had continued from the 26 of Iune vnto the 20 day of December.

Earle Fer rers diſheri ted.

¶ Here is to be remembred, that at the beginning of the ſiege, there were within the caſtell a thouſand and ſeuen hundred armed men, and eight ſcore women, beſide lackies and coiſterels. Here is alſo to be remembred, that whileſt the ſiege laie before Killingworth, by the aduiſe of the kings councell, and of the legat Othobone, there were twelue peeres appointed and choſen forth, which ſhould deuiſe and make ordinances touching the ſtate of the realme, and the diſherited perſons, who according to their commiſſion, ordeined certeine prouiſions, the which are conteined within the ſtatute intituled Dictum de Killingworth. The king after that the caſtell of Killingworth was deliuered to his hand, left therein his ſonne Edmund, and went himſelfe to Couentrie or (as other haue) to Oxford, and there held his Chriſtmaſſe. Shortlie after comming to Weſtminſter he held a parlement there, ſtudieng to ſet a quietneſſe in all matters and controuerſies depending betwixt him and the barons. In this parlement ſentence was giuen againſt earle Ferrers for the forfeiture of his earledome: then was Edmund the kings yoonger ſonne put in poſſeſſion both of the earledome of Darbie and Leiceſter.

The earle Gloceſte with an a commeth London.

On the firſt of Februarie being ſundaie, the king came to S. Edmundſburie, and ſtaieng there till the two and twentith of the ſame moneth, ſet foreward that day towards Cambridge, where he laie with his armie, the better to bridle them that kept the Ile of Elie againſt him. He laie there all the Lent ſeaſon. And in the meane time the earle of Gloceſter taking great diſpleaſure, for that he might not haue his will, aſwell for the baniſhing of ſtrangers, as for reſtitution to be made vnto the diſherited men of their lands, he began a new ſturre, and aſſembling a great power in the marſhes of Wales came neere vnto London, pretending at the firſt as though he had come to aid the king, at length he got licence of the maior and citizens to paſſe through the citie into Southwarke, where he lodged with his people, and thither came to him ſhortlie ſir Iohn d'Euille, by Southerie ſide, bringing with him a great companie.

The maior cauſed the bridge and water ſide to be kept and watched both day and night with armed men, and euerie night was the drawbridge drawne vp: but within a while the earle vſed the matter ſo, that he was permitted to lodge within the citie with certeine of his men, by reaſon whereof, he drew more and more of his people into the citie, ſo that in the end he was maiſter of the citie, and in Eaſter wéeke tooke the keies of the bridge into his hands. The legat comming forth of the tower, repaired to the church of S. Paule, vnder a colour to preach the croiſey, but in the end of that his exhortation, he turned his words to the earle of Gloceſter, admoniſhing him to obeie the king as he was bound by his allegiance. And further, whereas the earle had giuen commandement that no victuals ſhould be ſuffered to be brought into the tower where the popes legat was lodged, he thought himſelfe euill vſed in that behalfe, ſith he was a mediator for peace, and no partaker. But when the earle ſéemed to giue ſmall regard to his words, he got him ſecretlie againe into the tower, with certeine noble men the kings fréends, meaning to defend it vnto the vttermoſt of their powers.

The legat admoniſheth the earle of Gloceſter to obeie the king.

There entred alſo into the tower a great number of Iewes with their wiues and children, vnto whome one ward of the tower was committed to defend, which they did in that neceſſitie verie ſtoutlie. Manie of the citizens fearing a new inſurrection, auoided out of the citie, whoſe goods the earle ſeized into his owne vſe, or ſuffered his men to ſpoile the ſame at their pleaſures. The moſt part of all the commons of the citie tooke part with the earle, and in a tumult got them to the Guildhall, and there choſe for their maior or cuſtos of the citie, Richard de Colworth knight, and for bailiffes, Robert de Linton and Roger Marſhall, diſcharging the old maior and ſhiriffes of their roomes. Diuerſe aldermen were committed to priſon, and their goods ſequeſtred, and much part thereof ſpoiled. Alſo all ſuch perſons as were priſoners in Newgate, Ludgate, Creplegate, or in any other priſon about the citie, for the quarrell of the barons warre, were ſet at libertie.

The legat ⁊ other meane to defend the tower againſt the earle of Gloceſter.

The legat perceiuing ſuch diſorder, accurſſed generallie all ſuch as thus troubled the kings peace, ſhewing themſelues enimies to the king and the realme. He alſo interdicted all the churches within the citie and about it, licencing onlie diuine ſeruice to be ſaid in houſes of religion, and without ringing of any bell or ſinging: and whileſt ſeruice was in hand, he appointed the church doores to be ſhut, bicauſe none of them that ſtood accurſſed, ſhould enter and be preſent. The king in the meane time laie at Cambridge to defend the countries about from iniuries, which were dailie attempted by them that held the Ile of Elie againſt him, of whome at one time he diſtreſſed a certeine number at Ramſey. And bicauſe now after that the earle was thus come to London, another companie of them brake out to rob and ſpoile, and were ſtopped by the kings power from entring into the Ile againe, they repaired ſtreight to London, dooing miſcheefe inough by the waie.

The earle of Gloceſter greatlie incouraged by their aſſiſtance, fell in hand to aſſaile the tower, within the which the popes legat Othobone, and diuerſe other were incloſed, taking vpon them to defend it againſt the earle and all his puiſſance. The king vpon the firſt newes of the earle of Gloceſter his commotion, ingaged the ſhrines of ſaints, and other iewels and reliks of the church of Weſtminſter vnto certeine merchants for great ſummes of monie, with the which ſending into France and Scotland, he reteined men of warre to come to his aid. Herevpon his ſonne prince Edward came to his ſuccour vnto Cambridge, bringing thither with him thirtie thouſand able men out of the north parts, Scots and other. The king then leauing a conuenient number to defend Cambridge, marched from thence toward Windſore. After his comming thither, his armie dailie increaſed. The earle of Gloceſter and his complices began to feare the matter, and ſent to him for peace, which could not be granted: whervpon they appointed to giue him batell vpon Hounſlow heath. The king comming thither in the morning, found no man there to reſiſt him, and therefore, after he had ſtaied there a certeine ſpace, he marched forth and came to Stratford, where he was lodged in the abbeie: his hoaſt incamped and laie at Ham and thereabouts.

This chanced about thrée wéekes after Eaſter. The ſouldiers which laie in London and in Southwarke, did much hurt about in the countrie of Southerie, ⁊ elſe-where. They alſo ſpoiled the towne of Weſtminſter, and the pariſh-church there: but the monks and the goods belonging to the abbeie they touched not, but made hauocke in the kings palace, drinking vp ⁊ deſtroieng his wine, breaking the glaſſe windowes, and defacing the buildings moſt diſorderlie, yea ſcarſe forbearing to ſet the houſe on fire. Alſo there were of them that brake vp ⁊ robbed certeine houſes in London, of the which miſgouerned perſons there were foure taken, that ware the cogniſance of the earle of Darbie, whome the earle of Gloceſter cauſed to be put in ſackes, and ſo throwne into the Thames.

As the king thus laie at Stratford, there came vnto him from the parts of beyond the ſea, the earle of Bullongne, and S. Paule, with two hundred men of armes, and their ſuit of other ſouldiers. Alſo there arriued in the Thames a fléet of great veſſels fraught with Gaſcoins, and laie afore the tower, abiding the kings pleaſure. ¶ The earle of Gloceſter had cauſed bulworks and barbicans to be made betwixt the tower and the citie; and alſo in ſundrie places where néed required ditches and trenches were caſt, ſo that the citie was ſtronglie fortified. Howbeit now that the ſaid erle and his complices perceiued themſelues in manner as beſieged, they ſought for peace. And by mediation of the king of Almaine, the lord Philip Baſſet and the legat Othobone, the ſame was granted, the ordinance of Killingworth in euerie condition obſerued. The Londoners were pardoned of their treſpaſſe for receiuing the earle, though they were conſtreined to paie a thouſand marks to the king of Romans, in recompenſe of the hurts doone to him in burning of his houſe at Thiſtleworth.

Whileſt the earle of Gloceſter kept the citie of London againſt the king, one Henrie de Gudereſch, ſteward to the ſaid earle, departing from London, came to the manour houſe of Geffrey ſaint Leger at Offeld, which he burnt, and turning from thence came to Brickhill. The lord Reignold Graie that held of the knights part, aduertiſed hereof, followed him with his retinue of men of warre, and comming vpon his enimie at vnwares, tooke the ſaid Henrie, and ſlue thirtie of the chéefeſt of his companie, ſome he tooke, howbeit manie eſcaped. But now to our purpoſe. By this agréement concluded betwixt the king ⁊ the earle of Gloceſter, he alſo accepted to his grace the lord Iohn Eineley, the lord Nicholas de Segraue, the lord William Marmion, the lord Richard de Graie, the lord Iohn Fitz Iohn, and the lord Gilbert de Lucie, with others: ſo that all parts of the realme were quieted, ſauing that thoſe in the Iſle of Elie would not ſubmit themſelues: yet at length by mediation of prince Edward they were reconciled to the king, and all the fortreſſes and defenſes within that Iſle by them made, were plucked downe and deſtroied.

The reſidue ſubmitted themſelues, as the lord Wake, Simon Montfort the yonger, the Pechees and other, vpon condition to be pardoned of life and member: and further, that prince Edward ſhould be a meane to his father to receiue them into fauour. But by other it may rather ſeeme, that ſome of them kept and defended themſelues within that Ile, till after the agreement made betwixt the king and the earle of Gloceſter. By order of which agreement there were foure biſhops and eight lords choſen forth, which had beene firſt nominated at Couentrie, to order and preſcribe betwixt the king and the diſherited men a forme of peace and redemption of their lands. The legat Othobone, after he had in the ſynods holden at Northampton and London, deuiſed and made manie orders and rules for churchmen, and leuied amongſt them great ſummes of monie, finallie in the moneth of Julie, he tooke leaue of the king and returned to Rome, where after the deceaſſe of Innocent the fift, about the yeare of our Lord 1276 he was choſen pope, and named Adrian the fift, liuing not paſt 50 daies after. Prince Edward the kings ſonne, and diuerſe other great lords of England before this legats departure out of the realme, receiued the croſſe at his hands in Northampton on Midſummer day, meaning ſhortlie after according to promiſe there made, to go into the holie land to warre againſt Gods enimies. In the fiftie & third yeare of king Henries reigne, there was ſuch an exceeding great froſt, beginning at ſaint Andrewes tide, and continuing till it was neere candlemaſſe, that the Thames from the bridge vpwards was ſo hard froſen, that men and beaſts paſſed ouer on foot from Lambeth to Weſtminſter, and ſo weſtward in diuerſe places vp to Kingſton. Alſo merchandize was brought from Sandwich and other places vnto London by land. For the ſhips by reaſon of the yce could not enter the Thames. ¶ And about the feaſt of S. London.

About S. Georges day there was a parlement holden at London, for the appeaſing of a controuerſie depending betwixt prince Edward the kings ſon and the earle of Gloceſter: at the which parlement were preſent almoſt all the prelats and peeres of the realme. At length they put the matter in compromiſe, into the hands of the king of Almaine, vndertaking to be ordered by him high and low touching all controuerſies: and likewiſe for the iournie to be made into the holie land, but the king of Almaine did little in the matter to any great effect. ¶ In the beginning of Lent the king gaue to his ſonne prince Edward the rule of the citie of London, with all the reuenues and profits thereto belonging. After which gift, the ſaid prince made ſir Hugh Fitz Othon conſtable of the tower and cuſtos of the citie of London. ¶ Vpon the ninth day of Aprill, Edmund the kings ſonne, ſurnamed Crouchbacke, married at Weſtminſter Aueline the daughter of the earle of Aumarle. Prince Edward commanded the citizens of London to preſent vnto him ſix citizens, of the which number he might nominate two ſhiriffes, and ſo appointed William de Hadſtocke and Anketill de Alberne, which were ſworne to be accomptants as their predeceſſours had beene.

In thoſe daies a new cuſtome or toll was vſed to be paid, which prince Edward let to farme vnto certeine ſtrangers, for the ſumme of twentie marks by yeare. Wherefore the citizens being greeued therewith, bought it of him for two hundred marks. Alſo this yeare there was granted to the king towards his iournie by him purpoſed into the holie land, the twentith penie of euerie mans mooueable goods thoroughout the realme of the laie fee, and of the ſpiritualtie was granted by the aſſent of pope Gregorie the tenth, three diſmes to be gathered within the terme of three yeares. This yeare the kings ſonne the lord Edward obteined a confirmation for the citie of London of the charter of the ancient liberties, ſo that the citizens did then choſe vnto them a maior and two ſhiriffes, which ſhiriffes by vertue of the ſame charter, had their office to farme, in maner as before time was accuſtomed: ſauing that where they paid afore but three hundred and fiftie pounds, they paid now foure hundred and fiftie pounds. After which confirmation granted and paſſed vnder the kings broad ſeale, they choſe for their maior John Adrian, and for ſhiriffes Walter Potter and John Tailor, the which were preſented the 16 day of Julie vnto the king at Weſtminſter by his ſonne prince Edward, and there admitted and ſworne. Then was ſir Hugh Fitz Othon diſcharged of the rule of the citie. The citizens of their owne freewill gaue vnto the king an hundred marks, and to his ſonne prince Edward fiue hundred markes. There was no great diſorder attempted this yeare to the diſquieting of the realme, ſauing that certeine of the diſherited gentlemen that belonged to the earle of Darbie, withdrew vnto the forreſt of the Peake in Darbiſhire, and there making their abode, ſpoiled and waſted the countries next adioining.

In the moneth of Maie, prince Edward the kings ſonne ſet forward on his iournie towards the holie land, and taking the ſea at Douer, paſſed ouer into France, and came to Burdeaux, where he ſtaied a while, and after went to Agues Mortes, and there tooke ſhipping, firſt ſailing (as ſome write) vnto Thunis, where the chriſtian armie, which Lewes the French king as then deceaſſed had brought thither, was readie to depart, and ſo prince Edward, with the new French king Lewes and other princes paſſed ouer into Sicill, where he ſoiourned for the winter time. In this yeare the king was vexed with a greeuous ſickneſſe: and the Iriſhmen in rebellion ſlue a great ſort of Engliſhmen, as well magiſtrats, as others in that countrie.

Matth. Weſt. The king ſick

When the ſpring of the yeare began to approch, prince Edward eftſoones tooke the ſea, and finallie arriued at Acres with a thouſand choſen men of warre, though there be writers that affirme, how there arriued with him of ſundrie countries fiue thouſand horſmen, and double the ſame number of footmen. But amongſt thoſe that went out of England with him, theſe we find as principall, Iohn de Britaine, Iohn de Veſcie, Otes de Granton, and Robert de Bruſe, beſides other. Of his noble chiualrie there atchiued, yee ſhall find a breefe note in the deſcription of the holie land, and therefore here we omit the ſame. Howbeit this is to be remembred, that whileſt the lord Edward ſoiorned there in the citie of Acres, he was in great danger to haue beene ſlaine by treaſon: for a traitorous Saracen of that generation which are called Arſacidæ, and latelie reteined by the ſame lord Edward, and become verie familiar with him, found means one day as he ſat in his chamber, to giue him three wounds, which ſuerlie had coſt him his life, but that one of the princes chamberleins ſtaied the traitors hand, and ſomewhat brake the ſtrokes, till other ſeruants came to the reſcue, and ſlue him there in the place.

¶ There be that write, how prince Edward himſelfe, perceiuing the traitor to ſtrike at his bellie, warded the blowe with his arme: and as the Saracen offered to haue ſtriken againe, he thruſt him backe to the ground with his foot, and catching him by the hand, wreſted the knife from him, and thruſting him into the bellie, ſo killed him, though in ſtrugling with him, he was hurt againe a little in the forhead: and his ſeruants withall comming to helpe him, one of them that was his muſician, got vp a treſtill and ſtroke out the braines of the traitor, as he laie dead on the ground, and was blamed of his maiſter for ſtriking him, after he ſaw him once dead before his face, as he might perceiue him to be. Some write, that this traitor was ſent from the great admerall of Iapha, on meſſage to the prince Edward, and had beene with him diuerſe times before, & now making countenance to take forth letters, got forth his knife, and attempted ſo to haue wrought his feat. Whatſoeuer the man was, the prince was in great danger, by reaſon of the enuenimed knife wherewith he was wounded, ſo that it was long yer he could be perfectlie whole. Theſe Saracens called Arſacidæ, are a wicked generation of men, infected with ſuch a ſuperſtitious opinion, that they beleeue heauenlie bliſſe is purchaſed of them, if they can by anie means ſlea one of the enimies of their religion, & ſuffer themſelues for that fact the moſt cruell death that may be deuiſed. ¶ Prince Edward, after he was whole and recouered of his wounds, perceiuing that no ſuch aid came into thoſe parts out of chriſtendome, as was looked for, tooke a truce with the enimies of our faith, and returned towards England, as hereafter ſhall be ſhewed.

He left behind him iſſue begotten of his wife Sanctia two ſonnes, Edmund and Henrie. This Edmund was he that brought the blood of Hails out of Germanie: for as he was there vpon a time with his father, it chanced that as he was beholding the relikes, and other pretious monuments of the ancient emperors, he eſpied a box of gold: by the inſcription whereof he perceiued (as the opinion of men then gaue) that therein was conteined a portion of the bloud of our ſauiour.

Henrie the brother of this Edmund, and ſonne to the foreſaid king of Almaine, as he returned from Affrike, where he had beene with prince Edward, was ſlaine at Viterbo in Italie (whither he was come about buſineſſe which he had to doo with the pope) by the hand of Guie de Montfort, the ſonne of Simon de Montfort earle of Leiceſter, in reuenge of the ſame Simons death. This murther was committed afore the high altar, as the ſame Henrie kneeled there to heare diuine ſeruice. The foreſaid Guie vpon that murther committed, fled vnto his father in law, the earle of Anguilare, then gouernour of Tuſkain. There was at Viterbo the ſame time Philip king of France, returning homewards from the iournie which his father made into Affrike, where he died. Alſo Charles king of Sicill was there preſent, whome the ſaid Guie then ſerued. Both thoſe kings were put in much blame, for that the murther and wilfull eſcape was doone and ſuffred in their preſence and no purſuit made after the murtherer. Boniface the archbiſhop of Canturburie, when he had ruled the ſea ſeauen and thirtie yeares, departed this life: and after his deceaſſe, about two yeares or more, was one Robert Kilwarbie appointed in his place by pope Gregorie, which Robert was the ſix and fortith archbiſhop that had gouerned the ſee of Canturburie.

Robert Kilwarbie archb. of Cãturburie

About the moneth of Iune there fell great debate and diſcord betwixt the monks of Norwich and the citizens there; which increaſed ſo farre, that at length the citizens with great violence aſſaulted the monaſterie, fired the gates, and forced the fire ſo with reed and drie wood, that the church with the bookes, and all other ornaments of the ſame, and all houſes of office belonging to that abbeie were cleane burned, waſted, and deſtroied, ſo that nothing was preſerued except one little chapell. The king hearing of this riot, rode to Norwich, and cauſing inquirie to be made thereof, thirtie yoong men of the citie were condemned, hanged and burnt, to the great greefe of the other citizens, for they thought that the priour of the place was the occaſion of all that miſcheefe, who had got togither armed men, and tooke vpon him to keepe the belfraie and church by force of armes: but the prior was well inough borne out, and defended by the biſhop of Norwich, named Roger, who (as it is likelie) was the maiſter of the miſcheefe, though hands were not laid vpon him nor his adherents: perhaps for feare,

The king returning by ſaint Edmundſburie, after he had doone his deuotions to S. Edmunds ſhrine, began to waxe ſomewhat craſie: but after hauing a little recouered his health, he called a councell there, wherein he went about to haue taken order for the puniſhment of rebels: but his ſickneſſe againe renewing, he brake vp the aſſemblie, and with all ſpéed haſted to London. Prince Edward vpon his returne out of the holie land came to Chalons in Burgogne, & at the requeſt of the earle he did attempt with his companie to hold a iuſtes and tournie againſt the ſaid earle & all other commers. And though through diſdaine and ſpite there was homelie plaie ſhewed, vpon purpoſe to put the Engliſhmen to the foile & reproch; yet by high valiancie prince Edward and his companie bare themſelues ſo worthilie, that in the end the aduerſaries were well beaten, and conſtreined to leaue the honor of that enterpriſe to the ſaid prince Edward and his partakers. After this, he kept on his iornie till he came vnto Paris, where he was honourablie receiued of the French king, and from thence he went to Burdeaux, and there remained till after his fathers death.

In this meane time king Henrie, being returned to London from ſaint Edmundſburie (as before yée haue heard) his ſickneſſe ſo increaſed vpon him, that finallie he departed at Weſtminſter on the ſixtéenth day of Nouember, in the yeare of our Sauiour 1272. after he had liued thréeſcore and fiue yeares, and reigned fiftie and ſix yeares, and ſeauen and twentie daies. A little before his death, when he perceiued that he could no longer liue, he cauſed the earle of Glocester to come before him, and to be newlie ſworne to kéepe the peace of the land, to the behoofe of his ſonne prince Edward. His bodie was buried at Weſtminſter. He had iſſue by his wife quéene Elianor two ſonnes, the foreſaid Edward, prince of Wales, that ſuccéeded him; and Edmund earle of Lancaſter, by ſome authors ſurnamed Crouchbacke, though (as other affirme vntrulie) that this Edmund was the elder brother: but bicauſe he was a deformed perſon, therefore his yonger brother Edward was preferred to the kingdome, which was deuiſed of purpoſe to conueie a right to king Henrie the fourth, which fetched the deſcent from the ſaid Edmund, and by force vſurped and held the crowne, as after it may appeare. Moreouer, king Henrie had thrée daughters by the ſaid Elianor, as Margaret maried to Alexander king of Scots, Beatrice whom the duke of Britaine had to wife, and Catharine which died before ſhe was mariable.

The iſſue of king Henrie the third.

He was of bodie well caſt and ſtrong, of a good ſtature in heigth, well fauoured of face, with the lid of one of his eies comming downe, ſo as it almoſt couered the apple of the ſame eie. Of nature he was courteous, and of ſtomach rather noble than ſtout; a deuout prince and liberall towards the poore and néedie. Yet he wanted not diſpraiſe in ſome points, namelie for that in ordering of things and weightie affaires, he vſed ſmall conſideration. He was alſo noted to be a great taker of monie by loanes, taxes, and ſubſidies: but thereunto he was inforced by neceſſitie, to beare the charges of warre and other publike affaires, than of any couetous mind or purpoſe to ſerue his owne turne. ¶ What capteins of honour among the nobilitie liued in his time, it may appeare by the courſe of the hiſtorie of his age.

His conditiōs

Of ſundrie learned men theſe we find mentioned in maiſter Bales centuries and others. Walter of Couentrie an hiſtoriographer: Radulphus Niger that wrote both hiſtories and other treatiſes, Geruaſius de Melkelie, Albricius of London, Robert Curſon a man excellentlie learned both in diuine and humaine letters, ſo that comming to the court of Rome he there grew in ſuch eſtimation, that he became a cardinall, of whom we find this recorded by Matthew Weſtminſter and Matthew Paris. [At the taking of Damiate, a citie in Aegypt, there was with Pelagius, the cardinall of Alba, the popes legat, maſter Robert Curſon an Engliſhman a moſt famous clerke, borne of a noble houſe, and cardinall of the church of Rome.] Theſe are reported to floriſh in the daies both of king Iohn and king Henrie his ſonne.

In the ſaid kings time alſo there liued other learned men, as theſe; Hugh Kirkeſtéed, Richard of Elie, Peter Henham, Iohn Giles or de Sancto Egidio an excellent phyſician, Caducan a Welſhman borne and biſhop of Bangor, Alexander a ſingular learned man that wrote diuerſe and manie treatiſes aſwell in diuinitie as philoſophie and humanitie, both in verſe and proſe; alſo Stephan Langton, that for his ſingular knowledge was made high chancellor of the vniuerſitie of Paris, and at length was admitted archbiſhop of Canturburie, againſt the will of king Iohn, in which quarell ſo great trouble inſued, as before yée haue partlie heard; Raſe Coggeſhall alſo liued in king Henries daies, that wrote the appendix vnto the chronicle of Ralfe Niger, he was abbat of Coggeſhall abbeie in Eſſex, whereof he tooke his ſurname; William Lanthonie, Peter of S. Sauior, a canon of the houſe called S. Sauior, or of the trinitie by London; Alexander Hailes a frier of the order of the minors, who wrote manie treatiſes in diuinitie; Richard ſurnamed Medicus a moſt learned phyſician, and no leſſe expert in philoſophie and the mathematicals. There be alſo remembred by maiſter Bale, Randulfe the earle of Cheſter, the third and laſt of that name, who hauing great knowledge and vnderſtanding in the lawes of this land, compiled a booke of the ſame lawes, as a witneſſe of his great ſkill therein: Alexander Wendocke biſhop of Cheſter, Iohn Blund, Edmund Rich, Robert Rich, Henrie Bracton, that excellent lawier, who wrote the booke commonlie called Bracton after his name, intituled De conſuetudinibus Anglicanis; Richard ſurnamed Theologus, Walter de Eueſham, Ralfe Freborne, Laurence Somercote, brother as it is thought to Robert Somercote, at that time a cardinall of the Romane church; Nicholas Fernham a phyſician, Robert Bacon a notable diuine, Simon Langton, brother to the archbiſhop of Canturburie Stephan Langton; Richard Fiſaker, Simon Stokes, Iohn of Kent or Kantianus, William Shirwood, Michaell Blaunpaine, Iohn Godard, Vincent of Couentrie, Alberike Veer, Richard Wich, Iohn Baſing aliàs de Baſingſtoke, Roger Waltham, William Seningham, Robert Groſted that learned biſhop of Lincolne, whoſe memorie amongſt the learned will remaine while the world laſteth.

Edward

Edvvard the firſt, ſurnamed Longſhanks, the eldeſt ſonne of Henrie the third.

EDward, the firſt of that name after the conqueſt, began his reigne ouer this kingdome of England, the 16 day of Nouember, in the yéere of the world, 5239, of our Lord 1272, of the Saxons 814, after the conqueſt 206, the vacation of the empire after the deceaſſe of Frederike the ſecond as yet induring (though ſhortlie after in the yeare next following, Radulfe of Habſpurge was elected emperour) in the third yeare of Philip the third then reigning in France, and Alexander the third yet liuing in gouernement of the Scotiſh kingdome.

This Edward the firſt, when his father died, being about the age of 35 yeares, was as then in the holie land, or rather in his iournie homewards: but whereſoeuer he was at that preſent, the nobles of the land, after his father was departed this life, aſſembled at the new temple in London, and cauſing a new ſeale to be made, they ordeined faithfull miniſters and officers, which ſhould haue the treaſure in kéeping, and the adminiſtration of iuſtice for the maintenance of peace and tranquillitie within the land, and on the 22 day of Nouember he was proclaimed king. Who after he had remained a time in the holie land, and perceiued himſelfe deſtitute of ſuch aid as he looked for at the hands both of the Chriſtians and Tartarians, he left in the citie of Acon certeine ſtipendarie ſouldiers, and taking the ſea ſailed homewards, arriuing firſt in Sicill, where, of Charles K. of that land he was honorablie receiued and conueied, till he came vnto Ciuita vecchia in Italie, where pope Gregorie as then laie with his court, of whome (as of his old fréend that had béen with him in the holie land) he obteined that earle Aldebrandino Roſſo, and Guy of Montfort, that had murthered the lord Henrie, eldeſt ſonne to Richard king of Almaine, might be ſent for. Earle Aldebrandino purged himſelfe, but Guy de Montfort was excõmunicated, as a violator of the church, a murderer and a traitor, ſo as he was diſherited euen vnto the fourth generation, till he had reconciled himſelfe to the church, as he was inioined.

After this, it is woonderfull to remember with what great honor king Edward was receiued of the cities, as he paſſed through Tuſcaine and Lumbardie. At his comming ouer the mounteins at Chalon in Burgundie, he was at a iuſts and tornie, which then was there holden by the Frenchmen againſt the Engliſhmen, the honor whereof remained with the Engliſhmen. In this tornie the fight of the footmen was great: for the Engliſhmen being ſore prouoked, ſlue manie of the French footmen, but bicauſe they were but raſcals, no great accompt was made of them, for they were vnarmed gaping for the ſpoile of them that were ouerthrowen. K. Edward paſſing forth, came to the French court, where of his coſine germane king Philip he was ioifullie receiued. Here king Edward, dooing homage to the French king for the lands which he ought to hold of him in France, paſſed into Guien.

A diſme grãted to the king & his brother.

A tenth was granted of the cleargie to the K. and to his brother Edmund earle of Leiceſter and Lancaſter by the popes appointment for two yeares, a chapleine of the pope a Gaſcoine borne named Reimond being ſent into England for that purpoſe, who gaue part vnto them, and part thereof he kept to himſelfe towards his charges, but the moſt part was reſerued to the popes diſpoſing. ¶ Whileſt the king remained in Gaſcoigne, he had ſomwhat to do againſt certeine rebels, as Gaſton de Bierne, and other that were reuolted from him. The caſtels belonging to the ſaid Gaſton he ſubdued, but his perſon he could not méet with. Finallie, after he had ſet things in order aſwell in Guien as in other places in the parts of beyond the ſeas, he haſted homewards, and came to London on the ſecond day of Auguſt, where he was receiued with all ioy that might be deuiſed. The ſtréets were hanged with rich cloths of ſilke, arras, and tapeſtrie, the aldermen and burgeſſes of the citie threw out of their windowes handfuls of gold and ſiluer, to ſignifie the great gladneſſe which they had conceiued of his ſafe returne: the conduits ran plentifullie with white wine and red, that ech creature might drinke his fill. Vpon the 19 day of Auguſt in this ſecond yeare of his reigne he was crowned at Weſtminſter, togither with his wife quéene Elianor, by the hands of Robert Kilwarbie archbiſhop of Canturburie.

At this coronation were preſent Alexander king of Scots, and Iohn earle of Britaine, with their wiues that were ſiſters to K. Edward. The king of Scots did homage vnto king Edward for the realme of Scotland, in like maner as other the kings of Scotland before him had doone to other kings of England anceſtours to this king Edward. At the ſolemnitie of this coronation there were let go at libertie (catch them that catch might) fiue hundred great horſſes by the king of Scots, the earles of Cornewall, Glouceſter, Penbroke, Warren, & others, as they were alighted frõ their backs. ¶ On S. Nicholas euen there chanced ſuch an earthquake with lightning and thunder, and therewithall the appearing of the burning drake, and a blaſing ſtarre called a comet, that the people were brought into no ſmall feare vpon conſideration thereof. But now to the point of the hiſtorie.

degrées of men, that he ſéemed to excéed the reaſonable bounds of courteous humanitie, much more than became his roiall eſtate. After this, he reformed diuerſe lawes and ſtatutes, and deuiſed ſome new ordinances, greatlie for the wealth of the realme. He held his firſt parlement at Weſtminſter, where the ordinances were made, called the ſtatutes of Weſtminſter the firſt.

To this parlement was Leolin the prince of Wales ſummoned to come and doo his homage, hauing béene requeſted firſt to come to the kings coronation, but he refuſed; and now hauing ſummons to come to this parlement, he excuſed himſelfe, affirming that he durſt not come for feare of certeine noblemen that laie in wait for his life, requiring to haue pledges deliuered for his ſafe comming and going, the kings ſonne, and Gilbert earle of Gloceſter, with Robert Burnell the lord chancellor. The king was greatlie offended with ſuch a preſumptuous demand, but paſſed it ouer, till after the end of the parlement, & then repairing to Cheſter he ſent eftſoones meſſengers to the ſaid Leolin, requiring of him to come & doo his homage, but he ſtill detracted time, ſo that in the end the king raiſed an armie, meaning to recouer that by force, which otherwiſe he could not obteine by quiet meanes. ¶This yéere the people paid a fiftéenth to the king of all their temporall goods, which was ſaid to be granted firſt to his father.

Matth.Weſtm. Breton biſhop of Hereford departeth this life.

The ſame yéere departed this life John Breton biſhop of Hereford, who being verie expert in the lawes of the land, compiled a booke of them called Le Breton. The 11 of September, a generall earthquake chanced betwixt the firſt houre and the third of the ſame daie, the church of S. Michaell on the hill without Glaſtenburie, was therwith throwne down to the ground. After this, it rained bloud in the countrie of Wales, as a prodigious euill token to that nation, with whoſe bloud ſhortlie after that region was in manie places moiſtened and ſtained. For as it chanced ſhortlie after, Leolin the ſonne of Griffin came to haue the gouernment of Wales, who partlie to raiſe new ſeditions in England, and partlie to purchaſe him friendſhip and aliance in France, ſent vnto king Philip, requiring of him that he might haue in marriage the ladie Eleanor daughter to Simon Montfort earle of Leiceſter, the which togither with hir mother and brother Emerike, remained as baniſhed perſons in France. The French king granted his requeſt, and ſent hir vnder the conduct of hir ſaid brother to be conueied into Wales vnto Leolin, who had promiſed to marrie hir. But yer they approched to Wales, at the Ile of Sillie both the brother & ſiſter were taken by foure ſhips of Briſtow, the owners whereof that ſo tooke them, ſent them vnto king Edward. When Leolin vnderſtood that his wife was taken from him by the waie as ſhe was comming, he was not a little wroth, and incontinentlie began to make warre vpon king Edwards ſubiects that bordered néere vnto Wales, killing the people, ſpoiling their goods, and burning vp their townes and houſes on each ſide.

It rained bloud.

Leolin prince of wales beginneth to make wars. Matth. Weſt.

Herewith the king of England was ſo mooued, that although the ſaid Leolin made ſute for peace, and offred no ſmall ſum of monie to haue the daughter of the earle of Leiceſter his fianced wife deliuered to him, yet would not the king by any meanes conſent to that marriage, nor receiue any monie of him, except he would reſtore vnto the right owners ſuch lands as he had inuaded and got into his poſſeſſion, and further repaire ſuch caſtels as he had deſtroied. Herevpon grew no ſmall grudge betwixt the Welſhmen and Engliſhmen, ſo that to repreſſe the inuaſion of the enimies in the parts towards Briſtow, Mountgomerie and Cheſter, the king ſent thrée hundred men in armes on horſebacke. In the quindene of Eaſter, the king departing from Weſtminſter, haſted towards Wales with a mightie power, and cauſed the courts of the excheker and of his bench to remooue vnto Shrewſburie, that they might be néere vnto him, making forward with all conuenient ſpéed to come to the aid and ſuccour of his liege people.

Math.We The ex and the b bench r ued to ſweſbur

Herevpon entring into Wales he tooke the caſtell of Rutland, and ſent into Weſtwales a valiant capteine named Paine de Camurets, who with fire and ſword waſted that countrie, ſo that the people offering themſelues to the kings peace, deliuered vnto the ſaid Paine the caſtell of Stridewie with the countrie adioining. Then Leolin the prince of Wales, perceiuing that he was not able to reſiſt the kings power, and knowing that if he did attempt the conflict againſt him the danger would redound to himſelf & his traine, did as th'old verſe counſelleth, and therefore made ſuit for peace, in ſo much that finallie it was agréed, that commiſſioners for both parts ſhould talke concerning certeine articles, and whatſoeuer they concluded, aſwell the king as the ſaid Leolin ſhould hold the ſame for firme and ſtable. The king appointed one of his commiſſioners, to wit, the lord Robert de Tiptoſt, to take an oth for him, & authoriſed the ſaid Robert, Anthonie Beke, and frier William de Southampton, prior prouinciall of the friers preachers, commiſſioners, nominated on his behalfe, to receiue the like oth of the ſaid Leolin. Which Leolin appointed commiſſioners for his part, Tuder ap Edeuenet, and Grono ap Helin, the which commiſſioners with good deliberation concluded vpon certeine points and articles, of which the principall were as followeth.

N.Triuet. Cōmiſſi appoint

1 Firſt, that the ſaid Leolin ſhould ſet at libertie all priſoners which he held in captiuitie for the king of Englands cauſe, freelie and without all challenge.

2 Secondlie, that to haue peace and the kings of Englands fauour, he ſhould giue vnto the ſaid king fiftie thouſand pounds ſterling, the daies of the paiment whereof to reſt in the kings will and pleaſure.

3 Thirdlie, that the land of the foure cantreds without all contradiction ſhould remaine for euer to the king and his heires, with all lands conquered by the king and his people, the Ile of Angleſey excepted, which Ile was granted to the prince, ſo that he ſhould paie for the ſame yearelie the ſumme of one thouſand marks, and fiue thouſand marks for an income. Prouided, that if the prince chanced to die without iſſue, then the ſaid Ile to reuert againe into the kings hands.

4 Fourthlie, that the prince ſhall come to Rothelan or Rothland (as it is commonlie called) there to doo fealtie to the king, and before his comming thither, he ſhould be abſolued and haue the interdiction of his lands releaſed, and at his being at Rothelan, a daie ſhall be appointed him by the king for his comming to London, there to doo his homage. Herevpon was order taken for his ſafe conduct, aſwell in his comming to Rothelan, as to London. There be that write that he was appointed to come vnto London, at the feaſt of the natiuitie of our Lord.

5 Fiftlie, it was couenanted, that all the homages of Wales ſhould remaine to the king, except onelie of fiue barons which inhabited néere vnto the caſtell of Snowdon: for otherwiſe the ſaid Leolin could not conuenientlie call himſelfe prince, except he had ſome barons vnder him.

6 Sixtlie, that he ſhould receiue the title and name of prince ſo long as he liued, and after his deceaſſe the homages of thoſe fiue barons ſhould reuert to the king and to his heires for euer.

Dauid Leolins brother prouided for.

Seuenthlie the king granted vnto the ſaid Leolin, the lands that belonged to his brother Dauid, for tearme of the ſaid Leolins life, and in recompenſe thereof was contented to ſatiſfie the ſaid Dauid with other lands in ſome other place, the which after the deceaſe of the ſaid Leolin or Dauid ſhould reuert to the king and his heires.

An oth to be receiued.

For the aſſurance of which articles and couenants the prince deliuered for hoſtages ten perſons of the beſt in Wales, which he could get, without impriſonment, diſheriting, or terme of deliuerance; and of euerie cantred twentie perſons, of the beſt and moſt ſufficient, to be choſen by ſuch as the king ſhall ſend thither yéerelie, & ſhall from yéere to yéere be ſworne vpon the euangeliſts, in preſence of the bailiffes of the ſaid Leolin, that whenſoeuer the prince ſhall breake any of theſe articles, and vpon admonition dooth not reforme himſelfe, they ſhall forſake him, and in all things, being vnto him open enimies, ſhall beare him deadlie hoſtilitie.

Leolins brethren.
Dauid rewarded by king Edward.
Dauid preferred in mariage

Beſides this, the prince ſhall (as farre as in him may lie) pacifie his brethren, of the which he had put two in priſon, Owen and Roderike: the third named Dauid, eſcaping his hands, fled into England, and remained many yéeres with king Edward, who receiuing him into his ſeruice, made him knight in this warre, and gaue vnto him a caſtell at Denbigh in Wales, with lands to the yéerelie value of a thouſand marks, in recompenſe of thoſe poſſeſſions which he ought to haue had in Angleſey, the which (as before is ſaid) the king granted vnto Leolin for terme of his life, and after his deceaſſe to reuert vnto the king and to his heires. Moreouer, he preferred Dauid to the marriage of a iollie widowe, that was daughter to the earle of Darbie.

The article concerning Owen.

As concerning Owen, through the kings fauour he was deliuered out of priſon, by force of the articles concluded at this preſent by the commiſſioners, vnder this forme and maner: that vpon his being ſet at libertie, certeine perſons appointed by the king ſhould make offer to him, to chooſe whether he would firſt compound with his brother, and therevpon come to the king, and beſéech him to allow the compoſition, or elſe to put himſelfe vnder the ſafe kéeping of the king, till according to the lawes and cuſtomes of Wales, in the place where he did tranſgreſſe, iudgement ſhould be giuen of the matter: and if he were acquit, then might he demand his heritage if he thought it ſo expedient: and which of theſe two waies he ſhould chooſe, the ſame ſhould be made firme and ſtable in the kings preſence.

All theſe articles, with other additions, were accorded by the ſaid cõmiſſioners at Aberconweie, on the tueſdaie before the feaſt of S. Martine, in the yeare 1277, and letters of confirmation made thereof by the king, dated at Rutland on the tenth daie of Nouember, in the fift yéere of his reigne. Alſo the ſaid Leolin, by the name of Leolin ap Griffin prince of Wales, with letters vnder his ſeale, confirmed the aboueſaid articles on his behalfe, for the releaſing of his right to the foure cantreds and other things that ſhould remaine to the king, which letters bare date at Aberconweie, on the foreſaid tueſdaie in the ſaid yéere 1277. Alſo the K. releaſed to the ſaid Leolin, the ſaid ſumme of fiftie thouſand pounds, and the ſaid ſumme of a thouſand marks yéerelie to be paid for the Ile of Angleſey, as by his letters dated at Rutland on the ſaid 10 daie of Nouember in the ſaid fift yéere of his reigne more at large it appéereth. Neuertheleſſe by his letters dated at Rutland, on the ſaid eleuenth of the ſaid month of Nouember, it is euident that he receiued of the ſaid Leolin the ſumme of two thouſand marks ſterling, by the hands of Thomas Beke kéeper of his wardrobe.

He alſo bare all the charges of the feaſt at the daie of the marriage, and honored the ſame with the preſence of himſelfe and the quéene. ¶ A ſubſidie of the twentieth part of euerie mans goods was granted to the king towards his charges ſuſteined in the Welſh warres. About the ſame time the king remooued all ſuch ſhiriffes as were either préeſts or ſtrangers, and in their places appointed knights to be ſhiriffes, that were of the ſame countrie where their offices laie. Moreouer, about this ſeaſon king Edward builded the caſtell of Flint, and fortified the caſtell of Rutland and others, placing garriſons of Engliſhmen in the ſame to defend the countrie, and to kéepe the Welſhmen vnder obedience. But Leolin ſo ſmallie regarded all couenants made, and benefits receiued, that ſhortlie after, vpon the death of his late married wife, being ſummoned to come to a parlement holden by king Edward, he diſdained to obeie, and vpon a verie ſpite began to make new warre to the Engliſhmen, in waſting and deſtroieng the countrie: notwithſtanding king Edward had ſo manie waies doone him good, and had giuen him iuſt cauſe of thankfulneſſe, which is the common reward of benefits, and which little recompenſe whoſo neglecteth to make, being but a little lip labour,

He ſueth for peace.

But being put in feare with the kings comming towards him with his power, he laid armor aſide, and began eftſoones to require peace, which the king now the ſecond time did not denie to grant; bicauſe he would not loſe time to warre with the mounteins, woods and mariſhes, the places of refuge for Welſhmen in thoſe daies, when they wanted power to abide battell and kéepe the féelds. A ſynod at Reading.

Frier Iohn Peckham, whome the pope had alreadie conſecrated archbiſhop of Canturburie, being the 47 in number that had gouerned the ſaid ſee, came this yeare ouer into England to ſupplie the roome. ¶ Alſo Walter Gifford archbiſhop of Yorke departed this life, in whoſe place ſucceeded William Wickham, the 37 archbiſhop there. The archbiſhop of Canturburie held a ſynod at Reading about the latter end of Iulie, wherin he renewed the conſtitutions of the generall councell, as thus: That no eccleſiaſticall perſon ſhould haue aboue one benefice to the which belonged cure of ſoule; and againe, that all thoſe that were promoted to any eccleſiaſticall liuing, ſhould receiue the order of prieſthood within one yere after his being promoted therevnto.

The kings coine amended.

In this yeare the king tooke order for the amending of his monie and coine, which in that ſeaſon was fowlie clipped, waſhed, and counterfeited by thoſe naughtie men the Iewes, and other, as before you haue partlie heard. The king therefore in the octaues of the Trinitie ſent forth commandement to all the ſhiriffes within the land, that ſuch monie as was counterfeited, clipped or waſhed, ſhould not be currant from thenceforth: and furthermore he ſent of his owne treaſure, good monie and not clipped, vnto certeine cities and townes in the realme, that exchange might be made with the ſame till new monie were ſtamped. About the third daie of Auguſt, the firſt exchange was made of the new monie of pence and farthings; but yet the old monie went all this yeare togither with the new, and then was the old coine generallie forbidden, and commandement giuen by publike proclamation, that from thenceforth it ſhould no more be allowed for currant. Herewith alſo halfpence, which had beene ſtamped in the meane time, began to come abroad the ſame day in which the old monie was thus prohibited.

A ſhift to get monie.

The lord Roger Mortimer kept a great feaſt at Killingworth, with iuſts and triumphs of an hundred knights and as manie ladies, to the which reſorted lords, knights, & gentlemen from diuerſe countries and lands, to ſhew proofe of their valiancie in the practiſe of warlike feats and exerciſes. In the meane ſeaſon king Edward ſtanding in need of monie, deuiſed a new ſhift to ſerue his turne, as this: namely that wheras he was cheefe lord of many lordſhips, manours, poſſeſſions and tenements, he well vnderſtood, that partlie by length and proces of time, and partlie by caſualties during the troubles of the ciuill warres, manie mens euidences, as their charters, deeds, copies and other writings were loſt, waſted, and made awaie, he therfore vnder colour to put the ſtatute of (Quo waranto) in execution, which was ordeined this yeare in the parlement holden at Gloceſter in Auguſt laſt paſt (as ſome write) did now command by publike proclamation, that all ſuch as held any lands or tenements of him, ſhould come and ſhew by what right and title they held the ſame, that by ſuch meanes their poſſeſſions might returne vnto him, by eſcheat as cheefe lord of the ſame, and ſo to be ſold or redeemed againe at his hands.

Ordinances for monie.

This was thought to be ſo ſore a proclamation, as that a more greeuous had not lightlie beene heard of. Men in euerie place made complaint and ſhewed themſelues greeuouſlie offended, ſo that the king by meanes thereof came in great hatred of his people: but the meane ſort of men, though they ſtood in defenſe of their right, yet it auailed them but little, bicauſe they had no euidence to ſhew, ſo that they were conſtreined to be quiet with loſſe, rather than to ſtriue againſt the ſtreame. Manie were thus called to anſwer, till at length the lord Iohn Warren earle of Surrie, a man greatlie beloued of the people, perceiuing the king to haue caſt his net for a preie, and that there was not one which ſpake againſt him, determined to ſtand againſt thoſe ſo bitter and cruell proceedings. And therefore being called afore the iuſtices about this matter, he appeared, and being aſked by what right he held his lands: ſuddenlie drawing forth an old ruſtie ſword; By this inſtrument (ſaid he) doo I hold my lands, and by the ſame I intend to defend them. Our anceſtors comming into this realme with William the Conquerour, conquered their lands with the ſword, and with the ſame will I defend me from all thoſe that ſhall be about to take them from me; he did not make a conqueſt of this realme alone, our progenitors were with him as participants and helpers.

The ſaieng of the earle of Surrie.

The king vnderſtanding into what hatred of his people by this meanes he was fallen, and therfore deſirous to auoid ciuill diſſention and war that might thereby inſue, he left off his begun practiſe: ſo that the thing which generallie ſhould haue touched and beene hurtfull to all men, was now ſuddenlie ſtaied by the manhood and couragious ſtoutneſſe onelie of one man, the foreſaid earle, who in his rare act of defending cõmon equitie againſt the mightie in authoritie (who ſpared not to offer extreme iniurie) ſhewed himſelfe a verie true and naturall branch of nobilitie,

A ſynod at Lambeth.

The archbiſhop of Canturburie held an other ſynod at Lambeth, in the which he receiued and confirmed the orders and conſtitutions decreed and eſtabliſhed by the legats Otho and Othobone, in councels by them kept here within this realme, adding diuerſe other of his owne: & in the ſame councell he went about to adnihilate certeine liberties belonging to the crowne, as the taking knowledge of the right of patronages and the kings prohibitions In placitis de catallis, and ſuch like, which ſeemed meerlie to touch the ſpiritualtie. But the king by ſome in that councell withſtood the archbiſhop openlie, and with menaces ſtaied him from concluding any thing that might preiudice his roiall liberties and prerogatiues. King Edward held a parlement at London, in the which he demanded a fifteenth of the cleargie, which latelie before he had got of the temporaltie. The archbiſhop of Yorke was content at the firſt to grant this fifteenth to be paid of the cleargie within his dioceſſe in two yeares; but the archbiſhop of Canturburie held off, and required reſpit till the next parlement to be holden after Eaſter, and then he granted vnto the king the diſmes of all his cleargie for three yeares, that in ſome point he might be different from the archbiſhop of Yorke.

In the ninth yeare of king Edwards reigne, the feaſt of the round table was kept at Warwike with great and ſumptuous triumph. Whileſt theſe things were in doing, Dauid brother to Leolin prince of Wales, forgetting the great benefits which he had receiued at the hands of king Edward, became his aduerſarie, and cauſed his ſaid brother the prince of Wales with a great number of other noble men of that countrie to rebell: and to incourage them the ſooner to attempt the warre, he began the firſt exploit himſelfe, taking the ſaid lord Roger Clifford (a right worthie and famous knight) in his caſtell of Hawardine, vpon Palmeſundaie, the ſaid lord being in no doubt of any ſuch matter. Diuerſe knights and other that were in the ſame caſtell at that time, and made reſiſtance, were ſlaine.

The king entreth into wales.

The king haſted forth to come to the reſcue of his people, wherevpon Leolin and his brother Dauid retired with their people to Snowdon hilles, and fortified the caſtell there with a ſtrong garriſon of men. The king entring into Wales, when he heard that his enimies were withdrawne into the mounteins, paſſed forth till he came neere vnto them, where he pitched downe his field, and the next day cauſing his horſſemen to iſſue forth of the campe, filled all the plaines which compaſſe the foot of thoſe hilles (aſwell on the eaſt ſide as toward the ſouth) with the ſame horſſemen, and herewith placed his footmen more aloft on the ſide of the hilles in couert: this doone he prouoked his enimie to come forth to fight, but when he ſaw this would not be, then that he might ſtop them from all places of refuge, he cauſed his ſhips to take the Iſle of Angleſey, bicauſe the Welſhmen vſed to flie thither oftentimes for their ſafegard, in the which enterpriſe the mariners of the cinque ports bare themſelues right manfullie.

After this, ioining certeine veſſels togither, he cauſed a bridge to be made in the riuer of Meneth, into the which an other ſmall riuer falleth that riſeth at the roots of thoſe hilles of Snowdone, to keepe the enimies from lodging on the further ſide of that riuer. This bridge conteining roome for threeſcore armed men to paſſe afront, was made ouer the riuer of Sient, by the which men ſaile into the Iſle, which by the courſe of the ſea ebbeth and floweth euerie twelue houres. But ſo it came to paſſe, that before the bridge was well borded ouer, whileſt the king yet remained at Aberconwaie, diuerſe of the Engliſh nobilitie, to the number of ſeauen banerets with three hundreth armed men raſhlie paſſed ouer, and as they ſurueied the foot of the mounteine, the tide began to come in ſo ſwiftlie, that where the Engliſhmen were aduanced a good prettie waie from the water ſide, they could not now get backe againe to the bridge which as yet was not fullie made vp.

The Welſhmen perceiuing this, came downe beſide the mounteine, and aſſailed the Engliſhmen verie fiercelie, and with their great multitude ſo oppreſſed them, that for feare the Engliſhmen were driuen to take the water, and ſo by reaſon they were loaden with armour, manie of them were drowned: and amongſt other, that famous knight ſir Lucas de Thanie, Robert Clifford, ſir William Lindſey, and two gentlemen of good accompt that were brethren to Robert Burnell as then biſhop of Bath. There periſhed in all (as ſome ſaie) thirteene knights, ſeuenteene yoong gentlemen, and to the number of two hundred footmen. Yet ſir William Latimer, as good hap would, eſcaped, and diuerſe other. The earle of Gloceſter maketh warre on the welſhmen

In this meane time in an other part of the countrie the earle of Gloceſter with an armie, made ſore warre to the Welſhmen, and neere vnto the towne called Lantilaware, fought a ſore battell with them, in the which manie of the Welſhmen being ſlaine, the earle loſt alſo fiue knights vpon his partie, as William Valence the yoonger, being one of that number, who was the kings couſine. The earle of Gloceſter then departing from thence, Leolin the prince of Wales entered into the countrie of Cardigan and Stradwie, deſtroieng the lands of Rice ap Meridoc, which now held with the king againſt the ſaid prince. At length, prince Leolin going towards the land of Buelth with a ſmall companie, left his maine armie behind him aloft vpon the top of the mounteine, neere to the water called Waie, and he had ſet a number of his people to keepe the bridge of Orewin: and ſo the Welſhmen kept on the one ſide, and the Engliſhmen on the other, of whome were capteins the lord John Gifford and the lord Edmund Mortimer, the which perceiuing the Welſhmen that were readie to defend the bridge, and a great hoſt of them vpon the top of the mounteine, they conſulted togither what they were beſt to doo.

Helias walwaine.

At length by the couragious exhortation of one Helias Walewaine they drew on the one hand alongſt the riuer, where was a foord paſſable in deed, though not without danger: but yet the Engliſhmen by the conduct of the ſame Helias, got ouer by the ſame foord, ſo that it bare the name long after of Helias way. And ſo the Welſhmen that kept the bridge (perceiuing the Engliſhmen to be got ouer vnto that ſide) fled, wherevpon the reſidue of the Engliſh armie paſſed ouer at the bridge, whereof roſe a great noiſe, which Leolin lurking not farre off might well heare, but yet at the firſt he could not be brought to thinke that by any poſſible means the Engliſhmen were got ouer to that ſide of the water. But yet perceiuing it to be true, he drue backe toward the heigth of the mounteine againe, neuertheleſſe being diſcouered by one Stephan de Franketon, named by ſome writers Sward, he was ſo narrowlie purſued of the ſame Stephan, that he was ouertaken and ſlaine.

Prince Leolin ſlaine by Stephan de Franketon.

Stephan not knowing whome he had ſlaine, returned to the hoſt, the which was now mounting vp the hill to ioine with the Welſh armie that ſtood ſtill looking for the returne of their prince Leolin (though in vaine) yet they manfullie abode by their tackle, diſcharging plentie of arowes and darts at the Engliſhmen as they came vp towards them. The Engliſh archers which were mingled amongſt the horſſemen, paid them home againe with their ſhot, ſo that finallie the Engliſh horſſemen, winning the top of the hill, ſlue manie of them ſtanding ſtoutlie at defenſe, and put the reſidue to flight. Stephan Sward that had ſlaine Leolin, after the victorie was atchiued, rode to the dead bodie which he had ſlaine in the beginning of the battell, and vpon vew taken of him perceiued who he was, of which good hap the Engliſhmen were verie ioifull. His head was herewith cut off, which the lord Edmund Mortimer tooke with him vnto Rutland (where the king as then was lodged) vnto whome he preſented it: and the king ſent it vnto London, appointing that there ſhould be an yuie crowne ſet vpon it, in token that he was a prince, and ſo being adorned, a horſſeman carried it vpon the end of his ſtaffe through Cheapſide, holding it as he rode on heigth, that all men might ſee it, till he came to the tower, & there it was pight vp aloft vpon one of the higheſt turrets, remaining there a long time after.

to him by an old woman taken for a ſouthſaier, of whome he required to know how he ſhould ſpeed in this warre, whereunto ſhe anſwered, that he ſhould boldlie go forward in them, for he ſhould ride with a crowne on his head through Cheapſide: and ſo by the deceiueable propheſie he was deluded & brought to deſtruction. The incounter wherein the Welſhmen were vanquiſhed (as before ye haue heard) chanced on the fridaie before S. Lucies day. King Edward being certified thus of the victorie, ſtreightwaies marched forth with his people, and appointed at euerie paſſage certeine bands of ſouldiers to lie in wait for the enimies. Alſo at the foot of the hilles he left his horſſemen, and mounted vp the hilles himſelfe, with the reſidue of his armie. There were certeine Gaſcoines, whome the lord John Veſcie had brought with him out of their countrie, to ſerue the king, which burned manie townes, and ſlue great numbers of the Welſhmen, all that came in their waie, and finallie, giuing an aſſault to Snowdon caſtell, they wan it in fine by force.

The Gaſcoins purſue the welſhmen egerlie.

In this meane time, the Welſhmen, when they ſaw themſelues incloſed, and ſtopped from all waies to eſcape, after the maner of wild beaſts, fled into the thicke woods & caues, ſome of them making ſhift to get downe through the ſteepe and broken rocks, and ſome of them ſeeking to eſcape by flight, fell into their enimies hands, & were either ſlaine or taken, and amongſt theſe, about Midſummer was Dauid taken, togither with his wife, his two ſonnes, and ſeauen daughters, and brought to the king, who ſent them firſt to Rutland caſtell, there to be ſafelie kept.

King Edward hauing ſubdued the Welſhmen that inhabited in the mounteins, went about all the countrie to conquer the reſidue, aſſembling all his armie togither, and then purſuing his aduerſaries, made great ſlaughter of them on each ſide, ſo that there were ſlaine aboue three thouſand men: then hauing the countrie at his will, he gaue vnto the Engliſh lords townes in the middeſt of Wales, and diuided the countrie into ſhires, ordeined ſhiriffes, and other officers as then were vſed in England. At Aberconow he builded a ſtrong caſtell, where before was an houſe of white monks, the which he remoued to the Vale roiall in Cheſhire, where he builded a faire abbeie of the Ciſteaux order, and endowed it with great lands and reuenues. He alſo made and fortified the caſtell of Carnaruan faſt by Snowdon, and repared againe the towne of Lambaterwhir, otherwiſe called Abreſwich, which Leolin had before beaten downe. Alſo he placed Engliſh garriſons in the caſtels and holds by the ſea ſides, and made Engliſhmen lords of the grounds and poſſeſſions belonging to the ſame. Rees ap Bouan one of the cheefeſt and mightieſt capteins of all Wales, which during the warres, had doone more diſpleaſure to the Engliſhmen than any other, in ſpoiling their confines, and making great ſlaughters vpon them, vnderſtanding now both of the death of prince Leolin, and the taking of his brother Dauid, and alſo perceiuing himſelfe purſued on each ſide, at length yeelded himſelfe and his complices to Humfrie de Bohun earle of Hereford, who ſtraightwaies ſent him to the king, and the king ſent him to London, there to be kept priſoner in the tower.

His head was ſent to London, and ſet vp by the head of his brother Leolin. His quarters were diuided, and ſent to be ſet vp on the gates of foure of the cheefeſt cities of England. The death of the Scotiſh king.

The nineteenth of March, died Alexander king of Scotland, by a fall which he caught as he ran a ſtirring horſſe: he left no iſſue behind him, nor any certeine knowne heire to ſucceed him, by reaſon whereof inſued great harme to that relme (as in the Scotiſh hiſtorie may more at large appeare.) The manner of whoſe death (as in Richard Southwell I find it reported) I haue thought good breeflie to touch, for that in recitall thereof, he ſomewhat diſagreeth from the Scotiſh hiſtorie. There went (ſaith he) a common ſpeach through Scotland all this yeare, before the kings death, that on the ſame nineteenth of March the daie of iudgement ſhould be: wherevpon, as the ſaid king ſat at dinner in the caſtell of Edenburgh, hauing a diſh of excellent good lampries before him, he ſent part therof to one of the lords that ſat at ſome other table not far from him, and willed him by the gentleman that bare it, to be merrie, and haue in mind that this was the day of doome. The lord ſent him thanks againe, and praied the meſſenger to tell the king merilie, that if this were the daie of doome, they ſhould riſe to iudgement ſpeedilie with their bellies filled with good meats and drinks. After they had dined, and the night began to draw on, he tooke his horſſe, and onlie accompanied with three gentlemen, would needs ride to Kingorne, where the queene his new wife then laie, and before he could get vnto Innerkenin, it was darke night, ſo that he tooke there two guides to lead him the waie: but they had not ridden paſt two miles, but that the guides had quite loſt the waie, ſo that they were driuen to giue their horſſes libertie to beat it out themſelues.

Rich. South.

Herewithall the king being ſeuered from his companie, how he ruled his horſſe it is hard to ſaie, but downe he was throwne, and immediatlie died with the vehement fall which he thus caught, either headlong downe one of the cliffes or otherwiſe, and thus he came to his end, on a mondaie, being ſaint Cuthberts euen the nineteenth of March (as before is noted) after he had reigned ſix & thirtie yeares and nine moneths, as the ſame Southwell ſaieth; who alſo (contrarie to that which Hector Boetius writeth) affirmeth, that the ſame daie was ſo tempeſtuous with wind, ſnow, haile and raine, that he and manie other that then liued and felt it, durſt not vncouer their faces, in going abroad againſt the bitter northerne wind, that droue the ſnow and ſleet moſt vehementlie vpon them. And although that ſuch fowle weather might haue ſtaied him from taking his iournie in that ſort, yet he made no accompt thereof, as he that was accuſtomed to ride as well in fowle weather as faire, and ſpared neither for tempeſt, waters, nor craggie rocks, thicke nor thin; for all was one to him, oftentimes taking his iournie in diſguiſed apparell, accompanied onlie with one ſeruant. But to returne vnto the doings in England.

In this yeare the king tooke eſcuage, fortie ſhillings of euerie knights fee, towards the charges of his laſt wars in Wales. ¶ A parlement was holden at Weſtminſter, at the which were made the ſtatutes called Additamenta Gloceſtriæ, or rather the ſtatutes of Weſtminſter the ſecond. In the foureteenth yeare of king Edward, a citizen of London named Thomas Piwileſdon, who in time of the barons warres had beeue a great doer, to ſtir the people againſt king Henrie, was now accuſed, that he with other ſhould go about to make new diſturbance within the citie: whereof inquirie being made and had before ſir Raſe Standiſh, then cuſtos or gardian of the citie, the ſaid Piwileſdon and other, to the number of fiftie, were baniſhed the citie for euer. ¶ Alſo, whereas of old time before this ſeaſon, the merchant ſtrangers were vſed to be lodged within the dwelling houſes of the citizens of London, and ſold all their merchandize by procuration of their hoſts, for the which their ſaid hoſts had a certeine allowance, after the rate of euerie pound: now it was ordeined, that the ſaid merchant ſtrangers might take houſes to hire, for to inhabit therein, & for ſtowage of their wares, & no citizen to intermeddle with them or their wares: by reaſon whereof they vſed manie deceits, both in vttering counterfeit wares, and alſo vniuſt weights. Moreouer, much of thoſe wares, which they ſhould haue waied at the K. beame, they weighed at home within their houſes, to the hinderance of the kings cuſtome. Wherevpon ſearch being made vpon a ſudden, and their weights found and prooued falſe, twentie of the ſaid ſtrangers were arreſted and ſent to the towre, and their weights burnt, deſtroied and broken to peeces in Weſtcheape, on thurſdaie before the feaſt of Simon and Iude. Finallie, the ſaid merchants were deliuered, being put to a fine of a thouſand pounds, after ſore and hard impriſonment.

The Iewes in one night were generallie apprehended, and put in priſon through all the parts of England, and ſo kept in durance, till they had fined at the kings pleaſure. ¶ It is reported that the commons of England granted to the king, the fift part of their mooueables, to haue the Iewes baniſhed out of the land: but the Iewes, to put the Engliſhmen frō their purpoſe, gaue to the king great ſummes of monie, whereby they tarried yet a while longer. King Edward went ouer into France vpon the fiue and twentith of Maie, paſſing through Picardie vnto Amiens, and there the French king, to doo him honor, was readie to receiue him. Here king Edward did homage vnto the French king, for the lands which he ought to hold of him in France. And after, he was alſo preſent at a parlement, which the ſaid French king held at Paris, in the which he obteined manie things for the liberties of his ſaid lands, as then by diuerſe waies wrongfullie oppreſſed, though ſuch grant continued not long in force. After Whitſuntide, king Edward departed from Paris and went into Gaſcoigne, togither with his wife queene Elianor, who was with him in all his iournie.

This yeare the king went into Aragon, where his authoritie auailed much, in the making of agreement betwixt the kings of Aragon and Naples; whereby Charles king of Naples was then ſet at libertie, vpon certeine contracts or couenants paſſed and agreed betwixt them. ¶ The kings mother queene Elianor this yeare forſooke the world, and tooke vpon hir the habit of a nunne at Ambreſburie; but yet ſhe ſtill reteined and inioied hir dower by the popes authoritie and diſpenſation. About this time a ſquire called Chamberlaine, with his complices, ſet fire on the merchants boothes, at S. Butolphes faire; and whileſt the merchants were about to quench the fire, the ſaid ſquire and his complices ſet vpon the ſaid merchants, ſlue manie of them, and robbed them of their goods. In this yeare fell variance betweene the lord Paine Tiptoſt, wardeine of certeine caſtels in Wales, and a Welſh knight called ſir Rees ap Meridoc, ſo that ſundrie ſkirmiſhes were foughten betwixt them, and men ſlaine on both ſides, to the great diſturbance of the countrie.

The cauſe of this warre roſe cheeflie, for that the ſaid lord Tiptoſt, and the lord Alane Plucknet, the kings ſteward in Wales, would haue conſtreined the ſaid Rees to appeare at counties and hundreds, as the vſe in other parts of Wales then was, contrarie to ſuch liberties as he had obteined of the king as he pretended. things in due and reaſonable order) Rées hauing alreadie put armour vpon his backs, would not now incline to any peace, but to reuenge his cauſe, aſſembled a great multitude of Welſhmen, with whoſe helpe he burnt & deſtroied manie townes in Wales, ſo that the K. being then beyond the ſeas, ſent to the earle of Cornewall, whom in his abſence he had appointed his lieutenant ouer England, requiring him to ſend an armie into Wales, to reſiſt the malice and riotous attempts of the Welſhmen. The earle ſhortlie therevpon prepared an armie, and went with the ſame into Wales, or (as other write) the biſhop of Elie, the lord prior of S. Iohns, the earle of Gloceſter, and diuerſe barons of the land went thither, and chaſing the ſaid Rées, diſperſed his armie, and ouerthrew and raced his caſtels, but by vndermining and reuerſing the wals at the caſtell of Druſlan, with the fall therof, the baron Stafford, and the lord William de Montchenſie, with manie other knights and eſquiers, were oppreſſed and bruſed to death. ¶ This yeare, the king at Blankfort in Gaſcoigne, tooke vpon him the croſſe, purpoſing eftſoones to make a iournie againſt Gods enimies.

Chron. Dunſt.

In the winter of this yeare great flouds chanced, by reaſon of the excéeding abundance of raine that fell: and the ſea alongſt the northeaſt coaſts from Humber to Yarmouth, brake into the land, ouerflowing the ſame by the ſpace of thrée or foure leagues in breadth (as the author of the Chronicle of Dunſtable affirmeth) ouerthrowing buildings, and drowning vp men and cattell that could not auoid the danger by the ſodden comming in thereof, namelie, about Yarmouth, Dunwich, and Gippeſwich. Likewiſe in the Mers land of Lincolnſhire it did paſſing great hurt, bringing all the countrie into water. This chanced in the verie night of the beginning of this yéere, to wit, in the feaſt of the circumciſion of our Lord, and in December it brake out againe in Northfolke and Suffolke, where it did much harme, namelie about Yarmouth.

This yeare, and likewiſe the yeare laſt paſt, was ſuch plentie of graine, that wheat was ſold in ſome places of this land for twentie pence a quarter, and in ſome places for ſixtéene pence, and peaſe for twelue pence a quarter. The ſummer this yeare excéeded in heat, ſo that men thorough the intemperate exceſſe thereof died in diuers places. ¶ It chanced in Gaſcoigne, that as the king & quéene ſate in their chamber vpon a bed talking togither, the thunder-bolt comming in at the window behind them, paſſed through betwixt them as they ſate, and ſlue two of their gentlemen that ſtood before them, to the great terror of all that were preſent. ¶ This yeare diuerſe of thoſe that robd the faire at Boſton, were executed.

Moreouer, whereas Rées ap Meridoc continued ſtill in his miſchieuous dooings, at length, the lord deputie of Wales, Robert Tiptoſt, vſing both ſpéedie diligence and timelie counſell, gathered all ſuch power as he could make, & paſſed forth againſt his aduerſaries. Whereof when ſir Rées was aduertiſed, and vnderſtanding that the Engliſhmen were farre fewer in number than his Welſhmen, he thought to ouerthrow them at his pleaſure, and therefore incouraging his people with manie comfortable words, to ſhew their manhood vpon the Engliſhmens approch, he haſted to méet them. The Welſhmen being for the more part but yoong ſouldiers, and not trained to kéepe any order of battell, ran fiercelie vpon their enimies, aſſailing them on the front before, on the ſides a flanke, and on the backe behind, inforcing themſelues to the vttermoſt of their power to breake their arraie.

But the Engliſhmen valiantlie reſiſted, ſo that there was a ſore battell for a while, and the more couragiouſlie the Welſhmen aſſailed, the more ſtoutlie the Engliſhmen defended, in kéeping themſelues cloſe togither, and beating backe their aduerſaries: and at length perceiuing them to faint and wax wearie, they ruſhed forth into the middle of the Welſhmen, & brake them in ſunder, ſo that when they ſaw themſelues thus repelled by the Engliſhmen, contrarie vnto all their expectation, they knew not what to doo, for they durſt neither fight nor flée, and ſo by that meanes were beaten downe on euerie ſide. Meridoc himſelfe was taken, but the moſt part of all his armie was ſlaine, to the number of foure thouſand men. Thus were the Welſhmen worthilie chaſtiſed for their rebellion. Sir Rées ap Meridoc was had to Yorke, where at length, after the king was returned out of Gaſcoigne, he was hanged, drawen and quartered.

The king, after he had remained and continued thrée yeares, two moneths, and fiftéene daies in Gaſcoine, and in other parts there beyond the ſea, he returned into England on the fourth day of Auguſt, and vpon the euen of the Aſſumption of our ladie he came to London, where he was moſt ioifullie receiued, & ſo came to Weſtminſter: where ſhortlie after were preſented vnto him manie gréeuous complaints and informations againſt diuerſe of his iuſtices, as ſir Thomas Weiland, Adam Stretton, and others, the which were had in examination, and thervpon found giltie of manie treſpaſſes and tranſgreſſions, in ſo much that it was giuen him to vnderſtand, that there were among them that had giuen conſent to the committing of murthers and robberies, and wittinglie had receiued the offendors. Wherevpon, the king cauſed ſtreight inquirie to be made by an inqueſt of 12 ſubſtantiall perſonages, who found by verdict, that Thomas Weiland lord chéefe iuſtice of the kings bench, had cauſed a murther to be doone by his ſeruants, and after ſuccoured and mainteined them: hervpon he was by the kings officers arreſted, but eſcaping their hands, he tooke ſanctuarie in the church of the friers minors at ſaint Edmundeſburie, and was admitted into their habit, but within fourtie daies after, order was giuen by the king that no kind of vittels ſhould be ſuffered to be conueied to that houſe, ſo that all the friers came forth, except thrée or foure, and at length he was conſtreined to take vpon him a laie mans apparell, and comming forth was deliuered to the hands of Robert Malet knight, who had before the cuſtodie of him, and now hauing him againe brought him to the tower of London. At length, he was put to his choiſe of thrée waies, which ſoeuer of them he would take, that is, whether to be tried by his péeres, or to remaine in perpetuall priſon, or to abiure the realme: he choſe the laſt, and ſo bare-footed and bare-headed, bearing a croſſe in his hand, he was conueied from the tower to Douer, where taking the ſea, he was tranſported to the further ſide of the ſea; his goods, moueable and vnmoueable, being confiſcate to the kings coffers.

In the eightéenth yeare of his reigne, the king maried two of his daughters, that is to ſaie, Ioane de Acres vnto Gilbert de Clare earle of Gloceſter, and the ladie Margaret vnto the lord Iohn ſonne to the duke of Brabant. ¶ The king ordeined, that all the wooll, which ſhould be ſold vnto ſtrangers, ſhould be brought vnto Sandwich, where the ſtaple thereof was kept long time after. In the ſame yeare was a parlement holden at Weſtminſter, wherein the ſtatutes of Weſtminſter the third were ordeined. It was alſo decréed, that all the Iewes ſhould auoid out of the land, in conſideration whereof, a fiftéenth was granted to the king, and ſo héervpon were the Iewes baniſhed out of all the kings dominions, and neuer ſince could they obteine any priuilege to returne hither againe. Alſo, Alexander ſucceded his brother Edgar in the kingdome of Scotland, by conſent of K. Henrie the firſt. Alſo Dauid king of Scotland did homage to K. Stephan, & William K. of Scots did homage to Henrie, the ſon of K. Henrie the ſecond, when in his fathers life time he was crowned; and againe, to Henrie the father in the 20 yeare of his reigne, as by an agreement made betwixt them two it doth appeare. Alſo, Roger Houeden ſaith, that William king of Scotland came to his ſoucreigne lord king Henrie into Normandie, and likewiſe to king Richard, and moreouer to king Iohn at Lincolne, dooing to them his homage. Alſo, in the chronicles of S. Albons it is found, that Alexander king of Scotland married at Yorke Margaret the daughter of king Henrie the third, in the 35 yeare of his reigne, and did to him homage.

K. Edward recogniſed for ſuperiour lord of Scotland.

And further, when king Edward himſelfe was crowned at Weſtminſter, in the yeare of our Lord 1274, being the ſecond of his reigne, the laſt deceaſſed K. of Scotland, Alexander the third of that name did homage vnto him at Weſtminſter the morrow after the coronation. All which homages and fealties thus done by ſundrie kings of Scotland, vnto ſundrie kings of England, were directlie and moſt maniſeſtlie prooued to be doone for the realme of Scotland, and not onelie for the lands which they held of the kings of England within England, as the Scottiſh writers would ſeeme to colour the matter. But things being then freſh in memorie, no ſuch cauillation might be auerred. And ſo herevpon king Edwards title being ſubſtantiallie prooued, he was recogniſed ſuperiour lord of Scotland, of all them that pretended title at that time to that kingdome, by writings thereof made and confirmed vnder their ſeales, the which being written in French conteined matter as here followeth.

TO all them that theſe preſent writings ſhall ſee or heare, Florence earle of Holland, Robert le Bruce lord of Annandale, Iohn de Balioll lord of Galloway, Iohn Haſtings lord of Abergeuenny, Iohn Comin lord of Badenaw, Patrike de Dunbarre the earle of March, Iohn de Veſcy in ſtead of his father, Nicholas de Sules, William de Ros, ſend greeting in our lord. Bicauſe that of our good will and common aſſent, without all conſtraint, we doo conſent and grant vnto the noble prince the lord Edward, by the grace of God king of England, that he as ſuperiour lord of Scotland, may heare, examine, define and determine our claimes, chalenges, and petitions, which we intend to ſhew and prooue for our right, to be receiued before him as ſuperiour lord of the land, promiſing moreouer, that we ſhall take his deed for firme and ſtable, and that he ſhall inioy the kingdome of Scotland, whoſe right ſhall by declaration beſt appeare before him.

Whereas then the ſaid king of England cannot in this manner take knowledge, nor fulfill our meanings without iudgement, nor iudgement ought to be without execution, nor execution may in due forme be doone without poſſeſſion and ſeizine of the ſaid land and caſtels of the ſame; we will, conſent, and grant, that he as ſuperiour lord to performe the premiſſes may haue the ſeizine of all the land and caſtels of the ſame, till they that pretend title to the crowne be ſatiſfied in their ſuit, ſo that before he be put in poſſeſſion and ſeizine, he find ſufficient ſuertie to vs that pretend title, and to the wardens, and to all the communaltie of the kingdome of Scotland, that he ſhall reſtore the ſame kingdome with all the roialtie, dignitie, ſeigniorie, liberties, cuſtomes, rights, lawes, vſages, poſſeſſions, and all and whatſoeuer the appurtenances, in the ſame ſtate wherein they were before the ſeizine to him deliuered, vnto him to whome by right it is due, according to the iudgement of his regalitie, ſauing to him the homage of that perſon that ſhall be king: and this reſtitution to be made within two moneths after the daie in the which the right ſhall be diſcuſſed and eſtabliſhed, the iſſues of the ſame land in the meane time ſhall be receiued, laid vp, and put in ſafe keeping, in the hands of the chamberlaine of Scotland which now is, and of him, whome the king of England ſhall to him aſſigne, and this vnder their ſeales, reſeruing and allowing the reaſonable charges for the ſuſtentation of the land, the caſtels and officers of the kingdome. In witneſſe of all the which premiſſes, we haue vnto theſe letters ſet our ſeales. Giuen at Norham the wedneſday next after the feaſt of the Aſcenſion of our Lord, in the yeare of Grace, 1291.

These two letters the king of England ſent vnder his priuie ſeale vnto diuerſe monaſteries within his realme, in the 19 yeere of his reigne, that in perpetuall memorie of the thing thus paſſed, it might be regiſtred in their chronicles. Thus by the common aſſent of the cheefeſt of the lords in Scotland, king Edward receiued the land into his cuſtodie, till by due and lawfull triall had, it might appeere who was rightfull heire to the crowne there. The homage or fealtie of the nobles of Scotland was expreſſed in words as followeth.

Becauſe all we are come vnto the allegiance of the noble prince Edward king of England, we promiſe for vs and our heires, vpon all the danger that we may incurre, that we ſhall be faithfull, & loiallie hold of him againſt all maner of mortall men, and that we ſhall not vnderſtand of any damage that may come to the king, nor to his heires, but we ſhall ſtaie and impeach the ſame to our powers. And to this we bind our ſelues & our heires, and are ſworne vpon the euangeliſts to performe the ſame. Beſides this, we haue doone fealtie vnto our ſouereigne lord the ſaid king in theſe words ech one by himſelfe; I ſhall be true and faithfull, and faith and loialtie I ſhall beare to the king of England Edward and his heires, of life, member, and worldlie honour againſt all mortall creatures.

Wardens of the realme of Scotland appointed by K. Edward.

The biſhop of Catneſſe elected chancellor of Scotland.

He receiueth his ſeale.

He is ſworne.

The king hauing receiued as well the poſſeſſions of the realme, caſtels, manours, as other places belonging to the crowne of Scotland, he committed the gouernement and cuſtodie of the realme vnto the biſhops of S. Andrews and Glaſco, to the lords Iohn Comin, and Iames Steward, who had put him in poſſeſſion, ſo that vnder him they held the ſame, in maner as they had doone before. But in diuerſe caſtels he placed ſuch capteines as he thought moſt meeteſt to keepe them to his vſe, till he had ended the controuerſie, & placed him in the kingdome, to whom of right it belonged. He alſo willed the lords of Scotland to elect a ſufficient perſonage to be chancellour of the realme, which they did, naming Alane biſhop of Catneſſe, whom the king admitted, ioining with him one of his chapleins named Walter Armundeſham, ſo that on the 12 of Iune, vpon the greene ouer againſt the the caſtell of Norham, neere to the riuer of Tweed, in the pariſh of Vpſetelington, before Iohn Balioll, Robert Bruce, the biſhops of S. Andrews and Glaſco, the lords Comin and Steward, wardens of Scotland; the biſhop of Catneſſe receiued his ſeale, appointed him by the king of England as ſupreme lord of Scotland, and there both the ſaid biſhop & Walter Armundeſham were ſworne trulie to gouerne themſelues in the office.

The wardẽs ſworne.

The Scotiſh nobilitie doth fealtie to king Edward.

The morrow after were the wardens ſworne and with them as aſſociated Brian Fitz Alane, and there all the earles and lords of Scotland that were preſent ſware fealtie vnto king Edward, as to their ſupreme ſouereigne lord, and withall there was peace proclaimed, and publike edicts ſet forth in the name of the ſame king, intituled ſupreme lord of the realme of Scotland. The reſidue of the Scotiſh nobilitie, earles, barons, knights, and others, with the biſhops and abbats, vpon his comming into Scotland, ſware fealtie either to himſelfe in perſon, or to ſuch as he appointed his deputies to receiue the ſame, in ſundrie towns and places, according to order giuen in that behalfe. Such as refuſed to doo their fealties, were attached by their bodies, till they ſhould doo their fealties as they were bound. Thoſe that came not, but excuſed themſelues vpon ſome reaſonable cauſe, were heard, and had day giuen vntill the next parlement: but ſuch as neither came, nor made any reaſonable excuſe, were appointed to be diſtreined to come.

The biſhop of S. Andrewes, and Iohn lord Comin of Badenoth, with Brian Fitz Alane, were aſſigned to receiue ſuch fealties at S. Iohns towne. The biſhop of Glaſco, Iames lord ſteward of Scotland, and Nicholas Segraue were appointed to receiue them at Newcaſtell of Are. The earle of Southerland, and the ſhiriffe of that countrie, with his bailiffes, and the chatellaine of Inuerneſſe were ordeined to receiue thoſe fealties in that countie; the chattelaine firſt to receiue it of the ſaid earle, and then he with his ſaid aſſociats to receiue the ſame of others. The lord William de Saintclare, and William de Bomille, were appointed to receiue fealtie of the biſhop of Whiterne, and then the ſaid biſhop with them to receiue the fealties of all the inhabitants of Gallowaie. Amongſt other that did their homage to the king himſelfe, was Marie queene of Man, and counteſſe of Stratherne, vpon the 24 daie of Iulie, the king being thus in S. Iohns towne, otherwiſe called Perth. To conclude, he was put in full poſſeſſion of the realme of Scotland, & receiued there homages and fealties (as before ye haue heard) as the direct and ſupreme lord of that land.

The kings mother deceaſſed.

Anno Reg. 20. 1292

Nic. Triuet.

This doone, and euerie thing ordered as ſeemed moſt expedient, king Edward returned into the ſouth parts of his realme, to be at his mothers buriall, that in this meane time was departed this life. Hir hart was buried in the church of the Graifriers at London, & hir bodie at Ambreſburie in the houſe of the nunnes. ¶ After the funerals were ended, king Edward returned into the north parts againe: he ſtaied a while at Yorke, and during his abode there, Rees ap Meridoc (of whome ye haue heard before) was by order of law condemned & executed. ¶ This yeare after Eaſter, as the fleet laie before S. Matthewes in Britaine, there roſe certeine diſcord betwixt the Norman mariners, and them of Baion, and ſo farre the quarell increaſed, that they fell to trie it by force, the Engliſhmen aſſiſting them of Baion, and the French kings ſubiects taking part with the Normans, and now they fraught not their ſhips ſo much with merchandize as with armour & weapon. At length the matter burſt out from ſparkes into open flame, the ſequele whereof hereafter ſhall appeare, as we find it reported by writers.

Iohn Balioll obteineth the kingdome of Scotland.

Nic. Triuet.

Polydor.

But now touching the Scotiſh affaires. At length the king comming into Scotland, gaue ſummons to all thoſe that claimed the crowne, to appeare before him at the feaſt of the natiuitie of S. Iohn Baptiſt next inſuing, that they might declare more at large by what right they claimed the kingdome. Hervpon, when the daie of their appearance was come, and that king Edward was readie to heare the matter, he choſe out the number of 40 perſons, the one halfe Engliſhmen, and the other Scotiſhmen, which ſhould diſcuſſe with aduiſed deliberation and great diligence the allegations of the competitors, deferring the finall ſentence vnto the feaſt of S. Michaell next inſuing, the which feaſt being come, after due examination, full triall, and aſſured knowledge had of the right, the kingdome by all their aſſents was adiudged vnto Iohn Balioll, who deſcended of the eldeſt daughter of Dauid king of Scotland. Robert le Bruce, betwixt whom and the ſame Balioll at length (the other being excluded) the queſtion and triall onlie reſted, was deſcended of the ſecond daughter of king Dauid, though otherwiſe by one degree he was neerer to him in bloud. Thus writeth Nicholas Triuet.

But others affirme, that after long diſputation in the matter, by order of king Edward, there were appointed 80 ancient and graue perſonages, amongſt the which were 30 Engliſhmen, vnto whom (being ſworne and admoniſhed to haue God before their eies) authoritie was giuen to name him that ſhould be king. Theſe 80 perſons, after they had well conſidered vnto whome the right apperteined, declared with one voice, that Iohn Balioll was rightfull king.

king Edward allowed their ſentence, and by his authoritie confirmed vnto the ſame John, the poſſeſſion of the kingdome of Scotland, with condition that if he did not gouerne that realme with iuſtice, then vpon complaint, the king of England might put vnto his hand of reformation, as he was bound to doo by his right of ſuperioritie, that in him was inueſted. Herevpon king Edward awarded forth his writ of deliuerie of ſeizine at the ſuit of the ſaid J. Balioll, to William and Robert, biſhops of S. Andrewes and Glaſco, to John lord Comin, James lord Steward of Scotland, and to the lord Brian Fitz Alane, wardens of Scotland, commanding them to deliuer vnto the ſaid John Balioll the ſeizine and poſſeſſion of that realme, ſauing the reléeſes and debts due to him of the iſſues and profits of the ſame realme, vnto the day of the date of the writ, which was the ninetéenth day of Nouember, in the twentie yere of his reigne. Alſo there was another writ made, and directed to ſuch as had the kéeping of the caſtels in their hands, in forme as followeth.

The copie of the writ for the deliuerie of the caſtels.

EDwardus Dei gratia rex Angliæ, dominus Hiberniæ, dux Aquitaniæ, & ſuperior dominus regni Scotiæ, dilecto & fideli ſuo Petro Burdet, conſtabulario caſtri de Berwike ſalutem. Cùm Iohannes de Baliolo nuper in parlamento noſtro apud Berwicum ſuper Tuedam, veniſſet coram nobis, & petiuiſſet prædictum regnum Scotiæ ſibi per nos adiudicari, & ſeiſinam ipſius regni vt propinquiori hæredi Margaretæ filiæ regis Norwegiæ dominæ Scotiæ iure ſucceſſionis liberari, ac nos auditis & intellectis petitionibus, & rationibus diligentur examinatis, inuenerimus præfatum Iohannem de Baliolo eſſe propinquiorem hæredem prædictæ Margaretæ, quo ad prædictum regnum Scotiæ obtinendum: propter quod idem regnum Scotiæ, & ſeiſinam eiuſdem, ſaluo iure noſtro, & heredum noſtrorum, cùm voluerimus inde loqui, prædicto Iohanni reddidimus: tibi mandamus quòd ſeiſinam prædicti caſtri de Beruico cum omnibus pertinentijs ſuis, vnà cum alijs omnibus rebus tibi per chirographum traditis, ſecundum quod in prædicti caſtri tibi commiſſa cuſtodia res huiuſmodi recepiſti, ſine dilatione præfato Iohanni de Baliolo, vel attornatis ſuis has litteras deferentibus, deliberari facias. Teſte meipſo apud Beruicum ſuper Tuedam 19 die Nouembris, Anno regni noſtri 20.

In Engliſh thus.

EDward by the grace of God, king of England, lord of Ireland, duke of Aquitaine, and ſuperiour lord of the realme of Scotland, to his welbeloued and faithfull ſeruant Peter Burdet coneſtable of the caſtell of Berwike, ſendeth greeting. Where Iohn de Balioll late in parlement holden at Berwike vpon Tweed, came before vs, and demanded the ſaid realme of Scotland to be adiudged to him by vs, and ſeizine of the ſame realme to be to him deliuered as next heire to Margaret daughter to the king of Norwaie, ladie of Scotland by right of ſucceſſion. We hauing heard and vnderſtood the ſame petitions; and reaſons being diligentlie weighed and examined, we find the ſaid Iohn Balioll to be next heire vnto the ſaid Margaret, as to obteine the ſaid kingdome of Scotland, wherevpon we haue deliuered to him the ſaid kingdome of Scotland, and the ſeizine therof, ſauing the right of vs & our heires, when it ſhall pleaſe vs to ſpeake therof. We therefore command you, that you deliuer vp vnto the ſaid Iohn Balioll, or to his attornies, that ſhall bring with them theſe our preſent letters, the ſeizine of the ſaid caſtell of Berwike, with all the appurtenances, togither with all other things to you by indenture deliuered accordinglie as you did receiue the ſame, with the cuſtodie of the ſaid caſtle to you committed: and this without delaie. Witneſſe our ſelfe at Berwike vpon Tweed the nineteenth day of Nouember, in the twentith yeare of our reigne.

In the ſame forme of words were writs awarded forth, to all and euerie other the kéepers of caſtels and manors belonging to the crowne of Scotland, and being at that time in K. Edwards hands, the names of places and the perſons that had them in cuſtodie onelie changed. On the ſame day alſo in the caſtell of Berwike was the ſeale broken, which had béene appointed to the gouernors, during the time that the realme was vacant of a king. It was broken into foure parts, and put into a purſſe to be reſerued in the treaſurie of the king of England, in further and more full token of his ſuperioritie and direct ſupreme dominion ouer the realme of Scotland.

The ſeale broken.

Theſe things were doone in preſence of the ſaid John Balioll then king of Scotland, John archbiſhop of Dubline, John biſhop of Wincheſter, Anthonie biſhop of Dureſme, William biſhop of Elie, John biſhop of Carleil, William biſhop of S. Andrewes, Robert biſhop of Glaſco, Marke biſhop of Man, and Henrie biſhop of Aberdene, with diuerſe other biſhops, beſides abbats and priors of both the realmes; Henrie earle of Lincolne, Humfrie earle of Hereford, Roger earle of Norffolke, John earle of Buchquane, Douenald earle of Mar, Gilbert earle of Angus, Patrike earle of March, and Maliſius earle of Stratherne; with the foure and twentie auditors of England, and the foure score auditors of Scotland: chapleins alſo, Henrie de Newmarke deane of Yorke, John Lacie chancellour of Chicheſter, William de Gréenefield canon of Yorke, and John Ercurie notarie, and manie other. John Balioll being thus created K. of Scotland, on the twentith day of Nouember, in the caſtell of Norham, did fealtie to king Edward for the kingdome of Scotland, in maner as followeth.

The forme of the fealtie of Iohn Balioll king of Scots to the king of England in proteſtation.

THis heare you my lord Edward king of England, ſoueraigne lord of the realme of Scotland, that I John de Balioll king of Scotland, which I hold and claime to hold of you, that I ſhall be faithfull and loiall, and owe faith and loialtie to you, I ſhall beare of life and member, and of earthlie honour, againſt all people, and lawfullie I ſhall acknowledge and doo the ſeruices which I owe to doo to you, for the realme of Scotland aforeſaid. So God me helpe and his holie euangeliſts.

Hereof alſo he made letters patents, witneſſing that he had thus done fealtie vnto king Edward, which letters he ſealed and deliuered in preſence of William biſhop of ſaint Andrews, Robert biſhop of Glaſco, Iohn earle of Bouchquane, William earle of Ros, Patrike earle of March, Walter earle of Menteth, Iames lord ſteward of Scotland, Alexander de Ergay, Alexander de Balioll lord of Caures, Patrike de Graham, and William de Saintclere. This done, king Edward appointed Anthonie biſhop of Dureſme, and the lord Iohn ſaint Iohn to paſſe with Balioll into Scotland, and there to put him into the corporall poſſeſſion of the ſame realme of Scotland, which they did, and ſo he was crowned at Scone vpon ſaint Andrews day, being placed in the marble chaire within the abbeie church there. The ſolemnitie of which coronation being ended, he returned into England, and comming to Newcaſtell vpon Tine, where K. Edward in that yeare kept his Chriſtmaſſe, he there did homage vpon ſaint Stephans daie vnto the ſaid king Edward, in forme of words as followeth.

Anno Reg. 21. Iohn Balioll crowned king of Scotland.

My lord, lord Edward king of England, ſuperior lord of Scotland, I Iohn de Balioll king of Scotland, doo acknowledge and recogniſe me to be your liegeman of the whole realme of Scotland, with all the appurtenances, and whatſoeuer belongeth thereto, the which kingdome I hold and ought of right and claime to hold by inheritance of you and your heires kings of England, and I ſhall beare faith and loialtie to you and to your heirs kings of England, of life, of member, and earthlie honour, againſt all men, which may liue and die.

This homage in forme aforeſaid did king Edward receiue, his owne and others right ſaued. Then did the king of England without delaie reſtore vnto the ſaid Iohn Balioll the kingdome of Scotland, with all the appurtenances. This yeare, as one Richard Bagley an officer of the ſhiriffes of London led a priſoner towards the gaile, thre perſons reſcued the ſaid priſoner, and tooke him from the officer, the which were purſued and taken, and by iudgement of law then vſed, were brought into Weſtcheape, and there had their hands ſtriken off by the wriſts. On the 14 daie of Maie fell a woonderfull ſnow, and therewith blew ſuch an exceeding wind, that great harme was done thereby in ſundrie places of England. In the ſame yeare died frier Iohn Peckham archbiſhop of Canturburie, and then was Robert of Winchelſie elected archbiſhop the 48 in number that had ruled that ſee. About the middle of September following, the earle of Bar a Frenchman, married the ladie Elianor the kings daughter in the towne of Briſtow. ¶ This yeare wheat was ſold at London for two ſhillings a buſhell.

This yeare alſo the war was begun betwene the kings of England and France. For whereas king Edward had furniſhed foorth ſix ſhips of warre, and ſent them vnto Burdeaux for defenſe of the coaſts thereabouts, two of them, as they ſailed alongſt the coaſt of Normandie, and fearing no hurt by enimies, were taken by the Norman fleet, and diuerſe of the mariners hanged. The lord Robert Tiptoſt that was admerall of the Engliſh fleet aduertiſed therof, got togither a great number of ſhips, and directed his courſe with them ſtreight towards Normandie, and finding no ſhips of the Normans abroad in the ſeas, vpon a deſire to be reuenged, entered the mouth of the riuer of Saine, and ſet vpon the Norman ſhips that laie there at anchor, ſlue manie of the mariners, & tooke ſix ſhips awaie with him, and ſo returning to the ſea againe, caſt anchor not far off from the land, to prouoke the Frenchmen to come foorth with their fleet to giue battell. And as he laie at anchor, it chanced that certeine Norman ſhips fraught with wine came that waies, as they returned out of Gaſcoigne. The lord Tiptoſt ſetting on them, tooke them with little adoo, and ſleaing neere hand the third part of all the mariners, ſent the ſhips into England.

Two Engliſh ſhips taken.

The lord merall of Eng land ſetteth vpō the No man ſhips.

The Frenchmen to reuenge this act, prepared a nauie, and furniſhing the ſame with ſouldiers went foorth to the ſea, to incounter the Engliſhmen: but yer they met, meſſengers were ſent to and fro, the Engliſhmen accuſing the Frenchmen of truce-breaking, and the Frenchmen againe requiring reſtitution of their goods taken from them by violence. And now forſomuch as this buſineſſe had beene moued raſhlie betwixt the Engliſhmen and the Normans, without any commiſſion of their princes, their minds therefore were not ſo kindled in diſpleaſure, but that there had been good hope of agreement betwixt them, if Charles earle of Valois the French kings brother (being a man of a hot nature & deſirous of reuenge) had not procured his brother to ſeeke reuengement by force of armes. Wherevpon the French fleet made toward the Engliſhmen, who minding not to detract the batell, ſharplie incountred their enimies in a certeine place betwixt England and Normandie, where they had laid a great emptie ſhip at anchor, to giue token where they meant to ioine. There were with the Engliſhmen both Iriſhmen and Hollanders, and with the Normans there were Frenchmen and Flemings, and certeine veſſels of Genowaies.

Charles earle of Valois procureth warre betwixt England and France.

The fight at the firſt was doubtfull, and great ſlaughter made, as in the meeting of two ſuch mightie nauies muſt needs inſue. Yet in the end the victorie fell to the Engliſhmen, and the French ſhips put to the chaſe and ſcattered abroad. The number of ſhips loſt is not recorded by ſuch writers as make report of this conflict, but they write that the loſſe was great. King Philip being aduertiſed of this diſcomfiture of his fleet was ſore diſpleaſed, and as though he would proceed againſt king Edward by order of law, he ſummoned him as his liegeman to appeare at Paris, to anſwer what might be obiected againſt him; but withall bicauſe he knew that king Edward would not come to make his appearance, he prepared an armie.

The Engliſhmen victors by ſea.

K. Edward ſummoned to appeare at Paris.

In the meane time king Edward ſent his brother Edmund earle of Lancaſter to be his attornie, and to make anſwer for him before all ſuch iudges as might haue hearing of the matter: but the iudges meaning nothing leſſe than to trie out the truth of the cauſe, admitted no reaſons that the earle could alledge in his brothers behalfe, and ſo pronounced king Edward a rebell, and decreed by areſt, that he had forfeited all his right vnto the duchie of Guien. Theſe things thus doone, he ſent priuie meſſengers vnto Burdeaux, to procure the citizens to reuolt from the Engliſhmen, and appointed conſtable of France the lord Arnold de Neale to follow with an armie, who comming thither eaſilie brought them of Burdeaux vnder the French dominion, being alreadie minded to reuolt through practiſe of thoſe that were latelie before ſent vnto them from the French king for that purpoſe. After this, the ſaid conſtable brought the people neere adioining vnder ſubiection, partlie moued by the example of the cheefe and head citie of all the countrie, and partlie induced therevnto by bribes and large gifts. The Engliſhmen that were in the countrie, after they perceiued that the people did thus reuolt to the French king, withdrew incontinentlie vnto the townes ſituat néere to the ſea ſide, but ſpeciallie they fled to a towne called the Rioll, which they fortified with all ſpéed. Thus ſaith Polydor.

N. Triuet.

Henrie earle of Lincolne.

Nicholas Triuet, writing hereof, declareth the beginning of this warre to be on this manner. The Engliſh merchants being diuerſlie vexed vpon the ſeas, made complaint to the king for loſſe of their merchandize. The king ſent Henrie Lacie earle of Lincolne vnto the French king, inſtantlie requiring, that by his aſſent there might ſome waie be prouided with ſpéed by them and their councell, for ſome competent remedie touching ſuch harmes and loſſes by ſea as his people had ſuſteind. In the meane time whileſt the earle taried for anſwer, a nauie of the parts of Normandie conteining two hundred ſhips and aboue, being aſſembled togither, that they might the more boldlie aſſaile their enimies, and the more valiantlie reſiſt ſuch as ſhould encounter them, ſailed into Gaſcoigne, determining to deſtroie all thoſe of their aduerſaries that ſhould come in their waie. But as theſe Normane ſhips returned backe with wines, glorieng as it were that they had got the rule of the ſea onelie to themſelues, they were aſſailed by thréeſcore Engliſh ſhips, which tooke them, & brought them into England the fridaie before Whitſundaie: all the men were either drowned or ſlaine, thoſe onelie excepted which made ſhift to eſcape by botes. The newes hereof being brought into France, did not ſo much moue the king and the councell to wonder at the matter, as to take thereof great indignation.

The biſhop of London ſent with an anſwer vnto the French king.

Ambaſſadors were appointed to go into England which on the behalfe of the French king, might demand of king Edward reſtitution of thoſe ſhips and goods thus taken by his ſubiects, and conueied into his realme, without all delaie, if he minded to haue any fauour in the French court touching his affairs that belonged to his countrie of Gaſcoigne. The king of England hearing this meſſage, tooke therein deliberation to anſwer, and then ſent the biſhop of London, accompanied with other wiſe and diſcréet perſons into France, to declare for anſwer vnto the French king and his councell as followeth; that is, Whereas the king of England hath his regall court without ſubiection to any man, if there were therefore any perſons that found themſelues hurt or indamaged by his people, they might come to his court, and vpon declaration of their receiued iniuries, they ſhould haue ſpéedie iuſtice, and to the end they might thus doo without all danger, whoſoeuer minded to complaine, he would giue vnto them a ſafe conduct to come and go in ſafetie thorough his land: but if this waie pleaſed not the French king, then he was content there ſhould be arbitrators choſen on both ſides, who weieng the loſſes on both parts, might prouide how to ſatiſfie the complaints: and the king of England would for his part enter into bonds by obligation to ſtand to and abide their order and iudgement herein, ſo that the French king would likewiſe be bound for his part, and if any ſuch doubt fortuned to ariſe, which could not be decided by the ſaid arbitrators, let the ſame be reſerued vnto the kings themſelues to diſcuſſe and determine, and the king of England vpon a ſufficient ſafe conduct had, would come ouer to the French K. if he would come downe vnto any hauen towne néere to the ſea coaſt, that by mutuall aſſent an end might bée had in the buſineſſe: but if neither this waie ſhould pleaſe the French king nor the other, then let the matter be committed to the order of the pope, to whom it apperteined to nouriſh concord among chriſtian princes; or bicauſe the ſée was as then void, let the whole colledge of cardinals or part of them take order therein, as ſhould be thought neceſſarie, that ſtrife and diſcord being taken awaie and remoued, peace might againe flouriſh betwixt them and their people, as before time it had doone, and bring with it the bleſſings thereupon depending; namelie, althings that may make an happie & fortunat ſtate, according to the nature of peace, whereof it is ſaid,

Pax eſt cunctorum mater veneranda bonorum,
Fit ſub pace forum, fit felix cultus agrorum,
Pax pietas mentis, pax eſt pincerna ſalutis.

The king of England cited to appere

Sentence giuen againſt the king of England.

The French councell weied nothing at all theſe offers, and would not ſo much as once vouchſafe to giue an anſwer to the Engliſh ambaſſadors earneſtlie requiring the ſame. Finallie, the French K. ſent vnto the citie of Aniou, which is knowne to belong vnto the dutchie of Guien, where he there cauſed the king of England to be cited to make his appéerance at Paris, at a certeine daie, to anſwer to the iniuries and rebellions by him doone in the countrie of Gaſcoigne, at the which daie when he appéered not, the French king ſitting in the ſeat of iudgement in his owne proper perſon, gaue ſentence there againſt the king of England, for making default, and withall commanded the high coneſtable of France to ſeize into his hands all the dutchie of Guien, and either to take or to expell all the king of Englands officers, ſouldiers, and deputies, which were by him placed within the ſaid duchie. The king a little before had ſent thither a valiant knight, named the lord Iohn ſaint Iohn, which had furniſhed all the cities, townes, caſtels, and places, with men, munition, and vittels, for defenſe of the ſame.

Anno Reg. 22.

The peace of the quéenes.

In the meane time the king of England, deſirous to be at quiet with the Frenchmen, appointed his brother Edmund earle of Lancaſter, as then ſoiourning in France, to go vnto the French kings councell to procure ſome agréement, which both might be allowed of the French king, and not be diſhonorable vnto him. But when the earle could not preuaile in his ſute, he tooke his iournie towards England, vtterlie deſpairing to procure any peace. But yer he came to the ſea ſide, he was ſent for backe againe by the two quéenes of France, Ione wife to king Philip, and Marie his mother in law, which promiſed to frame ſome accord betwéene the two kings, and ſo thereupon after diuerſe communications by them had in the matter with the ſaid earle of Lancaſter, at length it was accorded, that for the ſauing of the French kings honour, which ſéemed to be touched by things doone by the king of Englands miniſters in Gaſcoigne, ſix caſtels ſhould remaine at the ſaid kings pleaſure, as Santes, Talemond, Turnim, Pomeroll, Penne, and mount Flaunton. Alſo there ſhould be ſet a ſeruant or ſergeant in the French kings name, in euerie citie and caſtell within all the whole duchie of Guien, except Burdeaux, Baion, and the Rioll. And further, hoſtages ſhould be deliuered at the French kings pleaſure, of all miniſters to be placed by the king of England in Gaſcoigne and other places through all the country. Theſe things doone, the French king ſhould reuoke the ſummons publiſhed and pronounced in the court of Paris againſt the king of England. Alſo he ſhuld reſtore all the caſtels (his ſeruants being remoued which he had placed in the ſame) togither with the pledges incontinentlie, at the requeſt of the ſame quéenes, or of either of them. The king of England hauing a ſafe conduct ſhould come to Amiens, that there méeting with the French king, peace and amitie might be confirmed betwixt them. Then were there writings made and ingroſſed touching the forſaid articles of agréement, one part deliuered to the earle, ſealed with the ſeales of the quéenes, and other remained with the foreſaid quéenes ſealed with the ſeale of the earle.

Letters patents.

The king of England certified hereof, ſent his letters patents, directed vnto all his officers and miniſters in Gaſcoigne, commanding them to obeie in all things the French kings pleaſure. Theſe letters patents were firſt ſent vnto the earle of Lancaſter, that he might cauſe them to be conueied into Gaſcoigne when he ſhould ſée time. The earle hauing receiued thoſe letters, doubting whether the French K. would obſerue the agréement which the quéenes had made and concluded, or not; required of them that he might heare the French king ſpeake the word, that he would ſtand vnto that which they had concluded. Wherevpon in the preſence of the ſaid earle and his wife Blanch quéene of Nauar, mother to the French quéene, alſo of the duke of Burgoigne, Hugh Veere ſonne to the earle of Oxenford, and of a chapline called ſir Iohn Lacie, the French king promiſed by the faith of a prince, that he would fulfill the promiſes of the ſaid quéenes, and the couenants by them accorded.

Sir Geffrey Langley.

Hervpon a knight of the earles of Lancaſter, called ſir Geffrey de Langley, was ſpéedilie ſent into Gaſcoigne with letters from the French king, directed to the coneſtable, to call him backe againe from his appointed enterpriſe. And the foreſaid chapleine ſir Iohn Lacie was ſent alſo thither with the letters patents of the king of England, directed vnto his officers there, in forme as is aboue mentioned, wherevpon the lord Iohn ſaint Iohn the king of Englands lieutenant in Gaſcoigne, vnderſtanding the concluſions of the agréement, ſold all ſuch prouiſions as he had made and brought into the cities, townes, and fortreſſes for the defenſe of the ſame, and departing out of Gaſcoigne, came towards Paris to returne that waie into England.

The French kings mind changed.

His vniuſt dealing.

But behold what followed; ſuddenlie by the enimie of peace was the French kings mind quite changed. And where the king of England was come vnto Canturburie, and kept his Eaſter there, that immediatlie vpon the receipt of the ſafe conduct he might tranſport ouer the ſeas, and ſo come to Amiens, according to the appointment made by the agréement; now not onelie the ſafe conduct was denied, but alſo the firſt letters reuocatorie ſent vnto the coneſtable to call him backe, by other letters ſent after were alſo made void, and he by the latter letters appointed to kéepe vpon his iournie, ſo that the coneſtable entring into Gaſcoigne with a power, found no reſiſtance, the capteins and officers ſubmitting them ſelues with the townes and fortreſſes at his pleaſure according to the tenor of the letters patents latelie to them deliuered. All the officers and capteins of the fortreſſes were brought to Paris as captiues and pledges.

The French K. renounceth what he had ſaid.

Within a few daies after, the earle of Lancaſter required the quéenes, that they would call vpon the king to grant his ſafe conduct for the king of England, to reuoke the citation or ſummons, to reſtore the lands taken from him; and to deliuer the pledges: but the French king by the mouths of certeine knights ſent vnto the earle, renounced all ſuch couenants as before had béene concluded. The earle of Lancaſter then perceiuing that both he and his brother king Edward were mocked thus at the French kings hands, returned into England, and informed the king & his councell from point to point of all the matter. Hervpon a parlement being called at Weſtminſter, at the which the king of Scotland was preſent, it was decréed by the ſtates, that thoſe lands which were craftilie taken ſo from the K. ſhould be recouered againe by the ſword. And the king herewith ſent vnto the French king a frier preacher named Hugh of Mancheſter, and a frier minor called William de Gaineſbourgh, both being wiſe and diſcréet men, and doctours of diuinitie, to declare vnto him, that ſith he would not obſerue ſuch agréements as had béene concluded betwixt their anceſtours; and further had broken ſuch couenants as were now of late agréed vpon betwixt them, by the trauell of his brother Edmund earle of Lancaſter: there was no cauſe whie he ought to account him being king of England, and duke of Guien, as his liegeman, neither did he intend or meane further to be bound vnto him by reaſon of his homage.

Imbaſſadors ſent into Germanie.

About the ſame time did the king of England ſend the archbiſhop of Dubline, and the biſhop of Dureſme into Germanie, about the concluding of a league with Adolph king of Romans, to whome was giuen a great ſumme of monie (as was ſaid) vpon couenants, that he ſhould aid the king of England againſt the French king, with all his maine force, and that neither of them ſhould conclude peace with the ſaid French king without conſent of the other. About the Aſcenſion tide, king Edward ſtaied the wolles of this land, aſwell belonging to ſpirituall men as temporall men, till the merchants had fined with him for the ſame, ſo that there was a ſubſidie paied for all ſarpliers of wooll that went out of the relme, and in ſemblable wiſe for felles and hides. He alſo ſent an armie by ſea into Gaſcoigne, vnder the conduct of his nephue Iohn of Britaine that was earle of Richmond, appointing to him as councellours, the lord Iohn ſaint Iohn, and the lord Robert Tiptoſt; men of great wiſdome, and verie expert in warlike enterpriſes.

To them of Yarmouth and other of thoſe parts, he aſſigned the lord Iohn Botetourt: to them of the cinque ports, William de Leiborne: and to them of the weſt countrie, and to the Iriſhmen, he appointed a valiant knight of Ireland as their chéefteine. This yeare in England was a great dearth and ſcarſitie of corne, ſo that a quarter of wheat in manie places was ſold for thirtie ſhillings: by reaſon whereof poore people died in manie places for lacke of ſuſtnance. About Michaelmas, the Engliſh fléet tooke the ſea at Porteſmouth, and after ſome contrarie winds, yet at laſt they arriued within the riuer of Garon, and ſo paſſing vp the ſame riuer, wan diuers townes, as Burge, Blaines, Rions, and others.

The kings coffers by reaſon of furniſhing forth of this armie, and other continuall charges which he had ſuſteined, were now in maner emptie: for remedie whereof, William March one of the kings treaſurers, purpoſed with other mens loſſes to ſuplie that want. He knew that in abbeies and churches was much monie kept in ſtore, the which if he commanded to be taken from thence, he thought that he ſhould not commit any offenſe, but rather doo a good déed, that the monie might come abroad to the vſe of the people, whereby the ſouldiers might be ſatiſfied for their wages. Such capteins therefore, as he appointed to worke the feat, placing their ſoldiers in euerie quarter through the realme, made ſearch at one time, in Iulie, at thrée of the clocke in the afternoone, for all ſuch monie as was hid and laid vp in all hallowed places, and taking the ſame awaie, brought it vnto the king, who diſſembling the matter, as he that ſtood in néed, excuſed the act doone by his treaſurer ſo well as he could, to auoid the enuie of the people; and not content herewith, he called togither ſhortlie after, to wit, on ſaint Matthewes day the apoſtle, at London, all the archbiſhops, biſhops, deanes, & archdeacons,

Here when they were once aſſembled, the king declared vnto them the warres which he was driuen to mainteine againſt the Frenchmen, & the charges which he was at for the ſame. The cleargie hauing no ſpeciall head, by reaſon that the ſee of Canturburie was void, wiſt not well how to gouerne themſelues. At length Oliuer biſhop of Lincolne, required in all their names to haue three daies reſpit to make anſwer to the matter, the which time expired, they offered to the king two diſmes to be paid within one yeare. The which when the king heard, he tooke great diſdaine therewith, and threatned by ſome of his men of war to put the cleargie out of his protection, except they would grant to him the halfe of their goods. The cleargie put in feare herewith, and ſome of them alſo deſirous to win the kings fauour, granted his requeſt, and ſo the king at that time got the halfe part of euerie ſpirituall mans liuing and benefice for one yeares extent, to be paid in portions within three yeares next inſuing, beginning at twentie marks benefice, & ſo vpwards. And the ſooner to induce them herevnto, he promiſed the biſhops to grant ſome thing that might be beneficiall to the cleargie, if they would demand it.

The biſhops taking councell togither, required of him that the ſtatute of Mortmain might be repealed, which they ſaw to be moſt preiudiciall to their order. But the king anſwered them, that without the whole conſent of a parlement he could not breake that ordinance, which by authoritie of parlement had beene once eſtabliſhed, and therefore he wiſhed that they would not require that thing which laie not in him to grant, and ſo by that means he ſhifted them off. The earles of Lancaſter & Lincolne vanquiſhed by the welſhmen.

Moreouer, about the ſame time, the Welſhmen eftſoones rebelled againſt the king, and in diuerſe parts made diuerſe rulers amongſt them. Thoſe of Northwales which inhabited about Snowdon hils, hauing to their capteine one Madoc, of the line of their former prince Leolin, burned the towne and caſtell of Carnaruan, ſleaing a great multitude of Engliſhmen, which doubting no ſuch matter, were come thither to the faire. Thoſe of the weſt part hauing choſen to their ruler one Malgon on the parts of Penbroke and Carmardin ſhires, did much miſcheefe. And one Morgan hauing them of Southwals at his commandement, expelled and droue the earle of Gloceſter out of his countrie of Glamorgan, which earle had before time diſherited the anceſtors of the ſame Morgan. The king therefore to repreſſe the Welſhmens attempts, called backe his brother Edmund earle of Lancaſter, and the earle of Lincolne, being readie to haue ſailed ouer into Gaſcoine, the which earles as they approched neere vnto the caſtell of Denbigh vpon ſaint Martins day, the Welſhmen with great force incountred them, and giuing them battell, droue them backe and diſcomfited their people. Polydor iudgeth that this ouerthrow happened to the Engliſhmen, the rather for that the armie was hired with ſuch monie as had beene wrongfullie taken out of the abbeis and other holie places, howbeit it is but his opinion onelie.

The king kept his Chriſtmaſſe at Aberconwey in Wales, and hearing that the new archbiſhop of Canturburie, doctor Robert Winchelſey, being returned from Rome (where, of pope Celeſtine he had receiued his pall) was comming towards him, he ſent one of his chapleines named John Berwike with a power of ſouldiers to conduct him ſafelie vnto his preſence. And after the archbiſhop had done his fealtie to the king, accordinglie as of dutie and cuſtome he was bound, he was licenced to returne with great honour ſhewed vnto him at the kings hands. Vpon the day of the circumciſion of our Lord, was the citie of Baion rendred vnto the lord John ſaint John, the which the day before had beene taken by the mariners by force of aſſault. Manie of the citizens which were knowne to be cheefe enimies vnto the king of England, were apprehended and ſent into England. The caſtell was then beſieged, and after eight daies taken. The lord of Aſpermont with diuerſe others that held it, were committed to priſon. There were alſo taken two gallies, which the French king had cauſed to be made, and appointed to be remaining there vpon defenſe of that citie. Shortlie after the towne of ſaint John de Sordes was deliuered vnto the Engliſhmen, who wan manie other townes and fortreſſes, ſome by ſurrender of their owne accord, and ſome by force and violence. The Engliſh armie greatlie increaſed within a while, after the deceit of the Frenchmen once appeared, for the Gaſcoins returned vnto the Engliſh obedience, in ſuch wiſe that foure thouſand footmen and two hundred horſemen came to aid the Engliſh capteins.

There was a ſmall quantitie of wine amongſt them, which they would haue reſerued onelie for the king, & therfore refuſed to taſt therof. But leaſt they ſhould repine at his extraordinarie and ſeuerall fare, and ſo take conceits of diſcontentment for not hauing the like, he conſidered in a ſympathie, that,

For as touching him (being the cauſe and procurer of their want) he would not be preferred before any of them in his meats and drinks. The Welſhmen compaſſed him about in hope to diſtreſſe him, for that the water was ſo riſen, that the reſidue of his armie could not get to him. But the earle hauing placed his battell ſo, that euer betwixt two horſſemen there ſtood a croſbow, a great part of the Welſhmen which ſtood at defenſe in maner aforeſaid with their ſpeares, were ouerthrowne and broken with the ſhot of the quarels, and then the earle charged the reſidue with a troope of horſſmen, and bare them downe with ſuch ſlaughter, as they had not ſuſteined the like loſſe of people (as was thought) at anis one time before.

In the meane while, king Edward to reſtreine the rebellious attempts of thoſe Welſhmen, cauſed the woods of Wales to be cut downe, wherein before time the Welſhmen were accuſtomed to hide themſelues in time of danger. He alſo repared the caſtels and holds in that countrie, and builded ſome new, as the citie and caſtell of Bewmariſe with other, ſo that the Welſhmen conſtreined through hunger and famine, were inforced within a while to come to the kings peace. Alſo at length about the feaſt of ſaint Laurence, the Welſhman Madoc, that tooke himſelfe for prince of Wales was taken priſoner, and being brought to London was committed to perpetuall priſon. ¶ By ſome writers it ſhould appeare, that Madoc was not taken, but rather after manie aduentures & ſundrie conflicts, when the Welſhmen were brought to an iſſue of great extremitie, the ſaid Madoc came in and ſubmitted himſelfe to the kings peace, and was receiued, vpon condition that he ſhould purſue Morgan till he had taken him and brought him to the kings priſon, which was doone, and ſo all things in thoſe parts were ſet in reſt and peace, and manie hoſtages of the chéefeſt amongſt the Welſh nobilitie were deliuered to the king, who ſent them to diuerſe caſtels in England where they were ſafelie kept almoſt to the end of the warres that followed with Scotland.

The Earle of Richmond.

Rion beſieged

About the ſame time Charles de Valois brother to the French king, being ſent with an armie into Gaſcoine, and comming vpon the ſudden, found the Engliſhmen wandering abroad in the countrie out of order, by reaſon wherof taking them at that aduantage, he cauſed them to leaue their booties behind them, ſlue part of them, and chaſed the reſidue, the which fled to their ſhips, or to ſuch hauen townes as were in their poſſeſſion. The capteins of the Engliſhmen, as Iohn de Britaine earle of Richmond, and the lord Iohn ſaint Iohn, after they had got togither their ſouldiers which had béene thus chaſed, ſent two bands vnto Ponteſey to defend that towne againſt the enimies: alſo other two bands vnto ſaint Seuere: and they themſelues went to Rion to fortifie that place. Charles de Valois aduertiſed hereof, thought he would not giue them long reſpit to make themſelues ſtrong by gathering any new power, and therfore appointed the coneſtable ſir Raſe de Neale, (who had woone the citie of Burdeaux from the Engliſhmen latelie before) to go vnto Ponteſey and beſiege that towne, whileſt he went vnto Rion, which he beſieged and fiercelie aſſaulted. But the Engliſhmen and Gaſcoins did not onelie defend the towne ſtoutlie, but alſo made an iſſue forth vpon their enimies, though (as it happened) the ſmaller number was not able to ſuſteine the force of the greater multitude, and ſo were the Engliſhmen beaten backe into the towne againe.

Rion wonne.

Whileſt they tried their manhood thus at Rion, the conſtable woone Ponteſcy or Pontſac vpon Dordone, and came to ioine with the earles de Valois at Rion, and ſo inforced both their powers to win that towne. The Engliſhmen and Gaſcoins, though they were put in ſome feare, yet they ſhewed their approoued valiancie in defending the towne, till at length when they ſaw they could defend it no longer, and were in no hope of ſuccour from anie part, they fled out about midnight, and made toward their ſhips: but diuerſe of them were taken by the waie, for the Frenchmen hauing knowledge of their intent, forlaie the paſſages, and taking ſome of them that firſt ſought to eſcape thus by flight, ſlue them, but there was not many of thoſe. For all the reſidue, when they perceiued that the Frenchmen had laid betwixt them and their ſhips, making vertue of neceſſitie, ſtood ſtill in defenſe of the towne, till the Frenchmen entred it by force of aſſault the friday in Eaſter wéeke.

Some write, that the ſame night, in which they ſo ment to flée to their ſhips, there chanced a great tumult and mutenie betwixt the footmen and horſſemen, ſo that they fought togither, or elſe might the whole number of them haue eſcaped. The horſſemen that got forth left their horſſes behind them readie brideled and ſadled, which the Frenchmen vpon entring the towne in the morning tooke, after they had ſlaine the moſt part of the footmen. The Frenchmen hauing got a bloudie victorie, ſaued onelie the capteins and gentlemen, and ſlue the other, aſwell Engliſhmen as Gaſcoins. There was taken of knights, ſir Raſe Tannie, ſir Amis de ſaint Amand, with his brother ſir Raſe de Gorges marſhall of the armie, ſir Roger Leiborne, ſir Iohn Kreting, ſir Iames Kreting, ſir Hen. Sir Adam Kreting was killed, a right valiant knight, by reaſon of one ſir Walter Gifford a knight alſo, which had dwelled in France manie yeares before as an outlaw.

Charles de Valois returneth into France.

Polydor.

On the ſame day was the towne of ſaint Seuere deliuered vnto the Engliſhmen, the which Hugh or (as Abington ſaith) Robert Véer, brother to the earle of Oxenford tooke vpon him to kéepe as capteine there with two hundred men of armes. Charles de Valois aduertiſed thereof, departed from Rion with all ſpéed, to beſiege the foreſaid towne of ſaint Seuere, per the Engliſhmen ſhould haue time to fortifie it. But the foreſaid Hugh Véer kept him out the ſpace of thirtéene or (as Abington ſaith) nine wéekes, to the great loſſe of the Frenchmen, no ſmall part of their people dieng in the meane time, both of peſtilence and famine. At length, when vittels began to faile within, a truce was taken for fiftéene daies, within the which it might be lawfull for them within the towne to ſend vnto Baion for ſuccour, which if it came not within that tearme, the towne ſhould be yéelded vnto the Frenchmen, and ſo it was vpon theſe conditions, that the Engliſhmen and other that would depart, ſhould haue libertie to take with them their armour and goods, and be ſafelie conueied two daies iornie on their waie from the French armie. Alſo that thoſe which were minded to remaine ſtill in the towne, ſhould not ſuſteine any loſſe or damage in their bodies or goods. The pledges alſo which aforetime were taken out of that towne by the French kings ſeneſhall, ſhould returne in ſafetie to the towne, and haue their goods reſtored vnto them. This doone, Charles de Valois appointed a garriſon of ſoldiers to remaine there for the kéeping of the towne, and then returned backe into France. The Engliſhmen, which eſcaped out of thoſe places from the Frenchmens hands, repaired vnto Baion, to defend that towne with their capteins the foreſaid erle earle of Richmond and the lord Iohn de S. Iohn, the which of ſome are vntruelie ſaid to haue béene ſlaine at Rion. Shortlie after that Charles de Valois was departed and gone out of the countrie, the towne of ſaint Seuere was recouered by the Engliſhmen.

The Earle of Oxford then liuing hight Robert Véer and not Hugh Véer.

¶ It ſhould appeare by report of ſome writers, that Hugh Véer (whome they wronglie name to be earle of Oxenford) was ſent ouer as then from king Edward to the aid of his capteins in Gaſcoine, and at his firſt comming, recouered the towne of ſaint Seuere, and afterwards ſo valiantlie defended it againſt the Frenchmen, that honorable mention is made of him, both by Nicholas Triuet, and alſo by ſome

French writers, for his high manhood therin ſhewed. But whether he were brother or ſonne to the earle of Oxford, I can not ſaie; howbeit about the 27 yeare of this king Edwards reigne, we find one Hugh Veer, that was a baron, whom I take to be this man, but earle I thinke he was not. For (as Euerſden ſaith) one Robert Veer that was earle of Oxford deceaſſed in the yeare next inſuing, and after him ſucceeded an other earle that bare the ſame name (as by records it may appeare.) Polydor. Cardinals ſent to the kings of England and France to treat a peace. Math. Weſtm.

The cardinals gather monie.

In the ſame yeare Berard biſhop of Alba and Simon archbiſhop of Bourges, two cardinals of the Romane ſee, were ſent vnto the kings of England and France, to mooue them to conclude a peace. They firſt came into France, and after into England, but perceiuing the minds of the kings nothing inclined to concord, they returned to Rome without any concluſion of their purpoſe, but not without monie gathered of religious men to beare out their expenſes, for they had authoritie by the popes grant to receiue in name of procuracies and expenſes, ſix marks of euerie cathedrall and collegiat church thorough the realme, beſides diuerſe other rewards. And where any poore chapiter of nunnes or religious perſons were not able of themſelues, the pariſh churches next adioining were appointed to be contributorie with them.

Nic. Triuet. Polydor. Math. Weſtm. Sir Thomas Turberuiles promiſe to the French king.

At the ſame time ſir Thomas Turberuile a knight, and one of thoſe (as before ye haue heard) which were taken at Rion, to ſaue his life, and to deliuer himſelfe out of captiuitie, though he was neuer proued falſe before, promiſed king Philip that if he would ſuffer him to returne into England, he would ſo worke with king Edward, that he might be made by him admerall of the ſeas; which thing brought to paſſe he would deliuer the Engliſh nauie into the hands of the ſaid king Philip. Herevpon was he ſet at libertie, and ouer he came into England. And for as much as he had knowne to be a man of ſingular and approued valiancie, king Edward receiued him verie courteouſlie, who remembring his promiſed practiſe to the French king, fell in hand by procuring of freends to be made admerall of the ſeas. But king Edward (as God would haue it) denied that ſute.

French men ſlaine. A gallie burnt.

The French king in the meane time hauing prepared his nauie, conteining three hundred ſaile, what with the gallies and other ſhips (for he had got diuerſe both from Merſelles and Genoa) ſent the ſame forth to the ſeas, that vpon ſuch occaſion the king of England might alſo ſend forth his fleet. But the French nauie comming neere to the coaſt of England, and lieng at anchor certeine daies, looking for ſir Thomas Turberuile; when he came not at the day prefixed, the capteines of the French fleet appointed one of their veſſels to approch neere to the ſhore, and to ſet on land certeine perſons that knew the countrie, to vnderſtand and learne the cauſe of ſuch ſtaie. They being taken of the Engliſhmen and examined, could make no direct anſwer in their owne excuſe, and ſo were put to death. Some write that they ſent fiue gallies towards the ſhore to ſuruey the coaſt, of the which gallies one of them aduanſing forth afore hir fellowes, arriued at Hide neere to Romney hauen, where the Engliſhmen eſpieng hir, to draw the Frenchmen on land, feined to flie backe into the countrie, but returning ſuddenlie vpon the enimies, they ſlue the whole number of them, being about two hundred and fiftie perſons. They ſet fire on the gallie alſo and burned hir.

Douer robbed by the French.

The Frenchmen chaſed to their ſhips.

Frenchmen ſlaine about Douer.

The admerall of the French fleet kindled in anger herewith, ſailed ſtreight vnto Douer, and there landing with his people, robbed the towne and priorie. The towneſmen being ſtriken with terror and feare of the ſudden landing of their enimies, fled into the countrie, and raiſed people on euerie ſide, the which being aſſembled togither in great numbers, towards euening came to Douer, and inuading ſuch Frenchmen as were ſtraied abroad to ſeeke preies, ſlue them downe in ſundrie places. The French admerall which had beene buſie all the day in pilfering the towne, hearing the noiſe of thoſe Frenchmen that came running towards the ſea ſide, ſtreightwaies got him to his ſhips with ſuch pillage as he could take with him. The other Frenchmen, which were gone abroad into the countrie to fetch preies, and could not come to their ſhips in time, were ſlaine euerie mothers ſonne. Some of them hid themſelues in the corne fields, and were after ſlaine of the countrie people. There was little leſſe than eight hundred of them thus ſlaine by one meane and other at that time. There were not manie of the men of Douer ſlaine, for they eſcaped by ſwift flight at the firſt entrie made by the Frenchmen: but of women and children there died a great number, for the enimies ſpared none. There was alſo an old moonke ſlaine named Thomas, a man of ſuch vertue (as the opinion went) that after his deceaſſe, manie miracles through him were ſhewed.

Caxton.

Abington.

Sir Thomas Turberuile, being troubled in his mind that he could not bring his traitorous purpoſe to paſſe, began to aſſaie another waie, which was to procure Iohn Balioll king of Scotland to ioine in league with the French king, but yer any of his practiſes could be brought about, his treaſon was reuealed, who being thereof euidentlie conuicted, was put to execution. Nich. Triuet ſaith, that he had promiſed the French king to cauſe Wales to reuolt from king Edward, and that by procurement of the prouoſt of Paris, he conſented to worke ſuch treaſon. And (as ſome write) he did not onelie homage vnto the French king, but alſo left two of his ſonnes in pledge for aſſurance to worke that which he had promiſed. His ſecretarie that wrote the letters vnto the French king, conteining his imagined treaſons, with other aduertiſements touching king Edwards purpoſes, fearing leaſt the matter by ſome other means might come to light (as the old prouerb ſaith, Quicquid nix celat ſolis calor omne reuelat) as well to his deſtruction as his maiſters for concealing it, diſcloſed all to the king. Now he hauing knowledge that he was bewraied by his ſeruant, fled out of the court, but ſuch diligence was vſed in the purſuit of him, that he was taken within two daies after, and brought backe againe to London, where he was conuicted of the treaſon ſo by him imagined, and therefore finallie put to death. ¶ This yeare the cleargie gaue to the king the tenth part of their goods, the citizens a ſixt part, and the commons a twelfth part, or rather (as Euerſden ſaith) the burgeſſes of good townes gaue the ſeuenth, and the commons abroad the eleuenth penie.

The ſame yeare died Gilbert de Clare earle of Gloceſter, which left iſſue behind him, begot of his wife the counteſſe Ione the kings daughter (beſide three daughters) one yoong ſonne named alſo Gilbert to ſucceed him as his heire. The counteſſe his wife, after hir huſbands deceaſſe, married a knight of meane eſtate, borne in the biſhopricke of Dureſme, named ſir Rafe Monthermer, that had ſerued the earle hir firſt huſband in his life time. The king of Scots concludeth a league with the French king.
Polydor.
Matth. Weſt.

John king of Scotland affianced his ſonne Edward Balioll with the daughter of Charles du Valois brother to the French king, and concluded with the ſaid French king a league againſt the king of England. Nothing mooued the Scotiſh king ſo much hereto, as the affection which he bare towards his natiue countrie, for he was a French man borne, and lord of Harecourt in Normandie, which ſegniorie was after made an earledome by Philip du Valois king of France. The Scotiſhmen had choſen 12 péeres, that is to ſaie, foure biſhops, foure earles, and foure barons, by whoſe aduiſe and counſell the king ſhould gouerne the realme, by whome he was induced alſo to conſent vnto ſuch accord with the French men, contrarie to his promiſed faith giuen to king Edward when he did homage to him.

The diſloiall dealing of the Scots.

King Edward not fullie vnderſtanding the concluſion of this league, required aid of the Scotiſh king for the maintenance of his warres againſt France, and receiuing a doubtfull anſwer, began to ſuſpect the matter: whervpon he required to haue thrée caſtels, as Barwike, Edenburgh, and Rokeſburgh, deliuered vnto him as gages till the end of the warre, and if the Scotiſhmen continued faithfull vnto him, he would then reſtore the ſame caſtels to them againe when the warres were ended. This to do the Scotiſhmen vtterlie denied, alledging that their countrie was frée of it ſelfe, and acquit of all ſeruitude or bondage, and that they were in no condition bound vnto the king of Scotland, and therefore they would receiue the merchants of France, of Flanders, or any other countrie without exception, as they thought good.

The earle of Lancaſter ſent into Gaſcoine.
Abington.

There were in the hauen of Berwike at the ſame time, certeine Engliſh merchants, vpon whome the Scots made aſſault, and wounded ſome of them, and ſome of them they ſlue, and chaſed the reſidue, the which returning into England, made complaint, and ſhewed in what euill maner they had béene dealt with. King Edward héerevpon perceiuing the purpoſes of the Scots, determined to make warre vpon them with all ſpéed, & to conquer the whole countrie, if they could not cleare themſelues of ſuch euill dealing as of them was reported and thought to be put in practiſe. About the conuerſion of ſaint Paule in Januarie, king Edward ſent ouer into Gaſcoine his brother the lord Edmund earle of Lancaſter, with the earle of Lincolne and other, to the number of 26 banerets, and 700 men of armes, beſides a great multitude of other people. They arriued at Blay, about the midſt of Lent, and ſtaied there till towards Eaſter. In which meane ſeaſon, a great ſort of Gaſcoins and other people reſorted vnto them, ſo that they were two thouſand men of armes.

Vpon Cene thurſdaie, the caſtell de Leſparre was deliuered vnto the earle of Lancaſter, and after that diuers other caſtels. At his approching néere vnto Burdeaux, vpon the thurſdaie in Eaſter wéeke, as he reſted to refreſh himſelfe and his armie in a little village called Rekell, an armie of French men iſſuing out of Burdeaux, ment to come on the Engliſhmen at vnwares: but hauing warning, they prepared themſelues to battell, ſo well as the ſhortnes of time would permit, and ſo therevpon incountring with their enimies, and fighting a ſore battell, at length conſtreined the French men to returne vnto the citie, and purſuing them as they fled, two Engliſh knights being brethren to ſir Peter de Mallow and an other that was a Gaſcoine, entred the citie with two ſtandard-bearers belonging to the earle of Richmond, & to the lord Alane de la Zouch, whom the Frenchmen tooke, cloſing them within the gates. The other Engliſhmen being ſhut out, firſt fell to the ſpoile of the ſuburbs, and then ſet fire vpon the ſame. After this were certeine of the citizens that ſecretlie were at a point with the earle of Lancaſter, to haue deliuered the citie into his hands, but their practiſe being eſpied, they were taken and executed yer they could performe that which they had promiſed.

Then the earle perceiuing he ſhould but loſe his labor to ſtaie any longer there, vpon certeine weightie occaſions returned vnto Baionne, where he ſhortlie after fell ſicke and died. He left behind him thrée ſonnes, Thomas that ſuccéeded him in the earldome of Lancaſter, Henrie lord of Monmouth, and John whome he had begot of his wife Blanch, the which before had béene married vnto Henrie earle of Champaigne, and king of Nauar, by whome ſhée had but one onelie daughter, that was married vnto the French king Philip de Beau. After this the Engliſh armie beſieged the citie of Aques, but thorough want of vittels he was conſtreined to raiſe thence and breake vp the ſiege. The earle of Arthois being ſent of the French king with an armie into Gaſcoine, incountred with the Engliſhmen, and chaſed them with the ſlaughter of a great number, and after recouered diuers townes and fortreſſes in the countrie.

Thoſe Engliſhmen that kept the towne of Burg, being compaſſed about with a ſiege by Mounſeur de Sully, obteined truce for a certeine ſpace, during the which they ſent vnto Blaines for ſome reléefe of vittels, and where other refuſed to bring vp a ſhip loden with vittels, which was there prepared, the lord Simon de Montagew, a right valiant chéefetaine, and a wiſe, tooke vpon him the enterpriſe, and through the middle of the French gallies, which were placed in the riuer to ſtop that no ſhip ſhould paſſe towards that towne, by helpe of a proſperous wind, he got into the hauen of Burg, and ſo relieued them within of their want of vittels, by meanes whereof, Mounſeur de Sully brake vp his ſiege, and returned into France.

The king of England concludeth a league with the earle of Flanders.
He concludeth a league alſo with the earle of Bar.
The earle of Bar inuadeth Champaigne.

In the meane time, king Edward not ſléeping his buſineſſe, procured Guie earle of Flanders to ioine with him in league againſt the Frenchmen. This Guie was the ſon of Margaret counteſſe of Flanders, whom ſhe had by hir ſecond huſband William lord of Dampire in Burſtoine. Alſo king Edward procured Henrie earle of Bar, to whome (as before ye haue heard) he had giuen his daughter Eleanor in marriage, to make warre vpon the Frenchmen, ſo that at one time the erle of Bar inuaded the countrie of Champaigne, and the earle of Flanders made incurſions vpon thoſe countries of France which ioine vnto Flanders. King Philip hereof aduertiſed, ſent forth one Walter de Creſſie with a great armie againſt the earle of Bar, ſo that beſieging the chéefeſt towne of Bar, he conſtreined the ſaid earle to leaue off his enterpriſe in Champaigne, and to returne home, for doubt to loſe more there than hée ſhould win abroad.

A marriage concluded.

But now to touch more at large the circumſtances of the occaſion that mooued the earle of Flanders to make war againſt the French king, I find (in Iacob Meir) that there was a marriage concluded betwixt the lord Edward the eldeſt ſon of king Edward, and the ladie Philip daughter to the foreſaid Guie earle of Flanders, which marriage was concluded by Henrie biſhop of Lincolne, and the earle Warren, being ſent ouer as ambaſſadours by king Edward, vnto the ſaid earle Guie for the ſame purpoſe. In the yeare following, the ſaid earle of Flanders, togither with his wife, comming to viſit the French king at Corbeill, were arreſted, and ſent to Paris, there to remaine as priſoners, bicauſe that the earle had affianced his daughter to the French kings aduerſarie, without his licence: neither might they be deliuered, till by mediation of the pope (who muſt néeds meddle in the matter by vertue of his peremptorie power, & all chriſtendome muſt veile the bonnet to his holineſſe, or rather abhominableneſſe,

Ille etenim toto ſeſe iubet orbe colendum, and ſuertie had vpon the promiſe of Amedie earle of Sauoy, they were ſet at libertie, with theſe conditions, that they ſhould deliuer into the French kings hands their daughter, which was ſo affianced vnto K. Edwards ſonne, and further couenanted, not to conclude any league with the king of England, but in all points t'obſerue a certeine peace which was concluded with Ferdinando earle of Flanders, in the yeare 1225. And if earle Guie brake the ſame peace, then ſhould he be excommunicated, and all his countrie of Flanders interdicted by the archbiſhop of Reims, and the biſhop of Senlis, iudges appointed herein by authoritie of the pope.

The earle of Flanders arreſted.

The pope intermedleth in the matter.

The earle of Flanders forced to agrée with the French king.

The earles daughter being ſent for, and brought vnto Paris, the earle and his wife were releaſed, and ſuffered to returne into Flanders, and ſhortlie after, the earle made earneſt ſuit to haue his daughter reſtored vnto him againe, inſomuch that he procured pope Boniface to be a meane for him to the French king; but all would not ſerue, no, though as ſome ſay the pope accurſſed the French king for reteining hir, anſwer being made, that matters perteining to worldlie gouernement, belonged not to the pope to diſcuſſe. Finallie, earle Guie, perceiuing he could not preuaile in that ſuit, to haue his daughter againe, vpon high diſpleaſure concluded to ioine in league with king Edward & his confederats. Herevpon, at an aſſemblie or councell kept at Gerardmount, there was a ſolemne league made and agréed betwixt Adolph the emperour of Almaine, Edward king of England, Guie earle of Flanders, John Duke of Brabant, Henrie earle of Bar, both ſonnes in law to king Edward, and Albert duke of Auſtrich, againſt Philip king of France, and John earle of Henault his partaker.

The earle of Flanders releaſed returneth home.

The French kings anſwer to the pope.

A new league betwixt the K. of England, the emperour and others againſt the French king.

Match. Weſt.

The merchants of Flanders procured the earle to conclude this league with king Edward, as ſome write, the rather in reſpect of the great commodities which roſe to their countrie, by reaſon of the intercourſe of merchandize vſed betwixt England and Flanders, and for that through aid of the Engliſhmen, they might the better withſtand the malice, both of the French and of all other their enimies. This league being proclaimed in England, there were ſent ouer into Flanders, the treaſurer of the excheker, and diuerſe other noble men, to fetch hoſtages from thence, and to giue to the earle fiftéene thouſand pounds of ſiluer, toward the fortifieng of his caſtels and holds. King Philip being hereof aduertiſed, by counſell of the péeres of his realme, ſent two honorable perſonages, as the capteine of Mounſtrell, and the capteine of Belquerke, which ſhould attach the earle of Flanders by his bodie, and ſummon him to yéeld himſelfe priſoner at Paris, within the ſpace of fiftéene daies next inſuing.

The earle of Flanders defieth the French king.

This attachment made, and ſummons giuen, the earle of Flanders ſent his full defiance vnto the French king by the abbats of Gemblois, and Seneſles, vnto whome he gaue ſufficient letters procuratorie, to authoriſe them thereto, dated at Male in the yeare of Grace 1296, after the accounts of the chronicles of Flanders, which begin their yere at Eaſter: and ſo this chanced in the fiue and twentith yeare of king Edwards reigne, the wedneſdaie next after the feaſt of the Epiphanie. Herevpon was the earle accurſſed, & Flanders interdicted by the archbiſhop of Reims, and the biſhop of Senlis comming vnto Terwane for that purpoſe, about the fifteenth day of June, in the yeare 1297. But the lord Robert the earles ſonne appealed from that interdiction to the pope, and ſo the Flemmings tooke themſelues frée & out of danger of the ſame. Earle Guie alſo obteined of king Edward, that it might be lawfull for them of Bruges, to buy wools, through England, Scotland and Ireland, as fréelie as the Italians might by their priuilege and grant.

The earle of Flanders accurſſed.

His ſonne appealeth from the interdiction.

But to returne now to the doings of king Edward, who in this meane time, hauing perfect knowledge of the league concluded betwixt the king of France and the king of Scotland, prepared an armie, and firſt ſent ambaſſadors into Scotland, to giue ſummons to king John to appeare at Newcaſtell within certeine daies, that he might there ſhew the cauſe whie he had broken the league: and further, to declare vnto him that he was deceiued, if he thought he might ſerue two maiſters, contrarie to the words of the goſpell, and according to the old ſaieng which ſeldome neuer faileth in conſequence, Deficit ambobus qui vult ſeruire duobus.

For how much fauour as he purchaſed at the hands of the Frenth king, ſo much diſpleaſure might he aſſure himſelfe to procure at the hands of the king of England, whome to obeie, it ſhould be moſt for his aduantage. The ambaſſadors that were ſent, did their meſſage throughlie, but king John was ſo farre off from anſwering any thing that might ſound to the maintenance of peace, that ſhortlie after he ſent letters of complaint vnto king Edward, for wrongs which he alledged he had ſuſteined by his means and at his hands. Herevpon, king Edward, by aduiſe of his councell, determined to ſet forward with his armie into Scotland.

Ambaſſadors ſent to the K. of Scots.

In the meane time, Robert Ros, capteine of Warke caſtell, reuolted to the Scotiſh king, moued therevnto through the loue of a Scotiſh gentlewoman, whome he meant to marrie, notwithſtanding he had ſworne fealtie vnto king Edward. Wherevpon, his brother William de Ros giuing knowledge to king Edward, required to haue ſome aid, whereby he might defend the caſtell againſt the Scotiſhmen. King Edward ſent vnto him a thouſand ſouldiers, (Polydor ſaith an hundred) the which as they lodged one night in a towne called Preſtfen, were ſlaine by the Scotiſhmen of the gariſon of Rockeſborough, that were led and guided by the ſaid Robert Ros: ſome of them although but few eſcaped awaie by flight. King Edward aduertiſed hereof, haſted forth, and came to the ſaid caſtell, glad of this (as is reported) that the Scotiſhmen had firſt begun the warre, meaning, as it ſhould ſéeme by their procéedings, to follow the ſame, for vpon Good friday, diuerſe Scotiſhmen entring the borders, burnt ſundrie villages, and ſpoiled the abbeie of Carham.

In the meane time, a ſpie, the which had beene taken and committed to priſon, ſet fire on the houſe wherein he was incloſed, and ſo the flames catching hold vpon the other buildings, a great part of the citie was thereby burned. Yet the men and the women getting themſelues to the wals, droue their enimies backe, and ſo defended the citie from taking. Foure Engliſh ſhips loſt.

Abington.

On the ſame thurſdaie, king Edward with his armie paſſed the riuer of Tweed, and ſo entring into Scotland, ſent to the burgeſſes of Berwike, offering them peace vpon certeine conditions, and ſtaied a whole day for an anſwer: but when he could haue none that liked him, nor that ſounded in anie thing to peace, he approched the towne, and lodged in the monaſterie of Caldeſtreime. His armie conſiſted as ſome write of foure thouſand men of armes on horſebacke, and thirtie thouſand foot men, beſides fiue hundred men of armes on horſſebacke, and a thouſand footmen of the biſhoprike of Durham. At the ſame time, there came foure and twentie Engliſh ſhips, the mariners whereof, beholding where the Engliſh armie was placed in battell raie, vpon a plaine, the king making there certeine knights, they thought his meaning was to haue giuen forthwith an aſſalt, and ſo entring the hauen, and approching to the land, began to fight with the towneſmen, where they loſt foure of their ſhips, and were conſtreined to withdraw with the reſidue, with helpe of the falling water. Some haue written, that they loſt but three ſhips which were conſumed with fire, and that the mariners and ſouldiers of one of thoſe ſhips, after they had defended themſelues by great manhood from the firſt houre of the daie, till eleuen of the clocke, eſcaped awaie, ſome by the bote of that ſhip, and ſome leaping into the water, were ſaued by the botes of other ſhips that made in to ſuccour them.

Berwike wonne.

This ſir Richard Cornewall was brother to the erle of Cornewall.

Caxton.

The rumor of the mariners attempt being bruted through the armie, the king paſſing forward towards the towne, got ouer a ditch, which the Scots had caſt to impeach his paſſage, and ſo comming to the towne, wan it, not loſing any man of renowme, ſauing ſir Richard Cornewall, the which was ſlaine by a quarell which a Flemming ſhot out of a croſſebowe, being in the red hall, which the merchants of Flanders held in that towne, and had fortified it in manner of a tower: but when they would not yeeld, and could not eaſilie otherwiſe be wonne, the houſe towards euening was ſet on fire, and ſo they being thirtie in number, were burned to death within it. Vpon the ſame night, the king lodged in the caſtell, which was yeelded vnto him by them that kept it, their liues and limmes ſaued, and receiuing an oth, that they ſhould not from thenceforth beare armour againſt the king of England, they were permitted to depart whither they thought good, their capteine ſir William Dowglas excepted, whom the king ſtill kept with him, till the end of the warres. Some write that there ſhould be ſlaine of Scotiſhmen at this winning of Berwike, aboue the number of twentie thouſand men, Abington ſaith 8000, but Richard Southwell ſaith 15000 at the leaſt one with an other, with ſmall loſſe of Engliſhmen, not paſt eight and twentie of all ſorts. Yee may read more hereof in the Scotiſh hiſtorie.

R. Grafton, pag. 176.

G. Buchanan rer. Scotic. lib. 8. pag. 243. prope finem.

¶ But before I paſſe ouer this ſlaughter, ſo lamentable and wonderfull, I haue bethought my ſelfe of a promiſed apologie for and in the behalfe of Richard Grafton, mentioned before in the reigne of Henrie the ſecond, page 112. col. 1. where I ſhewed how vnaduiſedlie and with vnſeemelie modeſtie for a man of learning, George Buchanan the Scot dooth ſhoot his bolts at the ſaid Grafton, as now by occaſion of the matter conuenientlie occurrent ſhall be ſhewed. The ſaid Grafton in his large volume of Engliſh chronicles, falling vpon the affaires betweene king Edward the firſt, and Iohn Baliol king of Scotland, among other things there remembred, maketh report that in the ſaid battell of Berwike, the ſlaughter was ſo great, that a mill might well haue beene driuen by the ſpace of two daies, with the ſtreames of bloud which at that time ouerranne the ground. At which words George Buchanan giueth a ſnatch, emboldened ſo to doo, bicauſe the ſaid Grafton referreth this record to Hector Boetius in his fourteenth booke and ſecond chapter.

Ieſu, how the Scot taketh vp the Engliſhman for halting in his allegation, firſt for the chapter, conuincing him that Hector Boetius diuided not his booke into chapters, and therefore, where is the ſecond chapter, ſith the whole fourteenth booke is a continued diſcourſe without diſtinction by chapters? Secondlie the ſaid Grafton hath the checke, for ſetting a lie aflote, Buchanan flatlie affirming that Hector Boetius hath no ſuch matter once mentioned in his annales. Touching the firſt fault, wherewith the Scot chargeth the Engliſhman, this is note-worthie, that it ſhould ſeeme to anie man of meane iudgement, that Buchanan of a prepenſed malice and purpoſed wilfulneſſe hath ſharpened his ſtile in this nipping ſort againſt Grafton. For ſith it was Graftons meaning to record the truth, ſo farre forth as he was warranted by the auerment of writers; why ſhould he be caſt in the teeth with Effrænis maledicendi libido, or diſhoneſtlie termed Indoctus & impudenter mendax? Which opprobrious epithets, if they were deſerued by an vntrue report of the author; then ſhould Buchanan haue ſharpened his tong againſt Belenden his countriman, the tranſlator of Hector Boetius into their mother tong, from whome Grafton hath deriued his words; ſenſe for ſenſe vnmangled (as he found the ſame written.)

Now who knoweth not that Bellenden diſtinguiſhed Hectors annales into chapters, vpon whoſe authoritie Grafton relieng, and citing his authoritie according to the quotation of his diuiſion, white ſhould he rather than Bellenden be barked at, who is the principall in this controuerſie? Againe, it could not be hidden from Buchanan, that Bellenden had diſtributed Boetius into chapters; conſidering that they were σύγχρονοι, both liuing in the reigne of Iames the fift of that name king of Scots: ſo that it might haue pleaſed him to haue tried Grafton by the Scotiſh Boetius, and ſo to haue beene reſolued for the ſecond chapter of the foureteenth booke, according to the archdeacon of Murreis tranſlation.

Hector Boetius, pag. 294. lib. impreſſ. Pariſijs à Iacobo du Puys, 1574.

Now for the matter it ſelfe, touching the effuſion of bloud, wherewith a mill might well haue beene driuen for two daies ſpace; Hector Boetius his owne words are theſe; Riui ſanguinis toto oppido adeo fluxere, vt cum æſtu decurrente minor aqua quàm ad molendina circumagenda fuerit, adiuuante aquam ſanguine aliqua circumagi ſponte cœperint. Which place, Bellenden hath interpreted after this manner; So lamentabl' ſlauhter wes throw all the parts of the toun, that ane mill might haif gane two daies ithandlie be ſtremis of blude. Now examine Graftons words by Bellenden, and Bellendens by Boetius (beſides that, marke what Grafton annexeth to the report of this ſlaughter, who ſaith that he will not inforce the credit thereof vpon any man, but counteth it a Scotiſh lie rather than a matter of truth) and then conclude according to equitie, that Grafton is altogither excuſable and fautleſſe, and Buchanans curious & furious challenge reprouable. But admit Grafton had fetcht his report from Boetius, as he had it from Bellenden; ſeemeth it a lie or an vnlikelihood, that the bloud guſhing out of the bodies of 25000, or (as Hector Boetius ſaith) 7000, would not increaſe to a ſtreame ſufficient & able to driue a mill or two about, without any water intermingled therwithall? The Latine copie hath Riui ſanguinis, riuers of bloud, noting by the word the abundance and alſo the ſtreaming courſe of the ſame, which was able with the violent current thereof to beare awaie the verie bodies of the ſlaine. To conclude this matter, & to ſet our Engliſhman by the truth, and let the Scot go with his lieng toong, which I would he had had the modeſtie to haue tempered, & to haue proffered a practiſe of that which himſelfe paraphraſticallie preacheth and teacheth others to obſerue, ſaieng;

K. Edward fortifieth Berwike.

A ſcotiſh frier ſent to king Edward.

And now to the ſtorie. K. Edward remaind at Berwike 15 daies, & cauſed a ditch to be caſt about the towne of 80 foot in breadth, & of the like in depth. In the meane time, about the beginning of Aprill, the warden and reader of the frier minors of Rockeſborough called Adam Blunt, came vnto him with letters of complaint from king John, for the wrongs doone and offered vnto him and his realme, as well in claiming an vniuſt ſuperioritie, and conſtreining him to doo homage by vndue and wrongfull meanes, as alſo by inuading his townes, ſlaieng and robbing his ſubiects: for the which cauſes he teſtified by the ſame letters, that he renounced all ſuch homage and fealtie for him and his ſubiects, as he, or any of them owght for any lands holden within England. The king hearing the letters red, receiued the reſignation of the homage, and commanded his chancellor, that the letter might be regiſtred in perpetuall memorie of the thing.

The Scotiſh king renounceth his homage and fealtie vnto the king of England.

The Scots inuade the Engliſh borders.

Harbotell.

Rich. South.

The earles of Scotland before remembred, being aſſembled togither with their powers at the caſtell of Jedworth, entred into England the eighth of Aprill, and with fire and ſword did much hurt in the countries as they paſſed. In Riddeſdale they beſieged the caſtell of Harbotell by the ſpace of two daies, but when they could not preuaile, they remoued, and paſſing forth by the eaſt part of the riuer of Tine, thorough Cokeſdale, Riddeſdale, and Northumberland, vnto Herham, they did much miſcheefe by burning and harrieng the countries. At Herham they ſpoiled the abbeie church, and got a great number of the cleargie, as well moonks, prieſts, as ſcholers, and others, whom they thruſt into the ſcholehouſe there, and cloſing vp the doores, ſet fire on the ſchoole, and burned all them to aſhes that were within it. It is wonderfull to read, what beaſtlie crueltie the Scots vſed in that road which they made at that time in two ſeuerall parts. For the earle of Boghan, with them of Galloway, entred by Cumberland in like manner as the other did in Riddeſdale, burning and murthering all that came in their waie. For whereas all thoſe that were of able age and luſtie to get awaie, fled, & eſcaped their hands; the aged & impotent creatures, women in childbed, and yoong children that could not ſhift for themſelues, were vnmercifullie ſlaine, and thruſt vpon ſpeares, and ſhaken vp in the aire, where they yeelded vp their innocent ghoſts in moſt pitifull wiſe.

The earle of Boghan.

The crueltie of the Scots.

Churches were burned, women were forced without reſpect of order, condition or qualitie, as well the maids, widowes and wiues, as nunnes that were reputed in thoſe daies conſecrated to God, and when they had beene ſo abuſed, manie of them were after alſo murthered, and cruellie diſpatched out of life. At length, they came to the nunrie of Lamclaie, & burned all the buildings there, ſauing the church, and then returned backe into Scotland with all their pillage and booties by Lauercoſt, an houſe of moonks, which they likewiſe ſpoiled. So that the cruell & bloudie deſolation whereof Lucan ſpeaketh in his ſecond booke of ciuill warres, may aptlie be inferred here, as fitlie deſcribing the mercileſſe murther of all ſtates and ſexes without parcialitie vnder the hand of the enimie: for ſaith he,

The nunrie of Lamclaie burnt.

The caſtell of Dunbar rendred to the Scots.

Patrike earle of Dunbar came to the king of England, and ſubmitted himſelfe, with all that he had into his hands; but the caſtell of Dunbar vpon ſaint Markes day, being aſſieged of the Scots was rendred vnto them, by treaſon of ſome that were within it, of whome, the counteſſe (wife to the ſame erle) was the cheefeſt; for recouerie whereof king Edward ſent John earle of Warren, Surrey and Suſſex, & William earle of Warwike with a great power, the which laieng ſiege to that caſtell, a great hoſt of Scotiſhmen came vpon them to the reſcue of them within, ſo that there was foughten a verie ſore and terrible battell. At length, the victorie abode with the Engliſhmen, and the Scotiſhmen were put to flight, the Engliſhmen following them in chaſe eight mile of that countrie, almoſt to the foreſt of Selkirke: the ſlaughter was great, ſo that (as was eſteemed) there died of the Scotiſhmen that day, to the number of ten thouſand.

Beſide 2000 barded horſſes they had in that armie 10000 footmen.

The morrow after being ſaturdaie, which was the eight and twentith day of Aprill, at the kings comming thither the caſtell was ſurrendred vnto him. There were taken in the ſame caſtell three earles, Menteth, Caſſels, and Ros; ſix barons, John Comin the yoonger, William Sanclere, Richard Siward the elder, John Fitz Geffrey, Alexander de Morteigne, Edmund Comin of Kilbird, with thirtie knights, two clearks, John de Someruile, and William de Sanclere, and three and thirtie eſquires, the which were ſent vnto diuerſe caſtels in England, to be kept as priſoners. After the winning of Dunbar the king went to the caſtell of Rockeſborough, which incontinentlie was yeelded by the lord Steward of Scotland, the liues and members of all ſuch as were within it at the time of the ſurrender.

Rockeſborough yeelded.

Then went king Edward vnto Edenburgh, where he planted his ſiege about the caſtell, and raiſed engines, which caſt ſtones againſt and ouer the walles, ſore beating and bruſing the buildings within. But as it chanced, the king writing letters, to aduertiſe his councell at home of his proceedings, and concerning other buſineſſe, deliuered that packet vnto a Welſhman named Lewin, commanding him to go with the ſame to London in all haſt poſſible, for he knew him to be a verie ſpeedie meſſenger and a truſtie alſo (as he tooke it.) But hauing the letter thus deliuered him, togither with monie to beare his charges, he got him to a tauerne, where riotouſlie cõſuming the monie (which he had ſo receiued) in plaie, & making good cheere, in the morning he cauſed one of his companions to take a target, and beare it afore him in approching the caſtell, for that he meant (as he colourablie pretended) not to depart, vntill he had wrought ſome diſpleaſure to them within with his croſſebow, which he tooke with him for that purpoſe, ſo that comming vnto the caſtell gates, he called to the warders on the walles to caſt downe to him a cord, that they might plucke him vp to them therewith, for that he had ſomwhat to ſay to their capteine touching the ſecrets of the king of England.

They fulfilling his deſire, when he came in, and was brought afore the captein ſitting then at breakfaſt, he ſaid vnto him: Behold ſir, here ye may peruſe the king of Englands ſecrets, and withall raught to him a box, wherein the packet of the kings letters were incloſed, and appoint me (ſaith he) to ſome corner of the wall, and trie whether I can handle a croſſebow or not, to defend it againſt your aduerſaries. Heere when others would haue opened the box, and haue read the letters, the capteine would in no wiſe conſent thereto, but going into a turret, called to the Engliſhmen beelow, and willed them to ſignifie to the king, that one of his ſeruants being fled to him, ſought to bewraie his ſecrets, wherevnto he would by no means agree, and therefore meant to reſtore both the traitor and the letters. Herevpon, the lord Iohn Spenſer, comming to heare what the matter might meane, the capteine cauſed Lewin to be let downe to him, togither with the letters ſafe, and not touched by him at all.

A welſhman hanged.

When the king vnderſtood this, he much commended the honeſt reſpect of the capteine, and whereas he had cauſed engins to be raiſed to annoie them within (as yee haue heard) he commanded the ſame to ceaſſe, and withall, vpon their capteins ſuit, he granted them libertie to ſend vnto their king Iohn Balioll, to giue him to vnderſtand in what ſort they ſtood. As touching the Welſhman, he was drawne and hanged on a paire of high galowes, prepared for him of purpoſe, as he had well deſerued. A notable example of a traitorous villaine, ſo to offer the ſecrets of his ſouereigne to be known to his enimies: and no leſſe excellent a preſident of an honeſt and faithfull harted foe, that would not himſelfe nor let anie other haue a ſight of the contents therein written; a rare point of good meaning and vpright dealing in a ſouldier, and ſpeciallie in an enimie; but

Edenburgh caſtell deliuered to the king of England.

Now while the meſſengers were on their waie to Forfair, where the Scotiſh king then laie, king Edward with a part of his armie went vnto Striueling, where he found the caſtell gates ſet open, and the keies hanging on a naile, ſo that he entred there without any reſiſtance, for they that had this caſtle in gard, were fled out of it for feare before his comming. The meſſengers that were ſent from them within Edenburgh caſtell, comming to their king, declared to him in what caſe they ſtood that were beſieged. King Iohn, for that he was not able to ſuccor them by any manner of means at that preſent, ſent them word, to take the beſt waie they could for their owne ſafetie; with which anſwer the meſſengers returning, the caſtell was immediatlie deliuered vnto the lord Iohn Spenſer, that was left in charge with the ſiege, at the kings departure towards Striueling, with the like conditions as the caſtell of Rockeſborough had yeelded a little before.

Thus was that ſtrong caſtell of Edenburgh ſurrendred by force of ſiege, to the king of Englands vſe, on the 15 daie, after he had firſt laid his ſiege about it. A place of ſuch ſtrength by the heigth of the ground whereon it ſtood, that it was thought impregnable, and had not beene wonne by force at any time, ſince the firſt building therof, before that preſent, ſo farre as anie remembrance either by writing or otherwiſe could be had thereof.

The king of Scots ſueth for peace.

The biſhop of Durham.

The king of Scots ſubmitteth himſelfe to the K. of England.

Here at Edenburgh, or rather at Rockeſborough (as Abington ſaith) a great number of Welſhmen came vnto the king, who ſent home the like number of Engliſh footmen, of thoſe that ſeemed moſt wearie. Moreouer, at Striueling, there came to the king the earle of Vlſter, with a great number of Iriſhmen. Then paſſing ouer the riuer of Forth, the king came vnto ſaint Iohns towne about Midſummer, and there tarried certeine daies. Whileſt theſe things were a dooing, Iohn king of Scotland, perceiuing that he was not of power to reſiſt king Edward, ſent ambaſſadors vnto him to ſue for peace: king Edward was content to heare them, and therevpon appointed, that king Iohn ſhould reſort vnto the caſtell of Brechin, there to commen with ſuch of his councell as he would ſend thither within fifteene daies next enſuing, to treat of an agreement. King Edward ſent thither Anthonie biſhop of Durham, with full commiſſion to conclude all things in his name. And within the appointed time came king Iohn, and diuers of his nobles vnto him, the which after many & ſundrie treaties holden betwixt them and the ſaid biſhop, at length they ſubmitted themſelues and the realme of Scotland, ſimplie and purelie into the hands of the king of England, for the which ſubmiſſion to be firmelie kept and obſerued, king Iohn deliuered his ſon in hoſtage, and made letters thereof, written in French as followeth.

The inſtrument of the ſaid ſubmiſſion.

IEhan per la grace de Dieu, roy de Eſcoce, á tous ceulx quæ ceſtes præſentes letres verront ou orront, ſaluz, &c. Iohn by the grace of GOD king of Scotland, to all thoſe that theſe preſent letters ſhall ſee or heare, ſendeth greeting. Bicauſe that we through euill counſell and our owne ſimplicitie, haue greeuouſlie offended our ſouereigne lord, Edward by the grace of God king of England, lord of Ireland, and duke of Aquitane, in many things; that is to ſaie, in that, whereas we beeing and abiding vnder his faith and homage, haue bound our ſelues vnto the king of France which then was his enimie and yet is, procuring a mariage with the daughter of his brother Charles du Valois, and that we might greeue our ſaid lord, and aid the king of France with all our power by warre and other means, we haue at length by aduiſe of our peruerſe counſell defied our ſaid lord the K. of England, and haue put our ſelues out of his allegiance and homage, & ſent our people into England, to burne houſes, to take ſpoiles, to commit murther, with many other damages, and alſo in fortifieng the kingdome of Scotland, which is of his fee, putting and eſtabliſhing armed men in townes, caſtels, and other places, to defend the land againſt him, to deforce him of his fee, for the which tranſgreſſions our ſaid ſouereigne lord the king, entring into the realm of Scotland with his power, hath conquered and taken the ſame, notwithſtanding al that we could do againſt him, as by right he may do, as a lord of his fee, bicauſe that we did render vnto him our homage, and made the foreſaid rebellion. We therfore as yet being in our full power and free will, doo render vnto him the land of Scotland, and all the people therof with the homages. In witneſſe whereof, we haue cauſed theſe letters patents to be made. Yeuen at Brechin the tenth day of Iulie, in the fourth yeare of our reigne, ſealed with the common ſeale of the kingdome of Scotland.

K. Edward paſſeth forward through Scotland.

After this, king Edward went forward to ſee the mounteine countries of Scotland, the biſhop of Durham euer keeping a daies iournie afore him. At length, when he had paſſed through Murrey land, and was come to Elghin, perceiuing all things to be in quiet, he returned towards Berwike, and comming to the abbeie of Scone, he tooke from thence the marble ſtone, wherevpon the kings of Scotland were accuſtomed to ſit as in a chaire, at the time of their coronation, which king Edward cauſed now to be transferred to Weſtminſter and there placed, to ſerue for a chaire for the prieſt to ſit in at the altar. The king comming to Berwike, called thither vnto a parlement all the nobles of Scotland, and there receiued of them their homages, the which in perpetuall witneſſe of the thing, made letters patents thereof, written in French, and ſealed with their ſeales, as the tenor here followeth.

A Touz ceux que ceſtes lettres verront ou orront, &c. To all thoſe that theſe preſent letters ſhall ſee or heare, we Iohn Comin of Badenaw, &c. Bicauſe that we at the faith and will of the moſt noble prince, and our deareſt lord, Edward by the grace of God king of England, lord of Ireland, and duke of Aquitaine, doo vow and promiſe for vs and our heires, vpon paine of bodie and goods, and of all that we may haue, that we ſhall ſerue him well and trulie againſt all men, which may liue and die, at all times when we ſhall be required or warned by our ſaid lord the king of England or his heires, and that we ſhall not know of any hurt to be doone to them, but the ſame we ſhall let and impeach with all our power, and giue them warning thereof: and thoſe things to hold and keepe, we bind vs, our heires, and all our goods, and further, receiue an oth thereof vpon the holie euangeliſts: and after all, we and euerie of vs haue done homage vnto our ſouereigne lord the king of England in words as followeth; I become your liegeman of life, members, and earthlie honour, againſt all men which may liue and die. And the ſame our ſouereigne lord the king receiued this homage vnder this forme of words; We receiue it for the land of the which you be now ſeized, the right of vs, or other ſaued, and except the lands which Iohn Balioll ſometime king of Scotland granted vnto vs, after that we did deliuer vnto him the kingdome of Scotland, if happilie he hath giuen to you any ſuch lands.

Moreouer, all we, and euerie of vs by himſelfe haue done fealtie to our ſaid ſouereigne lord the king in theſe words; I as a faithfull & liege man, ſhall keepe faith and loialtie vnto Edward king of England, and to his heires, of life, member and earthlie honor, againſt all men which may liue and die, and ſhall neuer for any perſon beare armour, nor ſhall be of counſell nor in aid with any perſon againſt him, or his heires in any caſe that may chance, but ſhall faithfullie acknowledge, and doo the ſeruice that belongeth to the tenements the which I claime to hold of him, as God me helpe and all his ſaints. In witneſſe wherof, theſe letters patents are made and ſigned with our ſeales. Yeuen at Warke the foure and twentith of March, in the 24 yeare of the reigne of our ſaid lord the king of England.

Officers appointed in Scotland by king Iohn.

Then was Iohn Warren earle of Surrey and Suſſex made by king Edward warden of Scotland, Hugh Creſſingham treaſurer, and William Ormeſbie high iuſtice, whome the king commanded, that he ſhould call all thoſe before him which held any lands of the crowne, and to receiue of them in his name their homages and fealties. Iohn Balioll the late king of Scotland was ſent to London, and had a conuenient companie of ſeruants appointed to attend him, hauing licence to go any whither abroad, ſo that he kept himſelfe within the circuit of twentie miles neere to London. Iohn Comin of Badenaw, and Iohn Comin of Lowan, and diuerſe nobles of Scotland were brought into England on the ſouth ſide of Trent, being warned vpon paine of death not to returne into Scotland, till the king had made an end of his wars with France. After this, at his returne into England, king Edward held a parlement at ſaint Edmundſburie, which began the morrow after the feaſt of All ſaints, in which the citizens & burgeſſes of good townes granted vnto him an eighth part of their goods, and of the reſidue of the people a twelfth part.

Anno Reg. 25.

This yeare after the feaſt of the Epiphanie, Elizabeth the kings daughter was married vnto king Iohn earle of Holland. Humfrey de Bohun earle of Hereford and Eſſex was ſent to conueie them into Holland, there to take poſſeſſion of the earledome, as then deſcended vnto the ſaid Iohn, by the death of his father latelie before ſlaine by his owne ſubiects, bicauſe he would haue diſherited this Iohn, and made a baſtard ſonne which he had to be his heire. ¶ The day appointed for the parlement to be holden at London being come, and the cleargie continuing in their deniall to grant any ſubſidie, the king excluded them out of his protection, for the redeeming whereof, manie by themſelues, and manie by mediators, did afterwards giue vnto the king a fift part of all their goods. The archbiſhop of Canturburie being found ſtiffe in the matter, the king ſeized all his lands, and commanded all ſuch debts as were found of his in the rolles of the excheker, to be leuied with all ſpeed of his goods and cattell. Some write, that when the archbiſhop of Canturburie in name of all the reſidue, had declared to them whom the king had appointed commiſſioners to receiue the anſwer, that whereas they of the cleargie had two ſouereigne lords and gouernours, the one in ſpirituall matters and the other in temporall, yet they ought rather to obeie their ſpirituall gouernour than their temporall. Neuertheleſſe, to ſatiſfie the kings pleaſure, they would of

of their owne charges ſend to the pope, that by his licence and permiſſion, they might grant the king ſome aid, or elſe receiue ſome anſwer from him, what to doo therein: for (ſaith the archbiſhop) we beléeue that the king feareth the ſentence of excommunication, and would be as glad to auoid it as we.

When the commiſſioners heard this anſwer, they required that they would appoint ſome of their owne companie to beare this meſſage vnto the king, for they durſt not report it to him: which being doone as the commiſſioners had required, the king in his furie procéeded againſt them, in ſuch rigorous manner as ye haue heard, in ſomuch that the lord chéefe iuſtice ſitting vpon the bench, ſpake openlie theſe words; You ſirs that be attornies of my lords the archbiſhops, biſhops, abbats, priors, and all other the cleargie, declare vnto your maſters, and tell them, that from hencefoorth there ſhall no iuſtice be doone vnto them in the kings court for any manner of thing, although neuer ſo heinous wrong be doone vnto them: but iuſtice ſhall be had againſt them, to euerie one that will complaine and require to haue it.

The declaration of the lord chéefe iuſtice.

The clearkelie handling of the matter by the archbi. of Yorke his ſuffragans.

Henrie de Newarke the elect biſhop of Yorke, with the biſhops of Durham, Elie and Saliſburie, with certeine other, fearing the kings indignation thus kindled againſt them, ordeined to laie downe in the churches, a fift part as ye haue heard, of all their goods, towards the defenſe of the realme, and maintenance of the kings warres in ſuch time of great neceſſitie, and ſo the king receiuing it, they were reſtored to the kings protection againe. The fréends of the biſhop of Lincolne found means, that the ſhiriffe of the ſhire leuied and tooke the fift part of all his goods, and reſtored to him againe his lands and poſſeſſions. Alſo, all the monaſteries within his dioceſſe, and within the whole prouince of Canturburie, were ſeized into the kings hands, and wardens appointed, which onelie miniſtred neceſſarie finding vnto the monks and other religious perſons, and conuerted the ouerplus vnto the kings vſe. Wherevpon the abbats and priors were glad to follow the court, and ſued to redéeme, not their ſins, but their goods, with giuing a fourth part thereof. The cleargie ſuffered manie iniuries in that ſeaſon, for religious men were ſpoiled and robbed in the kings high waie, and could not haue any reſtitution nor remedie againſt them that thus euill intreated them, till they had redéemed the kings protection. Perſons and vicars, and other of the cleargie, when they rode foorth any whither, were glad to apparell themſelues in laie mens garments, ſo to paſſe through the countrie in ſafetie.

The miſerie of churchmen.

The archbiſhop of Canturburie loſt all the goods that he had, for he would neither agrée to giue any thing, nor to laie any thing downe in the church, that the king might receiue it. Wherevpon he was brought to ſuch extreme miſerie, that all his ſeruants went from him, & commandement was giuen foorth, that no man ſhould receiue him, neither within monaſterie nor without, and ſo not hauing any one place of all his biſhoprike where to laie his head, he remained in the houſe of a poore perſon, onelie with one prieſt and one clearke: yet he ſtiffelie ſtood in the matter, affirming certeinlie, that all thoſe which granted any thing, either to the king, or to any other temporall perſon without the popes leaue, ran without doubt into the danger of the ſentence pronounced in the canon.

The archbiſh. of Canturburie his goods confiſcate.

The obſtinate maner of the archbiſhop of Canturburie.

About the feaſt of S. Matthew in Februarie, the king called a parlement of his nobles (not admitting thereto any of the cleargie) at Saliſburie, and there required certeine of his Nobles to paſſe ouer into Gaſcoine, but euerie of them ſéemed to excuſe himſelfe, whereat the king being mooued, threatened that they ſhould either go, or he would giue their lands to other that would go, with which words manie of them were gréeuouſlie offended, in ſo much that the earles of Hereford and Marſhall, Humfrie Bohun, and Roger Bigod, declared that they would be readie to go with the king if he went himſelfe, or elſe not. And when the earle Marſhall was eftſoones required to go, he anſwered, I will willinglie go with the king, and march before him in the fore ward, as by right of inheritance I am bound. Yea (ſaith the king) and you ſhall go with other though I go not. I am not ſo bound (ſaith the earle) neither doo I purpoſe to take the iournie in hand with you.

A parlement at Saliſburie

The king then in a great chafe burſt out & ſware, By God ſir earle, either thou ſhalt go or hang. And I ſweare (ſaith the earle) the ſame oth, that I will neither go nor hang: and ſo he departed from the king without leaue taking. Immediatlie herevpon thoſe two earles aſſembled manie noble men, and other of their fréends togither to the number of thirtie banerets and aboue, ſo that in all they were found to be fiftéene hundred men of armes appointed and readie for battell, and herewith they withdrew into their countries, and kept ſuch ſtir there, that they would not permit the kings officers to take neither wools, leather, nor any thing againſt the owners will, but forbad them on paine of loſing their heads to come within their roomes, and withall prepared themſelues to reſiſt if néed were.

The diſloiall demeanor of the two erles.

In this meane time the warre was proſecuted in Gaſcoine. ¶ The thurſdaie before the Purification of our ladie, Henrie earle of Lincolne, and the lord Iohn ſaint Iohn departing from Baion towards Bellegard, a place beſieged as then by the earle of Arthois, to ſuccour them within the ſame with vittels (whereof they ſtood in néed) as they approched to a wood diſtant from the fortreſſe thrée miles, they diuided themſelues into two ſeuerall battels, the lord Iohn ſaint Iohn leading the firſt, and the earle of Lincolne the ſecond. The lord ſaint Iohn therefore hauing paſſed the wood with his battell, and entring into the plaine fields, was incountred by the earle of Arthois, who tarried there for him with a great power, where immediatlie at the firſt ioining of the battels, the earle of Lincolne retired backe: ſo that the lord Iohn ſaint Iohn and his companie ouerſet with preaſſe of enimies were vanquiſhed: and the ſaid lord ſaint Iohn with ſir William de Mortimer, ſir William Burmengham and other to the number of eight knights, and diuerſe eſquires were taken, the which were ſent to Paris as priſoners.

They had with them 600 men of armes, and 10000 footmen as Abington ſaith.

Battell betwixt the earle of Lincolne and the earle of Arthois, who had with him 1500 men of armes, as Abingtõ ſaith.

Other write ſomewhat otherwiſe of this battell, as that vpon the firſt incounter the Engliſhmen droue backe one regiment of the earle of Arthois his men of armes, whom he diuided into foure parts; but when they once ioined with the ſecond regiment, to the which they were beaten backe, forward they came againe, and ſo charging the Engliſhmen, with helpe of their third ſquadron, which was now come to them alſo, they eaſilie put the Engliſhmen oppreſſed with multitude vnto flight, & followed them in chaſe. After this came the Engliſhmen which were in the rereward, and incountring with the fourth ſquadron or regiment of the Frenchmen, ſtreightwaies brake the ſame. Herewith was the night come vpon them, ſo that one could not know an other, a fréend from an enimie, and ſo both the Engliſhmen and Frenchmen were diſperſed till the moone roſe, and the Frenchmen withdrew to their fortreſſes, and amongſt them certeine Engliſhmen were mingled, which being diſcouered were taken priſoners, as the lord Iohn ſaint Iohn, and others.

The ſlaughter was not great, for there were no footmen on either part, to ſpoile or kill the men of armes that were throwne beſide their horſſes: for the Engliſh footmen remained in the wood, or were withdrawne backe, as before ye haue heard, without attempting any exploit worthie of praiſe. Indéed ſome laie the blame in the Gaſcoine footmen for the loſſe of this battell, bicauſe that they withdrew backe, and left the Engliſh horſſemen in danger of the enimies which had compaſſed them about on euerie ſide. Thrée hundred of the men of armes came through to the towne of Bellegard, but bicauſe it was night, ſo that they could not be diſcerned whether they were frends or foes, they within the towne would not ſuffer them to enter: wherevpon they departed, and went to S. Seuere foure leagues off. Yet further in the night, other of the Engliſhmen were receiued into Bellegard, which came thither after the other, and ſo in the morning they of the gariſon with their aſſiſtance iſſued forth, and comming to the place where the battell had béene, gathered the ſpoile of the field, and conueied into their towne ſuch prouiſion of vittels as they found there.

He inuadeth the countrie about Tholouſe.

The earle of Lincolne with a great manie of other wandred a great part of the night and knew not whither to go. At length about thrée of the clocke in the morning he came to Perforate, where he had lodged with his armie the night before, & there found a great number of his people right glad of his comming and happie eſcape out of danger. From thence he returned vnto Baion with the earle of Richmond ſir Iohn de Britaine and all his companie that were left. And ſuch was the hap of this iournie. In Lent following, thoſe that were diſperſed here and there abroad, reſorted to the earle of Lincolne, ſoiourning at Baion, and in the ſummer ſeaſon made a iournie towards Tholouſe, ſpoiling and waſting the countries of Tholouſe and other there abouts, and remoued alſo the ſiege which thoſe of Tholouſe had laid vnto a fortreſſe called S. Kiternes, in chaſing them from the ſame ſiege: and towards Michaelmaſſe they returned to Baion, and there laie all the winter till after Chriſtmaſſe, and then by reaſon of the truce concluded, as after appeareth, betwixt the two kings of England & France, they returned home into England.

The French king inuadeth Flanders.

In the ſame yeare the king raiſed the cuſtome of wooll to an higher rate than had béene paid at any time before: for he tooke now fortie ſhillings of a ſacke or ſarpler, where before there was paid but half a marke. Moreouer he commanded, that againſt his iournie which he meant to make ouer into France, there ſhould be two thouſand quarters of wheat, and as much of oates taken by the ſhiriffe in euerie countie within the realme to be conueied to the ſea ſide, except where they had no ſtore of corne, and there ſhould béeues and bakons be taken to a certeine number. In the meane time the earle of Flanders was ſore vexed by war which the French king made againſt him, being entred into Flanders with an armie of thrée ſcore thouſand men, as ſome authors haue recorded.

About the feaſt of the natiuitie of S. Iohn Baptiſt, he laid ſiege to Liſle, and ſhortlie after came the earle of Arthois, being returned out of Gaſcoine with his power vnto that ſiege, and was ſent forth to kéepe the Flemings and others occupied, which laie at Furneis, and in other places thereabouts in low Flanders, with whome he fought and got the victorie. King Edward therefore, to ſuccour his fréends prepared to go ouer into Flanders, and therevpon ſummoned all thoſe that owght him any ſeruice, & ſuch alſo as held lands to the value of twentie pounds and aboue, to be readie with horſſe and harneſſe at London about Lammas to paſſe ouer with him in that iournie.

A rebellion in Scotland by the means of one william waleis.
Engliſhmen ſlaine in Scotland.

In the meane time about the moneth of Maie, there began a rebellion in Scotland by the ſetting on of William Waleis: for the king of Englands iuſtice William Ormſbie, accordinglie as he had in commiſſion, confined and put to outlawrie a great ſort of ſuch Scotiſhmen, as refuſed to doo fealtie and homage vnto the king of England, the which Scotiſhmen being thus condemned as outlawes, elected the foreſaid William Waleis for their capteine, with whome William Douglas being once aſſociated, the number of them increaſed hugelie. The earle of Surrey and the treaſurer being in England, thoſe outlawes purpoſed to haue taken the iuſtice at Scone: but he being warned though almoſt too late, eſcaped himſelfe with much adoo, leauing the moſt part of his people as a ſpoile to the enimies. For William Waleis and his companie killed as manie Engliſhmen as fell into his hands, and taking certeine religious men, he bound their hands behind them, and conſtreined them to leape into the riuer, taking pleaſure to behold how they plunged.

The vnfaithfull dealing of the Scots.

The king ſent the biſhop of Durham into Scotland, to vnderſtand the certeintie of this rebellion, who returning from thence, informed him of the truth. The king not minding to breake his iournie which he had purpoſed to make into Flanders, appointed that the earle of Surrey ſhould haue the leading of all ſuch men of warre as might be leuied beyond Trent, to repreſſe the Scotiſh rebels, and alſo wrote vnto Iohn Comin earle of Boughan, that remembring their faith and promiſe, they ſhould returne into Scotland, and doo their beſt to quiet the countrie: they according to his commandement, went into Scotland, but ſhewed themſelues ſlow inough to procure thoſe things that perteined to peace and quietneſſe.

In the meane time, whileſt theſe things were a doing, the biſhop of Carleill, and other which laie there vpon the gard of that citie and caſtell, hauing ſome miſtruſt of the loialtie in Robert Bruce the yoonger, that was earle of Carrike by his mother, they ſent him word to come vnto them at a certeine daie, bicauſe they had to talke with him of matters touching the kings affairs. He durſt not diſobeie but came to Carleill togither with the biſhop of Gallowaie, & there receiued a corporall oth vpon the holie and ſacred myſteries, and vpon the ſword of Thomas Becket, to be true to the king of England, and to aid him and his againſt their enimies in all that he might: and further to withſtand that the ſaid king receiued no hurt nor damage ſo far as in him might lie.

This doone, he returned againe into Scotland, and for a colour entred into the lands of William Douglas, and burnt part of them, bringing the wife and children of the ſame William backe with him into Annandale: but ſhortlie after, he conſpired with the Scotiſh rebels, and ioined himſelfe with them, not making his father priuie to the matter, who in the meane while remaind in the ſouth parts of England. He would haue perſuaded ſuch knights, gentlemen and other as held their lands of his father in Annandale, to haue gone with him, but they would not breake their faith giuen to the king of England, and ſo left him. The earle of Surrey aſſembling togither his power in Yorkeſhire, ſent his nephue the lord Henrie Percie with the ſouldiers of the countrie of Carleill before into Scotland, who paſſing forth to the towne of Aire, went about to induce them of Gallowaie into peace, and hearing that an armie of Scotiſhmen was gathered togither at a place about foure miles from thence called Irwin, he made thitherward, and comming néere to the Scotiſh hoſt, might behold where the ſame was lodged beyond a certeine lake. In that armie were capteins, the biſhop of Glaſco, Andrew de Murreie ſteward of Scotland, and William Waleis which (as it ſhould ſéeme)

Sir Richard Lundie.

There was in the ſame armie a knight named ſir Richard Lundie, which neuer yet had doon homage to the king of England, but now flieng from his companie, he came to the Engliſh armie, and ſubmitted himſelfe with his retinue vnto the king of England, ſaieng that he ment not to ſerue amongſt them any longer that could not agrée togither.

The Scots ſue for peace.

The reſidue of the Scotiſhmen ſued for peace, vpon condition to haue liues, members, goods, cattels and lands ſaued, with a pardon of all offenſes paſt. The lord Percie vpon pledges & writings héerof deliuered, was contented to grant their requeſts, ſo that the king his maiſter would be therewith pleaſed, who being hereof certified, bicauſe he would not gladlie be ſtaied of his iournie into Flanders, granted vnto all things that were thus required.

Then after that the earle of Surrie was come to the Engliſh campe, bicauſe William Waleis ceaſſed not in the meane time to aſſemble more people, the Engliſhmen doubting ſome treaſon, reſolued to giue battell, but whileſt they were in mind thus to do,

It is to be noted, that euen in the verie time that the treatie was in hand betwixt the lord Percie and the Scotiſh capteins, the Scots of Gallowaie and other ſet vpon that part of the Engliſh campe, where the truſſe and baggage laie, which they ſpoiled and ranſacked, ſlaieng aboue fiue hundreth perſons, what of men, women and children, but the alarum being raiſed, the Engliſhmen came to the reſcue, and chaſing the Scots, ſlue aboue a thouſand of them, and recouered the moſt part of their owne goods, with more which they tooke from their enimies.

The archbiſh. of Canturburie receiued into fauour.

In this meane time king Edward at the feaſt of Lammas held a councell at London, where he receiued the archbiſhop of Canturburie againe into his fauor, reſtoring vnto him all his goods and lands. He appointed him and the lord Reinold Grey to haue his eldeſt ſonne prince Edward in kéeping, till his returne out of Flanders.

After this, the king cauſed ſir Raſe Monthermer (whom his daughter the counteſſe of Gloceſter, in hir widowhood had taken to husband without knowledge of hir father) to be deliuered out of the caſtell of Briſtow, wherein he had béene kept priſoner a certeine time vpon diſpleaſure for the marriage: but now he was not onelie ſet at libertie, but alſo reſtored to his wife, and to all the lands perteining to the earledome of Gloceſter, appointing him to find 50 men at armes to ſerue in that iournie into Flanders.

At length, about the 21 daie of Auguſt, the king tooke the ſea, and landed in Flanders néere to Sluice, about the 27 day of the ſame moneth. He was no ſooner on land, but that through old enuie and malice depending betwéene the mariners of the cinque ports, and them of Yermouth and other quarters, a quarell was picked, ſo that they fell togither, and fought on the water in ſuch earneſt ſort, notwithſtanding the kings commandement ſent to the contrarie, that there were 25 ſhips burnt and deſtroied of theirs of Yermouth, and other their partakers: alſo thrée of their greateſt ſhips, part of the kings treaſure being in one of them, were tolled forth into the high ſea, and quite conueied awaie.

Debate and fighting betwixt the mariners of the cinque ports and others.

Ia. Meir.

The king from Sluice firſt went to Bruges, and after to Gaunt, finding the countrie in euill ſtate, by reaſon that the good towns were not all of one mind: for diuers of them miſliked with the doings of the earle, in that he had alied himſelfe with the French kings aduerſaries.

Liſle yéelded to the French king.

About the beginning of September was Liſle yéelded vnto the French king, and after that they of Dowey, Curtray, and Bruges, did likewiſe ſubmit themſelues to the ſame king.

Charles de Valois ſent to Bruges.

Then was Charles earle of Valois ſent to Bruges to fortifie that towne, and to take the Engliſh nauie that laie at anchor in the hauen of Dam: but the Engliſhmen hauing warning thereof, got forth with their veſſels into the ſea, and ſo the earle of Valois being diſappointed of that preie, ſet in hand to fortifie Bruges and Dam. But the earle of Auſtrich, & Robert de Neuers ſon to earle Guy, being ſent with a power of Engliſhmen, Flemings, and other ſouldiors vnto Dam, fought with the Frenchmen, ſlue foure hundreth of them, beſides diuers that were taken, and recouered the towne. They might alſo haue recouered Bruges, as was thought, if the Engliſhmen and Flemings had not fallen at ſtrife, & fought togither about diuiding of the preie.

The emperour Adulfe breaketh promiſe.

Finallie, after this, the French king came to Bruges, and when the king of England and the earle of Flanders had long looked and all in vaine for the emperor Adulfe, who had promiſed to come to their aid with a great armie; for the charges and wages whereof he had receiued great ſummes of monie both of the king of England, and alſo of the earle of Flanders: they concluded in the end (when they perceiued he would not come) to make ſome agreement with the French king: and ſo firſt was a truce taken, from the middeſt of October, vnto the calends of December, and after by mediation of Charles (ſurnamed Claudius) king of Sicill, the ſame truce was prolonged as hereafter ye ſhall heare.

In this meane while, to wit, about the end of Auguſt, the earle of Surrey, when he ſaw that the Scotiſhmen would not performe promiſe touching the deliuerie of the pledges, and that William Waleis ſtill moued the people to rebellion, he aſſembled his armie, & with the ſame entring Scotland, came vnto Striueling. Then the lord ſteward of Scotland, and alſo the earle of Lenox came vnto him, requiring him to ſtaie till they might haue leaſure to ſée if they could bring the people of Scotland vnto the kings peace. But when they could not doo it, they returned on the tenth day of September, promiſing to bring to the aid of the earle of Surrey on the morrow after fortie horſſemen, vpon the which day two friers of the order of preachers were ſent vnto William Waleis, and to the other Scotiſhmen lieng beyond the hill aboue the monaſterie of Scambeſkin, to moue them to the kings peace. But their anſwer was, that they were not come to haue peace, but to trie the matter by battell.

The pride of Hugh Creſſingham.

The Engliſh armie without good aduiſe, thorough the preſumptuous pride of the lord Hugh Creſſingham, preaſed to the bridge, and haſting to paſſe the ſame, the Scotiſhmen came vpon them yer the one halfe could get ouer, and ſo fiercelie aſſailed them, that the Engliſhmen were beaten backe and ſlaine downe. For the Scots, after they ſaw ſo manie of the Engliſhmen to haue paſſed the bridge, as they thought themſelues able to diſtreſſe, they made downe to the bridge foot, and with a number of their ſpearemen on foot, cloſed it vp, that no more ſhould come ouer to the aid of their fellowes, nor thoſe that were alreadie paſſed, ſhould returne againe: yet one ſir Marmaduke Thweng a right valiant knight, which was one of the firſt among the men of armes that came ouer, after that he and his companie had driuen downe one wing of their aduerſaries, & had followed them in chaſe a good waie, as purpoſing to haue gotten the conqueſt againſt them, at length perceiuing the companie behind diſtreſſed by the Scots, he returned with thoſe few that were about him, and purpoſing to repaſſe the bridge, ruſhed in among the Scots that ſtood before him with ſuch violence, that he paſſed thorough them, making waie for himſelfe and his folks by great manhood, ſauing one of his nephues alſo which was ſet on foot & wounded, after his horſſe had béene killed vnder him.

The Engliſhmen diſcomfited.

At length the diſcomfiture was ſuch, and the Scots preaſſed ſo earneſtlie to win the bridge alſo of thoſe Engliſhmen, which were not yet paſſed, that at length the earle of Surrey commanded to breake that end of the bridge, where they ſtood at defenſe to kéepe backe the Scots, for elſe had there few of the Engliſhmen eſcaped. There were ſlaine (as ſome haue written) to the number of ſix thouſand men, and amongſt other was ſlaine ſir Hugh Creſſingham, whoſe ſkin (as hath béene reported) the Scots ſtripped off his dead carcaſſe, for the malice which they bare toward him. This diſcomfiture chanced on the 11 day of September. The earle of Surrey, leauing in the caſtell of Striueling the ſaid ſir Marmaduke Thweng, promiſed him to come to his aid at all times when néed ſhould be, within ten wéekes ſpace, and herewith taking his horſſe, rode in ſuch haſt to Berwike, that after his comming thither, his ſtéed being ſet vp in the ſtable of the friers minors, neuer after taſted meat, but died: after this, the ſaid earle making no long aboad in Berwike, rode vp to London vnto prince Edward, and left the towne of Berwike as a preie to the Scotiſhmen: but thoſe yet that had the caſtell in kéeping, defended it manfullie againſt the Scots, the which aſſembled togither in campe vnder the leading of Alexander earle of Murrey: and their capteine William Waleis came to Berwike, and finding the towne void of all defenſe, entred it, but they could not win the caſtell by any meanes.

The caſtell holdeth tacke againſt them.

The Northumberland men conueied their wiues, their children, their cattell, & other goods, which might be remoued, out of the countrie for feare of the enimies inuaſion: but when the Scots lingered time, and entred not within the Engliſh borders for a ſeaſon, they brought their goods againe, in hope that the Scots would not come foorth of their owne marches at that time. But the Scots hauing aduertiſement thereof, about the feaſt of S. Luke entred the Engliſh borders, and did much hurt within the countrie of Northumberland, ſo that to auoid the danger, all the religious men fled out of the monaſteries ſituat betwixt Newcaſtell vpon Tine, and Carleill. The Scots ſpoiled, harried, and burnt vp the countrie, till the feaſt of ſaint Martine, and in the oactues of the ſame feaſt they drew togither, and went towards Carleill, which towne they ſummoned, as you ſhall heare.

The Scots inuade Northumberland, and ſpoile the countrie.

They ſent a préeſt to them that kept it, commanding them to yéeld: but receiuing a froward anſwer, they fell to and waſted all that countrie, paſſing thorough the forreſt of Inglewood, Cumberland, and Allerdale, till they came vnto Derwent and Cokermouth, not ſparing either church nor chappell. Their meaning was to haue gone into the biſhoprike of Durham, but what through ſore weather of haile, ſnow and froſt, & what through vaine feare of wrong information giuen by their ſpials, that the countrie was well prouided of men of warre for defenſe, they brake off that iournie, and yet there were not paſt a hundred men of armes, and thrée thouſand footmen in that countrie, which were then alſo diſperſed thorough irkſomeneſſe of long ſtaieng for the enimies. The Scots therefore drew vnto Hexham, and there lodged, not without vexing the canons, although they had granted letters of protection vnto the prior and couent of the ſame houſe, to indure for one whole yeare: and likewiſe letters of ſafe conduct to paſſe and repaſſe for one canon, one ſquire, and two ſeruants, when ſoeuer they ſhould ſend to them, during that terme: which letters were giuen foorth vnder the name of the ſaid earle of Murrey, and William Waleis. From thence they went towards Newcaſtell, and burnt the towne of Riton. Finallie, perceiuing they could not preuaile in attempting to win the towne of Newcaſtell, they diuided their ſpoiles and returned home.

About the ſame time, to wit, a little before Chriſtmaſſe, the lord Robert Clifford, with the power of the citie of Carleſll, entred Annandale, committing all to the ſpoile of the footmen, of whome there was a great number. The men of armes on horſbacke, being not paſt an hundred in all, kept togither, and finding their enimies aſſembled néere to Annankirke, gaue a charge vpon them, and chaſed them into a mariſh, within the which they kept them, till the footmen came in, and aſſailing them, ſlue 308 perſons, and tooke diuerſe of them priſoners, and returning againe to their market, burnt ten villages, and on Chriſtmaſſe euen returned with their preie and booties vnto Carleiſl. Manie other articles they would that the king ſhould grant, confirme, pardon and eſtabliſh. The which were all ſent ouer into Flanders to the king, that he might peruſe them, and declare whether he would agrée or diſagrée to the ſame. He as one being driuen to the wall, thought good to yéeld vnto the malice and iniquitie of the time, to reconcile the offended minds of the péeres and barons of his realme, and granted vnto all the ſaid articles, confirming the ſame with his charter vnder his great ſeale. In conſideration wherof, the nobles of the realme and commons granted to the king the ninth penie of all their goods: the archbiſhop of Canturburie, with the cleargie of his prouince, the tenth penie; and the elect of Yorke and thoſe of his prouince, granted the fift penie; towards the maintenance of the war againſt the Scots, bicauſe they were next vnto the danger.

The king alſo by his ſpeciall letters required the nobles of the realme, that if they continued in their due obedience to him, as they promiſed at his departure out of the realme to doo, that then they ſhould reſort and appeare at his parlement, to begin at Yorke the morrow after the feaſt of ſaint Hilarie, without all excuſe or delaie: for otherwiſe he would accompt them as enimies to the commonwelth of the realme. At which day appeared the earles of Warren and Gloceſter, with the counteſſe of Gloceſter his wife daughter to the king, the earles Marſhall, Hereford, and Arundell, Guie ſonne to the earle of Warwike in his fathers roome: and of barons, the lord Henrie Percie, the lord John Wake, and the lord John Segraue, with manie of the nobilitie, the which being aſſembled togither, would that it ſhould to all men be notified, in what manner the king had confirmed the great charter, and the charter of foreſts: wherevpon the ſame being read with the articles therevnto added, and put in, the biſhop of Carleill, adorned in pontificalibus, did pronounce all them accurſſed, that went about to violate and breake the ſame. And bicauſe the Scotiſh lords appeared not, being ſummoned to be there, it was decréed that the armie ſhould come togither at Newcaſtell vpon Tine, in the octaues of the feaſt of ſaint Hilarie next inſuing, ſo that the generall muſters might then and there be taken.

Debate betwixt ẏ kings men and the Gantners.

The king laie the moſt part of this winter at Gant, in the which meane time there chanced ſedition betwéene th'Engliſhmen & the Gantners, inſomuch that the Welſhmen had ſet fire on the towne, if the king had not ſtaied the matter. But the Flemiſh writers ſaie, the Engliſhmen ſet fire in foure parts of the towne indéed, that they might the more fréelie haue robbed in other parts thereof, whileſt the towneſmen had gone about to quench the fire. But the towneſmen bent on reuenge, aſſembled togither in great numbers, and falling on the Engliſhmen ſlue thirtie of their horſſemen, and of their footmen to the number of ſeuen hundred, or thereabouts. They had alſo ſlaine the king, if a knight of Flanders had not made ſhift to ſaue him. ¶ Indéed (as ſhould appeare by the ſame writers) the Engliſh footmen had doone much hurt in the countrie, and namelie one day they ſpoiled the towne of Dam, and ſlue two hundred worthie perſonages, who had yéelded themſelues to the king at his firſt comming into the countrie.

And although the king cauſed certeine of thoſe that had doone this outrage to be hanged: yet the Flemings bare this & other iniuries in their minds, & meant to be reuenged thereof, before the Engliſhmen departed out of their countrie, and therefore there drew out of ſundrie parts into the citie of Gant by ſmall companies, to the number of foure thouſand men of armes, beſides a great multitude of footmen, and when they perceiued themſelues ſtrong inough (as they tooke the matter) at the day amongſt them appointed, and conſidered in their minds, that they cluſtred togither, and vnder the leading of the earles ſonnes, William and Robert, they did firſt ſet vpon the Engliſhmen that were in their lodgings, of whom they ſlue diuerſe, and after comming forth into the ſtréets, they ment to haue made ſlaughter of all the reſidue: but by the noiſe that was raiſed, the king had warning in what ſtate the matter ſtood, and therewith getting him to armour, came forth of his lodging, and ſtreightwaies his people flocked about him. And furthermore, the footmen which were lodged in the ſuburbes, hearing of this tumult, got them to armour, & approching the gates, found them ſhut: but with fire which they kindled with ſtraw, wood, butter and tallow, and other ſuch things, they burnt vp the ſame gates and ſo got in, loſing not paſt ſix perſons that were ſlaine at the firſt entring.

The Flemings ſet vpon the Engliſhmen in their lodgings.

Herewith the earle of Flanders came to the king, and beſought him to ſtaie his people from committing further outrage: but the king as he had reaſon ſo to doo, blamed him for the outragious attempt of his people, and bad him go to appeaſe them, or he would take paine with them himſelfe to his owne ſuertie, though not greatlie to their eaſe. The earle went, and preuailed ſo much, that at length he quieted them, and then was order giuen for reſtitution of ſuch things as had béen taken from any man wrongfullie, according to the order and direction preſcribed by certeine diſcréet perſons appointed as commiſſioners in that behalfe. The king perceiuing himſelfe in ſome danger, and that without the fauour of the Flemings he might hardlie eſcape out of their countrie, bare manie things, and ſpake courteouſlie, making partlie amends for the harms doone by his people, as well abroad in the countries as in the towns. And finallie about Midlent he returned into England, as after ye ſhall heare.

An armie aſſembled at Yorke.

In this meane time, by the kings appointment, the earle of Surrey lord warden of Scotland, with other earles and noble men to him aſſociat, about the feaſt of ſaint Hilarie, had aſſembled an armie at Yorke, hauing firſt ſummoned the lords of Scotland to appeare there at the ſame day, who yet came not, but contrarilie had beſieged the caſtell of Rockeſborough. Wherevpon the earle of Surrey haſted thitherwards, ſo that William Waleis and other of the Scotiſhmen which laie there at ſiege, raiſed the ſame, and departed from thence. The earle of Surrey comming to Rockeſborough, and relieuing them that kept it with ſuch things as they wanted, paſſed forth to Kelſow, and came afterwards to the towne of Berwike, which the Scotiſhmen had left void. Here came letters vnto them from king Edward, ſignifieng that he had taken truce with the French king, and that he meant ſhortlie to returne into England, and therefore commanded them not to make any further enterpriſe than the defending of the frontiers, and the recouerie of Berwike, till his comming ouer. Herevpon was a great part of the armie diſcharged, and ſuch onelie remained in Berwike as might ſuffice for defenſe thereof.

The earle of Surrey entreth Scotland.

K. Edward returneth homewards.

King Edward hauing made an end of his buſineſſe in Flanders, as before ye haue heard, returned now towards England, and came to a towne called Ardenburge, where the moſt part of ſuch Scotiſhmen as he had brought with him into Flanders ſlipped from him, and went vnto Paris. The king being returned into England, remoued the barons of the exchecker, and the iuſtices of the bench vnto Yorke, calling a parlement thither; and gaue ſummons vnto the lords of Scotland to come to the ſame: but making default in their appearance, he ſent forth his commiſſion and letters to warne his ſubiects to be readie with horſſe and harneſſe at Rockeſborough in the feaſt of the Natiuitie of S. Iohn Baptiſt next inſuing. They obeieng his commandement, aſſembled there at the day appointed.

The Scots ſummoned to the parlement at Yorke, refuſed to come.

An armie raiſed.

Abington. The number of men armed in this armie.

There were in this armie now aſſembled at Rockeſborough togither with thoſe of the biſhoprike, about thrée thouſand men of armes mounted on barded horſſes, beſides foure thouſand other armed men on horſſebacke without bards. There were alſo a great number of footmen, and yet none but ſuch as came vpon their owne good willes, the which were almoſt all Welſhmen or Iriſhmen. There came alſo afterwards fiue hundred men of armes well apparelled, furniſhed and mounted out of Gaſcoine, of the which a certeine number were ſent to Berwike by the king: where after the battell fought with the Scots, they remained in gariſon. The earle of Hereford, and the earle Marſhall were preſent with their retinues amongſt other in this armie here aſſembled at Rockeſborough, the which vpon ſuſpicion conceiued of that they had heard, thought it not ſufficient to haue the kings letters patents touching the confirmation of the two charters, and other the articles aboue mentioned, ſigned by him, whileſt he was out of the realme, and therefore required that he would now within his owne land confirme the ſame againe. Here the biſhop of Durham, Iohn earle of Surrie, William earle of Warwike, and Rafe erle of Gloceſter, vndertooke for the king, that after he had ſubdued his enimies, and ſhould be againe returned into the realme, he ſhould ſatiſfie them in that behalfe, and confirme the ſame articles.

This doone, the king marching forth with his armie, came to Temple Hiſton, and ſent forth the biſhop of Durham to take certeine caſtels therabouts, as Drinton or (as ſome copies haue) Drilton, and other two, which enterpriſe the biſhop ſpéedilie accompliſhed. The Engliſh fléet that ſhould haue come from Berwike, and kept alongſt the coaſt to haue furniſhed the armie with victuals, was ſtaied and holden backe with contrarie winds, ſo that the armie began to be in great neceſſitie of victuals. The Scotiſhmen were aduertiſed hereof, and ſuppoſing that the Engliſhmen by reaſon of ſuch want of victuals, had not béene able through féebleneſſe to make anie great reſiſtance, aſſembled their powers togither, and came towards the place where the king with his armie was lodged.

Caſtels won by the biſhop of Durham.

At the ſame time two of the Engliſh ſhips arriued there with victuals, the which being beſtowed amongſt the ſouldiors, releeued them greatlie of their hunger. Amongeſt other the Welſhmen had two tunnes of wine deliuered to them for their ſhare, the which they taſted ſo gréedilie, that ouercome therewith they fell to quarrelling with the Engliſhmen, and begun a fraie, in the which they ſlue eightéene, and hurt diuerſe. The Engliſh horſſemen herewith being kindled with diſpleaſure, got them to armor, and ſetting vpon the Welſhmen, ſlue of them to the number of fourescore, and put the other to flight: wherevpon the next morning it was ſaid that the Welſhmen vpon wrath conceiued hereof meant to depart to the Scots: but yet when the campe remoued, they followed the armie though a farre off, and apart by themſelues, inſomuch that manie doubted leaſt if the Engliſhmen had chanced to haue had the worſſe at the Scotiſhmens hands, they would haue ioined with them againſt the Engliſhmen. This bloodie broile ſprang of intemperancie, and ſurfetting drunkenneſſe, which is worthie to be thus diſclaimed,

The king now hearing that the Scots were comming towards him, raiſed his field, and went forth to méet them, lodging the next night in a faire plaine. In the morning verie earlie, a great alarme was raiſed, ſo that euerie man got him to armour, ſuppoſing the Scots to be at hand. The horſſe appointed for the kings ſaddle that day, as the king ſhould haue got vpon him, frighted with ſome noiſe, ſtarted aſide, and threw the king downe with ſuch violence, that he brake two of his ribbes, as the report went. Other write, that his horſſe trod on him in the night, as he and his people reſted them, kéeping their horſſes ſtill bridled, to be readie the ſooner vpon occaſion of any neceſſitie: but howſoeuer he came by his hurt, he ſtaied not to paſſe forward in his purpoſed iournie, but mounting vpon an other horſſe, went forth with his armie till he came to a place called Foukirke, where both the armies of England and Scotland met and fought.

N. Triuet.

The battell of Foukirke.

The Scots were diuided in foure ſchiltrons, as they termed them, or as we may ſaie, round battels, in forme of a circle, in the which ſtood their people that carried long ſtaues or ſpeares, which they croſſed iointlie togither one within another, betwixt which ſchiltrons or round batels were certeine ſpaces left, the which were filled with their archers and bowmen, and behind all theſe were their horſſemen placed. They had choſen a ſtrong ground, ſomewhat ſideling on the ſide of a hill. The earles Marſhall, Hereford, & Lincolne, which led the fore ward of the Engliſhmen, at the firſt made directlie towards the Scots, but they were ſtaied, by reaſon they found a mariſh, or an euill fauoured moſſe betwixt their enimies and them, ſo that they were conſtreined to fetch a compaſſe towards the weſt ſide of the field. The biſhop of Durham ruling in the ſecond battell of the Engliſhmen, conſiſting of ſix and thirtie ſtandards or banners, knowing the let of that moſſe or mariſh toward the eaſt ſide, haſted forth to be the firſt that ſhould giue the onſet: but yet when they approched néere to the enimies, the biſhop commanded his people to ſtaie till the third battell, which the king led, might approach. But that valiant knight the lord Rafe Baſſet of Draiton ſaid to him: My lord biſhop, you may go and ſay maſſe, which better becommeth you, than to teach vs what we haue to doo, for we will doo that which belongeth to the order and cuſtome of warre.

And amongſt other was the brother of the lord ſteward of Scotland, who as he was about to ſet in order the bowmen of Selkirke, by chance was vnhorſſed, and ſlaine there amongſt the ſame bowmen, and manie a tall mans bodie with him. The Scotiſh archers thus being ſlaine, the Engliſhmen aſſailed the ſpearemen; but kéeping themſelues cloſe togither, and ſtanding at defenſe with their ſpeares like a thicke wood, they kept out the Engliſh horſſemen for a while, & fought manfullie, though they were ſore beaten with ſhot of Thomas Biſet requireth the Ile of Araine.

The euill opinion of the earles Marſhall & Hereford towards the king.

About the ſame time certeine Iriſh lords, and amongſt other as cheefe, one Thomas Biſet landed in the Ile of Araine, the inhabitants whereof yeelded themſelues vnto the ſame Thomas, who (as was iudged) meant to haue aided the Scots: but now hearing of the victorie which king Edward had gotten in a pight field, he ſent vnto him to giue him to vnderſtand that he was come in his aid, & had won the ſaid Ile of Araine, and therfore beſought him that it might pleaſe him to grant it vnto him and his heires for euer. Which requeſt the king granted: whereof when the earles Marſhall and Hereford were aduertiſed, they thought this a raſh part of the king, conſidering that he had promiſed to doo nothing anew without their conſents and counſell.

The kings liberalitie towards his nobles.

Therefore the king being (as ye haue heard) returned to Carleill, they got licence to depart home with their people, leauing the king ſtill at Carleill, where he remained a time, and held a parlement there, in the which he granted vnto manie of his nobles, the lands and liuings of diuers noble men of the Scots, as to the earles earledomes, to the barons baronies; but Gallowaie and Annandale, with certeine other counties, he aſſigned to none, reſeruing the ſame (as was thought) vnto the foreſaid two earles, leaſt they ſhould thinke themſelues euill dealt with, if they had no part beſtowed on them amongſt the reſidue.

His anſwer.

The addition put in the concluſion of the articles.

The king after this went to Durham, and from thence thought to haue returned ſtreight towards London, but hearing that the Scots meant to make ſome inuaſion, he went to Tinmouth, and remained there till towards Chriſtmaſſe. Now when the king had laine a certeine time at Tinmouth, he departed from thence, and drew ſouthward, and comming to Cotingham, a little from Beuerlie, held his Chriſtmaſſe there, and after drew towards London, where in the beginning of Lent, he held a parlement, at the which he was required to keepe promiſe for the confirmation of the two charters and articles concluded with the earles of Hereford and Marſhall. The king was nothing contented that this matter ſhould be ſo earneſtlie called vpon, for loth he was to grant their full requeſts; and againe to denie them, he ſtood in doubt how it might be taken: he therefore prolonged time, & would make no anſwer either to or fro. But when the lords vrged him ſo ſore to giue them anſwer, he got him out of the citie, not making them priuie of his departure, and when they followed him, and ſeemed not well contented that he ſhould ſo diſſemble with them, he excuſed himſelfe by blaming the aire of the citie to be againſt his health, and therefore bare them in hand, that he onelie ſought to refreſh himſelfe in ſome better aire in the countrie more agreeable to his nature: and as for anſwer to their requeſts, he willed them to repaire againe to the citie, and they ſhould haue anſwer by his councell, ſo farre as ſhould ſtand with reaſon to content them. They returned as he willed them, and had the charters confirmed according to their requeſts, ſauing that this addition was put in the latter end of the ſame, Saluo iure coronæ noſtræ. With which addition the lords were offended, and turned home to their houſes in as great diſpleeaſure towards the king as before.

The articles red in Paules churchyard.

The perambulations of forreſts.

The councell doubting ſome ſeditious ſtir to ariſe hereof amongſt the people, deliuered the charters (ſo ſealed and ſigned as they were) vnto the ſhiriffes of London, that the ſame might be read openlie before the people, which was doone in Paules churchyard in preſence of a great aſſemblie there, come togither and gathered for that purpoſe. at the firſt before they heard the addition, gaue manie bleſſings to the king for thoſe grants: but when they heard with what words he concluded, they curſed as faſt as before they had bleſſed. Before this parlement was diſſolued, the lords had warning to returne againe ſhortlie after Eaſter, and then they had all things granted and performed as they could wiſh or deſire. The perambulations of forreſtes were appointed vnto three biſhops, three earles, and three barons.

A biſhop ſent from the pope.

About the latter end of Iune there came ouer a biſhop ſent from pope Boniface as his Nuncio, and diuerſe other with him, to declare the order which the pope as arbitrator indifferentlie choſen betwixt the kings of England and France, for the deciding of all controuerſies depending betwixt them, had giuen forth & decreed, which was in effect as followeth.

But thoſe two laſt articles tooke ſmall effect, the French king refuſing to deliuer any of thoſe townes which he had gotten in poſſeſſion. Moreouer, theſe meſſengers in the popes behalfe required the king that he would ſet Iohn Balioll, ſometime king of Scotland at libertie, and reſtore thoſe lands vnto his ſonne Edward Balioll, which he ought to hold within the realme of England, promiſing and vndertaking in the popes behalfe to preſerue and ſaue the realme harmeleſſe from all hurt and damage that might inſue by the deliuerie of the ſaid Iohn Balioll.

A proclamation for monie.

In the eight and twentith yeare of his reigne, in the Chriſtmaſſe ſeaſon king Edward ſet forth a proclamation, forbidding and prohibiting all forren coins to be receiued and paid as ſterling monie within his dominion, commanding by the ſame proclamation, that two péeces of them ſhould go for one ſterling, vntill the feaſt of Eaſter. There were diuerſe monies in thoſe daies currant within this realme, as pollards, crocards, ſtaldings, eagles, leonines, ſléepings, and all theſe were white monies, artificiallie made of ſiluer, copper, and ſulphur, ſo that it was an ill time for baſe monies, & much chopping and changing was vſed in buieng and ſelling of things.

Forren monies forbidden to go as currant.

At Eaſter following the king vtterlie forbad that any of thoſe monies ſhould be currant at all, and held his exchange in ſundrie places, and to be rid of them, men gaue fiue or ſix of them for one ſterling, not caring for them, bicauſe of their baſeneſſe, and yet within a yeare after that men had learned the ſkill by proofe how to trie mettall with melted lead in the fire, they found that two péeces of thoſe baſe monies were in value worth one ſterling, and many became rich by the exchange, which had bought good ſtore of them, when they were ſo ſmallie eſtéemed: but the king cauſed inquirie to be made of them that vſed ſuch exchange without his licence, and put them to their fines.

At a parlement holden at London in Lent this yeare, the king renewed the confirmation of the charters, and made certeine new ſtatutes concerning fines and goale deliueries, verie profitable to the common-wealth. About the feaſt of ſaint Iohn Baptiſt, king Edward went with an armie into Scotland, and there granted a truce to the Scots that inhabited the mounteine countries to indure for eleuen moneths, that is to ſaie, till Whitſuntide next inſuing. As the king was vpon his iournie forewards in the north parts, his late married wife quéene Margaret was deliuered of hir firſt ſonne at Brotherton, a place in Yorkeſhire not farre from Pontfret; he was named Thomas, and tooke the ſurname of Brotherton, of the place where he was borne.

The king goeth with an armie into Scotland.

Thomas of Brotherton borne the firſt of Iune.

Moreouer pope Boniface at the ſute of the Scots wrote his letters vnto king Edward, commanding him by the ſame and by the archbiſhop of Canturburie, whome he appointed to deliuer the ſame letters by other letters to him directed, that he ſhould not onelie releaſe and ſet at libertie all ſuch Scots as he had in priſon, but alſo giue ouer his warres which he made againſt the realme of Scotland: and if he meant to make anie claime to the ſame, then to ſend his procurators vnto the court of Rome, and there to ſhew what euidence he could for his right thereto, where the mater (as he mainteined) was to be heard, decided, and iudged; and not elſewhere. The archbiſhop, according to the popes commandement, did the meſſage, and preſented the popes letters vnto the king, who deferred the anſwer vnto the aſſemblie of the eſtates in parlement, and hereof the archbiſhop aduertiſed the pope accordinglie, as in the letters to him dicreed he was commanded; which he durſt not but ſatiſfie, bicauſe he was perſuaded the popes authoritie to haue béene ſo ample and peremptorie, that there was no reſiſting or gaineſaieng of him, ſith,

This yeare alſo on ſaint Remigius daie, which is the firſt of October, died Edmund earle of Cornewall, the ſonne of earle Richard, that was alſo king of Almaine; and bicauſe he left no iſſue behind him to inherit that earledome, the ſame returned to the crowne. Pope Boniface being ſollicited by the inſtant ſuit of the Scotiſhmen, and offended alſo that the lands in England, which belonged vnto Edward Balioll ſonne of Iohn Balioll, were not to the ſame Edward reſtored, he eftſoones wrote to king Edward; forbidding him from thence forth any further to vex the Scots by wars, bicauſe that the kingdome of Scotland was ſurrendred alreadie into his hands by the generall conſent of the Scotiſhmen themſelues, and therefore was it in his power to beſtow and take away the ſame to whom or from whom ſoeuer it ſhould pleaſe him.

Pope Boniface prohibiteth the king of England further to vex the Scots.

¶ There were reaſons alledged why the king of England ſéemed to do wrong in challenging as then the kingdome of Scotland: and amongſt other, one was, that ſuch homage as had beene doone of ancient time to the kings of England, by the kings of the Scots, was onelie meant for Tindale, Penreth, and ſuch other lands as the Scotiſh kings held within England, and not for the realme of Scotland. And whereas the kings of Scotland had aided the kings of England in their warres againſt the rebels of the realme of England, and béene preſent at their coronation, the ſame was doone of ſpeciall fauour, and not of dutie. K. Edward hauing receiued the popes preſcript, and well conſidered the whole contents thereof, ſent in writing his anſwer at large, prouing by euident reaſons that the right of proprietie in the kingdome of Scotland, did moſt iuſtlie apperteine vnto him, and that the allegations were not true, but forged, which had béene by ſurmiſed information preſented againſt him.

N. Triuet.

Beſide the kings letters, which he wrote in his owne behalfe, there was an other letter deuiſed and written by all the lords temporall of the land, aſſembled in parlement at Lincolne, in which letter they anſwered in name of all the eſtates there gathered, vnto that point wherein the pope pretended a right to be iudge for the title of the realme of Scotland, proteſting flatlie, that they would not conſent that their king ſhould doo any thing that might tend to the diſheriting of the right of the crowne of England, and plaine ouerthrow of the ſtate of the ſame realme, and alſo hurt of the liberties, cuſtoms, and lawes of their fathers, ſith it was neuer knowne, that the kings of this land had anſwered or ought to anſwer for their rights in the ſame realme, afore any iudge eccleſiaſticall or ſecular.

Thus far out of M. Parkins et the inner temple.

The holie mother church, by whoſe miniſterie the catholike ſee is gouerned, in hir deeds (as we throughlie beleeue and hold) proceedeth with that ripeneſſe in iudgement, that ſhe will be hurtfull to none, but like a mother would euerie mans right be kept vnbroken, aſwell in another, as in hir ſelfe. Whereas therfore in a generall parlement called at Lincolne of late, by our moſt dread lord Edward by the grace of God the noble king of England; the ſame our lord cauſed certeine letters receiued from you to be read openlie, and to be declared ſeriouſlie afore vs, about certeine buſineſſe touching the condition and ſtate of the realme of Scotland: we did not a little muſe and maruell with our ſelues, hearing the meanings concerning the ſame, ſo wondrous and ſtrange as the like we haue not heard at any time before. For we know moſt holie father, and it is well knowne aſwell within this realme of England (as alſo not vnknowne to other perſons beſides) that from the firſt beginning of the realme of England, the certeine and direct gouernment of the realme of Scotland in all temporall cauſes from time to time belonged to the kings of the ſame relme of England and relme of Scotland, aſwell in the times both of the Britains as alſo Engliſhmen, yea rather the ſame realme of Scotland of old time was in fee to the anceſtours of our foreſaid lords kings of England, yea and to himſelfe.

Out of maiſter Fox. pag. 427.

Furthermore, the kings of Scots and the realme haue not beene vnder any other than the kings of England, and the kings of England haue anſwered or ought to anſwer for their rights in the foreſaid relme, or for anie his temporalities before anie iudge eccleſiaſticall or ſecular, by reaſon of free preheminence of the ſtate of his roiall dignitie and cuſtome kept without breach at all times. Wherefore, after treatie had, and diligent deliberation of the contents in your foreſaid letters, this was the common agreement & conſent with one mind, and ſhall be without faile in time to come by Gods grace, that our foreſaid lord the king ought by no meanes to anſwer in iudgement in any caſe, or ſhould bring his foreſaid rights into doubt, nor ought not to ſend any proctors or meſſengers to your preſence, ſpeciallie ſeeing that the premiſſes tend manifeſtlie to the diſheriting of the right of the crowne of England, and the plaine ouerthrowe of the ſtate of the ſaid realme, and alſo hurt of the liberties, cuſtomes and lawes of our fathers, for the keeping & defenſe of which we are bound by the duetie of the oth made, and we will mainteine them with all power, and will defend them (by Gods helpe) with all ſtrength, and furthermore, will not ſuffer our foreſaid lord the king to doo or by anie means attempt the premiſſes being ſo vnaccuſtomed, vnwont, and not hard of afore. Wherefore we reuerentlie and humblie beſeech your holineſſe, that yee would ſuffer the ſame our lord king of England (who among other princes of the world ſheweth himſelfe catholike and deuout to the Romiſh church) quietlie to inioy his rights, liberties, cuſtomes, and lawes aforeſaid: without all impairing and trouble, and let them continue vntouched. In witneſſe whereof, we haue ſet our ſeales to theſe preſents, as well for vs, as for the whole communaltie of the foreſaid relme of England. Dated at Lincolne the twelfth of Februarie, in the yeare of our Lord 1301, Et anno Edwardi primi 29.

The K. goeth to Scotland.

The pope when he heard and deliberatelie pondered the kings anſwer, with this letter directed to him from the Engliſh barons, waxed cold in the matter, and followed it no further. The truce betwixt the king and the Scots being once expired, the king aſſembled his armie, and went into Scotland, about the feaſt of ſaint Iohn Baptiſt, and tarieng there all the ſummer and winter following, his ſouldiers loſt manie of their great horſſes for lacke of forrage, which could not be gotten in the cold winter ſeaſon. He kept his Chriſtmas at Lithquo, and at length at the requeſt and ſute of his brother in law the French king, he granted eftſoones a truce to the Scotiſhmen, vntill the feaſt of All ſaints next inſuing.

The pope exhorteth the K. of England to make war againſt Frãce.

Then hauing ordered his buſineſſe for that time in Scotland, he returned into England, and about midlent called a parlement at London. Alſo this yeere pope Boniface vpon diſpleaſure conceiued againſt the French king, ſent vnto king Edward, exhorting him to make warres againſt the ſame French king, and to perſuade him the more eaſilie therevnto, he promiſed him great aid: but the king of England hauing prooued the ſaid pope, not the ſureſt man in friendſhip towards him, forbare to attempt anie forceable exploit againſt the French king, truſting by ſome other meanes to recouer his right.

This yeere Humfrey Bohun earle of Hereford departed out of this life, after whome ſucceeded his ſonne Humfrey, who afterwards maried the kings daughter, Elizabeth counteſſe of Holland, after that hir firſt huſband was dead. Tournies, iuſtes, barriers, and other warlike exerciſes, which yoong lords and gentlemen had appointed to exerciſe for their paſtime in diuerſe parts of the realme, were forbidden by the kings proclamations ſent downe to be publiſhed by the ſhiriffs in euerie countie abroad in the realme: the teſte of the writ was from Weſtminſter the ſixteenth of Iulie. ¶ The citizens of Burdeaux could not beare the yoke of the French bondage, and therefore this yeere about Chriſtmaſſe expelled them out of their citie. ¶ Shortlie after the French king doubting leaſt the king of England, by the ſetting on of the pope, ſhould make warres againſt him for wrongfull deteining of Gaſcoine, to purchaſe his fauor, reſtored to him all that which he held in Gaſcoine, and ſo then they of Burdeaux alſo ſubmitted themſelues to the king of England of their owne accord.

The lord Segraue ſent with an armie into Scotland.

Now after that the truce with the Scots was expired, which tooke end at the feaſt of All ſaints laſt paſt, the king ſent the lord Iohn Segraue, a right valiant knight (but not ſo circumſpect in his gouernment as was neceſſarie) with a great armie into Scotland, to haue the rule of the land as lord warden of the ſame: with him was ioined alſo Rafe Confreie, treaſurer of the armie. Theſe two capteins comming to the borders, and hearing that the Scotiſhmen alreadie were in armes, they entered into Scotland, and in order of battell paſſed forth to Edenburgh, and hearing nothing of their enimies which kept them ſtill in the mounteins, they deuided their armie into three ſeuerall battels, two of the which came behind the fore ward vnder the leading of the ſaid Rafe Confreie, the third (that is to ſay) the fore ward, the lord Segraue led himſelfe, in ſuch order that there was the diſtance of foure miles betwixt their lodgings. This they did to be the more plentiouſlie ſerued of vittels.

But the Scots vnderſtanding this order of their enimies, became the more hardie, and therevpon hauing knowledge where the lord Segraue was lodged with his companie, a good way off from the other two parts of the armie, they haſted forwards in the night ſeaſon, and came néere vnto the place where the ſame lord Segraue was incamped, a little before daie, making themſelues readie to aſſaile the Engliſhmen in their campe. But the lord Segraue hauing knowlege of their comming, though he was counſelled by ſome of them that were about him, either to withdraw vnto the other battels, or elſe to ſend vnto them to come to his aid, he would follow neither of both the waies; but like a capteine more hardie than wiſe in this point, diſpoſed his companies which he had there in order to fight, and incouraging them to plaie the men, immediatlie vpon the riſing of the ſunne, and that his enimies approched, he cauſed the trumpets to ſound to the battell, and gaue therewith the onſet.

The Engliſh men vanquiſhed by the Scots.

The fight was ſore and doubtfull for a while, till the Engliſhmen ouercome with the multitude of their enimies began to be ſlaine on ech ſide, ſo that few eſcaped by flight. To the number of twentie worthie knights were taken, with their capteine the ſaid lord Segraue being ſore wounded, but he was by chance reſcued and deliuered out of the enimies hands, by certeine horſſemen, which vnder the leading of the lord Robert Neuell a right valiant knight (vpon hearing the noiſe of them that fled) came on the ſpurs out of the next campe to the ſuccour of their fellowes. Rafe Confreie after this miſhap (as Polydor ſaith) brought backe the reſidue of the armie into England, not thinking it neceſſarie to attempt any further enterpriſe at that time againſt the enimies, ouermatching him both in ſtrength and number. This incounter chanced on the firſt ſundaie in Lent. ¶ I remember the Scotiſh chronicles conteine much more of this enterpriſe greatlie to their glorie, and more (haplie) than is true, as by conferring the place where they intreat of it, with this that I haue here exemplified out of our writers it may well appeare. The earle Marſhall hauing ſpent largelie whileſt he ſtood in contention againſt the king, who was now earneſtlie called vpon to repaie ſuch ſummes of monie as he had borowed of his brother John Bigod, who was verie rich by reaſon of ſuch benefices and ſpirituall liuings as he had in his hands, the earle bicauſe he had no children, to whom he might leaue his lands, meant to haue left them vnto his ſaid brother: but when he ſaw him ſo importunate in calling for the debts which he owght him; he tooke ſuch diſpleaſure therewith, that to obteine the kings fauour, and to diſappoint his brother of the inheritance, he gaue vnto the king all his poſſeſſions, vpon condition that the king adding thereto other lands in value worth a thouſand markes by yeare, ſhould reſtore them to him againe to inioy during his life, the remainder after his deceaſſe to come vnto the king, and further, the king ſhould paie and diſcharge him of all his debts.

The Scots ſubmit themſelues to the king.

King Edward being aduertiſed of the loſſe which his men had ſuſteined in Scotland, ſtreightwaies called a parlement, wherein by aſſent of the ſtates a ſubſidie was granted, towards the maintenance of his warres, and then the ſame being leuied he aſſembled his people, and ſhortlie after about Whitſuntide entred into Scotland to reuenge the death of his men. The Scots hearing of the kings comming, fled into the mounteins, moſſes, and mariſh grounds, not once ſhewing any countenance to fight any ſet battell with the Engliſh hoſt, ſo that the king in maner without reſiſtance paſſed through the countrie euen vnto Cathnes, which is the furtheſt part of all Scotland. Manie of the Scots perceiuing their lacke of power to reſiſt the Engliſh puiſſance, came to king Edward, and ſubmitted themſelues, with condition that they ſhould inioy their lands which he had giuen awaie to his lords, they redéeming the ſame with conuenient fines, which was granted.

But Will. King Edward returning backe, came to the caſtell of Striueling (which the Scotiſhmen held againſt him) and beſieged it. The king himſelfe laie at Dunferling the moſt part of the winter: and whileſt he laie there, the quéene which had lien a long time at Tinmouth came to him, and when the winter was once paſt, the king himſelfe came to the ſiege, and cauſed certeine engins of wood to be raiſed vp againſt the caſtell, which ſhot off ſtones of two or thrée hundred weight: but yet would not they within once talke of any ſurrender. And where the Engliſhmen filled the ditches with wood and boughs of trées, they ſet the ſame on fire, and burnt them to aſhes: at length the ditches were filled with ſtones and earth, ſo that then the Scots within perceiuing themſelues in euident perill to loſe the caſtell, on ſaint Margarets daie they yéelded themſelues ſimplie into the kings hands, as the Engliſh writers affirme, though the Scotiſh writers record the contrarie.

A fiftéenth granted.

Finallie, when the king had ordered all his buſineſſe in Scotland at his pleaſure, he returned into England, leauing in Scotland for warden the lord John Segraue, or (as other writers haue) ſir Aimer de Valence earle of Penbroke. At his comming to Yorke he cauſed the iuſtices of his bench, and the barons of the excheker to remoue with their courts, and all their clearks and officers, togither with the lord chancellor and his court to London, that the termes might be kept there, as in times paſt they had béene, whereas now the ſame had remained at Yorke aboue the ſpace of ſix yeares, vpon this conſideration, that the king and his councell might be néere vnto Scotland to prouide for the defenſe thereof, as occaſion from time to time ſhould require. From Yorke he came to Lincolne, and there remained all the winter, holding a councell, in the which he eftſoones confirmed the articles of Magna charta, touching the liberties, priuileges and immunities of his ſubiects, the which to declare their thankfull minds towards him for the ſame, granted to him for the ſpace of one yéere the fiftéenth part of all their reuenues. Others write that the king had in this yeare of citizens and of the burgeſſes of good townes, the ſixt penie according to the valued rate of their goods.

Iuſtices fined.

About the ſame time, Thomas Colebrugh or Corbridge archbiſhop of Yorke departed this life, and one William Gréenefield doctour of both the lawes ſuccéeded him. ¶ There died about the ſame time that valiant knight the lord W. Latimer. ¶ Alſo John Warren earle of Surrey and Suſſex died this yéere & was buried at Lewes. His nephue by his ſon (named alſo John) ſuccéeded him, obteining to wife the kings néece by his daughter Elianor that was married to the earle of Bar, as before ye haue heard. Likewiſe Robert Bruce earle of Carrike, the fift of that name died this yeare, who was father to that Robert Bruce that was after K. of Scots. ¶ Moreouer, about this ſeaſon the king ordeined certeine commiſſioners of iuſticiaries, to make inquiſitions through the realme, by the verdict of ſubſtantiall iuries vpon all officers, as maiors, ſhiriffes, baſliffes, exchetors, and other that had miſuſed themſelues in their offices, either by extortion, briberie, or otherwiſe, to the gréeuance of the people, contrarie to that they rightlie might doo and iuſtifie by vertue of their offices: by means of which inquiſitions manie were accuſed and found culpable, and therevpon put to gréeuous fines.

Nic.Triuet. Traile baſton.

Alſo the iuſtices, which were aſſigned to take theſe inquiſitions, extended the ſame according to their commiſſion againſt ſuch as had made intruſions into other mens lands, and for doubt to be impleaded for the ſame had made alienations ouer into the hands of great men; alſo againſt ſuch barretors as vſed to take monie to beat any man, and againe would not ſticke to take monie of him whom they had ſo beaten, to beat him that firſt hired them to beat the other. The malice of ſuch maner people was now reſtreined by force of theſe inquiſitions: for ſuch as were found culpable, were worthilie puniſhed, ſome by death, and ſome by ranſoms: diuerſe alſo for feare to come to their anſwers fled the realme: alſo forfeits againſt the crowne were ſtreightlie looked vnto, found out, and leuied; by reaſon whereof great ſummes of monie came to the kings coffers, which holpe well towards the maintenance and charges of his warres. This kind of inquiſition was named commonlie Traile baſton, which ſignifieth, Traile or draw the ſtaffe. And forſomuch as the procéeding in this wiſe againſt ſuch miſdemenors as then were vſed, brought ſo great a benefit to the realme in reſtreining ſuch malefactors, which greatlie (as ſhould ſeeme) diſquieted the ſtate of the commonwealth, I haue thought good to ſet downe the ſubſtance of the ſame, as followeth.

In the three and thirtith yeare of his reigne, king Edward put his ſonne prince Edward in priſon, bicauſe that he had riotouſlie broken the parke of Walter Langton biſhop of Cheſter; and bicauſe the prince had done this déed by the procurement of a lewd and wanton perſon, one Péers Gaueſton, an eſquire of Gaſcoine, the king baniſhed him the realme, leaſt the prince, who delighted much in his companie, might by his euill and wanton counſell fall to euill and naughtie rule. Moreouer, the ſame yeare, William Waleis was taken, and deliuered vnto king Edward, who cauſed him to be brought to London, where on S. Bartholmewes euen, he was conueied through the ſtreets vnto Weſtminſter, and there arreigned of his treaſon, and condemned, and therevpon hanged, drawne and quartered, his head was ſet ouer London bridge, his right ſide ouer the bridge at Newcaſtell vpon Tine, his left ſide was ſent to Berwike and there ſet vp, his right leg was ſent to S. Iohns towne, and his left vnto Aberden, in which places the ſame were ſet vp for an example of terror to others.

Alſo, about the ſame time, the king of France required the king of England by meſſengers and letters ſent vnto him, that he would baniſh all the Flemings out of his realme, in like manner as at his inſtance he had latelie before baniſhed all the Scotiſhmen out of France. The king of England was contented ſo to doo, and by that means were all the Flemings auoided out of this land at that ſeaſon, but ſhortlie after, they returned againe. King Edward accuſed Robert archbiſhop of Canturburie vnto the pope, for that he ſhould go about to trouble the quiet ſtate of the realme, and to defend and ſuccour rebellious perſons, wherevpon the ſaid archbiſhop being cited to the popes conſiſtorie, was ſuſpended from executing his office, till he ſhould purge himſelfe by order of law, of ſuch crimes as were laid and obiected againſt him. The king alſo obteined an abſolution of the pope, of the oth which againſt his will he had taken, for the obſeruing of the liberties exacted by force of him, by the earls and barons of his realme, namelie, touching difforreſtings to be made.

But the king counted it no honour to be ſeuere againſt that ſex whom nature tendereth, though malefactors, and therfore was content with a mild correction tending rather to ſome ſhame than ſmart, to recompenſe hir offenſe, wherby ſhe procured againſt hir ſelfe no leſſe reproch than ſhe ſuſteined, agréable to the old ſaieng, Thrée hundred ſaith Matth. Weſt.

Prince Edward ſent into Scotland.

There were preſent at his coronation foure biſhops, fiue earles, and a great multitude of people of the land. Immediatlie vpon the newes brought to the king of Bruces coronation, he ſent foorth a power of men, vnder the conduct of the earle of Penbroke, and of the lord Henrie Percie, the lord Robert Clifford, and others, to reſiſt the attempts of the Scots, now readie to worke ſome miſchéefe, through the incouragement of the new king. Edward prince of Wales was made knight this yeare at London vpon Whitſundaie, & a great number of other yong bachelers with him (297 as Abington writeth) the which were ſent ſtreightwaies with the ſaid prince towards Scotland, to ioine with the earle of Penbroke, to reſiſt the attempts of the new king Robert le Bruce and his complices. King Edward himſelfe followed. The generall aſſemblie of the armie was appointed at Carleill, fiftéene daies after the Natiuitie of ſaint Iohn Baptiſt, from thence to march foorth vnder the guiding of the prince into Scotland.

It was the next ſundaie after midſummer daie.

Rob. Bruce put to flight by the earle of Penbroke.

In the meane time, Robert le Bruce went abroad in the countries of Scotland, receiued the homages of manie Scotiſhmen, and got togither an armie of men, with the which he approched néere to ſaint Iohns towne, into the which the earle of Penbroke was a little before entred to defend it, with thrée hundred men of armes, beſide fotmen. Then R. Bruce ſent to the earle to come out and giue battell, the earle ſent vnto him word againe, that he would not fight that daie being ſundaie, but vpon the next morow he would ſatiſfie his requeſt. Robert Bruce herevpon withdrew a mile backe from the towne, determining to reſt himſelfe and his people that night. About euening tide came the earle foorth of the towne with his people in order of battell, and aſſailing his enimies vpon a ſudden, ſlue diuerſe yer they could get their armour on their backs. Robert Bruce and others that had ſome ſpace to arme themſelues made ſome reſiſtance for a while, but at length the Engliſhmen put them to the worſe, ſo that they were conſtreined to flée.

Howbeit, his wife and his brother Nigell or Neall, with diuerſe other were taken in this caſtell, and ſent in ſafetie vnto Berwike. Alſo ſhortlie after, the earle of Atholl was taken, being fled out of the ſame caſtell. ¶ But ſome write, that this earle was taken in the battell laſt remembred, after long fight and great ſlaughter of Scots, to the number of ſeuen thouſand, and alſo that in the chaſe, the lord Simon de Friſell was taken, with the biſhops of ſaint Andrews and Glaſco, the abbat of Scone, and the ſaid earle of Atholl, named ſir Iohn Chambres. The biſhops and abbat, king Edward ſent vnto pope Innocent, with report of their periurie: but others write, that the foreſaid biſhops and abbat being taken indéed the ſame yeare, were brought into England, and there kept as priſoners within ſundrie caſtels.

The earle of Vlſter hir father, in the beginning of theſe laſt wars, ſent vnto king Edward two of his owne ſonnes to remaine with him, in ſuch wiſe as he ſhould thinke conuenient, to aſſure himſelfe of him, that he would attempt nothing againſt the Engliſh ſubiects. Alſo it was ſaid, that the ladie hir ſelfe, the ſame daie hir huſband and ſhe ſhould be crowned, ſaid, that ſhe feared they ſhould proue but as a ſummer king and quéene, ſuch as in countrie townes the yong folks choſe for ſport to danſe about maipoles. For theſe cauſes was ſhe the more courteouſlie vſed at the kings hands, as reaſon no leſſe required.

It ſhould appeare by Robert Fabian, that the king was preſent himſelfe at this battell: but other affirme, that prince Edward was there as generall and not his father, and that the battell was fought at Dunchell vpon the riuer of Tay. But neither the Scotiſh chronicles nor Nicholas Triuet (whom in the hiſtorie of this king Edward the firſt, we haue moſt followed) make anie mention, that either the king or prince ſhould be at the foreſaid battell, but that the earle of Penbroke with Robert lord Clifford, and Henrie lord Percie were ſent before (as ye haue alreadie heard) with an armie, by whome as appeareth this victorie was obteined, at a place called Methſen. After this was the caſtell of Lochdore taken, and within it Chriſtopher Seiton, that had married the ſiſter of Robert le Bruce; and bicauſe he was no Scot but an Engliſhman borne, the king commanded that he ſhould be led vnto Dunfriſe, where he had killed one of the kings knights, and there to be hanged, drawen and quartered.

The wife of this Chriſtopher Seiton, he appointed to be kept in the monaſterie of Thirell in Lindſey; and the daughter of Robert le Bruce, which was alſo taken about the ſame time, was ſent to the monaſterie of Waiton. Moreouer, the manour of Seiton in Whitebeſtroud he gaue vnto the lord Edmund de Mauley, and thoſe other lands that belonged vnto the ſaid Chriſtopher Seiton in Northumberland he gaue vnto the lord William Latimer. The lands that belonged to the new Scotiſh king he beſtowed in this wiſe, to Henrie Bohun earle of Hereford, which had married one of king Edwards daughters, he gaue the lordſhips of Annandale; Hert & Hertnes he gaue vnto the lord Robert Clifford, ſauing alwaies the right yet that belonged to the church of Durham, Totenham, and Totenhamſhire; and the maner of Wrothell in the ſouth parts he gaue to other noble men; and the earledome of Carrike which R. Bruce had holden, as by inheritance from his mother, the king gaue to the lord Henrie Percie, the earledome of Atholl he gaue to Rafe de Monthermer earle of Gloceſter, who had alſo married (as before yee haue heard) an other of the kings daughters, after the deceſſe of hir firſt huſband Gilbert de Clare earle of Gloceſter.

About the feaſt of ſaint Michaell, the new Scotiſh king Robert le Bruce returned forth of the Iles (into the which he had fled) with manie Iriſhmen and Scots in his companie, and remained a certeine time in Kentire, he ſent certeine of his officers, to leuie and gather vp the rents of the fermes due at the feaſt of ſaint Martine for ſuch lands and poſſeſſions as they held in that countrie, wherof the lord Percie being aduertiſed, haſted thither; but the new king comming vpon him, ſlue certeine of his men, tooke his horſſes and plate, with other things, and droue him into a caſtell, within the which he beſieged him, till at length by a power ſent from king Edward, Bruce was conſtreined to depart. The king in this meane time was come to Lauercoſt neere to Carleill, and there remained a long time. From thence he ſent his iuſtices vnto Berwike, where they ſate in iudgement vpon Nigell Bruce, and the other priſoners taken with him, which were condemned to die, and ſo they were hanged, drawen and quartered. The earle of Atholl was conueied to London, and although he ſued for pardon in reſpect of that he was of kin to the king, yet was he hanged vpon a gibbet higher than all the reſidue, his bodie burned vnder the ſame gibbet, and his head firſt cut off, was ſet vpon a pole ouer London bridge for example ſake that traitors ſhould looke for no pardon.

The elect archbiſhop of Yorke William Greenefield was confirmed this yeare by pope Clement the fift, at the citie of Lions in France, where the ſame pope was crowned about the ſame time, and held his court there, liuing cheeflie by the monie which he got of biſhops that came to him for their confirmations: he had of the ſaid archbiſhop of Yorke within one yeare, nine thouſand and 500 markes, beſides the expenſes which he was at whileſt he laie there, and ſo when this archbiſhop was returned into England, through pouertie he was driuen to gather monie of the perſons, preeſts, and religious men within his prouince at two ſundrie times in one yeare, as firſt, in name of a courteſie and gratious beneuolence, and the ſecond time by waie of an aid.

The ſummes of monie which the pope had of the archbiſh. of Yorke.

Moreouer, pope Clement ordeined Anthonie biſhop of Durham, patriarch of Ieruſalem, diſpenſing with him, ſo as he held ſtill the biſhoprike of Durham, notwithſtanding his other promotion; and this was, bicauſe the biſhop was rich, and the pope poore. For this biſhop might diſpend in yearelie reuenues by purchaſes & inheritances, beſides that belonged to his miter, aboue fiue thouſand marks, and he gaue great rewards to the pope, and to his cardinals, by means whereof he obteined in ſuit againſt the prior of Durham, ſo that he had the charge and ouerſight of the monaſterie of Durham, both the ſpirituall gouernement and temporall, through informing the pope, that the prior was not able in diſcretion to rule the houſe. At his returning home, he cauſed a croſſe of ſiluer and gilt, adorned with an image of the crucifix, to be borne afore him.

The great reuenues of Anthonie B. of Durham.

But where he appointed certeine perſons as his deputies to enter into the priorie of Durham, and to take charge thereof in place of the prior, the monks ſhut the gates againſt them, appealing to the pope, and pretending the kings protection, which they had purchaſed. But thoſe that thus came in the biſhops name, accurſed the monks, & ſo departed. The king heerewith was highlie offended, ſo that he cauſed them to anſwer the matter afore the iuſtices of his bench, and for their preſumption in pronouncing the curſſe, without making the king priuie to their doings, they were put to their fines. And whereas the biſhop was ſummoned to appeare before the king in perſon at a certeine daie, he made default, and departing out of the realme, got backe againe to the pope, contrarie to the kings prohibition: whervpon the liberties of the ſee of Durham were ſeized into the kings hands, and the king placed his iuſtices and chancellor there, and in the yeare next inſuing, he exacted of the tenants of the archbiſhoprike, the thirteenth penie of their goods, and otherwiſe vexed them with ſundrie talages.

He is kept out of the abbeie at Durham.

He is ſummoned to appeere before the K. and refuſeth.

The concluſion of this matter was this, that the prior was cited by the pope, to appeare at his conſiſtorie, whither he went, hauing the kings letters in his fauour directed to the pope; wherevpon, when the pope had examined the matter, and heard the prior ſpeake in his owne perſon, he perceiued him to be otherwiſe than he was informed (a ſober and diſcreet man) and therefore reſtored him againe to the gouernment of his houſe; but he remained in the popes court, till after the kings death, and finallie died there himſelfe in the yeare 1307. But now to returne to other doings of king Edward. We find, that whileſt he lay ſtill at Lauercoſt, he gaue to the earle of Warwike Bernards caſtell, the which he had by eſcheat, through forfeiture thereof made by John Balioll late king of Scotland. He alſo tooke and ſeized into his hands Penreth with the appurtenances.

Bernards caſtell giuen to the earle of Warwike.

In the octaues of S. Hilarie, the king held a parlement at Carleill, in the which, by the peeres of the realme, great complaint was made of the oppreſſions doone to churches, abbeies, and monaſteries, by reaſon of paiments latelie raiſed and taxed by one maiſter William or Guilelmo Teſta the popes chapleine. Commandement therefore was giuen to the ſame chapleine, that from thenceforth he ſhould not leauie anie ſuch paiments; and for further remedie, meſſengers were made forth vnto the pope, to declare vnto him the inconuenience thereof. This Teſta was ſent from pope Clement into England with bulles, in the contents whereof it appeared, that the pope had reſerued to himſelfe the firſt fruits of one yeares reuenues of euerie benefice that fell void by anie manner of meanes within the realme of England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, and likewiſe of all abbeies, priories, and monaſteries; ſo that it may well be ſaid of him & his retinue, according to the proceſſe of all their actions, as it was ſaid of old,

In the ſame parlement were ſtatutes made concerning religious men, which had their head and cheefeſt houſes in forren regions.

There came alſo at the ſame time, a cardinall from the pope, named Petrus Hiſpanus, to procure the conſummation of the mariage, betwixt the prince of Wales, and the French kings daughter; for the ſame was delaied, by reaſon that all couenants were not kept on the French kings behalfe, touching the deliuerie of the townes in Gaſcoine. For whereas in times paſt, the French king had giuen one of thoſe townes that were taken from the Engliſhmen, named Mauleon, vnto a French knight; he kept the ſame ſtill, and would not deliuer it now at the French kings commandement, where-through (as was ſaid) the marriage had beene hitherto deferred. The ſame cardinall by vertue of his bull, would haue had of euerie cathedrall church, colledge, abbeie, and priorie, twelue marks of ſterling monie; and of euerie perſon of pariſh churches eight pence of eue-

But the Engliſh cleargie appealed from this exaction, ſo that by the king and his councell it was ordeined, that he ſhould haue no more than in times paſt cardinall Othobon did receiue, that is to ſaie, the halfe of his demand. Moreouer, this cardinall being at Carleill, and hauing made a ſermon in praiſe of peace, vpon the concluſion of marriage betwixt the prince of Wales and the French kings daughter, in the end he reueſted himſelfe and the other biſhops which were preſent, and then with candels light, and cauſing the bels to be rong, they accurſed in terrible wiſe Robert Bruce the vſurper of the crowne of Scotland, with all his partakers, aiders and mainteiners.

Tho. Bruce executed. Alexander Bruce & Reginald Crawford executed.

Neuertheleſſe, Robert Bruce in this meane while ſlept not his buſineſſe, but ranging abroad in the countrie, ſlue manie that would not obeie him, and ſent forth his two brethren, Thomas that was a knight, and Alexander that was a préeſt, with part of his armie into an other quarter of the countrie, to allure the people vnto his obedience, partlie with gentleneſſe, and partlie with menaces. But the Engliſhmen came vpon them in the night and tooke them both, ſo that being brought before the iuſtices they were condemned, and therevpon hanged, drawen and quartered. ¶ Some write, that Duncan Magdoill, a man of great power in Galloway, tooke theſe two brethren priſoners, togither with Reginald Crawford (being the principlas) on the ninth daie of Februarie, as they with certeine other capteins and men of war came by ſea, and landed in his countrie, vpon whome being ſeuen hundred men, he with thrée hundred or few aboue that number boldlie gaue the onſet, and not onelie tooke the ſaid thrée perſons priſoners, ſore wounded as they were, with diuerſe other, but alſo ſlue Malcolme Makaile a lord of Kentire, and two Iriſh lords, whoſe heads, and the foreſaid priſoners, he preſented vnto king Edward, who cauſed Thomas Bruce to be hanged, drawen and quartered, but the other two were onelie hanged and quartered at Carleill, where their heads were ſet vp aloft on the caſtell and gates of the citie.

The earle of Penbroke put to flight.

Bruce beſiegeth the earle of Glouceſter.

He is chaſed frō that ſiege.

After Eaſter their brother Robert Bruce, calling himſelfe king of Scotland, and hauing now augmented his armie with manie ſouldiers of the out Iles, fought with the earle of Penbroke and put him to flight, and ſlue ſome of his men though not manie. Within a few daies after, he chaſed alſo the earle of Glouceſter, into the caſtell of Aire, and beſieged him within the ſame, till an armie was ſent from king Edward to the reſcue: for then the ſaid Robert was conſtreined to flée, and the Engliſhmen followed, till he got into the woods and mariſhes, where they might come néere him without manifeſt danger, to caſt themſelues awaie. ¶ The king of England, minding to make a full conqueſt of the Scots, and not to leaue off vntill he had wholie ſubdued them, ſent his commiſſions into England, commanding all thoſe that owght him ſeruice, to be redie at Carleill within thrée wéekes after Midſummer. He ſent his ſonne Edward into England, that vpon knowledge had what the French king did touching the agreement, he might accordinglie procéed in the marriage to be made with his daughter.

The death of K. Edward the firſt.
He is buried at Weſtminſter.
His iſſue.

After the prince was departed from the campe, his father king Edward was taken with ſore ſickeneſſe, yet he remoued from Carleill, where the ſame ſickneſſe firſt tooke him, vnto Burrough vpon Sand, and there the daie after being the ſeuenth daie of Iulie, he ended his life, after he had reigned 34 yeares, ſix moneths and one and twentie daies. He liued 68 yeares and twentie daies. His bodie was conueied to London, and in the church of Weſtminſter lieth buried. He had iſſue by his firſt wife queene Elianor, foure ſons, Iohn, Henrie, Alfonſe, & Edward which ſucceeded him, the other died long before their father. Alſo fiue daughters; Elianor, Ione, Margaret, and Elizabeth, were beſtowed in marriage as before in this booke is expreſſed: the fift named Marie became a nunne. By his ſecond wife quéene Margaret, he had two ſonnes, Thomas of Brotherton, and Edmund of Woodſtoke, with one daughter named Margaret after hir mother.

His ſtature and forme of bodie.

His qualitie of mind.

He miſliked the pride of prelats.

He was tall of ſtature, ſome what blacke of colour, ſtrong of bodie, and leane, auoiding groſeneſſe, with continuall exerciſe, of comelie fauour, and iettie eies, the which when he waxed angrie, would ſuddenlie become reddiſh, and ſeeme as though they ſparkled with fire. The haire of his head was blacke and curled, he continued for the moſt part in good health of bodie, and was of a ſtout ſtomach, which neuer failed him in time of aduerſitie. Moreouer, he had an excellent good wit, for to whatſoeuer he applied his ſtudie, he eaſilie atteined to the vnderſtanding thereof: wiſe he was and vertuous, an earneſt enimie of the high and preſumptuous inſolencie of préeſts, the which he iudged to procéed chéeflie of too much wealth and riches: and therefore, he deuiſed to eſtabliſh the ſtatute of Mortmaine, to be a bridle to their inordinate luſts and riotous exceſſe. He built the abbeie of the vale roiall in Cheſhire, he was a conſtant fréend, but if he once tooke diſpleaſure or hatred againſt any perſon, he would not eaſilie receiue him into fauour againe: whileſt he had any vacant time from weightie affaires, he ſpent lightlie the ſame in hunting.

Siluer mines

The ſame Wimondham alſo receiued 82 pounds, & 26 founders of lead, out of the which the ſiluer was tried, as appeareth by his accompts.

Towards the maintenance of his warres and other charges, beſides the ſubſidies which he leuied of his people, and other reuenues comming to his coffers, he had great helpe, by reaſon of the ſiluer mines which in his daies were found in Deuonſhire, and occupied greatlie to his profit, as in the records remaining in the excheker, concerning the accompts and allowances about the ſame it doth and may appeare. For in the accompts of maſter William de Wimondham, it is recorded, that betwixt the twelfth daie of Auguſt, and the laſt of October, in the 22 yeare of this king Edwards reigne, there was tried and fined out at Martineſſtowe in Deuonſhire by times, ſo much of fined ſiluer, as amounted to the ſumme of 370 pounds weight, which being brought to London, was there refined by certeine finers, that plate might be forged thereof, for the ladie Elianor duches of Bar, and daughter to the ſaid king, married in the yeare then laſt paſt to the duke of Bar, as before ye haue heard.

Betwixt the 10 day of Iulie, and the 10 day of October the ſame yeare.

In the 23 yeare of his reigne, there was fined at the place aforſaid 521 pounds & ten ſhillings weight of ſiluer by times, which was alſo brought to London. In the 24 yeare of his reigne, there were taken vp 337 miners, within the wapentake of the Peake in Darbiſhire, and brought into Deuonſhire, to worke there in thoſe ſiluer mines, as appeareth by the allowance demanded by the ſaid maſter William de Wimondham in his roll of accounts, deliuered that yeare into the excheker: and there was brought from thence to London the ſame yeare of ſiluer fined and caſt in wedges 700 foure pounds, thrée ſhillings, one penie weight. In the 25 yeare of his reigne, there were thrée hundred and fourtie eight miners brought againe out of the Peake into Deuonſhine, and out of Wales there were brought alſo 25 miners, which all were occupied about thoſe ſiluer mines, beſide others of the ſelfe countrie of Deuonſhire, and other places. Alſo Wil. de Aulton clearke, kéeper of the kings mines in Deuonſhire and Cornewall, was accomptant of the iſſues and profits of the kings mines there, from the fourth of March, Anno 26 of his reigne, till the eightéenth of Aprill, Anno 27, and yéelded vp his account, both of the ſiluer and lead.

But now to conclude with this noble prince king Edward the firſt, he was ſure not onelie valiant but alſo politike, labouring to bring this diuided Ile, into one entier monarchie, which he went verie neere to haue atchiued, for whereas he was fullie bent to make a conqueſt of Scotland, in like caſe as he had alreadie doone of Wales, if he had liued any longer time to haue diſpatched Robert le Bruce, that onelie ſtood in his waie, it was verie likelie that he ſhould haue found none other to haue raiſed banner againſt him about the quarrell or title to the claime of that realme. For as he was a right warlike prince of himſelfe, ſo was he furniſhed with capteins and ſouldiers anſwerable to his deſire, who being able to lead and command them of himſelfe, had them at length obedient inough to ſerue him, although (as partlie yée haue heard) ſome of the peeres ſhewed themſelues at times diſobedient and ſtubborne, whom yet in the end he tamed well inough, as the earles of Hereford and Northfolke, the which in the thirtith yeare of his reigne reſigned their caſtels and manours into his hands, as by the records of the tower it further may appeare.

Now to follow, as in other kings I haue doone heretofore for learned men, theſe I find to haue flouriſhed in this kings daies, Henrie de Henna a Carmelite frier, Goodwine the chantor of the church of Saliſburie, Adam de Mariſco or Mareis borne in Summerſetſhire an excellent diuine as he was reputed in thoſe daies, Gregorie Huntington a monke of Rameſey verie expert in the toongs; Seuall archbiſhop of Yorke a man ſingularlie learned and ſtout in defending the cauſe of his cleargie againſt the pope, Haimo de Feuerſham, Peter Swanington, Helias Trickingham, Helias de Eueſham, Radulfe Bocking borne in Suſſex, Alphred ſurnamed Anglicus, Iames Ciſtercienſis, William of Ware, Robert Oxenford, Thomas Docking, Iohn ſurnamed Grammaticus, Robert Dodeford: but the more part of theſe are rather to be aſcribed vnto the time of Henrie the third, the father of this king Edward, where theſe that follow are thought to flouriſh in the time of king Edwards reigne, after the deceaſſe of his father king Henrie, Thomas Spot a chronographer, Peter de Ickeham a Kentiſhman borne as Bale thinketh, Iohn Beckton a doctor of both the lawes, William Hanaberge a Carmelite frier, prouinciall gouernour of his order heere in England; Robert Kilwarbie biſhop of Canturburie, and after made a cardinall and biſhop of Portua; Gilbert ſurnamed Magnus, a monke of the Ciſteaux order; Helias Ros, Walter Recluſe, Hugh le Eueſham, Iohn Euerſden a writer of annales, whome I haue partlie followed in this kings life; William Pagham, Henrie Eſſeborne, Iohn de Haida, Roger Bacon a Franciſcane frier, an excellent philoſopher, and likewiſe a mathematician, Iohn Derlingon a dominike frier, Iohn Chelmeſton, Thomas Borſtale a Northfolke man borne, Gregorie Cairugent a monke of Glouceſter a writer of annales; Gregorie de Bredlington, Thomas Bungey a frier minor borne in Northfolke, an excellent mathematician, prouinciall ruler of his order heere in England, he flouriſhed in the daies of king Edward the firſt, although there were another of the ſame name that liued in the time of king Edward the third, Hugh de Mancheſter a Dominike frier, & prouinciall gouernour of his order héere in England, Richard Knapwell a Dominike frier, Iohn Peckham borne in the dioces of Chicheſter, a Franciſcane frier, excellentlie learned, as by his workes it appeareth, he was aduanced by pope Honorius the third, to the archbiſhops ſée of Canturburie; Thomas de Illey a Suffolke man borne, and a white or Carmelite frier in the houſe of Gippeſwich, Michaell ſurnamed Scot, but borne in the biſhoprike of Durham (as Leland ſaith) an excellent phyſician, and likewiſe verie expert in the mathematicals, Hugh de Newcaſtell a frier minor, profeſſed in the ſame towne, Thomas Sutton a blacke frier, that is of the order of S. Dominike, Iohn Read an hiſtoriographer, William de la Mare a frier minor, Thomas Wicke a chanon of Oſney in Oxenford, Simon de Gaunt, William Hothun, prouinciall of the friers Dominiks in England, Iohn de Hide a monke of Wincheſter, Robert Crouch, a cordelier, or a Franciſcane frier, Richard Midleton a frier minor, Thomas Spirman a blacke frier, William Lidlington a doctor of diuinitie, and a Carmelite frier in Stanford, Iohn Fiberie or Beuer, a monke of Weſtminſter, William Makeleſfield borne in Cheſhire, in a market towne, whereof he beareth the name, a blacke frier by profeſſion, and an excellent philoſopher.

Thus farre Edward the firſt, ſurnamed Longſhanks.

Continuation of Matt. Weſt.

EDward, the ſecond of that name, the ſonne of Edward the firſt, borne at Carnaruan in Wales, began his reigne ouer England the ſeauenth day of Julie, in the yeare of our Lord 1307, of the world 5273, of the comming of the Saxons 847, after the conqueſt 241, about the tenth yeare of Albert emperour of Rome, and the two and twentith of the fourth Philip, ſurnamed Le Beau, as then king of France, and in the third yeare after that Robert le Bruce had taken vpon him the crowne and gouernement of Scotland. His fathers corpſe was conueied from Burgh vpon Sands, vnto the abbeie of Waltham, there to remaine, till things were readie for the buriall, which was appointed at Weſtminſter.

The biſhop of Couentrie committed to priſon.

Within three daies after, when the lord treaſurer Walter de Langton biſhop of Couentrie and Lichfield (thorough whoſe complaint Peers de Gaueſton had beene baniſhed the land) was going towards Weſtminſter, to make preparation for the ſame buriall, he was vpon commandement from the new king arreſted, committed to priſon, and after deliuered to the hands of the ſaid Peers, being then returned againe into the realme, who ſent him from caſtell to caſtell as a priſoner. His lands and tenements were ſeized to the kings vſe, but his moueables were giuen to the foreſaid Peers. Walter Reignold that had beene the kings tutor in his childhood, was then made lord treaſurer, and after when the ſee of Worceſter was void, at the kings inſtance he was by the pope to that biſhoprike preferred. Alſo, Rafe biſhop of London was depoſed from the office of lord Chancellour, and John Langton biſhop of Chicheſter was therto reſtored. Likewiſe, the barons of the excheker were remoued, and other put in their places. And Amerie de Valence earle of Penbroke was diſcharged of the wardenſhip of Scotland, and John de Britaine placed in that office, whom he alſo made earle of Richmond.

Officers remoued.

But now concerning the demeanour of this new king, whoſe diſordered maners brought himſelfe and manie others vnto deſtruction; we find that in the beginning of his gouernement, though he was of nature giuen to lightneſſe, yet being reſtreined with the prudent aduertiſements of certeine of his councellors, to the end he might ſhew ſome likelihood of good proofe, he counterfeited a kind of grauitie, vertue and modeſtie; but yet he could not throughlie be ſo bridled, but that forthwith he began to plaie diuers wanton and light parts, at the firſt indeed not outragiouſlie, but by little and little, and that couertlie. For hauing reuoked againe into England his old mate the ſaid Peers de Gaueſton, he receiued him into moſt high fauour, creating him earle of Cornewall, and lord of Man, his principall ſecretarie, and lord chamberlaine of the realme, through whoſe companie and ſocietie he was ſuddenlie ſo corrupted, that he burſt out into moſt heinous vices; for then vſing the ſaid Peers as a procurer of his diſordred doings, he began to haue his nobles in no regard, to ſet nothing by their inſtructions, and to take ſmall heed vnto the good gouernement of the commonwealth, ſo that within a while, he gaue himſelfe to wantonnes, paſſing his time in voluptuous pleaſure, and riotous exceſſe: and to helpe them forward in that kind of life, the foreſaid Peers, who (as it may be thought, he had ſworne to make the king to forget himſelfe, and the ſtate, to the which he was called) furniſhed his court with companies of ieſters, ruffians, flattering paraſites, muſicians, and other vile and naughtie ribalds, that the king might ſpend both daies and nights in ieſting, plaieng, banketing, and in ſuch other filthie and diſhonorable exerciſes: and moreouer, deſirous to aduance thoſe that were like to himſelfe, he procured for them honorable offices, all which notable preferments and dignities, ſith they were ill beſtowed, were rather to be accounted diſhonorable than otherwiſe, both to the giuer and the receiuer, ſith

A parlement at Northampton.

About the thirteenth day of October, a parlement was holden at Northampton, in the which it was ordeined by the kings appointment, that the coine of his father king Edward ſhould be ſtill currant, notwithſtanding the baſeneſſe thereof, as ſome reputed it, and therefore it was moued in the parlement to haue it diſanulled. ¶ Alſo, order was taken for the buriall of his fathers corpſe, which was ſolemnelie conueied from Waltham, and brought to Weſtminſter the ſeauen and twentith day of October following, where with all funerall pompe it was interred. Moreouer, at the ſame parlement, a marriage was concluded betwixt the earle of Cornewall Peers de Gaueſton, and the daughter of Gilbert de Clare earle of Glouceſter, which he had by his wife the counteſſe Joane de Acres the kings ſiſter, which marriage was ſolemnized on All hallowes day next inſuing.

About the two and twentith of Januarie, the king ſailed ouer into France, and at Bullongne in Picardie on the foure and twentith day of Januarie, he did homage to the French king for his lands of Gaſcoine and Pontieu, and on the morrow after, maried Iſabell the French kings daughter, and on the ſeauenth of Februarie he returned with hir into England, and comming to London, was ioifullie receiued of the citizens, and on the fiue and twentith daie of Februarie, being Shrouesundaie in the leape yeare, they were ſolemnlie crowned by the biſhop of Wincheſter, bicauſe that Robert the archbiſhop of Canturburie was not as then within the realme. There was ſuch preaſe and throng of people at this coronation, that a knight called ſir John Wakewell alias Blackwell, was thruſt or crowded to death. ¶ On the day of the circumciſion this yeare, a great tempeſt of thunder and lightning began about euenſong time, that continued the moſt part of the night following.

The order taken for the apprehenſion of the téplers.

On wedneſdaie after the Epiphanie, the knights templers in England were apprehended all in one day by the kings commandement, vpon ſuſpicion of hainous crimes & great enormities by them practiſed, contrarie to the articles of the chriſtian faith. The order of their apprehenſion was on this wiſe. The king directed his writs vnto all and euerie the ſhiriffes of counties within the realme, that they ſhould giue ſummons to a certeine number of ſubſtantiall perſons, knights or other men of good accompt, to be afore them at certeine places within their gouernements, named in the ſame writs, on the ſunday the morrow after the Epiphanie then next inſuing, and that the ſaid ſhiriffes faile not, to be there the ſame day in their owne perſons, to execute that which in other writs to them directed, and after to be ſent, ſhould be conteined. The date of this writ was the fifteenth of December.

The ſecond writ was ſent by certeine chapleins, in which the ſhiriffes were commanded vpon the opening of the ſame, forthwith to receiue an oth in preſence of the ſaid chapleins, to put in execution all that was therein conteined, and not to diſcloſe the contents to any man, till they had executed the ſame with all expedition, and therewith to take the like oth of thoſe perſons, whom by vertue of the firſt writ they had ſummoned to appeare afore them. An other writ there was alſo framed & ſent by the ſame chapleins, by the which the ſaid ſhiriffes were commanded to attach by their bodies, all the templers within the precinct of their gouernements, and to ſeize all their lands and goods into the kings hands, togither with their writings, charters, deeds, and miniments, and to make thereof a true inuentarie and indenture, in preſence of the warden of the place, whether he were brother of that order, or any other, & in preſence of honeſt men being neighbors; of which indenture, one part to remaine in the cuſtodie of the ſaid warden, and the other with the ſhiriffe, vnder his ſeale that ſhould ſo make ſeizure of the ſaid goods: and further, that the ſaid goods and chattels ſhould be put in ſafe cuſtodie, and that the quicke goods and cattell ſhould be kept and found of the premiſſes as ſhould ſéeme moſt expedient, and that their lands and poſſeſſions ſhould be manured and tilled to the vttermoſt commoditie.

Further, that the perſons of the ſaid templers being attached, in manner as before is ſaid, ſhould be ſafelie kept in ſome competent place out of their owne houſes, but not in ſtreight priſon, but in ſuch order, as the ſhiriffes might be ſure of them to bring them forth when he ſhould be commanded, to be found in the meane time according to their eſtate of their owne goods ſo ſeized, and hereof to make a true certificat vnto the treaſurer and barons of the checheker, what they had done concerning the premiſſes, declaring how manie of the ſaid templers they had attached, with their names, and what lands and goods they had ſeized by vertue of this precept. The date of theſe two laſt writs was from Biflet the 20 of December, and the returne thereof to be made vnto the checheker, was the morrow after the Purification. There were writs alſo directed into Ireland, as we haue there made mention, and likewiſe vnto John de Britaine earle of Richmond the lord warden of Scotland, & to Euſtace de Coteſbach chamberleine of Scotland, to Walter de Pederton iuſtice of Weſtwales, and to Hugh Aldighle alias Audlie iuſtice of Northwales, to Robert Holland iuſtice of Cheſter, vnder like forme and maner as in Ireland we haue expreſſed.

The malice which the lords had conceiued againſt the earle of Cornewall ſtill increaſed, the more indeed through the high bearing of him, being now aduanced to honour. For being a goodlie gentleman and a ſtout, he would not once yeeld an inch to any of them, which worthilie procured him great enuie amongſt the chéefeſt peeres of all the realme, as ſir Henrie Lacie earle of Lincolne, ſir Guie earle of Warwike, and ſir Aimer de Valence earle of Penbroke, the earles of Gloceſter, Hereford, Arundell, and others, which vpon ſuch wrath and diſpleaſure as they had conceiued againſt him, thought it not conuenient to ſuffer the ſame any longer, in hope that the kings mind might happilie be altered into a better purpoſe, being not altogither conuerted into a venemous diſpoſition, but ſo that it might be cured, if the corrupter thereof were once baniſhed from him.

Tho. Walſi. Cõtinuatiõ of N. Triuet.

Here vpon they aſſembled togither in the parlement time, at the new temple, on ſaturdaie next before the feaſt of ſaint Dunſtan, and there ordeined that the ſaid Péers ſhould abiure the realme, and depart the ſame on the morrow after the Natiuitie of ſaint John Baptiſt at the furtheſt, and not to returne into the ſame againe at any time then after to come. To this ordinance the king (although againſt his will) bicauſe he ſaw himſelfe and the realme in danger, gaue his conſent, and made his letters patents to the ſaid earles and lords, to witneſſe the ſame.

Theſe letters were read, heard, and allowed in the preſence of all the Noble men of this land, the day and yeare aboueſaid. ¶ The archbiſhop of Canturburie, being latelie returned from Rome, where he had remained in exile in the late deceaſſed kings daies for a certeine time, did pronounce the ſaid Péers accurſed, if he taried within the realme longer than the appointed time, and likewiſe all thoſe that ſhould aid, helpe, or mainteine him, as alſo if he ſhould at any time hereafter returne againe into the land. To conclude, this matter was ſo followed, that at length he was conſtreined to withdraw himſelfe to Briſtow, and ſo by ſea as a baniſhed man to ſaile into Ireland.

out his companie, threatned the lords to be reuenged for this diſpleaſure, and ceaſſed not to ſend into Ireland vnto Peers, comforting him both with freendlie meſſages, and rich preſents, and as it were to ſhew that he meant to reteine him ſtill in his fauour, he made him ruler of Ireland as his deputie there. A wonderfull matter that the king ſhould be ſo inchanted with the ſaid earle, and ſo addict himſelfe, or rather fix his hart vpon a man of ſuch a corrupt humor, againſt whome the heads of the nobleſt houſes in the land were bent to deuiſe his ouerthrow: but the leſſe maruell it is that the king bare him ſuch a feruent affection, and ſet his hart vpon him, conſidering that

The lords perceiuing the kings affection, and that the treaſure was ſpent as lauiſhlie as before, thought with themſelues that it might be that the king would both amend his paſſed trade of life, and that Peers being reſtored home, would rather aduiſe him thereto, than follow his old maners, conſidering that it might be well perceiued, that if he continued in the incouraging of the king to lewdneſſe, as in times paſt he had doone, he could not thinke but that the lords would be readie to correct him, as by proofe he had now tried their meanings to be no leſſe. Hereupon to reteine amitie, as was thought on both ſides, Peers by conſent of the lords was reſtored home againe (the king meeting him at Cheſter) to his great comfort and reioiſing for the time, although the malice of the lords was ſuch, that ſuch ioy laſted not long.

The addition to Triuet.

In the fourth yeare of king Edward was a councell holden at London againſt the templers, the which councell indured from the beginning of Maie, till Iune. In this councell they confeſſed the ſame, but not the fact of the crimes laid to their charge, except two or thrée ribalds that were amongſt them: but bicauſe they could not cleare themſelues, they were adiudged vnto perpetuall penance within certeine monaſteries. The king this yeare fearing the enuie of the lords againſt Peers de Gaueſton, placed him for his more ſafetie in Bambourgh caſtell, bearing the prelats and lords in hand, that he had committed him there to priſon for their pleaſures.

The earle of Cornewall placed in Bambourgh caſtell.

This yeare alſo there were ordinances made for the ſtate and gouernement of the realme, by the prelats, earles, and barons, which were confirmed with the ſentence of excommunication againſt all them that ſhould go about to breake the ſame. The king neither allowed of them nor obſerued them, although he had confirmed them with his ſeale, and ſent them to all cathedrall churches and counties, to be regiſtred in perpetuall memorie thereof. The king indeed was lewdlie led, for after that the earle of Cornewall was returned into England, he ſhewed himſelfe no changeling (as writers doo affirme) but through ſupport of the kings fauour, bare himſelfe ſo high in his doings, which were without all good order, that he ſéemed to diſdaine all the peeres & barons of the realme. Alſo after the old ſort he prouoked the king to all naughtie rule and riotous demeanour, and hauing the cuſtodie of the kings iewels and treaſure, he tooke out of the iewell-houſe a table, & a paire of treſtels of gold, which he deliuered vnto a merchant called Aimerie de Friſcobald, commanding him to conueie them ouer the ſea into Gaſcoine. This table was iudged of the common people, to belong ſometime vnto king Arthur, and therefore men grudged the more that the ſame ſhould thus be ſent out of the realme.

Berwike fortified.

The king entred into Scotland.

The king this yeare raiſed a great power to go into Scotland. And about the feaſt of the Aſſumption of our ladie, hauing with him Peers de Gaueſton earle of Cornewall, and the earles of Gloceſter and Warren, he came to Berwike, which towne he cauſed to be fortified with a ſtrong wall, and a mightie déepe ditch, and although the other earles would not come to ſerue him in that voiage, by reaſon of a new variance riſen amongſt them, yet he marched forth into Scotland, to ſéeke his aduerſarie Robert le Bruce: but Robert refuſing the battell, kept him forth of the waie, ſo that the king was driuen to returne to Berwike againe, without méeting with his enimie. And he was no ſooner come backe, but the ſaid Robert and his people entred into Louthian, ſore moleſting ſuch as were yéelded to the king of England. The king aduertiſed thereof, followed them, but could doo no good, & ſo returned. The earle of Cornewall laie at Rokeſbourgh, and the earle of Gloceſter at Norham to defend thoſe parts. After Candlemaſſe, the king ſent the earle of Cornewall, with two hundred men of armes to S. Iohns towne, beyond the Scottiſh ſea, who receiued to the kings peace all thoſe that inhabited beyond that ſea vp to the mounteins. The king laie ſtill at Berwike, but the earles of Gloceſter and Warren, after the beginning of Lent, rode into the foreſt of Solkirke, and receiued the foreſters & other the inhabitants there to the kings peace. ¶ In this fift yeare of the kings reigne, but ſomwhat before this preſent, in the yeare 1310, Henrie Lacie earle of Lincolne gouernour of England in the kings abſence departed this life, in whoſe place the earle of Gloceſter was choſen gouernour, and therefore he returned now into England. This erle of Lincolne was buried in the new worke at Paules. Lieng on his death bed, he requeſted (as was reported) Thomas earle of Lancaſter, who had married his daughter, that in any wiſe he ſhould ſtand with the other lords in defenſe of the common-welth, and to mainteine his quarell againſt the earle of Cornewall, which requeſt earle Thomas faithfullie accompliſhed: for by the purſute of him, and of the earle of Warwike chéefelie, the ſaid earle of Cornewall was at length taken and beheaded (as after ſhall appeare.) Some write that king Edward the firſt vpon his death-bed, charged the earles of Lincolne, Warwike, and Penbroke, to foreſée that the foreſaid Peers returned not againe into England, leaſt by his euill example he might induce his ſonne the prince to lewdneſſe, as before he had alreadie doone.

Thomas earle of Lancaſter came toward Berwike, to doo homage to the king for the earledome of Lincolne fallen to him in right of his wife, now after the deceaſſe of hir father the late earle of Lincolne. But he was counſelled not to go forth of the realme to the king, ſo that therevpon roſe no ſmall diſpleaſure, and great doubt leaſt there would haue followed ciuill warres about it. Neuertheleſſe, at length the king was perſuaded to come ouer the water vnto Hagerſton, foure miles diſtant from Berwike, and there receiued homage of the earle, and ſo they continued fréends, and for that time departed aſunder in louing maner. The lords perceiuing the miſchéefe that dailie followed and increaſed by that naughtie man (as they tooke it) the earle of Cornewall, aſſembled at Lincolne, and there tooke counſell togither, and concluded eftſoones to baniſh him out of the realme, and ſo therevpon ſhortlie after, about Chriſtmaſſe (as ſome write) or rather, as other haue, within the quindene of ſaint Michaell, he was exiled into Flanders, ſore againſt the kings will and pleaſure, who made ſuch account of him, that (as appeared) he could not be quiet in mind without his companie, & therfore about Candlemaſſe he eftſoones re-

But he being nothing at all amended of thoſe his euill manners, rather demeaned himſelfe worſe than before he had done, namelie towards the lords, againſt whome vſing reprochfull ſpeech, he called the earle of Glouceſter baſtard, the earle of Lincolne latelie deceaſed burſten bellie, the earle of Warwike the blacke hound of Arderne, and the earle of Lancaſter churle. Such lords and other more that were thus abuſed at this earle of Cornewals hands, determined to be reuenged vpon him, and to diſpatch the realme of ſuch a wicked perſon: and therevpon aſſembling their powers togither, came towards Newcaſtell, whither the king from Yorke was remoued, and now hearing of their approch, he got him to Tinmouth, where the quéene laie, and vnderſtanding there that Newcaſtell was taken by the lords, he leauing the quéene behind him, tooke ſhipping, and ſailed from thence with his dearelie beloued familiar the earle of Cornewall, vnto Scarbourgh, where he left him in the caſtell, and rode himſelfe towards Warwike. The lords hearing where the earle of Cornwall was, made thither with all ſpéed, and beſieging the caſtell, at length conſtreined their enimie to yéeld himſelfe into their hands, requiring no other condition, but that he might come to the kings preſence to talke with him.

The king hearing that his beſt beloued familiar was thus apprehended, ſent to the lords, requiring them to ſpare his life, and that he might be brought to his preſence, promiſing withall that he would ſée them fullie ſatiſfied in all their requeſts againſt him. Wherevpon the earle of Penbroke perſuaded with the barons to grant to the kings deſire, vndertaking vpon forfeiture of all that he had, to bring him to the king and backe againe to them, in ſuch ſtate and condition as he receiued him. When the barons had conſented to his motion, he tooke the earle of Cornewall with him to bring him where the king laie; and comming to Dedington, left him there in ſafe kéeping with his ſeruants, whileſt he for one night went to viſit his wife, lieng not farre from thence.

The earle of Penbroks ſuit to the other lords.

The ſame night it chanced, that Guie erle of Warwike came to the verie place where the erle of Cornwall was left, and taking him from his kéepers, brought him vnto Warwike, where incontinentlie it was thought beſt to put him to death, but that ſome doubting the kings diſpleaſure, aduiſed the reſidue to ſtaie; and ſo they did, till at length an ancient graue man amongſt them exhorted them to vſe the occaſion now offered, and not to let ſlip the meane to deliuer the realme of ſuch a dangerous perſon, that had wrought ſo much miſchéefe, and might turne them all to ſuch perill, as afterwards they ſhould not be able to auoid, nor find ſhift how to remedie it. And thus perſuaded by his words, they cauſed him ſtreitwaies to be brought forth to a place called Blackelow, otherwiſe named by moſt writers, Gauerſlie heath, where he had his head ſmitten from his ſhoulders, the twentith day of Iune being tueſdaie. A iuſt reward for ſo ſcornefull and contemptuous a merchant, as in reſpect of himſelfe (bicauſe he was in the princes fauour) eſteemed the Nobles of the land as men of ſuch inferioritie, as that in compariſon of him they deſerued no little iot or mite of honour. But lo the vice of ambition, accompanied with a rable of other outrages, euen a reprochfull end, with an euerlaſting marke of infamie, which he pulled by violent meanes on himſelfe with the cords of his owne lewdneſſe, and could not eſcape this fatall fall: for

The earle of Cornwall beheaded.

When the king had knowledge hereof, he was wonderfullie diſpleaſed with thoſe lords that had thus put the ſaid earle vnto death, making his vow that he would ſée his death reuenged, ſo that the rancour which before was kindled betwixt the king and thoſe lords, began now to blaſe abroad, and ſpred ſo farre, that the king euer ſought occaſion how to worke them diſpleaſure. This yeare, the thirtéenth of Nouember, the kings eldeſt ſonne named Edward (which ſuccéeded his father in the kingdome by the name of Edward the third) was borne at Windſore. King Edward now after that the foreſaid Piers Gaueſton the earle of Cornewall was dead, nothing reformed his maners, but as one that deteſted the counſell and admonition of his Nobles, choſe ſuch to be about him, and to be of his priuie councell, which were knowne to be men of corrupt and moſt wicked liuing (as the writers of that age report) amongſt theſe were two of the Spenſers, Hugh the father, and Hugh the ſonne, which were notable inſtruments to bring him vnto the liking of all kind of naughtie and euill rule.

By the counſell therefore of theſe Spenſers, he was wholie lead and gouerned: wherewith manie were much offended, but namelie Robert the archbiſhop of Canturburie, who foreſaw what miſchéefe was like to inſue: and therefore to prouide ſome remedie in time, he procured that a parlement was called at London. In the which manie good ordinances and ſtatutes were deuiſed and eſtabliſhed, to oppreſſe the riots, miſgouernance, and other miſchéefes which as then were vſed: and to kéepe thoſe ordinances, the king firſt, and after his lords receiued a ſolemne oth, that in no wiſe neither he nor they ſhould breake them. By this means was the ſtate of the realme newlie reſtored, and new councellours placed about the king. But he neither regarding what he had ſworne, neither weieng the force of an oth, obſerued afterwards none of thoſe things, which by his oth he had bound himſelfe to obſerue. And no maruell: for ſuerlie (as it ſhould ſéeme by report of Thomas de la More) the lords wreſted him too much, and beyond the bounds of reaſon, cauſing him to receiue to be about him whome it pleaſed them to appoint. For the yoonger Spenſer, who in place of the earle of Cornwall was ordeined to be his chamberlaine, it was knowne to them well inough, that the king bare no good will at all to him at the firſt, though afterwards through the prudent policie, and diligent induſtrie of the man, he quicklie crept into his fauour, and that further than thoſe that preferred him could haue wiſhed.

But now to our purpoſe. About the ſame time, to wit, vpon the eleauenth of Maie, the aforeſaid Robert archbiſhop of Canturburie departed this life, ninetéene yeares after his firſt entrance into the gouernment of that ſée. After him was Walter biſhop of Worceſter tranſlated vnto the ſée of Canturburie, and was the nine and fortith archbiſhop that had ruled the ſame. ¶ Alſo William the archbiſhop of Yorke deceaſſed, and one William Melton ſuccéeded him the two & fortith archbiſhop that had gouerned that ſée. This archbiſhop Melton, though he was moſt ſtudious of things perteining to religion, beſtowing almoſt his whole time about the ſame, yet neuertheleſſe he was not forgetfull of that which belonged to the aduancement of the commonwealth, and therefore being at London vpon a time, Simon the elect biſhop of Whitherne came to Yorke, that he might be conſecrated of him: wherefore this archbiſhop gaue commandement to Iohn the biſhop of Carleill, to conſecrate the ſaid Simon, and in his name to receiue of him his oth of obedience, which commandement the ſaid biſhop of Carleill did dulie execute.

The king of England paſſeth into Scotland.

King Edward to be reuenged herof, with a mightie armie brauelie furniſhed, and gorgiouſlie appareled, more ſéemelie for a triumph, than méet to incounter with the cruell enimie in the field, entred Scotland, in purpoſe ſpeciallie to reſcue the caſtell of Sterling, as then beſieged by the Scotiſhmen. But at his approching néere to the ſame, Robert Bruce was readie with his power to giue him battell. In the which king Edward nothing doubtfull of loſſe, had ſo vnwiſelie ordered his people, and confounded their ranks, that euen at the firſt ioining, they were not onelie beaten downe and ouerthrowne, by thoſe that coped with them at hand, but alſo were wounded with ſhot a farre off, by thoſe their enimies which ſtood behind to ſuccour their fellowes when néed required, ſo that in the end the Engliſhmen fled to ſaue their liues, and were chaſed and ſlaine by the Scots in great number.

The king of England hauing eſcaped from this battell, which was fought on Midſummer day in the yéere aforeſaid, came to Yorke, where he held a councell of his lords, to haue their aduiſe by what means he might beſt reſtore his armie, and reuenge the loſſe which he had ſuſteined at the hands of his enimie R. Bruce. And ſhortlie after was ſir Peter Spalding ſent vnto Berwike, with a crew of ſouldiers to defend the towne againſt the ſaid Bruce, who intended ſhortlie to laie ſiege to that towne, as the king had certeine vnderſtanding. Alſo the Scotiſhmen aduanced highlie in their minds for the late gotten victorie, paſſed ouer into Ireland, vnder the conduct of Edward Bruce, the brother of Robert Bruce, ſore afflicting that countrie, by ſpoile, ſword, and fire: the villages were robbed, the townes and caſtels which they wan were ſacked, and after fired, ſo vtterlie to deface them.

The Iriſhmen being put in great feare herewith, aſſembled togither, and ioined themſelues with ſuch Engliſhmen as laie there in garriſons; ouer the which the lord Iohn Bermingham as deputie had the chéefe charge. Thus being ioined togither, they made earneſt reſiſtance againſt the attempts of their enimies in defenſe of the countrie. And ſo by that means they warred and fought one againſt an other, with great ſlaughter on both ſides, the Scotiſhmen on their part dooing their beſt to obteine the gouernement of the countrie, hauing alreadie obteined no ſmall portion thereof, and created Edward Bruce king there; and the Iriſhmen on the other part, inforcing their whole indeuor to beat the enimie backe, and to rid him out of the countrie. But at length the inuincible obſtinatneſſe of the Iriſhmen preuailed, through aid of the Engliſhmen (as after ſhall appeare.) The Scots not onelie thus inuaded Ireland, but alſo continued their rage againſt England. For the ſame yeare about the feaſt of Peter and Paule, they entered into the biſhoprike of Durham, & ſpoiled the countrie vnto Hartilpoole, which towne they robbed of all the goods which they there found, the inhabitants being fled with their ſhips to the ſea. About Maudlentide following, the king of Scots entred England with a mightie armie on the weſt borders, and comming to Carleill beſieged the citie, remaining before it ten daies, but they within ſo valiantlie defended themſelues and their wals, that the Scots loſt more than they wan, ſauing that during their abode at this ſiege, they robbed and waſted the countries of Allerdale, Copeland, and Weſtmerland. The 11 day after their comming thither, when they had aſſaied all their force and policie to win the citie, and ſaw themſelues nothing to preuaile, but to loſe their men and trauell, they raiſed their field, and returned into Scotland with diſhonor, leauing behind them all their engines of warre, ſo that beſides the diſhonour which he ſuſteined by the repulſe, in lieu of lucre he ſuffered loſſe, and therefore this leſſon by exemplification would be learned and practiſed, that

This yeare there fell excéeding great raine and abundance of wet, in the moneths of Iulie and Auguſt, that the huſbandmen of the countrie could not get in that ſmall crop which then ſtood on the ground, and that which they inned, yéelded not the hoped quantitie, as when it came to the threſhing well appeared. ¶ On the day of the Aſſumption of our ladie, Iohn the kings ſecond ſonne was borne at Eltham. ¶ A knight of Lancaſhire called ſir Adam Baniſter raiſed war in this yeare of king Edwards reigne, againſt his lord the earle of Lancaſter; but about the feaſt of ſaint Martine he was taken and beheaded. ¶ Alſo this yeare, Edward de Bruce brother to the king of Scots, entred into the north parts of Vlneſter with a great armie, vpon the day of S. Alſo in the ninth yeare of king Edwards reigne, before Chriſtmaſſe, a blaſing ſtarre or comet appeared in the north part of the element, by the ſpace of a moneth togither, and after followed dearth and death (as after ſhall appeare.) Guie earle of Warwike, a man of great counſell and ſkilfull prouidence, departed this life this yeare, and was buried at the abbeie of Bordiſley. ¶ About Midſummer the Scots eftſoones entred into England, doing much miſchéefe with fire and ſword, in like ſort as they had vſed to doo before time, not ſparing (as ſome write) ſo much as thoſe houſes wherin women laie in childbed. At their comming to Richmond, the gentlemen of the countrie that were got into the caſtell to defend it, compounded with the enimies for a great ſumme of monie, to ſpare the towne and countrie about it, without dooing further damage thereto at that iournie.

The Scots hauing receiued the monie, turned their march toward the weſt parts, and iournieng thréeſcore miles, came to Fourneis, burning all the countrie thereabouts, and tooke awaie with them all the goods and priſoners, both men and women which they might laie hands on, and ſo returned, reioiſing moſt of ſuch iron as they had got in that iournie, for they had great want in Scotland of that kind of metall in thoſe daies. The dearth by reaſon of the vnſeaſonable weather in the ſummer and harueſt laſt paſt ſtill increaſed, for that which with much adoo was inned, after when it came to the proofe, yéelded nothing to the value of that which in ſheafe it ſéemed to conteine, ſo that wheat and other graine which was at a ſore price before, now was inhanced to a farre higher rate, the ſcarſitie thereof being ſo great, that a quarter of wheat was ſold for fortie ſhillings, which was a great price, if we ſhall conſider the allaie of monie then currant. ¶ Alſo by reaſon of the murren that fell among cattell, béefes and muttons were vnreaſonablie priced.

About this ſeaſon, the lord Henrie Beaumont a man of high valiancie and noble courage, hauing gotten togither a power of men, entred into Scotland, and after he had taken great booties and ſpoiles in the countrie, he being intrapped by ſir Iames Dowglas, loſt the moſt part of his men, togither with the prey which they had gotten. The diſpleaſure of theſe miſhaps was increaſed with the naughtie and bold preſumption of ſir Gilbert Middleton knight, who being offended that maiſter Lewes Beaumount was preferred vnto the biſhops ſée of Durham, and Henrie Stamford put from it, that was firſt elected and after diſplaced by the kings ſuit made vnto the pope, tooke the ſaid Lewes Beaumont and his brother Henrie on Wingleſdon moore néere vnto Darington, leading the biſhop to Morpath, and his brother the lord Beaumont vnto the caſtell of Mitford, and ſo deteined them as priſoners, till they had redéemed their libertie with great ſums of monie. Herewith the ſaid ſir Gilbert being aduanced in pride, proclaimed himſelfe duke of Northumberland, and ioining in fréendſhip with Robert Bruce the Scotiſh king, cruellie deſtroied the countie of Richmond. With ſuch traitorous parts William Felton, and Thomas Heton, being not a little ſtirred, firſt wan by force the caſtell of Mitford, and after apprehended ſir Gilbert Middleton, with his companion Walter Selbie, and ſent them vp to London, where ſhortlie after they were drawne, hanged and quartered.

Some write that the ſaid ſir Gilbert was put to death for robbing two cardinals, to wit, Gancellino the popes chancellour, and Lucas de Fliſco, that were ſent from pope Iohn the two and twentith, to conſecrate the foreſaid Lewes Beaumont biſhop of Durham, and to intreat a peace betwixt the realms of England and Scotland, and alſo to make an agréement betwixt the king and the earle of Lancaſter. The which being met with vpon Wingleſdon moore in Yorkeſhire by the ſaid Gilbert, were robbed of ſuch ſtuffe & treaſure as they brought with them, but yet eſcaped themſelues and came to Durham, and from thence ſent meſſengers to Robert Bruce, to perſuade him to ſome agréement. But whereas he would not condeſcend to any reaſonable conditions of peace at that time, they determined to go into Scotland to talke with him themſelues: but before they came to the borders, king Robert, who iudged it not to ſtand with his profit to haue any peace in that ſeaſon, ſent certeine of his people to forbid the cardinals the entrie of his realme. The cardinals being thus iniuriouſlie handled, pronounced the Scots by their legantine power accurſed; and interdicted their whole realme. And bicauſe they ſaw nothing leſſe than any hope to doo good with king Robert touching any compoſition or agréement to be had, they returned againe to the pope, without any concluſion of that for the which they were ſent.

In this ſeaſon vittels were ſo ſcant and déere, and wheat and other graine brought to ſo high a price, that the poore people were conſtreined thorough famine to eat the fleſh of horſſes, dogs, and other vile beaſts, which is woonderfull to beléeue, and yet for default there died a great multitude of people in diuers places of the land. Foure pence in bread of the courſer ſort would not ſuffice one man a daie. Wheat was ſold at London for foure marks the quarter and aboue. Then after this dearth and ſcarſitie of vittels inſued a great death and mortalitie of people, ſo that what by warre of the Scots, and what by this mortalitie and death, the people of the land were woonderfullie waſted and conſumed. O pitifull depopulation!

Edward Bruce before the feaſt of Eaſter returned againe into Ireland, with the earle of Murrey and other noble men of Scotland, hauing with them a great armie, and beſieged the caſtell of Knockfergus, and after they went to another caſtell where they tooke a baron priſoner: & there Edward Bruce laie for a ſeaſon. Alſo Richard earle of Vlneſter lay in ſaint Maries abbie by Dublin, where the maior and communaltie of the citie tooke him, and put him in priſon within the caſtell of Dublin. Anno Reg. 13.

In this ſeaſon, to wit, in the yeare 1319, a great murreine and death of cattell chanced through the whole realme, ſpreading from place to place, but ſpeciallie this yeare it reigned moſt in the north, where as in the yeares before it began in the ſouth parts. The king deſirous to be reuenged of the Scots, made preparation to leuie a mightie armie; and for want of ſufficient numbers of men in other places towards the north parts, the king cauſed much people to come vnto him out of the ſouth and eaſt parts of the realme, amongſt the which the citie of London was conſtreined to find at their coſts and charges two hundred men, ſending them to Yorke, where the generall aſſemblie of the armie was made. From thence, after he had receiued his men from ſundrie countries and good townes of his realme, he went to Berwike, & laid ſiege to the towne. In which meane time the Scots being aſſembled, came to the borders, paſſed by the Engliſh hoſt, and entring into England, came in ſecreet wiſe downe into the marches of Yorkeſhire, and there ſlue the people, and robbed them in moſt cruell wiſe.

Wherefore the archbiſhop of Yorke, meaning in time of ſuch neceſſitie to doo his indeuour in defenſe of his countrie, aſſembled ſuch power as he could get togither, of clearkes, moonks, canons, and other ſpirituall men of the church, with huſbandmen and ſuch other vnapt people for the warres: and thus with a great number of men, and few warlike or diſcreet cheefeteins, he togither with the biſhop of Elie, as then lord chancellour, came foorth againſt the Scots, and incountred with them at a place called Mitton vpon Suale, the twelfth day of October. Here as the Engliſhmen paſſed ouer the water of Suale, the Scots ſet fire vpon certeine ſtacks of haie, the ſmoke whereof was ſo huge, that the Engliſhmen might not ſee where the Scots laie. And when the Engliſhmen were once got ouer the water, the Scots came vpon them with a wing in good order of battell, in faſhion like to a ſheeld, egerlie aſſailing their enimies, who for lacke of good gouernement were eaſilie beaten downe and diſcomfited, without ſhewing any great reſiſtance: ſo that there were ſlaine to the both of the lords and commons, as euer in times paſt was Péers de Gaueſton the late earle of Cornwall. But the lords minded not ſo much the deſtruction of theſe Spenſers, but that the king ment as much their aduancement, ſo that Hugh the ſonne was made high chamberleine of England, contrarie to the mind of all the noblemen, by reaſon whereof he bare himſelfe ſo hautie and proud, that no lord within the land might gainſaie that which in his conceit ſéemed good.

Additions to N. Triuet.

In this thirtéenth yeare of his reigne, in Iune king Edward went ouer into France, where at Amiens he found the French king, of whome he receiued the countie of Pontieu, which the ſaid French king vpon his comming to the crowne had ſeized into his hands, bicauſe the king of England had not doone to him his homage due for the ſame. Alſo this yeare the pope granted to the king of England the tenth of eccleſiaſticall reuenues for one yeare, as before that time he had likewiſe doone. ¶ About this ſeaſon, pope Iohn, being informed of the great deſtruction and vnmercifull warre which the Scots made vpon the Engliſhmen, and namelie for that they ſpared neither church nor chapell, abbeie nor priorie, he ſent a generall ſentence vnder his bulles of lead vnto the archbiſhop of Canturburie and Yorke, appointing them that if Robert le Bruce the Scotiſh king would not recompenſe king Edward for all ſuch harmes as the realme of England had by him ſuſteined, and alſo make reſtitution of the goods that had béene taken out of churches and monaſteries, they ſhould pronounce the ſame ſentence againſt him and his complices.

Scots eftſoons accurſed

Wherevpon when the Scots tooke no regard to the popes admonition, the archbiſhop procéeded to the pronouncing of the foreſaid ſentence, ſo that Robert Bruce, Iames Dowglas, and Thomas Randulfe earle of Murrey, and all other that kept him companie, or them in any wiſe mainteined, were accurſed throughout England euerie day at maſſe thrée times. Howbeit, this nothing holpe the matter, but put the king and the realme to great coſt and charge, and in the meane ſeaſon the commons of the realme were ſore oppreſſed by ſundrie waies and means, diuerſe of them loſt their goods and poſſeſſions, being taken from them vpon ſurmiſed and feined quarels, ſo that manie were vtterlie vndoone, and a few ſingular and miſordered perſons were aduanced.

The Scots inuade England.

After the Epiphanie, when the truce failed betwixt the two realmes of England and Scotland, an armie of Scots entred England, and came into the biſhoprike of Durham. The earle of Murrey ſtaied at Darington, but Iames Dowglas and the ſteward of Scotland went forth to waſte the countrie, the one towards Hartlepoole and Cleueland, and the other towards Richmond: but they of the countie of Richmond (as before they had doone) gaue a great ſumme of monie to ſaue their countrie from inuaſion. The Scots at that time remained within England by the ſpace of fiftéene daies or more. The knights and gentlemen of the north parts did come vnto the earle of Lancaſter that laie the ſame time at Pomfret, offering to go forth with him to giue the enimies battell, if he would aſſiſt them: but the earle ſéemed that he had no luſt to fight in defenſe of his prince, that ſought to oppreſſe him wrongfullie (as he tooke it) and therefore he diſſembled the matter, and ſo the Scots returned at their pleaſure without encounter.

Thom. Walſ.

About this ſeaſon, the lord William de Bruce that in the marches of Wales enioied diuerſe faire poſſeſſions to him deſcended from his anceſtors, but through want of good gouernement was run behind hand, offered to ſell a certeine portion of his lands called Gowers land lieng in the marches there, vnto diuerſe noble men that had their lands adioining to the ſame, as to the earle of Hereford, and to the two lords Mortimers, the vncle & nephue, albeit the lord Mowbraie that had maried the onelie daughter and heire of the lord Bruce, thought verelie in the end to haue had it, as due to his wife by right of inheritance. But at length (as vnhap would) Hugh Spenſer the yoonger lord chamberleine, coueting that land (bicauſe it laie néere on each ſide to other lands that he had in thoſe parts) found ſuch means through the kings furtherance and helpe, that he went awaie with the purchaſe, to the great diſpleaſure of the other lords that had béene in hand to buie it.

The chéefe cauſe of the variance betwixt yͤ lords and the Spenſers.

Hereby ſuch hartburning roſe againſt the Spenſers, that vpon complaint made by the erle of Hereford vnto the earle of Lancaſter, of their preſumptuous dealing, by ruling all things about the king as ſéemed beſt to their likings, it was thought expedient by the ſaid earles that ſome remedie in time (if it were poſſible) ſhould be prouided. Wherevpon the ſaid earls of Lancaſter and Hereford, with the lords Roger Tuchet, Roger Clifford, Iocelin Deieuille, Roger Bernſfield, the two Mortimers, Roger the vncle and Roger the nephue, William de Sullie, William de Elmbrige, Iohn Gifford of Brimeſfield, and Henrie Tieis, all barons; the which with diuerſe other lords and knights, and men of name, aſſembling togither at Shierborne in Elmedone, ſware each of them to ſtand by other, till they had amended the ſtate of the realme. But yet notwithſtanding this their oth, the moſt part of them afterwards forſaking the enterpriſe, ſubmitted themſelues to the king.

Neuertheleſſe, whether for that the king by a proclamation ſet forth the ſixtéenth of March, had commanded (as ſome write) that the lords Mowbraie,

Clifford,

The lords take armes vpon them againſt the Spenſers.

Clifford, and Deiuille for diſobeieng to make their perſonall appearance before him, ſhould auoid the land within ten daies next inſuing, or for that they meant with all ſpéed to put their enterpriſe in execution, we find that the earle of Hereford, the lords Mortimer, the vncle and nephue, the lord Roger Damorie, the lord Iohn Mowbraie, the lord Hugh Audelie, and his ſonne named alſo Hugh, the lord Clifford, the lord Iohn Gifford of Brimeſfield, the lord Morice Berkeley, the lord Henrie Tieis, the lord Iohn Matrauers, with manie other that were alied togither, hauing the conſent alſo of the earle of Lancaſter, on the wedneſdaie next after the feaſt of the Inuention of the croſſe, hauing with them to the number of eigth hundred men of armes, fiue hundred hoblers, and ten thouſand men on foot, came with the kings banner ſpread vnto Newport in Wenloks lands, where they tooke the caſtell that belonged vnto the lord chamberleine Hugh Spenſer the yoonger.

They inuade the Spenſers lands.

They alſo tooke Kaerdie, Kerſillie, Lantriſſane, Taluan, Lamblethian, Kenefegis, Neoth, Druſſelan, and Diuenor; part of his men which in the foreſaid places they found, they ſlue, as ſir Iohn Iwain, and ſir Matthew de Gorges knights, with 15 other of his men that were Welſhmen: part they tooke and put them in priſon, as ſir Raſe or Randulfe de Gorges being ſore wounded, ſir Philip Ioice, ſir Iohn de Friſſingfield, ſir Iohn de Dunſtable, William de Dunſtable, and manie other, of the which the moſt part were put to their ranſome. They tooke, ſpoiled and deſtroied ſo much in value of his goods as amounted vnto two thouſand pounds. They tooke vp in ſuch debts as were owing to him in thoſe parts, to the ſumme of thrée thouſand pounds, and of his rents to the value néere hand of a thouſand pounds. They burnt 23 of his manors which he had in thoſe parts of Wales, with his barnes, and did what hurt they could deuiſe, burning or taking awaie all his writings and euidences. After they had remained 15 daies there, they came into England, with the like force and diſorder inuading his caſtels, manors and poſſeſſions, ſo that the damage which they did here vnto the ſaid lord chamberleine, amounted to the value of ten thouſand pounds.

The king ſendeth to the lords.

The lord Badeliſmere reuolteth to the ſide of the barons.

The king aduertiſed of their doings, ſent vnto them the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and the lord Bartholomew de Badeliſmere lord ſteward of his houſe, to requeſt them to deſiſt and leaue off from ſuch their outragious doings, and comming to the parlement which he had alreadie ſummoned, they might put in their complaints and grieuances, & he would ſée that they ſhould haue iuſtice, according as equitie ſhould require. The lord Badeliſmere forſaking the king, became one of the confederacie with the barons, and ſo the archbiſh. was glad to returne alone, leauing the L. Badeliſmere behind him, who ſent the king word by the archbiſhop, that till they had expelled the Spenſers out of the realme, they would not giue ouer their enterpriſe. On ſaint Barnabies day they came to a manour of Hugh Spenſer the father called Faſterne, in the countie of Wiltſhire, and ſpoiled the ſame with diuerſe and manie other manors, aſwell in Wiltſhire, as elſe where, to wit, in Gloceſterſhire, Dorſetſhire, Hamſhire, Barkeſhire, Oxfordſhire, Buckinghamſhire, Surrie, Cambridgeſhire, Huntingtonſhire, Leiceſterſhire, Lincolneſhire, Cheſhire, and Warwikeſhire, making ſuch hauocke of all ſuch goods or cattell as belonged to the ſaid Hugh Spenſer the father, that he was thought to be indamaged to the value of thirtie thouſand pounds, burning his houſes, beating, maiming and ranſoming his men.

Furthermore not contented to ſpoile thoſe places which belonged to him, but hearing that in the abbeie of Stanlie he had laid vp monie and euidences, they brake into that abbeie, and tooke out thereof a thouſand pounds in readie coine, beſide euidences and writings, to the indamaging of him to the value of ſix thouſand pounds, and likewiſe entring into the caſtell of Marleburgh, where the ſaid Hugh Spenſer the father had laid vp in wooll to the number of 36 ſacks, they tooke the ſame and other of his goods, as well in plate as apparell, to the value in all of ſix thouſand pounds. And they did not onelie ſpoile the poſſeſſions, houſes, goods, and cattels of the two Spenſers, whereſoeuer they could heare that the ſame were to be found, but alſo they vſed the like diſorder againſt all ſuch as were knowne to be friends or wellwillers to either the father or ſonne, ſending commiſſions vnto ſuch as ſhould ſée the ſame executed to the moſt extremitie, ſo that in this rage of enuie and hot reuenge there was no parcialitie, but that one with another, the innocent with the nocent, the guiltleſſe with the guiltie went to wracke, and (as the old prouerbe ſaith concurring with common practiſe finallie, after they had ſatiſfied their deſires in ſuch riotous ſort, they raiſed the people, and conſtreined them to ſweare to be of their accord, and ſo came forward with the like force towards the parlement that was ſummoned to be holden at London thrée wéeks after Midſummer. At their comming to S. Albons, they ſent the biſhops of London, Saliſburie, Elie, Hereford, and Chicheſter, to the king with their humble ſuit in outward apperance, though in effect and verie déed more preſumptuous than was requiſite. Their chéefe requeſt was that it might pleaſe his highneſſe to put from him the Spenſers, whoſe counſell they knew to be greatlie againſt his honour, and hereof not to faile if he tendered the quiet of his realme. They alſo required letters patents of him, conteining a generall pardon for the indemnitie of themſelues, and all thoſe that had béene in armes with them, ſo as they ſhould not be impeached by the king for any tranſgreſſions paſt or preſent, in time hereafter to come.

They ſend to the king.

Their requeſts.

The kings anſwer.

The king hereunto anſwered, that as concerning Hugh Spenſer the father, he was abroad on his buſines beyond the ſeas, and that Hugh the ſonne was on the ſea for the ſafe kéeping of the cinque ports, as by his office he was bound, and that they ought not by any right or cuſtome to be baniſhed, before they haue made anſwere to the crimes obiected againſt them. He added further, that their requeſt wanted foundation of law and reaſon. And if it might be proued that the Spenſers had in any wiſe offended againſt the ſtatutes and ordinances of the land, they were alwaies readie to make their anſwere as the lawes of the realme ſhould require. Laſtlie he added this with an oth, that he would not be forſworne contrarie to that which at his coronation he had taken vpon him by oth, through granting letters of peace and pardon to ſuch notorious offendors in contempt of his perſon, and to the trouble and diſquieting of the whole realme.

The order which the lord maior of London tooke.

The barons vpon knowledge had what anſwer the king made to their requeſts, forthwith got them to armour, and with a great power of men of armes and other, came to the parlement, which the king had ſummoned to begin at Weſtminſter thrée wéekes after Midſummer. Their retinue were apparelled in a ſute of iakets or coats of colours demie, partie yellow and gréene, with a band of white caſt ouerthwart. By reaſon whereof that parlement long after was called The parlement of white bands. Then to ſée the kings peace kept within the citie, the maior cauſed a thouſand men well armed to watch dailie in diuerſe wards, & at diuerſe gates of the citie, which watch began at foure of the clocke in the morning, and ſo continued till ſix at night, and then as manie were appointed to the night watch, continuing the ſame till the houre of fiue in the morning. And for the more ſuertie that this night watch ſhould be well and ſufficientlie kept, two aldermen were aſſigned nightlie to ride about the citie with certeine officers of the towne, to ſée the watchmen well and diſcréetlie guided. The gates were ſhut at nine of the clocke & opened againe at ſeauen in the morning. Alſo euerie citizen was warned to haue his armour by him, that he might be readie vpon anie occaſion when he ſhould be called.

Mat. VVeſt.

Neuertheleſſe the barons being come in forceable wiſe (as yée haue heard) vnto this parlement, they conſtreined the earle of Richmond, Arundell, Warren, and Penbroke, to agrée vnto their purpoſe; and likewiſe ſome of the biſhops they compelled through feare to take an oth to ioine with them in their purpoſe, for the expelling of the Spenſers out of the realme, and ſo comming all togither before the king, they publiſhed certeine articles againſt the ſaid Spenſers, both the father and ſonne, wherevpon they made an award, that they ſhould be diſherited and baniſhed the land during their liues, if by the king and conſent of all the lords in parlement aſſembled, they ſhould not be reſtored. They had day and place appointed where to paſſe forth of the land, to wit, at Douer, and not elſewhere, betwixt the daie of his award made, and the feaſt of the decollation of ſaint Iohn Baptiſt, that day to be counted for one. Diuers articles (as before is ſaid) were laid to the charge of thoſe Spenſers.

The Spenſers baniſhed by the decrée of the barons.

Articles wherwith the barons charged the Spēſers.

1 Amongſt other things it was alledged; Firſt that Hugh Spenſer the ſonne, being on a time angrie and diſpleaſed with the king, ſought to allie and confederate himſelfe with the lord Gifford of Brimeſfield, and the lord Richard Gray to haue conſtreined and forced the king by ſtrong hand to haue followed his will and pleaſure.

2 Secondlie it was alledged, that the ſaid Spenſers as well the father as the ſonne, had cauſed the king to ride into Gloceſterſhire, to oppreſſe and deſtroie the good people of his land, contrarie to the forme of the great charter.

3 Thirdlie, that where the earle of Hereford, and the lord Mortimer of Wigmore, had gone againſt one Thlewillin Bren, who had raiſed a rebellion againſt the king in Glamorganſhire, whiles the lands of the earle of Gloceſter were in the kings hands, the ſame Thlewillin yéelded himſelfe to the ſaid earle, and to the lord Mortimer, who brought him to the king, vpon promiſe that he ſhould haue the kings pardon, and ſo the king receiued him. But after that the ſaid earle and lord Mortimer were out of the land, the Spenſers taking to them roiall power, tooke the ſaid Thlewillin and led him vnto Kardif, where after that the ſaid Hugh Spenſer the ſonne had his purpartie of the ſaid earle of Gloceſters lands, he cauſed the ſaid Thlewillin to be drawne, headed and quartered, to the diſcredit of the king, and of the ſaid earle of Hereford and lord Mortimer, yea and contrarie to the lawes and dignitie of the imperiall crowne.

4 Fourthlie, the ſaid Spenſers counſelled the king to foreiudge ſir Hugh Audlie, ſonne to the lord Hugh Audlie, and to take into his hands his caſtels and poſſeſſions. They compaſſed alſo to haue atteinted the lord Roger Damorie, that thereby they might haue enioied the whole earledome of Gloceſter.

Theſe and other articles of miſdemeanour in the Spenſers were exhibited, to perſuade the king and others, that they were vnprofitable members in the common-wealth, and not worthie of thoſe places which they occupied. Now after that their diſheriting and baniſhment was concluded in manner as before is ſaid, the earle of Hereford and other the lords that had proſecuted the quarell againſt them, came before the king, and humblie on their knées beſought him of pardon for all things which they had committed againſt him, his lawes, or any other perſon in the purſuit of the ſaid Spenſers. The king, being brought into a ſtreict, durſt not but grant vnto all that which they requeſted, eſtabliſhing the ſame by ſtatute.

The king goeth to Canturburie.

The parlement being thus ended, the king and quéene went to Canturburie, there to viſit the ſhrine of Thomas Becket ſomtime archbiſhop there. From thence he went to the Ile of Tenet, that he might méet with his deare & welbeloued councellour Hugh Spenſer the yoonger, whome he had of late ſent in ambaſſage vnto the French king, and now being returned by ſea into thoſe parts, he was deſirous to ſée him, that he might haue conference with him: and ſo comming togither, they ſpent certeine daies in commoning of ſuch matters as they thought good. The king calling to him the mariners of the cinque ports, committed to them the cuſtodie of the ſaid Hugh, who for a time kept him with them in their ſhips, and the king ſailing alongſt the coaſt to Porcheſter, conferred with him of manie things.

He commeth to talke with the lord chamberlaine.

From Porcheſter the king ment to returne vnto London, there to méet the quéene, who in hir returne from Canturburie would haue lodged one night in the caſtell of Léeds, which the lord Bartholomew de Badeliſmere late ſteward of the kings houſe had by exchange of the king for other lands, and now taking part with the barons, had left his wife and children with other of his fréends and treaſure in the ſame caſtell. Thoſe that were put in truſt with kéeping this caſtell, would neither permit quéene nor other to enter therein, without expreſſe commandement from their lord and maiſter, and ſo they ſignified not onelie to the quéenes ſeruants that came before to make prouiſion for hir, but alſo declared the ſame to hir ſelfe comming thither in perſon.

The quéene not ſuffered to lodge in the caſtell of Léeds.

This chanced verie vnluckilie for the barons: for where the quéene had euer ſought to procure peace, loue and concord betwixt the king and his lords, ſhée tooke ſuch diſpleaſure with this deniall made to hir for one nights lodging in that caſtell, that vpon hir gréeuous complaint ſent to the king, he forthwith raiſed a mightie armie out of Kent and Eſſex, from the cinque ports, and of the Londoners, and hauing with him his brethren, Thomas earle Marſhall, and Edmund earle of Kent, alſo the earls of Richmond, Penbroke, Arundell, and Atholl, he haſted thither, & laid ſiege about the caſtell; conſtreining them within by all meanes that might be deuiſed.

The king beſiegeth the caſtell of Léeds.

In the meane time, at the ſuit of the lord Badeliſmere, the earle of Hereford, and other lords of the confederacie, came with a great power vnto Kingſtone, about the feaſt of Simon and Iude, and there ſtaieng certeine daies for ſome of their companie that were to come vnto them, they ſent vnto the king the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and the biſhop of London, with the earle of Penbroke, requiring him to remooue his ſiege, till by parlement ſome order might be taken: but the king would not giue eare to their ſuit, but continued his ſiege till the caſtell was yéelded to him. For thoſe that were at Kingſtone cowardlie leuing their enterpriſe, came not forward, but returned backe againe. They that were within the caſtell, hauing ſimplie ſubmitted themſelues to the king, cauſed twelue or thirtéene of them to ſuffer death. Amongſt other was one Walter Culpepper reckoned for the chéefe of them that defended the caſtell againſt the king. The wife of the lord Badeliſmere, mere, with his nephue Bartholomew de Burwaſh was ſent to the tower of London, but his ſiſter was ſent to Douer caſtell, there to remaine in ſafe kéeping. The caſtell of Léeds being thus yéelded to the king, he entred the ſame on All halowes daie, and ſhortlie after the caſtell of Chilham was deliuered, and the caſtell of Tunbridge left void by them that had it in kéeping. The king thus beſtirring him, came into Eſſex, and ſeized into his hands the lands of the lord Badeliſmere, and likewiſe the lands of ſuch as were his mainteiners, abbettors, fréends, fauourers, and furtherers; of the which ſuch as he could méet with he put in priſon, and herewith ſummoned an armie to méet him at Cirenceſter about ſaint Lucies day the virgine. And then about ſaint Andrews tide he came to London, where the archbiſhop of Canturburie had called a prouinciall councell.

The lord chãberleine yéeldeth himſelfe to the law.

At the ſame time Hugh Spenſer the ſonne, being latelie come from the ſea, yéelded himſelfe priſoner to the kings ward, beſéeching the king that he might haue right miniſtred to him, concerning the wrongs and iniuries to him doone by the barons in maner as before ye haue heard, ſpeciallie for the award which in parlement they had procured to be enacted againſt him, the errours committed in the proceſſe, whereof he beſought the king that he might be admitted to ſhew: as firſt, in that they made themſelues iudges: ſecondlie, in that he was not called to anſwer: thirdlie, for that the ſame award was made without the aſſent of the prelats, who are péeres of the parlement as well as the temporall lords: fourthlie, in that the ſaid barons had no record in their purſuit vpon the cauſes conteined in that award: fiftlie, in that the award was made againſt the forme of the great charter of franchiſes, wherein is conteined that none ſhall be foreiudged nor deſtroied but by lawfull iudgement of his péers, according to the law of the land. Further, he alledged that it was to be conſidered, how the ſaid barons and great men being ſummoned to come in due maner vnto that parlement, they came in forceable wiſe with all their powers. A like petition was alſo exhibited on the behalfe of Hugh Spenſer the father, for redreſſe to be had of the wrongs and loſſes, which in like caſe he had ſuſteined.

Anno Reg. 15.

The king aſketh the opinions of the prelats.

The king fauouring inough the cauſes and petitions of the Spenſers, granted their requeſts, and deliuered the petitions vnto the archbiſhop of Canturburie and his ſuffragans, the which at the ſame time were there aſſembled in their prouinciall councell aforeſaid, requiring to haue their aduiſe and opinion therein. He likewiſe requeſted of the earles and barons that were then with him, and of the counſellers in law, what they thought of this matter. The prelats vpon deliberation had, declared that in their opinion, the ſaid award as touching the diſheriting and baniſhing of the Spenſers, the father and ſonne was erronious, and not rightlie decréed, and for themſelues they denied that they either did or could thinke it reaſon to conſent thereunto, and therefore they required that it might be repealed, and the kings brother Edmund earle of Kent, John de Britaine earle of Richmond, Aimer de Valence earle of Penbroke, and Edmund earle of Arundell, then being in preſence of the king, and likewiſe of the foreſaid prelats, affirmed that the ſaid award pronounced againſt the Spenſers was made contrarie to law and right, and therefore as the prelats requeſted, that the ſame might be repealed.

The declaration of the prelats.

The declaration of the earles.

Further, the ſaid earles alledged, that the aſſent which they gaue in the ſaid award, was for doubt of the vnlawfull force which the barons brought vnto the ſaid parlement, when they made that award, and for that the ſaid earles that now were with the king, had counſelled him to ſuffer the ſaid award to paſſe, for feare of the ſaid force, and confeſſed they had doone euill, and beſought him of pardon for their offenſes in ſo dooing. The king thus hauing cauſed the prelats, earles, barons, and lawiers there preſent to vtter their iudgements in maner aforeſaid, he iudiciallie reuoked and quite diſanulled the proceſſe of the ſaid award, made as well touching the baniſhment, as the diſheriting of the Spenſers, and reſtored them to his peace and allegiance, and to their former eſtates, in all conditions as they inioied the ſame before the making of the ſaid award, notwithſtanding certeine letters to the contrarie of the earle of Lancaſter, and other lords of his faction, which for the approuing and ratifieng of the ſaid proceſſe they directed vnder their ſeales to the king as yet remaining at London.

They wrote alſo to the prelats, iuſtices, and barons of the excheker, to induce the king to giue his aſſent to that which in the tenor of their letters was conteined. The earle of Hereford, the lord Roger Mortimer of Cherke, & the lord Roger Mortimer of Wigmore, entring the marches of Wales, came to Gloceſter, and tooke that citie. The caſtell was alſo deliuered vnto them by the conſtable thereof. The king hauing his people comming dailie vnto him, whereby his armie was hugelie increaſed, about the feaſt of ſaint Nicholas he ſet forth from London, and with him there went his brother Edmund earle of Kent, John earle of Richmond, Edmund earle of Arundell, and manie other great lords and barons. The quéene with hir children he left in the tower of London. The lord John de ſaint John comming to ſubmit himſelfe vnto the king, at the interceſſion of diuerſe noble men, with much adoo had his pardon at length granted him.

The king paſſing forward, ſeized into his hands the townes, caſtels, manors, and goods of them that were againſt him. But in the meane time the lord Henrie de Tieis, with certeine other that were entred into Gloceſterſhire (hearing that a great multitude of people was aſſembled out of the countrie of Cirenceſter by the kings commandement) came thither and chaſed them home to their houſes, putting them in feare of their liues, if they ſhould offer to reſiſt him. The king comming to Crikelade after the feaſt of ſaint Lucie the virgin, wrote to the earle of Lancaſter an anſwer of his letters, which he had receiued from him at London, modeſtlie reprouing him, for that he had ſo gréeuouſlie and vndutifullie reproched him, without reſpect had to his roiall eſtate, and alſo preſumed to aſſigne him a daie within the which he ſhould reforme thoſe things which he miſliked in him, as if he were his ſubiect and vnderling, & beſide this was now ioined with his aduerſaries againſt him, where on his behalfe there had béene no let nor ſtaie at any time, but that they might be fréends & remaine in quiet togither. Wherein though he did more than ſtood with the dignitie of his roiall title, in ſomuch as he had the earles life at his commandement, yet for that he tollerated ſuch inſolencie of behauiour, as was vnſéemelie to be ſhewed againſt the perſon of his prince, the kings clemencie and patience is highlie therein to be commended; though his forbearing and ſéeking means of quietneſſe did neuer a whit amend the malignant mind of the earle, whoſe hart was ſo inchanted with ambition and ſupereminent honour, that he quite forgat this good leſſon of ſubmiſſion and due allegiance, comming thither to ioine their powers with his. Thither came alſo a great ſtrength of footmen, part of the which vnder the leading of one Robert Aquarij, a right famous capteine, tooke the caſtell of Bronfield, thoſe that had the keeping of it fleeing foorth of it. The king comming to Worceſter about Newyeres tide, cauſed the walles of the citie to be repared, committing the cuſtodie thereof vnto William de Longchampe. After the Epiphanie he paſſed on the ſide of Seuerne towards Shrewſburie, where, at his comming thither he was honourablie receiued by the burgeſſes that came foorth to meet him in armor, and ſo conueied him into their towne being ſtronglie fenſed. In this meane time the Scots now that the truce was ended, entring with a ſtrong power into England, deſtroied all the countrie to Newcaſtell vpon Tine with fire and ſword. The Welſhmen with their capteine Griffin Loitis tooke the caſtels in Wales, which were kept by the people of the lord Mortimer the elder. They tooke alſo the caſtels of Mole, Chirke, and Olono, the keepers whereof comming vnto the king to Shrewſburie ſubmitted themſelues to him, who ſhortlie after ſent them to the tower of London. The lord Hugh Audelie the elder, the lord Iohn de Haſtings, and diuerſe other comming in, and ſubmitting themſelues to the king were likewiſe committed to ward. The lord Roger Damorie entring into the citie of Worceſter deſtroied all that which the K. had appointed to be doone, about the fortification thereof.

The earle of Lãcaſter writeth to the erle of Hereford.

The earle of Hereford cõmeth to ioine with the earle of Lancaſter.

The earle of Lancaſter lieng at Pomfret, and hearing of all this buſineſſe, wrote to the earle of Hereford, and other lords that were with him, that they ſhould make haſt to come to him at Pomfret, promiſing from thenceforth to be their generall and leader. The earle of Hereford reioiſing at theſe newes, togither with all thoſe that were about him, leauing Gloceſter and all other ſtrengths which they held in thoſe parts, ſet forward to paſſe through the middeſt of the realme, ſpoiling by the way mens cattell and goods verie diſorderlie, and ſo came through to the earle of Lancaſter. The king getting into his hands all the caſtels of his aduerſaries in thoſe parts, went to Hereford, where he was honorablie receiued of the cleargie and citizens. His armie increaſed dailie, many comming in vnto him, that before durſt not for feare of his aduerſaries. The biſhop of Hereford was ſharplie checked, bicauſe he had taken part with the kings enimies.

Killingworth holden againſt the K.

Tikehil caſtle beſieged.

The king ſent from hence the lord Iohn Haſtings into Southwales, to take in his name the ſeizine of the caſtels belonging to the earle of Hereford, the lord Roger Damorie, and the lord Hugh Spenſer the yoonger, which the barons had the laſt yeare got into their hands, all which being now taken to the kings vſe, were furniſhed with faithfull garriſons. ¶ The king, after this, comming to Gloceſter, condemned the ſhiriffe of Hereford to be hanged, for that he had taken part againſt him with the barons. The lord Maurice Berkley came to the king to Gloceſter, ſubmitting himſelfe to the kings pleaſure. After this the king came by Weſton vnder edge towards Couentrie, where he had appointed aſwell ſuch as he had latlie licenced to depart to their homes to refreſh themſelues for a time, as alſo diuerſe other, to aſſemble with their powers to go with him from thence againſt his aduerſaries. The day of this aſſemblie was the friday next after the firſt ſundaie in Lent. The king from Couentrie went to Meriuall, and there lodged in the abbeie for his more eaſe, writing to William Sutton vnder-conſtable of Warwike caſtell, commanding him to be attendant on the ſhiriffe of Warwike, in helping him to watch the entries and iſſues to and from the caſtell of Killingworth that was holden againſt him. In the meane time certeine of the lords that were gone to the earle of Lancaſter beſieged Tikehill caſtell fifteene daies togither, but preuailed not.

Letters intercepted.

King Arthur a name feined of purpoſe.

There were letters intercepted about the ſame time, which a meſſenger brought foorth of Scotland, three cloſed and three open, for there were ſix in all. The king ſent them to the archbiſhop of Canturburie, who by his commandement publiſhed them in open audience at London. The firſt was cloſed with the ſeale of the lord Thomas Randulfe earle of Murrie, lord of Annandale and of Man, lieutenant to Robert le Bruce king of Scotland, which conteined a ſafe conduct for ſir Thomas Topcliue chapleine, and one to be aſſociate with him to come into Scotland, and to returne from thence in ſafetie. The ſecond was ſealed with the ſeale of ſir Iames Dowglas for a like ſafe conduct for the ſame perſons. The third was cloſed with the ſeale of the ſaid earle of Murrie for the ſafe conduct of the lord Iohn de Mowbraie, and the lord Iohn de Clifford, and fortie horſſes with their pages for their ſafe comming vnto the ſaid erle into Scotland, and for their abiding there and returning backe. The fourth was cloſed with the ſeale of Iames Dowglas, directed to king Arthur. The fift was cloſed with the ſeale of Iames Dowglas directed vnto the lord Rafe Neuill. The ſixt had no direction, but the tenour thereof was this as followeth.

The tenor of the ſaid ſixt letter lacking a direction.

YOu ſhall vnderſtand my lord, that the communication before hand had, is now brought to effect. For the earle of Hereford, the lords Roger Damorie, Hugh de Audelie the yoonger, Bartholomew de Badeleſmer, Roger de Clifford, Iohn Gifford, Henrie Teis, Thomas Manduit, Iohn de Willington, and all other are come to Pomfret, and are readie to make you good aſſurance, ſo that you will performe couenant with them, to wit for your comming to aid vs, and to go with vs into England and Wales, to liue and die with vs in our quarell: We therefore beſeech you to aſſigne vs day and place, where we may meet, and we will be readie to accompliſh fullie our buſineſſe: and we beſeech you to make vs a ſafe conduct for thirtie horſſes, that we may in ſafetie come to your parts.

The king ſetteth forward towards his enimies.

He made a proclamation.

Burton vpon Trent.

The king, when ſuch earles and lords as he had licenced for a time were returned (his brother the earle of Northfolke excepted) & that the moſt part of thoſe men of warre were aſſembled that had ſummons, although diuerſe came not at all; about the firſt ſundaie in Lent he ſet forward towards his enimies, hauing with him to the number of ſixteene hundred men of armes on horſſebacke, and footmen innumerable; with this power paſſing foorth towards his aduerſaries, he cauſed proclamation to be made, that he was readie to receiue all men to his peace, that would come and ſubmit themſelues, thoſe excepted which had beene at the ſiege of Tikehill caſtell, or at the taking of the citie of Gloceſter, or at the inuaſion made vpon his men at Bridgenorth.

At his comming to a little village called Caldwell, he ſent afore him certeine bands to Burton vpon on Trent, where he ment to haue lodged: but the earles of Lancaſter and Hereford, the lords Roger Damorie, Hugh Audelie the yonger, John de Mowbraie, Bartholomew de Badeliſmere, Roger de Clifford, John Gifford de Bremeſfield, Henrie Tieis, and many other, being gotten thither before, kept the bridge, and aſſailing the kings people which he had thus ſent before, ſome of them they ſlue, and ſome they wounded, ſo defending the bridge, that none could paſſe, and by reaſon that the waters, and ſpeciallie the riuer of Trent through abundance of raine that was latelie fallen, were raiſed, there was no meane to paſſe by the foords, wherevpon the king was conſtreined to ſtaie the ſpace of thrée daies, in which meane time, the earles and their complices fortified the bridge at Burton, with barriers and ſuch like defenſes, after the maner of warre, but the king at length vpon deliberate aduiſe taken how to paſſe the riuer, ordeined, that the earle of Surrie with certeine armed men, ſhould go ouer by a bridge that was thrée miles diſtant from Burton, that he might come vpon the backes of the enimies, as they were fighting with thoſe that ſhould aſſaile them afront.

The K. paſſeth by a foord.

The earles of Lancaſter & Hereford flée and ſet fire on the towne.

The earles of Richmond and Penbroke were appointed to paſſe by a foord, which they had got knowledge of, with thrée hundred horſſemen in complet armour, and the king with his brother the earle of Kent ſhould follow them, with the reſidue of the armie, ſauing that Robert Aquarie or Waters, with certeine bands of footmen was commanded to aſſaile the bridge, which he did verie manfullie, cauſing the archers & croſſebowes to annoie them that kept it, ſo as he might draw the whole power of the enimies that waie, till the king and the earles were paſſed by the foord. But after that the earles of Lancaſter and Hereford with their complices, heard that the king was paſſed with his armie, they came foorth with their people into the fields, and put them in order of battell: but perceiuing the great puiſſance which the king had there readie to encounter them, without more adoo they fled ſetting fire on the towne, and leauing all their vittels and other things behind them. The kings people comming ſpéedilie forward, and entring the towne, quenched the fire, and fell to the ſpoile of ſuch things as the enimies for haſt had left behind them. The king kept nothing to himſelfe, but onelie a faire cup that belonged to the earle of Lancaſter, a péece eſtéemed to be of ſome great value.

The K. commeth to Tutburie.

Hue and crie.

On the ſame night, being wedneſdaie, the king came to Tutburie, and lodged in the caſtell, ſending foorth the next day with all ſpéed, letters to the ſhiriffe of Derbiſhire and Notinghamſhire, aduertiſing him both of the ſucceſſe he had againſt his enimies, and withall, pronouncing them and all their adherents, rebels and traitors to him and his realme, and that for ſuch they ſhould be reputed, taken and vſed. Wherefore he commanded in the ſame letters or writs, vpon forfeiture of all that the ſaid ſhiriffe might forfeit, he ſhould purſue the ſaid rebels, that is, the earles of Lancaſter and Hereford, the lords Roger Damorie, Hugh Audelie the yonger, John de Mowbraie, Bartholomew de Badeliſmere, Roger de Clifford, John Gifford de Brimeſfield, Henrie Tieis, and all and euerie other perſon or perſons that were of their confederacie, or in their companies; cauſing hue and crie to be raiſed vpon them, in what part ſoeuer they might be heard of, and in all places where the ſaid ſhiriffe ſhould thinke it expedient, and to inioine and ſtreightlie command all and ſingular perſons, the ſaid rebels and enimies to purſue, take and arreſt, and them to deliuer vnto the ſaid ſhiriffe, and that ſuch as were not able to purſue them, yet with hand or horne they ſhould leuie hue and crie againſt them, in paine that being found negligent herein, to be accompted for fauourers and adherents to the ſaid rebels and traitors, and that the ſaid ſhiriffe ſhould thervpon apprehend them, and put them in priſon. The writ was dated at Tutburie the eleuenth of March, and the like writs were directed and ſent foorth to all other ſhiriffes through the realme, and likewiſe to the biſhop of Durham, and to the iuſtice of Cheſter.

Proclamations made for the peace to be kept.

Beſide this, he directed alſo other writs to the ſaid ſhiriffes and others, that although he had béene conſtreined to paſſe in forceable wiſe through diuerſe parts of his realme, and the marches of Wales, to ſuppreſſe the malicious rebellion of diuerſe his ſubiects, and that as yet he was conſtreined to continue his iournie in ſuch forceable wiſe, neuertheles his pleaſure was, that the peace ſhould be mainteined and kept throughout his realme, with the ſtatutes, lawes and cuſtomes inuiolated, and therfore he commanded the ſaid ſhiriffes, that they ſhould cauſe the ſame to be proclaimed in places where was thought moſt expedient, as well within liberties as without, inhibiting that any maner of perſon, of what ſtate or condition ſoeuer he was, vpon paine that might fall thereon, to attempt any thing to the breach of peace; but that euerie man ſhould ſéeke to mainteine and preſerue the peace and tranquillitie of the people, with the ſtatutes, lawes and good cuſtomes of the land, to the vttermoſt of his power: this alwaies obſerued, that the rebels, whereſoeuer they might be found, ſhould be arreſted, and committed to ſafe cuſtodie. The date of this writ was at Tutburie aforeſaid on the twelfth of March.

The lord Damorie departed this life.

Sir Gilbert de Elleſfield & ſir Robert Holland ſubmit themſelues to the king.

The earles of Lancaſter & Hereford came to Pomfret.

The lord Roger Damorie laie ſicke in his bed at the ſame time in the priorie of Tutburie, who after he had heard what iudgement the king had pronounced againſt him, departed this life within two daies after. But the earles of Lancaſter and Hereford, with other in their companie that fled from the diſcomfiture at Burton, loſt manie men and horſſes in their flieng awaie, by reaſon of ſuch purſuit as was made after them. Diuerſe of them that had taken part with the lords againſt the king, came now and ſubmitted themſelues vnto him, amongſt the which were ſir Gilbert de Elleſfield, and ſir Robert Holland knights. The king yet had the ſaid Holland in ſome ſuſpicion, bicauſe he had promiſed to haue come to him before. The earle of Lancaſter had ſent him at this time to raiſe his tenants in Lancaſhire, and to bring them vnto him, but he deceiued him, and came not to him at all, wherevpon the earles of Lancaſter and Hereford, with the other barons, being come vnto Pomfret, fell to councell in the Friers there, and finallie, after much debating of the matter, and conſidering how by the vntrue dealing of the ſaid Robert Holland, their ſide was much weakened, it was concluded, that they ſhould go to the caſtell of Dunſtanborough, and there remaine till they might purchaſe the kings pardon, ſith their enterpriſe thus quailed vnder their hands: and herewith ſetting forward that waie foorth, they came to Borough bridge, where ſir Andrew de Herkley with the power of the counteſſe of Cumberland and Weſtmerland had forlaid the paſſage, and there on a tueſdaie being the 16 of March, he ſetting vpon the barons, in the end diſcomfited them, and chaſed their people.

The earle of Hereford ſlaine. The earle of Lancaſter taken.

Barons taken.

In this fight was ſlaine the earle of Hereford, the lord William de Sullie, with ſir Roger de Bourghfield, and diuerſe others. And there were taken Thomas earle of Lancaſter, the lord Roger Clifford ſon to that lord Roger which died in the battell of Bannockeſborne in Scotland, the lord Gilbert Talbot, the lord John Mowbraie, the lord Hugh de Willington, the lord Thomas Manduit, the lord Warren de Liſle, the lord Philip Darcie, the lord Thomas Wither, ther, the lord Henrie de Willington, the lord Hugh de Knouill, the lord Phillip de Beche, the lord Henrie de Leiborne, the lord Henrie de Bradborne, the lord John de Beckes, the lord Thomas Louell, the lord William fitz William, Robert de Wateuille, John de Strikeland, Odnell Heron, Walter Pauelie of Stretton, and a great number of other eſquires and gentlemen. This battell was fought on the fiftéenth day of March, in the yeare 1322 after the accompt of them that begin the yeare at the Circumciſion, which was in the ſaid fiftéenth yéere of this kings reigne.

The battell of Borough bridge.

The bodie of the earle of Hereford was ſent to Yorke, two friers of the order of preachers being appointed to looke to it, till the king tooke order for the burieng of it. The lord Clifford alſo, bicauſe he was wounded with an arrow, was ſent vnto Yorke. At the ſame time, the lord Henrie Percie tooke the lord Henrie Tieis, and John de Goldington knight, with two eſquires, and within a few daies after, Donald de Mar tooke the lord Bartholomew de Badeliſmere, the lord Hugh Audelie the yoonger, the lord John Gifford, the lord William Tuchet, and in maner all thoſe which eſcaped by flight from this battell were taken in one place or other, by ſuch of the kings ſeruants and fréends as purſued them. Vpon the one and twentith of March, came ſir Andrew de Harkley vnto Pomfret, bringing with him the earle of Lancaſter and other priſoners. The king was come thither a few daies before, and had the caſtell yéelded to him by the conſtable, that not manie daies paſt was appointed to the kéeping thereof by the earle, which earle now being brought thither captiue, was mocked, ſcorned, and in deriſion called king Arthur.

The caſtell of Pomfret is rendred to the king.

On the morrow after being mondaie, the two and twentith of March, he was brought before theſe noble men, Edmund earle of Kent, John earle of Richmond, Aimer earle of Penbroke, John erle of Surrie, Edmund earle of Arundell, Dauid earle of Atholl, Robert earle of Anegos, the lord Hugh Spenſer the father, the lord Robert de Malmeſthorp iuſtice, and others with them aſſociate, before whome he was arreigned of high treaſon, for that he had raiſed warre againſt the king, and defended the paſſage of Burton bridge, for the ſpace of thrée daies togither againſt him, and after when it was perceiued that the king had paſſed the riuer, he with Humfrie de Bohun earle of Hereford, and other their complices like traitors, ſet fire on the ſaid towne, and cruellie burnt part of the houſes and men of the ſame towne, and after, the ſaid earle of Lancaſter with his complices, arranged himſelfe in field with his armie and banners diſplaid readie to fight againſt the king, till that perceiuing the kings power to be ouerſtrong for him & his partakers to reſiſt, he togither with them fled, committing by the waie diuerſe felonies and robberies, till they came to Burrough bridge, where finding certeine of the kings faithfull ſubiects readie to reſiſt them, they aſſailed the ſaid faithfull ſubiects with force of armes and banners diſplaied, ſlaieng diuerſe of them, till finallie the ſaid earle of Lancaſter was caught, and other of his complices, ſome taken, ſome ſlaine, and the reſidue put to flight, ſo that there wanted no good will in the ſaid earle of Lancaſter and others, whie the king ſhould not haue béene vanquiſhed. Which treaſons, murthers, burning of houſes, deſtroieng of the kings people, being plainlie & manifeſtlie knowne to the earls, barons, lords, and other people of the land, the ſaid earle of Lancaſter was thervpon adiudged to die, according to the law in ſuch caſes prouided, that is, to be drawne, hanged, and headed. But bicauſe he was the quéenes vncle, and ſonne to the kings vncle, he was pardoned of all ſaue heading, and ſo accordinglie therevnto ſuffered at Pomfret the two and twentith of March.

The earle of Lancaſter arreigned.

He is found giltie.
Ri. Southwell.

He is beheaded.

Thus the king ſéemed to be reuenged of the diſpleaſure doone to him by the earle of Lancaſter, for the beheading of Peers de Gaueſton earle of Cornewall, whom he ſo déerelie loued, and bicauſe the erle of Lancaſter was the chéefe occaſioner of his death, the king neuer loued him entirelie after. ¶ So that here is verified the cenſure of the ſcripture expreſſed by the wiſedome of Salomon, that the anger and diſpleaſure of the king is as the roring of a lion, and his reuenge ineuitable. Wherefore it is an hie point of diſcretion in ſuch as are mightie, to take héed how they giue edge vnto the wrath of their ſoucreigne, which if it be not by ſubmiſſion made blunt, the burthen of the ſmart inſuing will lie heauie vpon the offendor, euen to his vtter vndoing, and loſſe (perhaps) of life. In this ſort came the mightie earle of Lancaſter to his end, being the greateſt péere in the realme, and one of the mightieſt earles in chriſtendome: for when he began to leauie warre againſt the king, he was poſſeſſed of fiue earledomes, Lancaſter, Lincolne, Saliſburie, Leiceſter, and Derbie, beſide other ſeigniories, lands, and poſſeſſions, great to his aduancement in honor and puiſſance. But all this was limited within preſcription of time, which being expired, both honour and puiſſance were cut off with diſhonour and death, for (O mutable ſtate!)

On the ſame day, the lord William Tuchet, the lord William fitz William, the lord Warren de Liſle, the lord Henrie Bradborne, and the lord William; Chenie barons, with John Page an eſquire, were drawne and hanged at Pomfret aforeſaid, and then ſhortlie after, Roger lord Clifford, John lord Mowbraie, and ſir Goſein d' Eeuill barons, were drawne and hanged at Yorke. At Briſtow in like manner were executed ſir Henrie de Willington, and ſir Henrie Montfort baronets; and at Glocceſter, the lord John Gifford, and ſir William Elmebridge knight; and at London, the lord Henrie Teies baron; at Winchelſie, ſir Thomas Culpepper knight; at Windſor, the lord Francis de Aldham baron; and at Canturburie, the lord Bartholomew de Badeliſmere, and the lord Bartholomew de Aſhbornham, barons. Alſo at Cardiffe in Wales, ſir William Fleming knight was executed: diuerſe were executed in their countries, as ſir Thomas Mandit and others.

Lords executed.

But now touching the foreſaid earle of Lancaſter, great ſtrife roſe afterwards amongſt the people, whether he ought to be reputed for a ſaint or no. Some held, that he ought to be no leſſe eſtéemed, for that he did manie almeſdéeds in his life time, honored men of religion, and mainteined a true quarell till his liues end. Alſo, his enimies continued not long after, but came to euill end. Others conceiued an other opinion of him, alledging, that he fauoured not his wife, but liued in ſpouſe-breach, defiling a great number of damoſels and gentlewomen. If anie offended him, he ſlue him ſhortlie after in his wrathfull mood. Apoſtataes and other euill doers he mainteined, and would not ſuffer them to be puniſhed by due order of law. All his doings he vſed to commit vnto one of his ſecretaries, and tooke no héed himſelfe thereof: and as for the manner of his death, he fled ſhamefullie in the fight, and was taken and put to death againſt his will, bicauſe he could not auoid it: yet by reaſon of certeine miracles which were ſaid to be doone néere the place both where he ſuffered, and where he was buried, cauſed manie to thinke he was a ſaint; howbeit, at length, by the kings commandement, the church doores of the priorie where he was buried, were ſhut and cloſed, ſo that no man might be ſuffered to come to the toome to bring any offerings, or to doo any other kind of deuotion to the ſame. Alſo, the hill where he ſuffered was kept by certeine Gaſcoines, appointed by the lord Hugh Spenſer the ſonne then lieng at Pomfret, to the end that no people ſhould come and make their praiers there in worſhip of the ſaid earle, whome they tooke verelie for a martyr.

Creation of earls.

The lord Audelie pardoned.

When the king had ſubdued the barons, ſhortlie after, about the feaſt of the Aſcenſion of our lord, he held a parlement at Yorke, in which parlement, the record and whole proceſſe of the decrée or iudgement concerning the diſheriting of the Spenſers, ordeined by the lords in parlement aſſembled at London the laſt ſummer, was now throughlie examined, and for their errours therein found, the ſame record and proceſſe was cléerelie adnihilated and reuerſed, and the ſaid Spenſers were reſtored to all their lands and offices, as before. And in the ſame parlement the lord Hugh Spenſer the father was made earle of Wincheſter, and the lord Andrew de Herklie earle of Carleill. Moreouer, in the ſame parlement, all ſuch were diſherited as had taken part with the earls of Lancaſter & Hereford, except the lord Hugh Audelie the yoonger, and a few other, the which lord Hugh was pardoned, bicauſe he had married the kings néece, that was ſiſter to Gilbert de Clare earle of Glouceſter, which was ſlaine in Scotland, at the battell of Bannockeſborne, as before is mentioned.

The kings eldeſt ſonne created prince of wales.

At this time alſo maſter Robert Baldocke, a man euill beloued in the realme, was made lord chancellour of England. This Robert Baldocke, and one Simon Reding were great fauourers of the Spenſers, and ſo likewiſe was the earle of Arundell, whereby it may be thought, that the Spenſers did helpe to aduance them into the kings fauour, ſo that they bare no ſmall rule in the realme, during the time that the ſame Spenſers continued in proſperitie, which for the terme of fiue yeares after that the foreſaid barons (as before is expreſſed) were brought to confuſion, did woonderfullie increaſe, and the quéene for that ſhe gaue good and faithfull counſell, was nothing regarded, but by the Spenſers meanes cléerelie worne out of the kings fauour. Moreouer, we find, that in this parlement holden at Yorke, the kings ſonne Edward was made prince of Wales, and duke of Aquitaine.

The earle of Penbroke arreſted.

Alſo, the king cauſed the ordinances made by the earles and barons to be examined by men of great knowledge and ſkill, and ſuch as were thought neceſſarie to be eſtabliſhed, he commanded that the ſame ſhould be called ſtatutes, and not ordinances. Beſide a great ſubſidie granted to the king by the temporaltie, the cleargie of all the prouince of Canturburie granted fiue pence of euerie marke, and they of the prouince of Yorke foure pence. Aimer earle of Penbroke, being returned home from this parlement holden at Yorke, was arreſted by certeine knights, ſent with authoritie thereunto from the king, who brought him backe to Yorke, where at length thorough ſuit of certeine noble men, he was vpon his oth taken to be a faithfull ſubiect, and in conſideration of a fine which he paied to the king, ſet at libertie. The occaſion of his impriſonment came, for that he was accuſed and detected to be a ſecret fauourer of the barons cauſe againſt the Spenſers in time of the late troubles.

Moreouer, ſhortlie after the king gathered the ſixt penie of the temporall mens goods thorough England, Ireland and Wales, which had béene granted to him at the foreſaid parlement holden at Yorke, towards the defending of the realme againſt the Scots. This tax was not gathered without great murmur and grudge, the realme being in ſuch euill and miſerable ſtate as it then was. ¶ This yeare alſo the ſunne appeared to mans ſight in colour like to bloud, and ſo continued ſix houres, to wit, from ſeuen of the clocke in the morning of the laſt daie of October, vntill one of the clocke in the after noone of the ſame daie.

The Scots inuade the biſhoprike of Durham.

Here is to be noted, that during the time whileſt the ciuill warre was in hand betwixt king Edward and his barons, the Scots and Frenchmen were not idle, for the Scots waſted & deſtroied the countrie of the biſhoprike of Durham (as before ye haue partlie heard) & the Frenchmen made roades & incurſions into the borders of Guien, alledging that they did it vpon good and ſufficient occaſion, for that king Edward had not doone his homage vnto the king of France, as he ought to haue doone, for the duchie of Aquitaine, and the countie of Pontieu. But the true occaſion that mooued them to attempt the warres at that preſent, was for that they were in hope to recouer all the lands which the king of England held within France, cléerelie out of his hands, for ſo much as they vnderſtood the diſcord betwixt him and his barons, and how infortunatlie he had ſped againſt the Scots, by reaſon whereof they iudged the time to ſerue moſt fitlie now for their purpoſe.

Merimouth.

In the octaues of the natiuitie of ſaint Iohn Baptiſt, Robert Bruce entring into England by Carleill, kept on his waie through Cumberland, Coupeland, Kendall, and ſo into Lancaſhire, till he came to Preſton in Anderneſſe, which towne he burnt, as he had doone others in the countries through which he had paſſed. There were ſome of the Scots that forraied the countrie fiue miles on this ſide Preſton ſouthwards, and thus being foureſcore long miles within England, they returned homewards, and entred againe into Scotland without incounter, after they had béene at this time within England the ſpace of thrée wéeks and thrée daies. King Edward being thus beſet with two miſchiefes both at one time, thought good firſt to prouide remedie againſt the néerer danger, which by the Scots was ſtill at hand, and therefore he meant to go againſt them himſelfe, and to ſend his brother Edmund earle of Kent into Guien, to defend that countrie from the Frenchmen. Herevpon now in the ſixteenth yeare of his reigne, after that the Scots were returned home with a great bootie and rich ſpoile, he got togither a woonderfull great armie of men, and entring into Scotland, paſſed far within the countrie, not finding any reſiſtance at all (as the moſt part of our writers doo agrée) but at length, through famine and diſeaſes of the flix and other maladies that fell amongſt the Engliſhmen in the armie, he was conſtreined to come backe, and in his waie beſieged the caſtell of Norham, which fortreſſe he wan within ten daies after he had begun to aſſault it.

Robert Bruce immediatlie after the Engliſh armie was retired home, raiſed a power, and entring into England by Sulwaie ſands, laie at a place called Beaumond, not paſt thrée miles frō Carleill, by the ſpace of fiue daies, ſending in the meane time the moſt part of his armie abroad to ſpoile and harrie the countrie on euerie ſide, and afterwards remouing from thence, he paſſed towards Blackamore, hauing knowledge by diligent eſpials, that king Edward was in thoſe parts, giuing himſelfe more to paſtime in hunting there within the woods about Blackamore, than to the good ordering of his people which he had then about him. Wherevpon the Scotiſh king Bruce, entring into that wild and mooriſh countrie, where he had not béene afore, conueied his enterpriſe ſo warilie, and with ſuch diligent induſtrie, that on ſaint Lukes daie, comming vpon the Engliſh armie at vnwares, he put the ſame to flight, ſo that the king himſelfe was in great danger to haue beene taken priſoner. For (as ſome authors write) the Scots had almoſt taken him at dinner in the abbeie of Beighland. Sir Iohn Britaine earle of Richmond was taken at this battell, and the kings treaſure was ſpoiled and carried awaie, with the prouiſion and ordinance that belonged to the hoſt.

The earle of Carleill raiſeth an armie.

Fabian.

The king eſcaping awaie, got to Yorke, and the Scots hauing thus the vpper hand, after they had ſpoiled the monaſterie of Riuale, and taken their pleaſure there, they paſſed forth into Yorkeſwold, deſtroieng that countrie euen almoſt vnto Beuerlie, which towne they ranſomed, receiuing a ſumme of monie for ſparing it, leaſt they ſhould haue burnt it, as they did other. The earle of Carleill being commanded by the king to raiſe the powers of Cumberland, Weſtmerland, and Lancaſhire, did ſo, and according to that he had in commandement, bringing them belowe the countries vnto Yorke, found the K. there in no plight to giue battell to his enimies, all things being brought about him into great confuſion: whervpon he licenced his people to depart to their homes againe, and the Scots ſo returned without battell home into their countries, entring into Scotland the morrow after All hallowes daie, after they had remained in England at this time, one whole moneth and foure daies. Some write, that in their returne, they ſpoiled Northalerton, and diuerſe other townes and places as they paſſed.

A conſpiracie to ſet priſoners at libertie.

Sir Iohn Goldington.

In the ſame yeare, there was a great conſpiracie practiſed by certein perſons that had taken part with the barons in the late warres, purpoſing to ſet at libertie in one ſelfe night, all thoſe noble men and others, that were by the king kept in priſon for that quarrell. Certeine therefore of thoſe conſpirators came to the caſtell of Walingford, within the which the lord Maurice Berkelie, and the lord Hugh Audlie remained as priſoners. The conſpirators found ſhift to enter the caſtell by a poſterne gate towards the Thames ſide, howbeit not ſo ſecretlie but that the towneſmen hauing knowledge thereof, aſſembled togither, and beſieged them that were ſo entred the caſtell, till the earles of Kent and Wincheſter came with a great power to reenforce the ſiege, ſo that in the end, they that had made this attempt fled into the chappell of the caſtell, in hope to be ſaued through ſanctuarie of the place, but they were (againſt the willes of the deane and preeſts of the colledge there that ſought to defend them) taken forth by force, ſo that ſir Iohn de Goldington knight, ſir Edmund of the Bech chapleine, and an eſquire called Roger Walton, were ſent to Pomfret, and there put in priſon; the eſquire was after ſent to Yorke, and there drawne and hanged. This enterpriſe cauſed all other priſoners to be more ſtreightlie looked vnto.

Rich. Southw. Polydor.

In this yeare was begun a wicked practiſe of treaſon vpon this occaſion. Where K. Edward hauing aſſaied fortune ſo froward towards him, in chance of warre againſt the Scots at ſundrie times, was therby taught to doubt the triall thereof any further, and rather to ſeeke for peace, he appointed Andrew Herklie earle of Carleill, to ſeeke ſome means, wherby a peace might be concluded betwixt him and king Robert. The earle by the kings commandement, going into Scotland, and comming vnto king Robert, whome he found at Loghmaban, intreated with him of warre, and not of peace; for whether it were ſo that he deſpaired of the ſtate of king Edwards buſineſſe, which proſpered neither at home nor abroad; cheefelie by reaſon of his owne wilfull negligence (as ſome write) or whether of his owne nature this earle delighted in nothing ſo much, as in deceipt, craft, and treaſon: he concluded vpon points with the Scotiſh king, how, when, and where king Edward ſhould be betraied, and to the end that couenanted faith on either ſide might be the more ſuerlie kept and obſerued, the ſiſter of K. Robert was affianced vnto the ſaid earle of Carleill: a verie beautifull ladie and a comelie as was anie where to be ſeene or found.

Treaſon will euer come to light by one meane or other.

The earle of Carleill put to death.

This practiſe being thus contriued, ſhortlie after the king got knowledge thereof, though by whome it was not certeinlie knowne: ſo hard a thing it is for man to conceale and keepe ſecret that thing which he goeth about, though he ſtudie neuer ſo much ſo to doo, namelie in matters of treaſon, which hath a thouſand feet to creepe abroad, and which way ſoeuer it goeth, it leaueth a thouſand prints of the footſteps behind it, by the which it may be diſcouered to the world. When therefore the earle came backe againe to Carleill, he was arreſted by commandement from the king, and ſtraightwaies being arreigned of the treaſon, he was thereof condemned and put to execution. His head was ſent vnto London, and there ſet vpon the bridge, or rather vpon ſome turret of the tower. So hard a matter it is for traitors to eſcape the hands of the executioner; vnder whoſe hatchet they ſubmit their heads to be hewen from their ſhoulders, euen then when they haue conceiued their traitorous attempts in hart, for God who hath placed princes in thrones of roialtie, to this end hath vouchſafed them a ſuperlatiue degree of dignitie, that they might be obeied, neither will his iuſtice permit impunitie to the diſloiall enterpriſes and complots of malefactors, common peace-diſturbers, hautie-harted Nemrods, ambitious Hamans, or anie lewd malcontent: for

Acer Dei eſt oculus ad omnia videndum,
Eius pœnas non effugit mortalis,
Viuere volens ergo ne faciat morte digna.

Ri. Southwell.

¶ But there be that write otherwiſe (as it may well be) thus, that this earle of Carleill, perceiuing the miſerie of his countrie, without conſent of the king of England, made peace with the king of Scots, vnder this forme, as by Richard Southwell we find recorded. Firſt, the earle promiſed faithfullie for him and his heires, that they ſhould with all their force and means poſſible, ſeeke to mainteine the ſaid king of Scots, his heires and ſucceſſors, in the peaceable poſſeſſion of the kingdome of Scotland, and that to their powers they ſhuld fight againſt all thoſe that would not agree vnto that couenant, as againſt them that ſhould ſeeme to be enimies vnto the common-wealth of both the realmes of England and Scotland. The king of Scots promiſed faithfullie for his part, to defend the ſaid earle, his heires, and adherents in the ſaid couenant or paction, and not onelie to keepe peace with England, but alſo to build a monaſterie within Scotland, aſſigning reuenues thereto, to the value of fiue hundred marks, to celebrate diuine ſeruice, and to pray continuallie for the ſoules of them that were dead, by occaſion of the paſſed warres betwixt England and Scotland; and further, that he ſhould giue to the king of England within ten yeares, fortie thouſand pounds of ſiluer; and that the king of England ſhould haue the king of Scots eldeſt ſonne, to marrie him vnto ſome ladie of his bloud, as he ſhould thinke expedient. To the performance of all which couenants well and truelie to be obſerued, Thomas Randulfe earle of Murrey ſware on the behalfe of the king of Scots, and the earle of Carleill ſware for himſelfe: and heerewith certeine writings indented were drawne and ingroſſed, to the which interchangeablie they ſet their hands and ſeales.

After that the earle of Carleill was returned home, he called to Carleill all the cheefe perſons of the countrie, as well ſpirituall as temporall, and there rather through feare, than otherwiſe, conſtreined them to receiue an oth, that they ſhould aid & aſſiſt him to their powers, to ſee all the couenants aboueſaid performed and kept. After that theſe things were knowne to the king and the realme, although ſome of the communaltie liked well inough of the matter, bicauſe they hoped thereby to remaine in peace, eſpeciallie thoſe of the north parts, the king yet and his councell (not without cauſe) were ſore offended, for that he whom the king had ſo latelie aduanced, ſhould confederate himſelfe with the Scots, to the preiudice of the king and his crowne, concluding any couenants of peace without his conſent, wherevpon reputing him for a ranke traitor, the king ſent vnto the lord Antonie Lucie, to apprehend the ſaid earle by ſome meanes if he might, and for his paines he ſhould not faile to be well rewarded.

The lord Lucie.

The lord Lucie watching his time, when the earles men were gone ſome whither abroad, and but few left about him, the morrow after the feaſt of ſaint Matthew the apoſtle, he entred the caſtell of Carleill, as it were to talke with the earle of ſome buſineſſe, as his manner was at other times to doo. He had with him ſir Hugh Lowther, ſir Richard Denton, and ſir Hugh Moricebie knights, and foure eſquiers, beſide other priuilie armed, ſo that leauing ſome at euerie gate and doore as he entred, he came into the hall, and there finding the earle inditing letters, arreſted him. Herewith when certeine of the earles ſeruants made a noiſe, and cried, Treaſon, treaſon, the porter of the inner gate would haue ſhut it vpon them that were thus entred, but ſir Richard Denton ſlue that porter with his owne hands, and there was not one more ſlaine by them in the apprehenſion of the earle, for all other his ſeruants yéelded themſelues and the houſe vnto the ſaid lord Lucie, without more reſiſtance.

Michaell de Herkley.

Howbeit one of his ſeruants that ſaw theſe doings, got awaie, and with all ſpéed ran to the péele of Heihead, and ſhewed to the earles brother Michaell Herkeley what was chanced to the earle, wherevpon the ſaid Michaell forthwith fled into Scotland, and with him ſir William Blunt knight, a Scottiſhman, and diuerſe other that were of the earles priuie councell. The lord Lucie ſtreightwaies ſent a meſſenger to the king vnto Yorke, aduertiſing him how he had taken the earle, and therefore required to vnderſtand further of the kings pleaſure. The king forthwith ſent the lord Geffrey Scrobe iuſtice, with a number of armed men vnto Carleill, the which came thither on ſaint Chaddes daie, and the morrow after, being the third of March, he ſat in iudgement vpon the ſaid earle, in the caſtell of Carleill, and there (as out of the kings mouth) he pronounced ſentence againſt him in this wiſe; firſt, that he ſhould be diſgraded of his earledome, by the taking awaie from him the ſword which the king had gird him with, and likewiſe of his knighthood, by cutting off his ſpurs from his héeles, and that after this, he ſhould be drawen from the caſtell through the citie vnto the place of execution, where felons were accuſtomed to ſuffer, and there to be hanged, afterwards headed, and then his head to be ſent vnto London, there to be ſet aloft vpon one of the turrets of the tower, and his quarters to be diuided, one to be ſet vp at Carleill, an other at Newcaſtell vpon Tine, the third at Briſtow, & the fourth at Douer.

The earle of Carleils iudgement.

His conſtancie at his death.

When he had heard this iudgement, he ſaid; You haue diuided my bodie at your pleaſure, and I commit my ſoule vnto God: and being according to the iudgement drawen to the place where he ſuffered, he neuer ſhranke at the matter, but boldlie behaued himſelfe, declaring at the verie houre of his death, that his intention in concluding the agréement with the Scots was good, and procéeding not of any euill meaning, but tending onelie to the wealth and quietnes of the realme. Neither could ſuch friers as were permitted to come to him before his arreignement to heare his confeſſion, get any thing more of him, but that his meaning was good, and that which he had concluded with the king of Scots was not doone vpon any euill purpoſe, whereby any hurt might inſue, either to the king or to the realme. ¶ Thus haue we thought good to ſhew the cauſe of this earles death, as by ſome writers it hath béene regiſtred; although there be that write, that the ouerthrow at Beighland chanced through his fault, by miſleading a great part of the kings hoſt, and that therefore the king being offended with him, cauſed him to be put to death, albeit (as I thinke) no ſuch matter was alleged againſt him at the time of his arreignement.

About this ſeaſon was the foundation begun of S. Michaels colledge in Cambridge, by one ſir Henrie Stanton knight, chancellour of the excheker. About the feaſt of the Aſcenſion, there came as commiſſioners from the king of England vnto Newcaſtell, Aimerie earle of Penbroke, and the lord chamberlaine Hugh Spenſer the yonger, and other foure perſonages of good accompt. And from the king of Scots, there came the biſhop of ſaint Andrews, Thomas Randulfe earle of Murrey, and other foure of good credit to treat of peace, or at the leaſt wiſe of ſome long truce, and through the good will and pleaſure of God, the author of all peace and quietneſſe, they concluded vpon a truce, to indure for thirtéene yeares, and ſo about the feaſt of ſaint Barnabe the apoſtle, it was proclaimed in both realmes, but yet ſo, that they might not traffike togither, bicauſe of the excommunication wherewith the Scots were as yet intangled, although as ſome write, about the ſame time, the interdict wherein the realme of Scotland ſtood bound, was by pope Iohn releaſed.

Polydor. Hect. Boetius. Anno Reg. 17. Meſſengers from the French king.

The French king taketh townes in Aquitaine.

The French K. being latelie come to the crowne, ſent certeine ambaſſadors vnto king Edward, to wit, the lord Beouille, and one Andreas de Florentia a notarie, to giue ſummons vnto him from the French king, to come and doo homage for the lands which he held in France, as for the duchie of Aquitaine, and the countie of Pontieu. And though the lord chamberleine Hugh Spenſer the ſonne, and the lord chancellour Robert Baldocke did what they could to procure theſe ambaſſadors, not to declare the cauſe of their comming to the king, yet when they ſhould depart, they admoniſhed the king to come and doo his homage vnto the French king, and vpon this admonition the ſaid Andreas framed a publike inſtrument, by vertue whereof, the French king made proceſſe againſt the king of England, and ſeized into his hands diuerſe townes and caſtels in Aquitaine, alledging that he did it for the contumacie ſhewed by the king of England, in refuſing to come to doo his homage, being lawfullie ſummoned, although the king was throughlie informed, that the ſummons was neither lawfull, nor touched him anie thing at all.

The lord Mortimer breaketh out of the tower.

About the ſame time, the lord Roger Mortimer of Wigmor, giuing his kéepers a drinke that brought them into a ſound and heauie ſléepe, eſcaped out of the tower of London where he was priſoner. This eſcape of the lord Mortimer greatlie troubled the king, ſo that immediatlie vpon the firſt newes, he wrote to all the ſhiriffes of the realme, that if he chanced to come within their roomes, they ſhould cauſe hue and crie to be raiſed, ſo as he might be ſtaied and arreſted, but he made ſuch ſhift, that he got ouer into France, where he was receiued by a lord of Picardie, named monſier Iohn de Fieules, who had faire lands in England, and therefore the king wrote to him, reprouing him of vnthankfulneſſe, conſidering he had beene euer readie to pleaſure him, and to aduance his profits and commodities, and yet notwithſtanding he did ſuccour the ſaid lord Mortimer, and other rebels that were fled out of his realme.

A parlement.

In Lent this yeare, a parlement was holden at London, in the which diuerſe things were intreated, amongſt other the cheefeſt was, to determine for the ſending of ſome honorable ambaſſage to the French king, to excuſe the king for not comming to him to doo his homage, according to the pretended ſummons. ¶ In the ſame parlement, Adam biſhop of Hereford was arreſted, and examined vpon points of treaſon, for aiding, ſuccouring, and mainteining the Mortimers, and other of the rebels. This biſhop was reckoned to be wiſe, ſubtill, and learned, but otherwiſe, wilfull, preſumptuous, and giuen to mainteine factions. At the firſt, he diſdeined to make anie anſwer at all, and finallie, when he was in manner forced thereto, he flatlie told the king, that he might not make any anſwere to ſuch matters as he was charged with, except by the licence and conſent of his metropolitane the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and other his peeres. Heerevpon, the ſaid archbiſhop and other biſhops made ſuch ſute, that he was committed to the keeping of the ſaid archbiſhop, with him to remaine, till the king had taken order for his further anſwer.

Within few daies after, when the king called him againe before his preſence, to make anſwere to the matters laid againſt him, the archbiſhops of Canturburie, Yorke, Dublin, and ten other biſhops came with their croſſes afore them, and vnder a colour of the priuilege and liberties of the church, tooke him awaie, before he had made anie anſwere, forbidding all men on paine of excommunication, to laie anie hands vpon him. The king greatlie offended with this bold proceeding of the prelats, cauſed yet an inqueſt to be impanelled, to inquire of the biſhop of Herefords treaſons, and vpon the finding of him giltie, he ſeized into his hands all the temporalties that belonged to his biſhoprike, and ſpoiled his manours and houſes moſt violentlie, in reuenge of his diſloiall dealings.

Lands belonging to the templers.

Moreouer, in this parlement, the lands and poſſeſſions that belonged ſometime to the Templers, and had beene deliuered vnto the knights Hoſpitalers, otherwiſe called knights of the Rodes by the king in the ſeauenth yeare of his reigne (according to the decree of the councell of Vienna) were by authoritie of this parlement aſſured vnto the ſaid knights, to enioy to them and their ſucceſſors for euer. Alſo it was concluded, that the earle of Kent, and the archbiſhop of Dubline ſhould go ouer as ambaſſadours into France, to excuſe the king for his not comming in perſon to the French king, to doo his homage for the lands he held in France. Moreouer, in the ſame parlement, the king granted, that all the dead bodies of his enimies and rebels that had ſuffered and hanged ſtill on the gallowes, ſhould be taken downe, and buried in the churchyards next to the places where the ſame bodies were hanging, and not elſewhere, by ſuch as would take paine to burie them, as by his writs directed vnto the ſhiriffes of London, and of the counties of Middleſex, Kent, Gloceſter, Yorke, and Buckingham it appeared. And not onelie this libertie was granted at that time for the taking downe of thoſe bodies, but (as ſome write) it was decreed by authoritie in the ſame parlement, that the bodies of all thoſe that from thenceforth ſhould be hanged for felonies, ſhould incontinentlie be buried, which ordinance hath beene euer ſince obſerued.

Imbaſſadors ſent into France.

The earle of Kent, and the archbiſhop of Dubline going ouer into France, could not light vpon anie good concluſion for the matter about the which they were ſent, bicauſe the ſame time, or rather ſomewhat before, the lord Raſe Baſſet of Draiton, being the kings ſeneſhall in Guien, had ouerthrowne a certeine towne, newlie fortified by the Frenchmen on the frontiers, for that the inhabitants, truſting on the French kings fauour and maintenance, refuſed to obeie the lawes and ordinances of the countrie of Aquitaine, and ſeemed to deſpiſe and ſet at naught the authoritie of the ſaid lord Baſſet in that countrie, contrarie to all right, good order or reaſon. Neuertheleſſe, the French king tooke the matter ſo greeuouſlie, that except the lord Baſſet might be conſtreined to come vnto Paris, and there make anſwer to his offenſe, he would not hearken to anie other ſatiſfaction. And therevpon, when the ambaſſadours were returned, he ſent his vncle the lord Charles de Valois earle of Aniou, with a mightie armie, againſt the Engliſh ſubiects into Guien, where entring into Agenois, he tooke and ſeized all that countrie into the French kings hands. The earle of Kent being now gotten into thoſe parts, with a great number of other capteins and men of warre ſent thither by the king of England, reſiſted the enimies verie manfullie, in ſo much that vpon their approch to the Rioll, a ſtrong towne in thoſe parts, the earle of Kent as then being within it, did iſſue foorth, and giuing them battell, ſlue (as ſome write) foureteene hundred of their men, ſo that they were glad to lodge at the firſt ſomewhat further off the towne.

The king of England writeth to the duke of Britaine.
Record. Tur.

Whileſt this ſiege remained before the towne of the Rioll, the king of England wrote his letters to the duke of Britaine, as one of the peeres of France, declaring the iniurious dealing of the French king, who had ſent his vncle the earle of Aniou with an armie againſt his people in Agenois, where he had taken manie townes, deſtroied his people, and now had beſieged his nephue Edmund earle of Kent, within the towne of the Rioll, inforſing his whole puiſſance wrongfullie to bereaue him of all the duchie of Guien, and againſt all reaſon, and the prerogatiue of the peeres of France, to an euill preſident or example in time to come of the perpetuall ſeruitude of the ſaid peeres. And although ſaith the king of England, that the French alledge that we haue been „ lawfullie ſummoned to come and doo homage, and haue refuſed ſo to doo, that is not ſo: for we were ne- „ uer in due order required as was conuenient, nei- „ ther could we doo homage, by reaſon of the great iniuries and hard dealings practiſed againſt vs, from „ the feaſt of Eaſter laſt, till the date of thoſe his preſent letters (which was the ſixt of October, in this „ eighteenth yeare of his reigne) and yet, ſaith he, there was neuer anie lawfull proceſſe had againſt vs be- „ fore our peeres, in the great chamber at Paris, as „ had beene requiſite.

Herevpon he requeſted the duke of Britaine, that for the preſeruation and maintenance of the honorable eſtate of the peeres of France, & for iuſtice ſake he would helpe to aid him, either by waie of requeſt, or other conuenient meanes, ſo as the ſaid ſtreict dealings and iniurious wrongs may ceaſſe, and the eſtate of the peereſhip may be mainteined as was requiſite. He wrote likewiſe to the lord Iohn the infant, the lord of Biſkie, and to the ladie Marie of Biſkie gouerneſſe of the king of Caſtile and Leon, and to Iames king of Aragon, requeſting them to aid him with men of warre, as well horſſemen as footmen, againſt his aduerſarie the French king, that moſt vniuſtlie went about to depriue him of his inheritance. But howſoeuer the matter went, no aid came to the earle of Kent from any part, till at length, the Frenchmen ſo reinforced the ſiege, that the towne was deliuered to the earle of Aniou, and a truce taken vpon certeine conditions, that

The lord de Sullie ſent into France in ambaſſage.

The pope ſendeth ambaſſadors to the kings of England and France.

Then were ſent ouer other ambaſſadors, as the lord John de Sullie a Frenchman borne, and one maiſter John de Shordich, but the lord Sullie had ſo ſtrange interteinment for ſome diſpleaſure which the French king conceiued againſt him, that if the French queene had not the beter intreated for him, he had loſt his head; and as for the other, he had alſo returned home without bringing any thing to paſſe, of that for the which he was ſent. After this, the pope ſent the archbiſhop of Uienna, and the biſhop of Orange, to the princes of either realme, to exhort them to ſome agréement, but they could doo no good, and ſo taking monie of the cleargie for their expenſes, they returned. After this, about the twentith daie after Chriſtmaſſe, there was a parlement called at London, in the which the king required to haue the aduiſe of the lords, how he might worke for ſauing of the duchie of Guien, ſore moleſted by the French. Herevpon it was concluded, that the biſhops of Wincheſter and Norwich, and John de Britaine earle of Richmond, ſhould go ouer as ambaſſadors to the French king, who comming into France, after manie argumentations, allegations, and excuſes, made on both parts, at length receiued a certeine forme of pacification at the French kings hands, with the which the biſhop of Wincheſter was ſent backe to England, the biſhop of Norwich, and the earle of Richmond remaining there, till it might be knowen how the king of England would like thereof.

Other ambaſſadors ſent ouer into France.

The quéene is ſent ouer into France to talke with hir brother the French king.

A peace and concord agréed vpon.

Finallie it was thought good, that the quéene ſhuld go ouer to hir brother the French king, to confirme that treatie of peace vpon ſome reaſonable conditions. She willinglie tooke vpon hir the charge, and ſo with the lord John Crumwell, & other foure knights, without any other great traine, taking ſea, ſhe landed in France, where of the king hir brother ſhe was ioifullie receiued, and finallie ſhe being the mediatrix, it was finallie accorded, that the K. of England ſhould giue to his eldeſt ſonne the duchie of Aquitaine, and the countie of Pontieu, and that the French king receiuing homage of him for the ſame, he ſhould reſtore into his hands the ſaid countie, and the lands in Guien, for the which they were at variance, and for thoſe countries which had béene forraied and ſpoiled, the earle of Aniou ſhould fullie ſée him ſatiſfied, as right did require.

Anno Reg. 19.

Upon the couenants the French king wrote his letters patents into England, and other letters alſo of ſafe conduct, as well for the ſonne as for the king himſelfe, if it ſhould pleaſe him to come ouer himſelfe in perſon. Upon which choiſe great deliberation was had, as well at Langdon, as at Douer, diuerſe thinking it beſt that the king ſhould go ouer himſelfe: but the earle of Wincheſter and his ſonne the lord chamberleine, that neither durſt go ouer themſelues with the king, nor abide at home in his abſence, gaue contrarie counſell, and at length preuailed ſo, that it was fullie determined that the kings eldeſt ſonne Edward ſhould go ouer, which turned to their deſtruction, as it appeared afterward.

The prince of wales is ſent into France.

Herevpon the king made a charter of grant vnto his ſonne, of the duchie of Guien, and countie of Pontieu, to haue and hold to him & his heires kings of England, with condition, that if he chanced to depart this life whileſt his father liued, thoſe lands ſhould returne to his father againe, ſo as the French king might not marrie the kings ſonne at his pleaſure, nor appoint vnto him any gardians or gouernours. This ordinance was made at Douer by the kings charter, with conſent of the prelats and other noble men of the realme there preſent, the morrow after the Natiuitie of our ladie, and on the thurſdaie following, the kings ſonne tooke the ſea, and with him Walter biſhop of Exceſter and others in competent number, and about the feaſt of ſaint Mathew the apoſtle, he did homage to his vncle the French king at Bois de Vincennes, vnder certeine proteſtations made, as well on the one part as the other.

A drie ſummer.

Cattell died.

The king ſendeth for his wife and ſon to returne home.

The ſummer this yeare prooued excéeding hot and drie, ſo that ſprings and riuers failed to yéeld their accuſtomed courſe of waters, by reaſon wherof great numbers of cattell and beaſts, both wild and tame died, through lacke of conuenient liquor to aſſwage their vehement thirſt. In the beginning of the next ſpring, king Edward ſent into France vnto his wife and ſonne, commanding them, now that they had made an end of their buſineſſe, to returne home with all conuenient ſpéed. The quéene receiuing the meſſage from hir huſband, whether it was ſo that ſhe was ſtaied by hir brother, vnto whome belike ſhe had complained after what manner ſhe was vſed at hir huſbands hands, being had in no regard with him: or for that ſhe had no mind to returne home, bicauſe ſhe was loth to ſée all things ordered out of frame by the counſell of the Spenſers, whereof to heare ſhe was wearie: or whether (as the manner of women is) ſhe was long about to prepare hir ſelfe forward, ſhe ſlacked all the ſummer, and ſent letters euer to excuſe hir tarriance. But yet bicauſe ſhe would not run in any ſuſpicion with hir huſband, ſhe ſent diuerſe of hir folkes before hir into England by ſoft iournies. A lamentable caſe, that ſuch diuiſion ſhould be betwéene a king and his quéene, being lawfullie married, and hauing iſſue of their bodies, which ought to haue made that their copulation more comfortable: but (alas) what will not a woman be drawne and allured vnto, if by euill counſell ſhe be once aſſaulted? And what will ſhe leaue vndoone, though neuer ſo inconuenient to thoſe that ſhould be moſt déere vnto hir, ſo hir owne fanſie and will be ſatiſfied? And how hardlie is ſhe reuoked from procéeding in an euill action, if ſhe haue once taken a taſte of the ſame? As verie truly is reported by the comedie-writer, ſaieng,

Plaut. in Truc.

But to the purpoſe. King Edward not a little offended with king Charles, by whoſe meanes he knew that the woman thus lingered abroad, he procured pope John to write his letters vnto the French king, admoniſhing him to ſend home his ſiſter and hir ſonne vnto hir huſband. But when this nothing auailed, a proclamation was made in the moneth of December, the ninetéenth yeare of this kings reigne, that if the quéene and hir ſonne entred not the land by the octaues of the Epiphanie next inſuing in peaceable wiſe, they ſhould be taken for enimies to the realme and crowne of England. ¶ Here authors varie, for ſome write, that vpon knowledge had of this proclamation, the queene determined to returne into England forthwith, that ſhe might be reconciled to hir huſband.

Others write, and that more truelie, how ſhe being highlie diſpleaſed, both with the Spenſers and the king hir huſband, that ſuffered himſelfe to be miſled by their counſels, did appoint indéed to returne into England, not to be reconciled, but to ſtir the people to ſome rebellion, wherby ſhe might reuenge hir manifold iniuries. Which (as the proofe of the thing ſhewed) ſéemeth to be moſt true, for ſhe being a wiſe woman, & conſidering that ſith the Spenſers had excluded, put out, and remoued all good men, from and beſides the kings councell, and placed in their roomes ſuch of their clients, ſeruants and fréends as pleaſed them, ſhe might well thinke that there was ſmall hope to be had in hir huſband, who heard no man but the ſaid Spenſers, which ſhe knew hated hir deadlie. Wherevpon, after that the tearme prefixed in the proclamation was expired, the king cauſed to be ſeized into his hands, all ſuch lands, as belonged either to his ſonne, or to his wife.

Sir Robert walkfare.

About the ſame time, one ſir Robert Walkfare knight, a right hardie man of his hands, but craftie and ſubtill (who being taken in the warres which the lords raiſed againſt the king, had béene committed to priſon in the caſtell of Corſe) found meanes now to kill the conſtable of that caſtell moſt cruellie, and eſcaping awaie, got ouer to the quéene into France, and ſo the number of them that ran out of the realme vnto hir dailie increaſed. This ſir Robert Walkfare was a great procurer of the diſcord betwixt the king and the lords, and a chéefe leader, or rather ſeducer of that noble man Humfrie de Bohune earle of Hereford: and whileſt other gaue themſelues to ſéeke a reformation in the decaied ſtate of the commonwealth, he ſet his mind vpon murders and robberies. Diuerſe other about the ſame time fled out of the realme vnto the quéene, and vnto hir ſonne the earle of Cheſter. But in the meane time, Walter Stapleton biſhop of Excester, which hitherto had remained with the quéene in France, ſtale now from hir, and got ouer into England, opening to the king all the counſell and whole mind of the quéene: which thing turned firſt of all vnto his owne deſtruction, as ſhall after appeare.

The biſhop of Excester cõmeth from the quéene.

Sir Oliuer de Ingham lieutenant of Gaſcoine.

About the ſame time, one ſir Oliuer de Ingham, a yoong, luſtie, and valiant knight, was by the kings ſonne the duke of Aquitaine (not without his fathers conſent) eſtabliſhed lord warden of the marches of Guien, the which ſir Oliuer gathering an armie of hired ſoldiers, Spaniards, Aragons, and Gaſcoins, inuaded the countrie of Agenois (which the French king held yet in his hands contrarie to couenant) and recouering it from the French, cléerelie reduced it to the Engliſh dominion. Moreouer, ſir Iohn Oturum, ſir Nicholas Kiriell, and ſir Iohn Felton, admerals by the kings appointment, with the fléets of the eaſt, ſouth, and weſt parts, went to the ſea, to apprehend ſuch Frenchmen as they might méet withall. They according to their commiſſion beſtirred themſelues ſo, that within few daies they tooke ſix ſcore ſaile of Normans, and brought them into England, wherevpon the diſpleaſure ſore increaſed betwixt the two realmes.

Agenois recouered out of the Frenchmens hands.

Ships of Normandie taken.

The king of England ſtood not onelie in doubt of the Frenchmen, but more of his owne people that remained in France, leaſt they thorough helpe of the French ſhould inuade the land, and therefore he commanded the hauens and ports to be ſuerlie watched, leſt ſome ſudden inuaſion might happilie be attempted, for it was well vnderſtood, that the quéene meant not to returne, till ſhe might bring with hir the lord Mortimer, and the other baniſhed men, who in no wiſe could obteine anie fauour at the kings hands, ſo long as the Spenſers bare rule. ¶ The pope lamenting this matter, ſent two biſhops into England, to reconcile the king and quéene, and alſo to agrée the two kings. Theſe biſhops were reuerentlie receiued, but more than reuerence here they obteined not, and ſo departed as they came.

Anno. Reg.20.

The lord Beaumont of Heinault.

King Edward vnderſtanding all the quéenes drift, at length ſought the French kings fauour, and did ſo much by letters and promiſe of bribes with him and his councell, that quéene Iſabell was deſtitute in manner of all helpe there, ſo that ſhe was glad to withdraw into Heinault, by the comfort of Iohn the lord Beaumont, the earle of Heinault his brother, who being then in the court of France, and lamenting quéene Iſabels caſe, imagined with himſelfe of ſome marriage that might be had betwixt the yoong prince of Wales, and ſome of the daughters of his brother the earle of Heinault, and therevpon required hir to go into Heinault, and he would be glad to attend hir. She gladlie conſenting hereto, went thither with him, where ſhe was moſt ioifullie receiued with hir ſonne, and all other of hir traine.

The quéene of England with hir ſon goeth into Heinault. Polydor.

Caxton.

The Spenſers (ſome write) procured hir baniſhment out of France, and that ſhe was aduiſed by the earle of Arthois chéefelie to repaire into Heinault. Alſo I find, that the Spenſers deliuered fiue barrels of ſiluer, the ſumme amounting vnto fiue thouſand marks, vnto one Arnold of Spaine a broker, appointing him to conueie it ouer into France, to beſtowe it vpon ſuch fréends as they had there of the French kings counſell, by whoſe meanes the king of France did baniſh his ſiſter out of his relme. But this monie was met with vpon the ſea by certeine Zelanders, and taken, togither with the ſaid Arnold, and preſented to the earle of Heinault, vnder whoſe dominion the Zelanders in thoſe daies remained, of which good hap the earle and quéene Iſabell greatlie reioiſed.

Fabian. A marriage concluded.

In the time that the quéene and hir ſonne laie in the court of the earle of Heinault, a marriage was concluded betwixt the prince of Wales, and the ladie Philip, daughter to the ſaid earle, vpon certeine conditions, whereof one was, that the ſaid erle ſhould at his proper coſts ſet ouer into England the ſaid prince of Wales, with a crue of foure hundred men of armes. But whether there was any ſuch mariage as then concluded, and that in conſideration thereof, the earle of Heinault aided quéene Iſabell and hir ſonne, it may be doubted, bicauſe other writers make no ſuch report. Neuertheleſſe, certeine it is, that the earls brother ſir Iohn de Heinault lord Beaumont, was appointed with certeine bands of men of arms, to the number of foure hundred or fiue hundred, to paſſe ouer with the ſaid quéene and hir ſonne into England, and ſo therevpon began to make his purueiance for that iournie, which thing when it came to the knowledge of king Edward and the Spenſers, they cauſed muſters to be taken through the realme, and ordeined beacons to be ſet vp, kept and watched, as well in the vallies by the ſea ſide, as within the countries, vpon hilles and high grounds, that the ſame vpon occaſion of the enimies arriuall, might be ſet on fire, to warne the countries adioining to aſſemble and reſiſt them.

Caxton. Prouiſion made in England to reſiſt the quéene.

But quéene Iſabell and hir ſonne, with ſuch others as were with hir in Heinault, ſtaied not their iournie for doubt of all their aduerſaries prouiſion, but immediatlie after that they had once made their purueiances, and were readie to depart, they tooke the ſea, namelie the quéene, hir ſonne, Edmund of Wodſtoke earle of Kent, ſir Iohn de Heinault aforeſaid, and the lord Roger Mortimer of Wigmore, a man of good experience in the warres, and diuerſe others, hauing with them a ſmall companie of Engliſhmen, with a crue of Heinewiers and Almains, to the number of 2757 armed men, the which ſailing forth towards England, landed at length in Suffolke, at an hauen called Orwell beſides Harwich, the 25 daie of September. Immediatlie after that the quéene and hir ſonne were come to land, it was wonder to ſée how faſt the people reſorted vnto them; and firſt of all, the earle Marſhall, in whoſe lands ſhe firſt came on ſhore, repaired vnto hir, ſo did the earle of Leiceſter, and diuerſe barons & knights of thoſe parts, with all the prelats in manner of the land, as the biſhops of Lincolne, Hereford, Dubline, and Elie, the which being ioined with the quéene, made a great armie. The archbiſhop of Canturburie and others aided hir with monie.

After that ſhe had refreſhed hir people a little ſpace at ſaint Edmundſburie, ſhe marched foorth to ſeeke the aduerſaries of hir and of the realme, as ſhe bruted it; but they ſtill keeping themſelues neere to the kings perſon, that vnder the ſhadow of the wings of his protection they might remaine in more ſafegard, durſt not depart from his preſence. At the time of the queenes landing he was at London, and being ſore amazed with the newes, he required aid of the Londoners.

The anſwer of the Londoners to the king.

They anſwered, that they would doo all the honour they might vnto the king, the queene, and to their ſonne the lawfull heire of the land: but as for ſtrangers & traitors to the realme, they would keepe them out of their gates, and reſiſt them with all their forces: but to go foorth of the citie further than that they might returne before ſunne-ſetting, they refuſed, pretending certeine liberties in that behalfe to them granted in times paſt, as they alledged.

The king forſaketh London, and goeth towards the marches of wales.

The king not greatlie liking of this anſwer, fortified the tower, and leauing within it his yoonger ſon John of Eltham, and the wife of the lord chamberleine Hugh Spenſer the yoonger that was his neece, he departed towards the marches of Wales, there to raiſe an armie againſt the queene.

A proclamation ſet forth by the king.

Before his departure from London, he ſet foorth a proclamation, that euerie man vnder paine of forfeiting of life & goods, ſhould reſiſt them that were thus landed, aſſaile, and kill them, the queene, his ſonne Edward, and his brother the earle of Kent onelie excepted; and whoſoeuer could bring the head or dead corps of the lord Mortimer of Wigmore, ſhould haue for his labour a thouſand marks.

The queenes proclamation.

The queenes proclamations on the other part willed all men to hope for peace, the Spenſers publike enimies of the realme, and the lord chancellor Robert Baldocke, with their aſſiſtants onlie excepted, through whoſe meanes the preſent trouble was happened to the realme. And it was forbidden, that no man ſhould take ought from any perſon, and who ſo euer could bring to the queene the head of Hugh Spenſer the yoonger, ſhould haue two thouſand pounds of the queenes gift.

The biſhop of Exceſter left in charge with the citie of London.

The king at his departure from London, left maiſter Walter Stapleton the biſhop of Exceſter behind him, to haue the rule of the citie of London. Then ſhortlie after, the queene with hir ſon, making towards London, wrote a letter to the maior, and the citizens, requiring to haue aſſiſtance for the putting downe of the Spenſers, not onelie knowne enimies of theirs, but alſo common enimies to all the realme of England.

Caxton.

To this letter no anſwer at the firſt was made, wherefore an other was ſent, dated at Baldocke the ſixt daie of October, vnder the names of Iſabell by the grace of God queene of England, ladie of Ireland, and counteſſe of Pontieu, and of Edward eldeſt ſonne to the king of England, duke of Guien, earle of Cheſter, of Pontien and of Muttrell. This letter being directed to the maior and communaltie of London, conteining in effect, that the cauſe of their landing and entring into the realme at that time, was onelie for the honor of the king and wealth of the realme, meaning hurt to no maner of perſon, but to the Spenſers, was faſtened vpon the croſſe in Cheape, then called the new croſſe in Cheape, on the night before the ninth daie of October. Diuerſe copies of the ſame letter were ſet vp, and faſtened vpon windowes and doores in other places of the citie, and one of the ſame copies was tacked vpon the lord maiors gates.

Fabian.
Thom. Walſi.

After which letter thus publiſhed in the citie, a great number of artificers, and other that loued not to ſit in reſt vpon ſuch occaſion of diſcord offered, now that things were in broile in other parts of the realme, aſſembled in great numbers, & with weapon in hand came to the lord maior of the citie, whom they knew to fauor the kings part, & therefore they forced him through feare of ſome iniurious violence, to receiue an oth to ſtand to their ordinance, which was to put to death all thoſe that were aduerſaries to the queene, or had by any meanes procured the hinderance of the cities liberties, vnder pretext of which oth they ran and tooke one of the citizens, called John Marſhall, who bicauſe he was verie familiar with the earle of Gloceſter, and therefore ſuſpected to haue accuſed the citizens, they ſtroke off his head, and ſpoiled all his goods.

The lord maior forced to take an oth.

John Marſhall taken & beheaded.

On the ſame day, being the fourteenth of October, continuing their rage, they ran to the houſe of the biſhop of Exceſter, Walter de Stapleton, and ſetting fire on the gates, they entred and ſpoiled him of all his plate, iewels, monie and goods. And as it chanced in an infortunate houre for him, the biſhop being at the ſame time returning from the fields, would not ſeeme to ſhrinke, although he was admoniſhed of theſe outragious attempts of the people; but ſitting on horſſebacke, came to the north doore of S. Paule, where foorthwith the furious people laid violent hands on him, threw him downe, and drew him moſt outragiouſlie into Cheapeſide, where they proclamed him an open traitor, a ſeducer of the king, and a deſtroier of their liberties.

The biſhop of Exceſter beheaded.

The biſhop had vpon him a certeine cote of defenſe, which was called an aketon, the ſame therefore being plucked beſide his backe as all other his garments, they ſhore his head from his ſhoulders, and to the like death they put two of his ſeruants, the one an eſquire, and the other a yeoman. The biſhops head was ſet on a pole for a ſpectacle, that the remembrance of his death, and the cauſe thereof might continue. His bodie was buried in an old churchyard of the pied friers, without any manner of exequies of funerall ſeruice doone for him.

The chiefeſt cauſe of the enimitie which the Londoners bare towards this biſhop, roſe hereof. He being lord treaſuror, procured that the iuſtices itinerants did ſit in the citie of London, and where manie of the citizens were found offendors, and iuſtlie puniſhed, as well by looſing their freedoms, as by paieng their fines, and ſuffering corporall puniſhments, they conceiued a great diſpleaſure towards him. Moreouer, it was ſaid, that he had raiſed a great multitude of armed men againſt the queene, and hir ſon the duke of Aquitaine, and therefore did the Londoners (as they affirmed) ſeeke to preuent his proceedings. ¶ The morrow after that they had thus beheaded the biſhop of Exceſter, they tooke by chance ſir John Weſton conſtable of the tower, and from him they tooke the keies of the ſame tower, and ſo entering the tower, they ſet all the priſoners at libertie, and in like caſe all thoſe that were impriſoned in maner through the land were permitted to go at large, and all the baniſhed men and outlawes were likewiſe reſtored home.

The Londoners hauing the tower thus at their commandement, remooued all the officers therein placed by the king, and put other in their roomes, in the name of the lord John de Eltham the kings ſon, whom they named warden of the citie and land. And yet they ceaſſed not to commit manie robberies & other outragious & moſt inſolent parts. In the meane time, the king being come to Briſtow, left that citie in the keeping of the earle of Wincheſter. And with the earles of Gloceſter and Arundell, and the lord chancellor ſir Robert Baldocke, he ſailed ouer into Wales, there to raiſe a power of Welſhmen in defenſe of himſelfe againſt the queens and hir adherents, which he had good hope to find amongeſt the

But now to ſpeake of the queene, yée moſt vnderſtand, that after ſhe had receiued knowledge from the Londoners, that they were wholie at hir deuotion, ſhe being glad thereof, turned hir iournie toward Wales to follow the king, and comming to Oxenford, ſtaied there a while, and ſtill came people to hir from all ſides. Héere Adam de Corleton the biſhop of Hereford, which latelie before had béene ſore fined by the king, for that he was accuſed to ſtirre the people to rebellion, and to aid the barons (as yée haue heard) made a pithie oration to the armie, declaring that the queene and hir ſonne were returned onelie into England, to the intent to perſecute the Spenſers, & reforme the ſtate of the realme. And ſith then that they now were come in maner to an end of the tyrannie of moſt naughtie men, and of the danger that might growe dailie thereof, he exhorted them with patient minds to beare the ſmall trauell that remained in purſuit of the enimies; and as for reward, they might looke for all things by the victorie, and the quéenes liberalitie, whoſe loue was ſuch towards the common-wealth, as ſhe onelie applied all hir endeuours and doings to the aduancement thereof.

From thence ſhe went to Briſtow, and the morrow after hir thither comming, being the euen of the apoſtles Simon and Iude, through the inſtant calling vpon of the people, the earle of Wincheſter was drawne forth in his cote armor vnto the common gallows, and there hanged. His head was after cut off, and ſent to Wincheſter, whereof he was earle.

Sir Thomas Blunt, lord Steward to the king, reuolteth to the quéene.

The king in this meane time kept not in one place, but ſhifting hither and thither, remained in great care. Wherevpon ſir Thomas Blunt, an ancient knight, and lord ſteward of the kings houſe, tooke his ſeruants, with vittels, horſſes, and armour in great plentie, and came to the queene, of whome, and likewiſe of hir ſonne he was ioifullie receiued, and diuerſe of them which he brought with him were reteined, and the other had letters of protection, and were ſent awaie in louing manner. ¶ The king with the earle of Gloceſter, and the lord chancellor, taking the ſea, meant to haue gone either into the Ile of Lundaie, or elſe into Ireland, but being toſſed with contrarie winds for the ſpace of a wéeke togither, at length he landed in Glamorganſhire, and got him to the abbeie and caſtell of Neith, there ſecretlie remaining vpon truſt of the Welſhmens promiſes. ¶ Hugoline Spenſer, the ſonne of the earle of Gloceſter, defended the caſtell of Kerſilie, againſt the power of the queene and of hir ſonne till eaſter following, and then compounding for the ſafetie of his owne life, and all theirs within that caſtell, and likewiſe for the inioieng of their goods, he yéelded it to the hands of the men of warre that held ſiege before it in the queenes name, and of hir ſonne.

But now touching the king, whileſt he was thus abroad, and no man wiſt where he was become, proclamations were made in the queenes armie dailie, in the which he was ſummoned to returne, and to take the rule of the relme into his hands, if he would be conformable to the minds of his true liege men; but when he appeared not, the lords of the land aſſembled in councell at Hereford, whither the quéene was come from Briſtow, and there was the lord Edward prince of Wales and duke of Aquitaine made warden of England, by common decrée, vnto whome all men, as to the lord warden of the realme, made fealtie, in receiuing an oth of allegiance to be faithfull and loiall to him. After this, they made the biſhop of Norwich lord chancellor, and the biſhop of Wincheſter lord treaſuror.

They vſed ſuch diligence in that charge, that finallie with large gifts beſtowed on the Welſhmen, they came to vnderſtand where the king was, and ſo on the day of ſaint Edmund the archbiſhop, being the ſixtéenth of Nouember, they tooke him in the monaſterie of Neith, néere to the caſtell of Laturſſan, togither with Hugh Spenſer the ſonne called earle of Gloceſter, the lord chancellour Robert de Baldocke, and Simon de Reading the kings marſhall, not caring for other the kings ſeruants, whome they ſuffered to eſcape.

Then was his head ſtriken off, his bowels taken out of his bodie and burnt, and his bodie diuided in quarters. His head was ſent to London, and ſet vpon the bridge with other, & his quarters were ſent to foure ſeuerall parts of the realme, and there pight vpon poles, to be ſéene of the people. The prince of wales made lord warden of the realme.

A new chancellor and treaſuror.

But now touching the king, whileſt he was thus abroad, and no man wiſt where he was become, proclamations were made in the queenes armie dailie, in the which he was ſummoned to returne, and to take the rule of the relme into his hands, if he would be conformable to the minds of his true liege men; but when he appeared not, the lords of the land aſſembled in councell at Hereford, whither the quéene was come from Briſtow, and there was the lord Edward prince of Wales and duke of Aquitaine made warden of England, by common decrée, vnto whome all men, as to the lord warden of the realme, made fealtie, in receiuing an oth of allegiance to be faithfull and loiall to him. After this, they made the biſhop of Norwich lord chancellor, and the biſhop of Wincheſter lord treaſuror.

The quéene remained about a moneths ſpace at Hereford, and in the meane while ſent the lord Henrie erle of Leiceſter, and the lord William la Zouch, and one Rice ap Howell, that was latelie deliuered out of the tower where he was priſoner, into Wales, to ſée if they might find means to apprehend the king by helpe of their acquaintance in thoſe parts, all thrée of them hauing lands thereabouts, where it was knowne the king for the more part kept. They vſed ſuch diligence in that charge, that finallie with large gifts beſtowed on the Welſhmen, they came to vnderſtand where the king was, and ſo on the day of ſaint Edmund the archbiſhop, being the ſixtéenth of Nouember, they tooke him in the monaſterie of Neith, néere to the caſtell of Laturſſan, togither with Hugh Spenſer the ſonne called earle of Gloceſter, the lord chancellour Robert de Baldocke, and Simon de Reading the kings marſhall, not caring for other the kings ſeruants, whome they ſuffered to eſcape.

The king is brought to Killingworth.

Hugh Spenſer the yonger executed.

The king was deliuered to the earle of Leiceſter, who conueied him by Monmouth and Leadburie, to Killingworth caſtle, where he remained the whole winter. The earle of Gloceſter, the lord chancellor, and Simon de Reading, were brought to Hereford, and there preſented to the queene, where on the foure & twentith of Nouember, the ſaid earle was drawne and hanged on a paire of gallowes of fiftie foot in heigth. Then was his head ſtriken off, his bowels taken out of his bodie and burnt, and his bodie diuided in quarters. His head was ſent to London, and ſet vpon the bridge with other, & his quarters were ſent to foure ſeuerall parts of the realme, and there pight vpon poles, to be ſéene of the people. He was drawne in his owne cote armour, about the which there were letters embrodered plaine to be read, conteining a parcell of the 52 pſalme, as followeth.

1 Quid gloriaris in malitia potens?
2 Iniquitatem tota die, iniuſtitiam cogitauit lingua tua, ſicut nouacula acuta feciſti dolum,
3 Dilexiſti malitiam ſuper bonitatem, iniuſtitiam magis quàm loqui iuſtitiam,
4 Dilexiſti omnia verba demerſionis lingua doloſa,
5 Propterea Deus deſtruat te in finem, euellat te & emigrare te faciat de tabernaculo tuo, & radicem dicem tuam de terra viuentium,

6 Videbunt iuſti & timebunt, & ſuper eum ridebunt, & dicent,
7 Ecce homo qui non poſuit Deum adiutorem ſuum, ſed ſperauit in multitudine diuitiarum ſuarum, & præualuit in vanitate ſua.

1 Why boaſteſt thou that thou canſt do miſchiefe?
2 Thy toong imagineth wickedneſſe, & with lies thou cutteſt like a ſharpe raſor,
3 Thou haſt loued vngratiouſneſſe more than goodneſſe, and to talke of lies more than righteouſneſſe,
4 Thou haſt loued to ſpeake all words that may doo hurt ô thou falſe toong,
5 Therefore ſhall God deſtroie thee for euer, he ſhall take thee, and plucke thee out of thy dwelling, and roote thee out of the land of the liuing,
6 The righteous alſo ſhall ſee this, and feare, and ſhall laugh him to ſcorne,
7 Lo this is the man that tooke not God for his ſtrength, but truſted vnto the multitude of his riches, & ſtrengthned himſelfe in his wickedneſſe.

Simon de Reading executed.

On the ſame daie was Simon de Reading drawne and hanged on the ſame gallowes, but ten foot lower than the other. This Reading being marſhall of the kings houſe, had vſed the quéene verie vncourteouſlie, giuing hir manie reprochfull words, which now were remembred, and therefore may ſerue for an example, how dangerous a thing it is to ſpeake euill of the higher powers. The common fame went, that after this Hugh Spenſer the ſonne was taken, he would receiue no ſuſtenance, wherefore he was the ſooner put to death, or elſe had he béene conueied to London, there to haue ſuffered. Iohn earle of Arundell was taken on S. Hughs day, in the parts about Shreweſburie, and the ſame day ſeuennight before the execution of the earle of Gloceſter, Hugh Spenſer the yonger, as well the ſaid earle, who had béene euer a great fréend to both the Spenſers, as alſo Iohn Daniell, and Thomas de Micheldeure were put to death at Hereford, by procurement of the lord Mortimer of Wigmore, that hated them extreamelie, by reaſon whereof they were not like to ſpéed much better, for what he willed the ſame was doone, and without him the quéene in all theſe matters did nothing.

The fauour in which the lord Mortimer was with the quéene.

The chancellour Robert de Baldocke being committed to the cuſtodie of Adam de Torleton biſhop of Hereford, remained at Hereford in ſafe kéeping till Candlemaſſe next, and then the biſhop being at London, appointed him to be brought vp, where not without the biſhops conſent (as was thought) he was taken out of his houſe by violence, and laid in Newgate, where ſhortlie after through inward ſorow and extreame gréefe of mind he ended his life. Thus the quéene and hir companie hauing compaſſed their buſineſſe in ſo happie maner as they could wiſh, she with hir ſonne and a great companie of lords and gentlemen repaired vnto Wallingford, where they kept Chriſtmaſſe togither with great ioy and triumph, the king in the meane while remaining (as ye haue heard) at Killingworth, in a kind of honorable eſtate, although he was priſoner. ¶ After Chriſtmaſſe, the quéene with hir ſon and ſuch lords as were then with them, remoued to London, where at their comming thither, which was before the feaſt of the Epiphanie, they were receiued with great ioy, triumph, and large gifts, and ſo brought to Weſtminſter, where the morrow after the ſame feaſt, the parlement which before hand had béene ſummoned began, in which it was concluded and fullie agréed by all the ſtates (for none durſt ſpeake to the contrarie) that for diuerſe articles which were put vp againſt the king, he was not worthie longer to reigne, and therefore ſhould be depoſed, and withall they willed to haue his ſonne Edward duke of Aquitaine to reigne in his place. This ordinance was openlie pronounced in the great hall at Weſtminſter by one of the lords, on the feaſt day of ſaint Hilarie being tueſdaie, to the which all the people conſented. The archbiſhop of Canturburie taking his theame, Vox populi, vox Dei, made a ſermon, exhorting the people to praie to God to beſtow of his grace vpon the new king. And ſo when the ſermon was ended, euerie man departed to his lodging. But the duke of Aquitaine, when he perceiued that his mother tooke the matter heauilie in appearance, for that hir huſband ſhould be thus depriued of the crowne, he proteſted that he would neuer take it on him, without his fathers conſent, and ſo thervpon it was concluded, that certeine ſolemne meſſengers ſhould go to Killingworth to mooue the king to make reſignation of his crowne and title of the kingdome vnto his ſonne.

Robert Baldocke ended his life.

A parlement.

The king is depoſed by act of parlement.

The archbiſhop of Canturburie preacheth.

There were ſent on this meſſage (as ſome write) thrée or (as other haue) two biſhops, two earles, two abbats, two or (as Tho. de la More and Walſingham haue) foure barons, and for euerie countie, citie, and burrough, and likewiſe for the cinque ports, certeine knights and burgeſſes. The biſhops that were ſent were theſe (as T. de la More noteth) Iohn de Stratford biſhop of Wincheſter, Adam de Torleton biſhop of Hereford, and Henrie biſhop of Lincolne. The two earles (as Southwell hath) were Lancaſter and Warwike: the two barons, Roſe and Courtney: beſide theſe (as he ſaith) there were two abbats, two priors, two iuſtices, two friers of the order of preachers, two of the Carmelits, two knights for the commons on the north ſide of Trent, and two for the other on the ſouth ſide of the ſame riuer: two citizens for London, two burgeſſes for the cinque ports, ſo as in all there went of this meſſage (as Southwell ſaith) thrée and twentie or rather foure and twentie perſons of one degrée and other.

None of the frier minors went, bicauſe they would not be the bringers of ſo heauie tidings, ſith he had euer borne them great good will. The biſhops of Wincheſter and Lincolne went before, and comming to Killingworth, aſſociated with them the earle of Leiceſter, of ſome called the earle of Lancaſter, that had the king in kéeping. And hauing ſecret conference with the king, they ſought to frame his mind, ſo as he might be contented to reſigne the crowne to his ſonne, bearing him in hand, that if he refuſed ſo to doo, the people in reſpect of the euill will which they had conceiued againſt him, would not faile but procéed to the election of ſome other that ſhould happilie not touch him in linage. And ſith this was the onlie meane to bring the land in quiet, they willed him to conſider how much he was bound in conſcience to take that waie that ſhould be ſo beneficiall to the whole realme.

The king being ſore troubled to heare ſuch diſpleaſant newes, was brought into a maruelous agonie: but in the end, for the quiet of the realme and doubt of further danger to himſelfe, he determined to follow their aduiſe, and ſo when the other commiſſioners were come, and that the biſhop of Hereford had declared the cauſe wherefore they were ſent, the king in preſence of them all, notwithſtanding his outward countenance diſcouered how much it inwardlie grieued him; yet after he was come to himſelfe, he anſwered that he knew that he was fallen into this miſerie through his owne offenſes, and therefore he he was contented patientlie to ſuffer it, but yet it could not (he ſaid) but greeue him, that he had in ſuch wiſe runne into the hatred of all his people: notwithſtanding he gaue the lords moſt heartie thanks, that they had ſo forgotten their receiued iniuries, and ceaſſed not to beare ſo much good will towards his ſonne Edward, as to wiſh that he might reigne ouer them. Therefore to ſatiſfie them, ſith otherwiſe it might not be, he vtterlie renounced his right to the kingdome, and to the whole adminiſtration thereof. And laſtlie he beſought the lords now in his miſerie to forgiue him ſuch offenſes as he had committed againſt them. Ah lamentable ruine from roialtie to miſerable calamitie, procured by them cheefelie that ſhould haue beene the pillers of the kings eſtate, and not the hooked engins to pull him downe from his throne! So that here we ſee it verefied by triall, that

The ambaſſadours with this anſwer returning to London, declared the ſame vnto all the ſtates, in order as they had receiued it, wherevpon great ioy was made of all men, to conſider that they might now by courſe of law proceed to the chooſing of a new king. And ſo therevpon the nine and twentith day of Ianuarie in ſeſſion of parlement then at Weſtminſter aſſembled, was the third king Edward, ſonne to king Edward the ſecond, choſen and elected king of England, by the authoritie of the ſame parlement, firſt (as before is ſaid) confirmed by his fathers reſignation: and the firſt day of his reigne they agreed to be the fiue and twentith of Ianuarie, in the yeare 1326 after the account of the church of England, beginning the yeare the fiue & twentith day of March, but by the common account of writers, it was in the yeare 1327. ¶ On the ſame daie ſir William Truſſell procurator for the whole parlement did renounce the old king in name of the whole parlement, with all homages and fealties due to him, ſo that the ſame fiue and twentith day of Ianuarie hath beene reputed and taken for the firſt day of the beginning of king Edward the third his reigne, ſo that whatſoeuer chanced before that day, is aſcribed to be doone during the reigne of his father.

But now to make an end of the life, as well as of the reigne of king Edward the ſecond, I find, that after he was depoſed of his kinglie honour and title, he remained for a time at Killingworth, in cuſtodie of the earle of Leiceſter. But within a while the queene was informed by the biſhop of Hereford, (whoſe hatred towards him had no end) that the erle of Leiceſter fauoured hir huſband too much, and more than ſtood with the ſuertie of hir ſonnes ſtate, wherevpon he was appointed to the keeping of two other lords, Thomas Berkley, and Iohn Matreuers, who receiuing him of the earle of Leiceſter the third of Aprill, conueied him from Killingworth vnto the caſtell of Berkley, ſituate not farre off from the riuer of Seuerne, almoſt the midwaie betwixt Gloceſter and Briſtow.

But forſomuch as the lord Berkley vſed him more courteouſlie than his aduerſaries wiſhed him to doo, he was diſcharged of that office, and ſir Thomas Gourney appointed in his ſtead, who togither with the lord Matreuers conueied him ſecretlie (for feare leaſt he ſhould be taken from them by force) from one ſtrong place to another, as to the caſtell of Corfe, and ſuch like, ſtill remoouing with him in the night ſeaſon, till at length they thought it ſhould not be knowne whither they had conueied him. And ſo at length they brought him backe againe in ſecret maner vnto the caſtell of Berkley, where whileſt he remained (as ſome write) the queene would ſend vnto him courteous and louing letters with apparell and other ſuch things, but ſhe would not once come neere to viſit him, bearing him in hand that ſhe durſt not, for feare of the peoples diſpleaſure, who hated him ſo extreamelie. Howbeit, ſhe with the reſt of hir confederats had (no doubt) laid the plot of their deuiſe for his diſpatch, though by painted words ſhe pretended a kind of remorſe to him in this his diſtreſſe, & would ſeeme to be faultleſſe in the ſight of the world, for

But as he thus continued in priſon, cloſelie kept, ſo that none of his freends might haue acceſſe vnto him, as in ſuch caſes it often happeneth, when men be in miſerie, ſome will euer pitie their ſtate, there were diuerſe of the nobilitie (of whome the earle of Kent was cheefe) began to deuiſe means by ſecret conference had togither, how they might reſtore him to libertie, diſcommending greatlie both queene Iſabell, and ſuch other as were appointed gouernours to the yong king, for his fathers ſtreict impriſonment. The queene and other the gouernours vnderſtanding this conſpiracie of the earle of Kent, and of his brother, durſt not yet in that new and greene world go about to puniſh it, but rather thought good to take awaie from them the occaſion of accompliſhing their purpoſe. And herevpon the queene and the biſhop of Hereford wrote ſharpe letters vnto his keepers, blaming them greatlie, for that they dealt ſo gentlie with him, and kept him no ſtreictlier, but ſuffered him to haue ſuch libertie, that he aduertiſed ſome of his freends abroad how and in what manner he was vſed, and withall the biſhop of Hereford vnder a ſophiſticall forme of words ſignified to them by his letters, that they ſhould diſpatch him out of the waie, the tenor whereof wrapped in obſcuritie ran thus:

and brought foward England was beheaded on the ſea, leaſt he ſhould accuſe the chiefe dooers, as the biſhop and other. Iohn Matreuers, repenting himſelfe, laie long hidden in Germanie, and in the end died penitentlie. Thus was king Edward murthered, in the yeare 1327, on the 22 of September. The fame went that by this Edward the ſecond, after his death manie miracles were wrought. So that the like opinion of him was conceiued as before had béene of earle Thomas of Lancaſter, namelie amongſt the common people. He was knowne to be of a good and courteous nature, though not of moſt pregnant wit.

The nature & diſpoſition of king Edward the ſecond.

And albeit in his youth he fell into certeine light crimes, and after by the companie and counſell of euill men, was induced vnto more heinous vices, yet was it thought that he purged the ſame by repentance, and patientlie ſuffered manie reprooſes, and finallie death it ſelfe (as before ye haue heard) after a moſt cruell maner. He had ſuerlie good cauſe to repent his former trade of liuing, for by his vndiſcréet and wanton miſgouernance, there were headed and put to death during his reigne (by iudgement of law) to the number of 28 barons and knights, ouer and beſide ſuch as were ſlaine in Scotland by his infortunate conduct.

All theſe miſchéefes and manie more happened not onlie to him, but alſo to the whole ſtate of the realme, in that he wanted iudgement and prudent diſcretion to make choiſe of ſage and diſcréet councellors, receiuing thoſe into his fauour, that abuſed the ſame to their priuate gaine and aduantage, not reſpecting the aduancement of the common-wealth, ſo they themſelues might atteine to riches and honour, for which they onelie ſought, inſomuch that by their couetous rapine, ſpoile, and immoderate ambition, the hearts of the common people & nobilitie were quite eſtranged from the dutifull loue and obedience which they ought to haue ſhewed to their ſouereigne, going about by force to wreſt him to follow their wils, and to ſéeke the deſtruction of them whome he commonlie fauoured, wherein ſuerlie they were worthie of blame, and to taſt (as manie of them did) the deſerued puniſhment for their diſobedient and diſloiall demeanors. For it was not the waie which they tooke to helpe the diſfigured ſtate of the common-wealth, but rather the readie meane to ouerthrow all, as if Gods goodneſſe had not béene the greater it muſt néeds haue come to paſſe, as to thoſe that ſhall well conſider the pitifull tragedie of this kings time it may well appeare.

His iſſue.

But now to procéed with that which remaineth touching this infortunate prince. He had iſſue by his wife quéene Iſabell two ſonnes, Edward which was made king whileſt he was yet aliue, and Iohn which died yoong: alſo two daughters, Elianor which died before ſhe came to yeares able for mariage; and Ione which was after giuen in mariage vnto Dauid king of Scotland. He was indifferentlie tall of ſtature, ſtrong of bodie, and healthfull, neither wanted there in him ſtoutneſſe of ſtomach, if his euill councellors had béene remooued, that he might haue ſhewed it in honorable exploits, which being kept backe by them, he could not doo. So that thereby it appeareth of what importance it is to be trained vp in youth with good and honeſt companie. ¶ It is ſaid that he was learned, inſomuch that there remaine verſes, which (as ſome haue written) he made whileſt he was in priſon. Certeine it is he fauored lerning, as by the creation of Oriall colledge in Oxford, & S. Maries hall, which were of his foundation, it may well be gathered.

Sée in Scotland.

Learned men we find recorded by Bale, to liue in this kings time theſe as follow. Iohn Duns that ſubtill logician, borne (as Leland hath gathered) in a village in Northumberland called Emildune, thrée miles diſtant from Alnwike, although other hold the contrarie, the Scots claiming him for their countrieman, and the Iriſhmen for theirs; Robert Walſingham a Carmelite frier that writ diuerſe treatiſes, Iohn Wilton an Auguſtine frier, Walter Winterborne, Rafe Lockſley, Nicholas Stanford, William Whitley, Thomas Ioice, Walter Ioice, William Gaineſburgh, Robert Baſton borne not farre from Notingham a Carmelite frier of Scarburgh, the ſame whome king Edward tooke with him into Scotland to write ſome remembrances of his victories, although being taken by the Scots, he was conſtreined by Robert Bruce to frame a dittie to a contrarie tune; Iohn Horminger a Suffolke man borne, William Riſhanger a monke of S. Albons an hiſtoriographer, Rafe Baldocke biſhop of London wrote alſo an hiſtorie, which was intituled Hiſtoria Anglica; Richard Bliton a Lincolnſhire man borne a Carmelite frier, Iohn Walſingham borne either in Walſingham or Brunham (as Bale ſuppoſeth) a Carmelite frier alſo, and wrote diuerſe treatiſes; Thomas Chabham a canon of Saliſburie and a doctor of diuinitie, Robert Plimpton borne in Deuonſhire a regular canon; Thomas Caſtleford a monke of Pomfret, William Manſfield, Iohn Canon, Robert Grime, William Aſkettle of Beuerley, Geffrey of Cornewall, Iohn Gatiſdene, Theobald Anglicus, Stephan Eiton or Edon, Iohn Goldſtone borne in Yorkeſhire, Iohn Winchelſey, Nicholas de Lyra a Iew by birth of thoſe that had their habitations in England, who wrote verie manie treatiſes, to his great commendation for his ſingular knowledge and zeale, which he ſhewed in diſprouing the Rabines that ſtill ſought to kéepe the Iewiſh nation in blindneſſe and vaine hope, in looking for another Meſſias; Rafe Acton an excellent diuine, Iohn Dumbleton a logician, Thomas Langford borne in Maldon in Eſſex a logician, Oſbert Pickenam a Carmelite frier of Lin in Norffolke, Nicholas Okeham a graie frier, William Ockam a frier minor that wrote diuerſe treatiſes, and namelie againſt Iohn Duns, and likewiſe againſt Iohn the thrée and twentith pope of that name in fauour of the emperour Lewes of Bauier, Richard Walingford, Thomas Haſelwood a canon of Léeds in Kent wrote a chronicle called Chronicon compendiarium, Robert Karew, Robert Perſcrutator borne in Yorkeſhire a blacke frier and a philoſopher or rather a magician, Richard Belgraue a Carmelite, Brinkley a minorite; and others.

Thus far infortunat Edward the second.

Edward the third, who came to the crowne by the reſignation of his father Edward the ſecond.

EDward the third of that name, the ſonne of Edward the ſecond, and of Iſabell the onelie daughter of Philip le Beau, & ſiſter to Charles the fift king of France, began his reigne as king of England, his father yet liuing, the 25 daie of Ianuarie, after the creation 5293, in the yeare of our lord 1327, after the account of them that begin the yeare at Chriſtmaſſe, 867 after the comming of the Saxons, 260 after the conqueſt, the 13 yeare of the reigne of Lewes the fourth then emperour, the ſeuenth of Charles the fift king of France, the ſecond of Andronicus Iunior emperour of the eaſt almoſt ended, and about the end of the 22 of Robert le Bruce king of Scotland. He was crowned at Weſtminſter on the day of the Purification of our ladie next inſuing, by the hands of Walter the archbiſhop of Canturburie.

Gouernours appointed.

And bicauſe he was but fourtéene yeares of age, ſo that to gouerne of himſelfe he was not ſufficient, it was decréed that twelue of the greateſt lords within the realme ſhould haue the rule and gouernment till he came to more perfect yeares. The names of which lords were as followeth. The archbiſhop of Canturburie, the archbiſhop of Yorke, the biſhops of Wincheſter and of Hereford, Henrie earle of Lancaſter, Thomas Brotherton earle marſhall, Edmund of Woodſtoke earle of Kent, Iohn earle of Warren, the lord Thomas Wake, the lord Henrie Percie, the lord Oliuer de Ingham, & the lord Iohn Ros. Theſe were ſworne of the kings councell, and charged with the gouernement as they would make anſwer. But this ordinance continued not long: for the quéene, and the lord Roger Mortimer tooke the whole rule ſo into their hands, that both the king and his ſaid councellors were gouerned onelie by them in all matters both high and low. Neuertheleſſe, although they had taken the regiment vpon them, yet could they not foreſée the tumults and vprores that preſentlie vpon the yong kings inthronizing did inſue: but néeds it muſt come to paſſe that is left written where children weare the crowne, & beare the ſcepter in hand,

Væ pueri terræ ſæpiſſimè ſunt ibi guerræ.

The franchiſes of the citie of London confirmed.

He confirmed the liberties and franchiſes of the citie of London, and granted that the maior of the ſame citie for the time being might ſit in all places of iudgement within the liberties thereof for chéefe iuſtice, aboue all other, the kings perſon onelie excepted; and that euerie alderman that had béene maior ſhould be iuſtice of peace through all the citie of London and countie of Middleſex; and euerie alderman that had not béene maior, ſhould be iuſtice of peace within his owne ward. He granted alſo to the citizens, that they ſhould not be conſtreined to go forth of the citie to anie warres in defenſe of the land, and that the franchiſes of the citie ſhould not be ſeized from thenceforth into the kings hands for anie cauſe, but onelie for treaſon and rebellion ſhewed by the whole citie. Alſo Southwarke was appointed to be vnder the rule of the citie, and the maior of London to be bailiffe of Southwarke, and to ordeine ſuch a ſubſtitute in the ſame borough as pleaſed him.

Records of Burie.

In the firſt yeare of this kings reigne, we find in records belonging to the abbeie of S. Edmundſburie in Suffolke, that the inhabitants of that towne raiſed a ſore commotion againſt the abbat & moonks of the ſame abbeie, and that at ſeuerall times, as firſt on the wedneſdaie next after the feaſt of the conuerſion of S. Paule, in the ſaid firſt yeare of this kings reigne, one Robert Foxton, Richard Draiton, and a great number of other, aſſembling themſelues togither in warlike order and araie, aſſaulted the ſaid abbeie, brake downe the gates, windowes, and doores, entered the houſe by force, and aſſailing certeine moonks and ſeruants that belonged to the abbat, did beat, wound, and euill intreat them, brake open a number of cheſts, coffers, and forſets, tooke out chalices of gold and ſiluer, books, veſtments, and other ornaments of the church, beſide a great quantitie of rich plate, and other furniture of houſehold, apparell, armour, and other things, beſide fiue hundred pounds in readie coine, & alſo thrée thouſand florens of gold.

All theſe things they tooke and caried awaie, togither with diuerſe charters, writings, & miniments, as thrée charters of Knute ſometime king of England, foure charters of king Hardiknute, one charter of king Edward the confeſſor, two charters of king Henrie the firſt, & other two charters of king Henrie the third, which charters concerned as well the foundation of the ſame abbeie, as the grants and confirmations of the poſſeſſions and liberties belonging thereto. Alſo they tooke awaie certeine writings obligatorie, in the which diuerſe perſons were bound for the paiement of great ſummes of monie, and deliuerie of certeine wines vnto the hands of the ſaid abbat. Moreouer they tooke awaie with them ten ſeuerall buls, concerning certeine exemptions and immunities granted to the abbats and moonks of Burie by ſundrie biſhops of Rome.

Furthermore, not herewith contented, they tooke Peter Clopton prior of the ſaid abbeie, and other moonks forth of the houſe, and leading them vnto a place called the Leaden hall, there impriſoned them, till the thurſdaie next before the feaſt of the Purification of our ladie, and that daie bringing them backe againe into the chapter-houſe, deteined them ſtill as priſoners, till they had ſealed a writing, conteining that the abbat and conuent were bound in ten thouſand pounds to be paid to Oliuer Kempe and others by them named. And further, they were conſtreined to ſeale a letter of releaſe for all actions, quarels, debts, transgreſſions, ſuits and demands, which the abbat might in anie wiſe claime or proſecute againſt the ſaid Oliuer Kempe and others in the ſame letters named.

For theſe wrongs and other, as for that they would not permit the abbats bailiffes and officers to kéepe their ordinarie courts as they were accuſtomed to doo, as well thrée daies in the wéeke for the market, to wit, mondaie, wedneſdaie and fridaie, as the Portman mote euerie tueſdaie thrée wéeks, and further prohibit them from gathering ſuch tols, cuſtomes, and yearelie rents, as were due to the abbat for certeine tenements in the towne, which were let to farme, the abbat brought his action againſt the ſaid Forton, Draiton, and others, and hauing it tried by an inqueſt, on the fridaie next after the feaſt of ſaint Lucie the virgine, in a ſeſſions holden at Burie by Iohn Stonore, Walter Friſkney, Robert Maberthorpe, & Iohn Bouſſer, by vertue of the kings writ of oier and determiner to them directed, the offendors were condemned in 40000 pounds, ſo that the ſaid Richard Draiton, and others there preſent in the court, were committed to priſon in cuſtodie of the ſhiriffe Robert Walkefare, who was commanded alſo to apprehend the other that were not yet arreſted, if within his bailiwike they might be found, and to haue their bodies before the ſaid iuſtices at Burie aforſaid, on thurſdaie in Whitſunwéeke next inſuing.

The ſecond riot.

Beſide this, there was an other indictement and action of treſpaſſe found there the ſame daie againſt the ſaid Richard Draiton and others, for a like diſorder and riot by them committed, on the thurſday next after the feaſt of the Purification of our ladie, in the ſame firſt yeare of this king, at what time they did not onelie breake into the abbie, and beat the abbats men, but alſo tooke the abbat himſelfe, being then at home, with certeine of his moonks, kéeping both him and them as priſoners, till the next daie that they were conſtreined to ſeale certeine writings. And amongſt other, a charter, in which it was conteined, that the abbat and his conuent did grant vnto the inhabitants of the towne of Burie, to be a corporation of themſelues, and to haue a common ſeale with a gild of merchants and aldermen: alſo they were compelled to ſeale another charter, wherein was conteined a grant to the ſaid inhabitants, that they ſhould haue the cuſtodie of the towne gates, and likewiſe the wardſhip of all pupils and orphans within the ſame towne, beſide diuerſe other liberties.

Moreouer, they were in like manner conſtreined to ſeale thrée ſeuerall obligations, in which the abbat and conuent were bound to the ſaid inhabitants, as to a communaltie of a corporation, in ſeauen thouſand pounds, as in two thouſand by one obligation, and in two thouſand by an other, and in thrée thouſand by the third obligation: and further they were driuen to ſeale a letter of releaſe of all treſpaſſes, and other things that might be demanded againſt the ſaid inhabitants, with a generall acquittance of all debts. Beſide this, the ſaid riotous perſons tooke at the ſame time forth of the abbie great riches, as well in plate, armor, books, & apparell, as in other things. They alſo brake downe two houſes or meſſuages, that belonged to the abbeie, and ſituate within the towne of Burie: they alſo deſtroied his fiſh-ponds, and tooke out ſuch ſtore of fiſh as they found in the ſame: they cut downe alſo thréeſcore aſhes there growing on the ſoile that belonged to the ſaid abbat, and did manie other great outrages and enormities, ſo that it was found by the inqueſt, that the abbat was damnified to the value of other fortie thouſand pounds.

The third riot.

Theſe riots may ſéeme gréeuous and verie ſtrange, but yet the ſame were not ſo heinouſlie taken, as an other which the ſaid inhabitants of Burie attempted againſt the ſaid abbeie in manner of a plaine commotion, vpon ſaint Lukes day in the ſame yeare, at what time (as by the records of that abbeie it ſhould appeare) both the abbat and his houſe were in the kings ſpeciall protection, and the ſaid inhabitants prohibited by his letters to attempt anie iniurie againſt him or his conuent. But neuertheleſſe we find that not onelie the inhabitants of Burie, but alſo a great number of other miſgouerned perſons, that reſorted to them from places there about, arraied and furniſhed with horſſe, armor and weapons, after the manner of warre, came and aſſaulted the abbeie gates, ſet fire on them, and burned them with diuerſe other houſes néere adioining, that belonged to the abbeie, and continued in that their riotous enterpriſe all that day and the night following.

The manour of Holderneſſe barne.

The manour of weſtlie burnt.

The ſame night alſo they burnt a manor of the abbats called Holderneſſe barne, with two other manors called the Almoners barne, and Haberdone, alſo the granges that ſtood without the ſouth gate, and the manour of Weſtlie, in which places they burned in corne & graine, to the value of a thouſand pounds. The next daie they entered into the abbeie court, and burnt all the houſes on the north ſide, as ſtables, brewhouſes, bakehouſes, garners, and other ſuch neceſſarie houſes and conuenient roomes of offices; and on the other ſide the court, they burnt certeine houſes belonging to the Almonrie. On the next daie they burned the mote hall, and Bradford hall, with the new hall, and diuerſe chambers and ſollers to the ſame halles annexed, with the chapell of ſaint Laurence at the end of the hoſpitall hall. Alſo the manor of Eldhall, the manor of Horninger, with all the corne and graine within and about the ſame.

The next day they burnt the ſoller of the Sollerer, with a chapell there: alſo the kitchin, the larder, and a part of the farmarie. On the thurſdaie they burnt the reſidue of the farmarie, and the lodging called the blacke lodging, with a chapell of S. Andrew therein. In executing of all theſe riotous diſorders, one Geffrie Moreman was an aider, who with diuerſe other perſons vnknowne, departed forth of the towne of Burie, and by the aſſent of the other his complices he burnt the manor of Fornham. The ſame day alſo other of their companie, as William the ſonne of Iames Neketon, Rafe Grubbe, Richard Kerie, and a great number of other perſons vnknowne, by the aſſent and abbetment of the other that committed the ſaid diſorders, burnt two manors belonging alſo to the ſaid abbeie in great Berton, with all the corne and graine there found.

The manour of Fornhan burnt.

Vpon knowledge had of theſe great riots, and perillous commotions, there was a commiſſion directed from the king, vnto Thomas earle of Northfolke high marſhall of England, to Thomas Bardulfe, Robert Morlie, Peter Wedall, Iohn Howard, and Iohn Walkfare, authoriſing them with the power of the counteſſe of Suffolke and Norffolke, to apprehend, trie and puniſh ſuch lewd diſordered perſons, and rebellious malefactors, which had committed ſuch felonious enterpriſes, to the breach of the kings peace, and dangerous diſquieting of his ſubiects: but the ſaid commiſſioners procéeded not according to the effect of their commiſſion in triall of anie felonies by the ſame perſons committed and doone, but onelie cauſed them to be indicted of treſpaſſe: albeit Robert Walkfare, and Iohn Clauer, with their aſſociats iuſtices of peace, in their ſeſſions holden at Elueden the tueſdaie next after the feaſt of the apoſtles Simon and Iude, in the ſaid firſt yeare of this king

K. Edward the third procéeded in ſuch wiſe againſt the ſaid malefactors, that John de Berton cordwainer, Robert Forton, and a great number of other were indicted of felonie, for the miſdemenours afore mentioned, and the indictements ſo found were after ſent and preſented vnto John Stonore, Walter de Friſkenie, Robert Malberthorpe, and John Bouſſer, who by vertue of the kings commiſſion of oier and determiner to them directed, ſat at S. Edmundſburie the wedneſdaie next after the feaſt of ſaint Lucie the virgine; and then and there ſent forth precepts to the ſhiriffe, commanding him to apprehend the ſaid Berton, Forton, and others, that were indicted of the foreſaid felonies, and alſo to returne a ſufficient iurie to trie vpon their arreignment the ſaid malefactors by order of law, the fridaie next after the ſaid feaſt of S. Lucie. Herevpon Alane de Latoner, and Robert Dalling, with ſeauentéene others, being arreigned, were found guiltie, and ſuffered death according to the order appointed for felons.

One Adam Miniot ſtood mute, and refuſed to be tried by his countrie, and ſo was preſſed to death, as the law in ſuch caſe appointeth. Diuerſe other were ſaued by their bookes, according vnto the order of clerkes conuict, as Alexander Brid perſon of Hogeſet, John Rugham perſon of little Welnetham, John Berton cordwainer, and diuerſe other. Some were repriued, as one woman named Julian Barbor, who being big bellied was reſpited, till ſhe were deliuered of child. Benedict Sio and Robert Ruſſell were repriued, and committed to the ſafe kéeping of the ſhiriffe, as triers or appeachers (as we tearme them) of other offendors: and bicauſe there was not anie as yet attached by their appeales, they were commanded againe to priſon. One Robert de Creſwell was ſaued by the kings letters of ſpeciall pardon, which he had there readie to ſhew. As for Robert Forton, Adam Cokefield, and a great number of other, whome the ſhiriffe was commanded to apprehend, he returned that he could not heare of them within the precinct of his bailiffewéeke, wherevpon exigents were awarded againſt them, and the ſhiriffe was commanded, that if he might come to attach them, he ſhould not faile but ſo to doo, and to haue their bodies there at Burie before the ſaid iuſtices, the thurſdaie in Whitſunwéeke, next inſuing.

Diuerſe alſo were arreigned at the ſame time of the ſaid felonies, and thereof acquited, as Michaell Scabaille, Rafe Smeremonger, and others. Indéed thoſe that were found guiltie, and ſuffered, were the chéefe authors and procurors of the commotion, bearing others in hand, that the abbat had in his cuſtodie a certeine charter, wherein the king ſhould grant to the inhabitants of the towne of Burie, certeine liberties, whereby it might appeare that they were frée, and diſcharged from the paiment of diuerſe cuſtomes and exactions, wherevpon the ignorant multitude eaſilie giuing credit to ſuch ſurmiſed tales, were the ſooner induced to attempt ſuch diſorders as before are mentioned. ¶ Thus haue yée heard all in effect that was doone in this firſt yeare of king Edward the third his reigne, by and againſt thoſe offendors. But bicauſe we will not interrupt matters of other yeares with that which followed further of this buſineſſe, we haue thought good to put the whole that we intend to write thereof here in this place.

The common people often deceiued by lewd informations.

Yée ſhall therefore vnderſtand, that diuerſe of thoſe, againſt whome exigents were awarded, came in, and yéelded their bodies to the ſhiriffes priſon, before they were called on the fift countie daie. Albeit a great manie there were that came not, and ſo were outlawed. Robert Forton got the kings pardon, and ſo purchaſing forth a ſuperſedeas, the ſuit therevpon againſt him was ſtaied. The ſhiriffe therefore in Whitſunwéeke, in the ſecond yeare of this kings reigne, made his returne touching Benedict Sio, Robert Ruſſell, & Julian Barbor, ſo that he deliuered them vnto the bailiffes of the libertie of the abbat of Burie, by reaſon of an ancient priuilege, which the abbat claimed to belong to his houſe. The bailiffes confeſſed they had receiued the ſaid priſoners, but forſomuch as they had béene arreigned at a Portmane mote, which was vſed to be kept euerie thrée wéeks, and vpon their arreignment were found guiltie of certeine other felonies by them committed within the towne of Burie, and therevpon were put to execution, Adam Finchman the kings attournie there tooke it verie euill, & laid it gréeuouſlie to the charge of the abbats officers, for their haſtie and preſumptuous procéeding againſt the ſaid priſoners, namelie, bicauſe the ſaid Sio and Ruſſell were repriued, to the end that by their vtterance, many heinous offenſes might haue béene brought to light.

Rob. Forton pardoned.

A priuilege.

Portman mote.

The abbats officers blamed.

On the ſame daie, that is to wit, the thurſdaie in Whitſunwéeke, the foreſaid Robert Forton, and diuerſe other came in, and were attached by the ſhiriffe to anſwer the abbat to his action of treſpaſſe, which he brought againſt them, and putting the matter to the triall of an inqueſt, they were condemned in ſixtie thouſand pounds, to be leuied of their goods and chattels, vnto the vſe of the abbat, and in the meane time they were committed to priſon. But firſt they made ſuit that they might be put to their fines for their offenſes committed againſt the kings peace, and their requeſt in that behalfe was granted, ſo that vpon putting in ſufficient ſuerties for their good abearing, their fines were aſſeſſed, as ſome at more and ſome at leſſe, as the caſe was thought for to require.

A condemnation.

Thus reſted the matter a long ſeaſon after, vntill the fift yeare of this kings reigne, in which the thurſdaie next after the feaſt of the bleſſed Trinitie, the K. being himſelfe in perſon at S. Edmundſburie aforeſaid, a finall agréement and concord was concluded betwixt the ſaid abbat and his conuent on the one partie, and Richard Draiton and others of the inhabitants of that towne on the other partie, before the right reuerend father in God John biſhop of Wincheſter and chancellor of England, and the kings iuſtices John Stonore and John Cantbridge ſitting there at the ſame time, by the kings commandement. The effect of which agréement was as followeth.

An agréemēt.

The articles of agreement betweene the moonks of Burie and the inhabitants of Burie.

Firſt, wheras the ſaid abbat had recouered by iudgement before the ſaid John Stonore and other his aſſociats iuſtices of oier and determiner in the ſaid towne of Burie, the ſumme of ſeuen ſcore thouſand pounds for treſpaſſes to him and his houſe committed and doone by the ſaid Richard Draiton, and other the inhabitants of Burie: now at the deſire of the ſaid king, and for other good reſpects him mouing, he pardoned and releaſed vnto the ſaid Richard Draiton, and to other the inhabitants of Burie, to their heires, executors, and aſſigns the ſumme of 122333 pounds, eight ſhillings eight pence, of the ſaid totall ſumme of 140000 pounds.

And further the ſaid abbat and conuent granted and agreed for them and their ſucceſſors, that if the ſaid Richard Draiton, & other the inhabitants of the ſaid towne of Burie, or any of them, their heires, executors or aſſignes, ſhould paie to the ſaid abbat & conuent, or their ſucceſſors within twentie yeares next inſuing the date of that preſent agreement, 2000 marks, that is to ſaie, 100 marks yearelie at the feaſts of S. Michaell & Eaſter, by euen portions: that then the ſaid Richard & other the inhabitants of the towne of Burie ſhould be acquited & diſcharged of 4000 marks, parcell of 17666 pounds, thirteene ſhillings foure pence reſidue behind for euer.

Moreouer, whereas the ſaid abbat and conuent, & the ſaid abbat by himſelfe, ſince the 19 yeare of the reigne of king Edward the ſecond vnto that preſent time, had ſealed certeine charters, deeds, & writings, as well with the proper ſeale of the abbat, as with the common ſeale of the abbat & conuent, if the ſaid Richard and the inhabitants of the ſaid towne of Burie did reſtore vnto the ſaid abbat & conuent all the ſame writings, or take ſuch order, that neither the abbat nor conuent be impleaded, or in any wiſe hindered, indamaged nor moleſted by force of the ſame: and further if neither the ſaid Richard, nor any the inhabitants of the ſaid towne, nor their heires, executors, nor aſſignes, ſhall go about to reuerſe the iudgements againſt them, at the ſuit of the ſaid abbat, nor ſhall ſeeke to impeach the executions of the ſame iudgements by anie falſe or forged acquitances or releaſes, nor implead nor moleſt any of the iurie, by whom they were conuict, that then they and their heires, executors & aſſignes ſhall be acquited & diſcharged of ten thouſand pounds parcell of the ſaid 17666 pounds, 13 ſhillings foure pence.

And furthermore, if the ſaid Richard and other the inhabitants of the ſaid towne of Burie, doo not hereafter maliciouſlie riſe againſt the ſaid abbat or conuent, nor ſeeke to vex them by any conſpiracie, confederacie, or by ſome other ſecret vniuſt cauſe, nor likewiſe euill intreat any man by reaſon of the inditement found againſt them, nor yet claime to haue any corporation of themſelues within that towne, that then the ſaid Richard, & the ſaid inhabitants, their heires, ſucceſſors & aſſignes, ſhall remaine acquited and diſcharged of all the reſidue of the ſaid 17666 pounds, thirteene ſhillings foure pence for euer. And the ſaid abbat and conuent doo grant for them & their ſucceſſours, that their intention is not, that if any ſingular perſon of his owne priuate malice, ſhall riſe againſt the ſaid abbat and conuent, their ſucceſſors, moonks, bailiffes, or ſeruants, to doo them, or any of them iniurie or diſpleaſure; that thoſe which be not partakers of the offenſe, ſhall be in any wiſe puniſhed for the ſame, ſo that the offendors be not mainteined by any of the ſame towne, but that the inhabitants there, doo aſſiſt the abbat and conuent their ſucceſſours, bailiffes, ſeruants & officers, that the ſame offendors may be puniſhed, according to their demerits, as reaſon and law ſhall allow.

This was the effect of the agreement at length had and made betwixt the abbat and moonks of Burie on the one part, & the inhabitants of that towne on the other part, and for the more confirmation thereof, it pleaſed the king to put his ſeale to the charter conteining the ſame agreement. ¶ But how ſoeuer it chanced, it ſhould appeare by ſuch records as came to the hands of maſter Iohn Fox, as he alledgeth in the firſt tome of his booke of acts and monuments, this agreement was but ſorilie kept: for diuerſe of the former offendors, bearing grudge towards the abbat for breaking promiſe with them at London, did confederat themſelues togither, and priuilie in the night comming to the manour of Chennington where the abbat then did lie, burſt open the gates, and entring by force, firſt bound all his ſeruants, and after they had robbed the houſe, they tooke the abbat, and ſhauing him, ſecretlie conueied him to London, and there remoouing him from ſtreet to ſtreet vnknowne, had him ouer the Thames into Kent, and at length tranſported him ouer vnto Diſt in Brabant, where they kept him for a time in much penurie, thraldome and miſerie, vntill at length the matter being vnderſtood, they were all excommunicate, firſt by the archbiſhop, & after by the pope. At the laſt, his freends hauing knowledge where he was, they found means to deliuer him out of the hands of thoſe theeues, and finallie brought him home with proceſſion, and ſo he was reſtored to his houſe againe.

This might come to paſſe before the agreement was made in the fift yeare of the kings reigne as aboue is mentioned, and ſo thereupon he might be reſtored.

Thus much touching thoſe troubles betwixt the townesmen of Burie & the abbat and moonks there, and now we will returne to other generall matters touching the publike ſtate of the realme. ¶ And firſt you ſhall vnderſtand, that in the beginning of this kings reigne the land trulie ſeemed to be bleſſed of God: for the earth became fruitfull, the aire temperate, and the ſea calme and quiet. This king though he was as yet vnder the gouernement of other, neuertheleſſe he began within a ſhort time to ſhew tokens of great towardneſſe, framing his mind vnto graue deuiſes, and firſt he prepared to make a iornie againſt the Scotiſhmen, the which in his fathers time had doone ſo manie diſpleaſures to the Engliſhmen, and now vpon confidence of his minoritie, ceaſſed not to inuade the borders of his realme. And namelie the verie ſelfe night that followed the day of this kings coronation, they had thought by ſkaling to haue ſtolne the caſtell of Norham: but Robert Maners capteine of that place, vnderſtanding of their enterpriſe aforehand by a Scotiſhman of the gariſon there, ſo well prouided for their comming, that where ſixteene of them boldlie entred vpon the wall, he ſlue nine or ten of them, and tooke fiue.

This was thought an euill token, that they ſhould ſtill be put to the worſſe in this kings time, ſith they had ſo bad ſucceſſe in the verie beginning of his reigne: but they continuing in their malicious purpoſes, about ſaint Margarets tide inuaded the land with three armies, the earle of Murrey hauing the leading of one of the ſame armies, and Iames Douglas of another, and the third was guided by the earle of Mar. King Edward aduertiſed hereof, aſſembled not onelie a great power of Engliſhmen, but alſo required Iohn lord Beaumont de Heinault, whome he had latelie ſent home right honorablie rewarded for his good aſſiſtance, to come againe into England, with certeine bands of men at armes, and he ſhould receiue wages and good interteinement for them. The lord Beaumont, as one that loued déeds of armes, was glad to accompliſh king Edwards requeſt: and ſo therevpon with ſeauen hundred men at armes, or fiue hundred (as Froiſſart ſaith) came ouer into England againe, to ſerue againſt the Scots.

The generall aſſemblie of the armie was appointed to be at Yorke, and thither came the ſaid lord Beaumont with his people, and was ioifullie receiued of the king and his lords. Here whileſt not onelie the Scotiſh ambaſſadours (which had béene ſent to treat of peace, were heard to tell their meſſage) but alſo whileſt the councell tooke ſome leiſure in debating the matter how to guide their enterpriſe, which they had now in hand: vpon Trinitie ſundaie, it chanced that there aroſe contention within the citie of Yorke, betwixt the Engliſh archers, and the ſtrangers, which the lord Beaumont of Heinault had brought with him, inſomuch that fighting togither there were ſlaine to the number of foure ſcore perſons of thoſe archers, which were buried within the church of ſaint Clement in Foſgate. ¶Some write that there were ſlaine to the number of thrée hundred Engliſhmen: yet bicauſe the Henuiers came to aid the king, their peace was cried vpon paine of life. And further, it was found by an inqueſt of the citie, that the quarrell was begun by the Engliſhmen, the which (as ſome write) were of the Lincolneſhire men, of thoſe that ſometime belonged to the Spenſers, and to the earle of Arundell, ſo that there was cauſe, whie they bare euill will to the Henuiers which had aided (as yée haue heard) to bring the ſaid earle and Spenſers to their confuſion.

In this meane time the Scots being entred into England, had doone much hurt, and were come as farre as Stanóp parke in Wiredale: and though they had ſent their ambaſſadours to treat with the king and his councell for peace, yet no concluſion followed of their talke. At the ſame time, bicauſe the Engliſh ſouldiours of this armie were cloathed all in cotes and hoods embrodered with floures and branches verie ſéemelie, and vſed to nouriſh their beards: the Scots in deriſion thereof made a rime, which they faſtened vpon the church doores of ſaint Peter toward Stangate, conteining this that followeth.

The king when he ſaw it was but a vaine thing to ſtaie anie longer in communication with the ambaſſadors about peace, departed from Yorke with his puiſſant armie, and getting knowledge how the Scots were cloſelie lodged in the woods of Stanop parke, he came and ſtopped all the paſſages, ſo it was thought that he ſhould haue had them at his pleaſure, but through treaſon (as was after reported) of the lord Roger Mortimer, after that the Scots had béene kept within their lodgings for the ſpace of fiftéene daies, till they were almoſt famiſhed, they did not onelie find a waie out, but about two hundred of them vnder the leading of the lord William Douglas, aſſailing that part of the Engliſh campe where the kings tent ſtood, in the night ſeaſon, miſſed not much of either taking the king or ſleieng him: and hauing doone hurt inough otherwiſe, as in the Scotiſh chronicle is alſo touched, they followed their companie, and with them returned into Scotland without impeachment.

It is ſaid, that Henrie earle of Lancaſter, and Iohn the lord Beaumont of Heinault would gladlie haue paſſed ouer the water of Wire, to haue aſſalted the Scots, but the earle of March through counſell of the lord Mortimer, pretending to haue right to the leading of the fore ward, and to the giuing of the firſt onſet, would not ſuffer them. Howſoeuer it was the king miſſed his purpoſe, and right penſiue therefore, brake vp his field, and returned vnto London. ¶Walter biſhop of Canturburie departed this life in Nouember, and then Simon Mepham was aduanced to the gouernement of that ſée. The lord Beaumont of Heinalt was honorablie rewarded for his paines and trauell, and then licenced to returne into his countrie, where he had not béene long, but that through his means then (as ſome write) the marriage was concluded betwéene king Edward, and the ladie Philip daughter to William earle of Heinault, and néece to the ſaid lord Beaumont, who had the charge to ſée hir brought ouer thither into England about Chriſtmaſſe: where in the citie of Yorke vpon the éeuen of the Conuerſion of ſaint Paule, being ſundaie, in the latter end of the firſt yeare of his reigne, king Edward ſolemnlie maried hir.

Fabian. Caxton. The blacke croſſe.

In the ſecond yeare of his reigne, about the feaſt of Pentecoſt, king Edward held a parlement at Northampton, at the which parlement by euill and naughtie counſell, whereof the lord Roger Mortimer and the quéene mother bare the blame, the king concluded with the Scotiſh king both an vnprofitable and a diſhonorable peace. For firſt, he releaſed to the Scots their fealtie and homage. Alſo he deliuered vnto them certeine old ancient writings, ſealed with the ſeales of the king of Scots, and of diuerſe lords of the land both ſpirituall and temporall: amongſt the which was that indenture, which they called Ragman, with manie other charters and patents, by the which the kings of Scotland were bound as feodaries vnto the crowne of England; at which ſeaſon alſo there were deliuered certeine iewels, which before time had béene woone from the Scots by the kings of England, and among other, the blacke croſier or rood is ſpeciallie named.

And not onelie the king by his ſiniſter councell loſt ſuch right and title as he had to the realme of Scotland, ſo farre as by the ſame councell might be deuiſed, but alſo the lords and barons, and other men of England that had anie lands or rents within Scotland, loſt their right in like manner, except they would dwell vpon the ſame lands, and become liege men to the king of Scotland. Herevpon was there alſo a marriage concluded betwixt Dauid Bruce the ſonne of Robert Bruce king of Scotland, and the ladie Iane ſiſter to king Edward, which of diuerſe writers is ſurnamed Ione of the tower, and the Scots ſurnamed hir halfe in deriſion, Ione Makepeace. This marriage was ſolemniſed at Berwike vpon the daie of Marie Magdalen. The quéene with the biſhops of Elie and Norwich, the earle Warren, the lord Mortimer, and diuerſe other barons of the land, and a great multitude of other people were preſent at that marriage, which was celebrate with all the honour that might be.

The earle of March ruleth all things at his pleaſure.

Caxton.

After the quindene of ſaint Michaell, king Edward held a parlement at Saliſburie, in which the lord Roger Mortimer was created earle of March, the lord Iohn of Eltham the kings brother was made earle of Cornwall, and the lord Iames Butler of Ireland earle of Ormond, who about the ſame time had married the earle of Herefords daughter. But the earle of March tooke the moſt part of the rule of all things perteining either to the king or realme into his owne hands: ſo that the whole gouernment reſted in a manner betwixt the quéene mother and him. The other of the councell that were firſt appointed, were in manner diſplaced; for they bare no rule to ſpeake of at all, which cauſed no ſmall grudge to ariſe againſt the quéene and the ſaid earle of March, who mainteined ſuch ports, and kept among them ſuch retinue of ſeruants, that their prouiſion was wonderfull, which they cauſed to be taken vp, namelie for the queene, at the kings price, to the ſore oppreſſion of the people, which tooke it diſpleſantlie inough.

The earle of Lancaſter.

Robert Holland ſlaine.

There was like to haue growen great variance betwixt the queene and Henrie earle of Lancaſter, by reaſon that one ſir Thomas Wither, a knight perteining to the ſaid earle of Lancaſter, had ſlaine Robert Holland, who had betraied ſometime Thomas earle of Lancaſter, and was after committed to priſon by earle Henries means, but the queene had cauſed him to be ſet at libertie, and admitted him as one of hir councell. The quéene would haue had ſir Thomas Wither puniſhed for the murther, but earle Henrie cauſed him to be kept out of the waie, ſo that for theſe cauſes and other, Henrie the earle of Lancaſter went about to make a rebellion, and the quéene hauing knowledge thereof, ſought to apprehend him: but by the mediation of the earles Marſhall and Kent, the matter was taken vp, and earle Henrie had the kings peace granted him for the ſumme of eleuen thouſand pounds, which he ſhould haue paid, but he neuer paid that fine, though it was ſo aſſeſſed at the time of the agreement.

The archbiſhop of Canterburie was the chiefe procuror of the agréement & reconciliation of the earle (as Merimuth ſaith.)

Adam Merimuth.

There were diuerſe lords and great men that were confederat with him, the lord Thomas Wake, the lord Henrie Beaumont, the lord Foulke Fitz Warrein, ſir Thomas Roſſelin, ſir William Truſſell, and other, to the number of an hundred knights.

The king about the beginning, or (as other ſaie) about the middle of Lent, held a parlement at Wincheſter, during the which, Edmund of Woodſtoke earle of Kent the kings vncle was arreſted the morrow after ſaint Gregories day, and being arreigned vpon certeine confeſſions and letters found about him, he was found giltie of treaſon. There were diuerſe in trouble about the ſame matter, for the earle vpon his open confeſſion before ſundrie lords of the realme, declared that not onelie by commandement from the pope, but alſo by the ſetting on of diuerſe nobles of this land (whome he named) he was perſuaded to indeuour himſelfe by all waies and meanes poſſible how to deliuer his brother king Edward the ſecond out of priſon, and to reſtore him to the crowne, whome one Thomas Dunhed, a frier of the order of preachers in London, affirmed for certeine to be aliue, hauing (as he himſelfe ſaid) called vp a ſpirit to vnderſtand the truth thereof, and ſo what by counſell of the ſaid frier, and of thrée other friers of the ſame order, he had purpoſed to worke ſome meane how to deliuer him, and to reſtore him againe to the kingdome. Among the letters that were found about him, diſcloſing a great part of his practiſe, ſome there were, which he had written and directed vnto his brother the ſaid king Edward, as by ſome writers it ſhould appeare.

The biſhop of London and certeine other great perſonages, whome he had accuſed, were permitted to go at libertie, vnder ſuerties taken for their good demeanour and forth comming. But Robert de Touton, and the frier that had raiſed the ſpirit for to know whether the kings father were liuing or not, were committed to priſon, wherein the frier remained till he died. The earle himſelfe was had out of the caſtell gate at Wincheſter, and there loſt his head the 19 day of March, chiefelie (as was thought) thorough the malice of the quéene mother, and of the earle of March: whoſe pride and high preſumption the ſaid earle of Kent might not well abide. His death was the leſſe lamented, bicauſe of the preſumptuous gouernement of his ſeruants and retinue, which he kept about him, for that they riding abroad, would take vp things at their pleaſure, not paieng nor agréeing with the partie to whome ſuch things belonged; in ſo much that by their meanes, who ought to haue doone their vttermoſt for the inlargement of his honour, he grew in greater obloquie and reproch: a fowle fault in ſeruants ſo to abuſe their lords names to their priuat profit, to whome they cannot be too truſtie. But ſuch are to be warned, that by the ſame wherin they offend, they ſhall be puniſhed, euen with ſeruants faithleſſe to plague their vntruſtineſſe, for

The yong queene Philip was brought to bed at Woodſtoke the 15 day of June of hir firſt ſonne, the which at the fontſtone was named Edward, and in proceſſe of time came to great proofe of famous chiualrie, as in this booke ſhall more plainelie appeare. He was commonlie named when he came to ripe yeares prince Edward, & alſo ſurnamed the Blacke prince. The ſixtéenth day of Julie chanced a great eclipſe of the ſunne, and for the ſpace of two moneths before, and thrée moneths after, there fell exceeding great raine, ſo that through the great intemperancie of weather, corne could not ripen, by reaſon whereof, in manie places they began not harueſt till Michaelmas, & in ſome places they inned not their wheat till Alhallontide, nor their peaſe till ſaint Andrews tide.

On Chriſtmaſſe euen, about the breake of day, a maruellous ſore and terrible wind came forth of the weſt, which ouerthrew houſes and buildings, ouerturned trees by the roots, and did much hurt in diuerſe places. ¶ This yeare ſhortlie after Eaſter, the king with the biſhop of Wincheſter, and the lord William Montacute, hauing not paſt fiftéene horſſes in their companie, paſſed the ſea, apparelled in clokes like to merchants, he left his brother the earle of Cornewall his deputie & gardian of the realme till his returne. Moreouer, he cauſed it to be proclaimed in London, that he went ouer on pilgrimage, and for none other purpoſe. He returned before the later end of Aprill, and then was there holden a turnie at Dertford.

A mightie wind.

The mondaie after ſaint Mathews day in September, the king held a ſolemne iuſts in Cheapeſide, betwixt the great croſſe and Soperlane, he with 12 as chalengers anſwering all defendants that came. This ſolemne iuſts and turnie continued thrée daies. The quéene with manie ladies being preſent at the ſame, fell beſide a ſtage, but yet as good hap would they had no hurt by that fall, to the reioiſing of manie that ſaw them in ſuch danger, and yet ſo luckilie to eſcape without harme. ¶ Alſo in a parlement holden at Notingham about ſaint Lukes tide, ſir Roger Mortimer the earle of March was apprehended the ſeuentéenth day of October within the caſtell of Notingham, where the king with the two queenes, his mother and his wife, and diuerſe other were as then lodged. And though the keies of the caſtell were dailie and nightlie in the cuſtodie of the ſaid earle of March, and that his power was ſuch, as it was doubted how he might be arreſted (for he had, as ſome writers affirme, at that preſent in retinue nine ſcore knights, beſide eſquiers, gentlemen and yeomen) yet at length by the kings helpe, the lord William Montacute, the lord Humfrie de Bohun, and his brother ſir William, the lord Rafe Stafford, the lord Robert Vfford, the lord William Clinton, the lord John Neuill of Hornbie, and diuerſe other, which had accuſed the ſaid earle of March for the murther of king Edward the ſecond, found means by intelligence had with ſir William de Eland conſtable of the caſtell of Notingham, to take the ſaid earle of March with his ſonne the lord Roger or Geffrey Mortimer, and ſir Simon Bereford, with other.

Additions to N. Triuet.

Sir Hugh Trumpington or Turrington (as ſome copies haue) that was one of his cheefeſt freends with certeine other were ſlaine, as they were about to reſiſt againſt the lord Montacute, and his companie in taking of the ſaid earle. The manner of his taking I paſſe ouer, bicauſe of the diuerſitie in report thereof by ſundrie writers. From Notingham he was ſent vp to London with his ſonne the lord Roger or Geffrey de Mortimer, ſir Simon Bereford, and the other priſoners, where they were committed to priſon in the tower. Shortlie after was a parlement called at Weſtminſter, cheefelie (as was thought) for reformation of things diſordered through the miſgouernance of the earle of March. But whoſoeuer was glad or ſorie for the trouble of the ſaid earle, ſuerlie the queene mother tooke it moſt heauilie aboue all other, as ſhe that loued him more (as the ſame went) than ſtood well with hir honour. For as ſome write, ſhe was found to be with child by him. They kept as it were houſe togither, for the earle to haue his prouiſion the better cheape, laid his penie with hirs, ſo that hir takers ſerued him as well as they did hir both of vittels & cariages. Of which miſvſage (all regard to honour and eſtimation neglected) euerie ſubiect ſpake ſhame. For their manner of dealing, tending to ſuch euill purpoſes as they continuallie thought vpon, could not be ſecret from the eies of the people. And their offenſe heerein was ſo much the more heinous, bicauſe they were perſons of an extraordinarie degree, and were the more narrowlie marked of the multitude or common people,

But now in this parlement holden at Weſtminſter he was attainted of high treaſon expreſſed in fiue articles, as in effect followeth.

1 Firſt, he was charged that he had procured Edward of Carnaruan the kings father to be murthered in moſt heinous and tyrannous maner within the caſtell of Berklie.

2 Secondlie, that the Scots at Stanop parke through his means eſcaped.

3 Thirdlie, that he receiued at the hands of the lord James Dowglas, at that time generall of the Scots, great ſummes of monie to execute that treaſon, and further to conclude the peace vpon ſuch diſhonorable couenants as was accorded with the Scots at the parlement of Northampton.

4 Fourthlie, that he had got into his hands a great part of the kings treaſure, and had waſted and conſumed it.

5 Fiftlie, that he had impropried vnto him diuers wards that belonged vnto the king: and had beene more priuie with queene Iſabell the kings mother, than ſtood either with Gods law, or the kings pleaſure.

These articles with other being proued againſt him, he was adiudged by authoritie of the parlement to ſuffer death, and according therevnto, vpon ſaint Andrewes euen next inſuing, he was at London drawne and hanged, at the common place of execution, called in thoſe daies The elmes, & now Tiborne, as in ſome bookes we find. His bodie remained two daies and two nights on the gallowes, and after taken downe was deliuered to the friers minors, who buried him in their church the morrow after he was deliuered to them, with great pompe and funerall exequies, although afterwards he was taken vp and carried vnto Wigmore, whereof he was lord. He came not to his anſwer in iudgement, no more than any other of the nobilitie had doone, ſince the death of Thomas earle of Lancaſter.

Sir Simon de Bereford knight that had beene one of the kings iuſtices, was drawne alſo and hanged at London, vpon S. Lucies daie. In this parlement holden at Weſtminſter, the king tooke into his hand, by aduiſe of the ſtates there aſſembled, all the poſſeſſions, lands and reuenues that belonged to the queene his mother, ſhe hauing aſſigned to hir a thouſand pounds by yeare, for the maintenance of hir eſtate, being appointed to remaine in a certeine place, and not to go elſewhere abroad: yet the king to comfort hir, would lightlie euerie yeare once come to viſit hir. ¶ After that the erle of March was executed (as yee haue heard) diuerſe noble men that were departed the realme, bicauſe they could not abide the pride and preſumption of the ſaid earle, now returned: as the ſonne and heire of the earle of Arundell, the lord Thomas Wake, the L. Edward Balioll commeth into England

In the fift yeare of K. Edwards reigne, Edward Balioll came forth of France into England, and obteined ſuch fauour through the aſſiſtance of the lord Henrie Beaumont, the lord Dauid of Strabogie earle of Athole, the lord Geffrey de Mowbraie, the lord Walter Cumin, and others, that king Edward granted him licence to make his prouiſion in England to paſſe into Scotland, with an armie of men to attempt the recouerie of his right to the crowne of Scotland, with condition that if he recouered it, he ſhould acknowledge to hold it of the king of England as ſuperiour lord of Scotland. The comming awaie of Edward Balioll out of France is diuerſlie reported by writers: ſome ſaie, that he was aided by the French king, whoſe ſiſter he had married: and other ſaie, that he being in priſon in France, for the eſcape of an Engliſhman, one John Barnabie eſquier, which had ſlaine a Frenchman by chance of quarelling in the towne of Dampierre, where the ſame Barnabie dwelled with the ſaid Edward Balioll, ſo it came to paſſe that the lord Henrie Beaumont hauing occaſion of buſineſſe with the French king, that fauoured him well, came ouer to France, and there vnderſtanding of Baliols impriſonment, procured his deliuerance, and brought him ouer into England, and cauſed him to remaine in ſecret wiſe at the manor of Sandhall vpon Ouſe in Yorkeſhire with the ladie Veſcis, till he had purchaſed the kings grant for him to make his prouiſion of men of war and ſhips within the Engliſh dominions.

In the ſixt yeare of king Edwards reigne, Reignold earle of Gelderland married the ladie Elianor ſiſter to this king Edward the third, who gaue vnto the ſaid earle with hir for hir portion, fifteene thouſand pounds ſterling. ¶ Iſabell the kings daughter was borne alſo this yeare at Woodſtoke. ¶ After that Edward Balioll had prepared and made readie his purueiances for his iournie, and that his men of warre were aſſembled and come togither, being in all not paſt fiue hundred men of armes, and about two thouſand archers, and other footmen, he tooke the ſea at Rauenſpurgh in Yorkeſhire, and from thence directing his courſe northward, he arriued at length in Scotland, where he atchiuing great victories (as in the Scotiſh chronicle yee may read more at large) was finallie crowned king of that realme.

Edward Balioll crowned K. of Scotlãd.

It may ſeeme a wonder to manie, that the king of England would permit Edward Balioll to make his prouiſion thus in England, and to ſuffer his people to aid him againſt his brother in law king Dauid that had married his ſiſter (as before ye haue heard.) Indéed at the firſt he was not verie readie to grant their ſuit that moued it, but at length he was contented to diſſemble the matter, in hope that if Edward Balioll had good ſucceſſe, he ſhould then recouer that againe, which by the concluſion of peace during his minoritie, he had through euill counſell reſigned out of his hands. The Scots neuertheleſſe in December chaſed their new king Edward Balioll out of Scotland, ſo that he was faine to retire into England, and celebrated the feaſt of the Natiuitie at Carleill, in the houſe of the friers minors, and the morrow after being S. Stephans day, he went into Weſtmerland, where of the lord Clifford he was right honorablie receiued, to whome he then granted Douglas Dale in Scotland, which had béene granted to the ſaid lord Cliffords grandfather in the daies of king Edward the firſt, if he might at anie time recouer the realme of Scotland out of his aduerſaries hands.

After this, he went and laie a time with the ladie of Gines, that was his kinſewoman. Finallie about the tenth day of March, hauing aſſembled a power of Engliſhmen and Scotiſhmen, he entred Scotland, and beſieged the towne of Berwike, during the which ſiege, manie enterpriſes were attempted by the parties: and amongſt other, the Scots entred England by Carleill, dooing much miſchiefe in Gilleſland, by burning, killing, robbing and ſpoiling. The king aduertiſed hereof, thought himſelfe diſcharged of the agréement concluded betwixt him and Dauid Bruce, the ſonne of Robert Bruce that had married his ſiſter, & therfore tooke it to be lawfull for him to aid his coſen Edward Balioll the lawfull K. of Scots. And herewith aſſembling an armie, came to the ſiege of Berwike, togither with his brother Iohn of Eltham earle of Cornewall, and other noble men, ſéeking by all meanes poſſible how to win the towne: and finallie diſcomfited an armie of Scots, which came to the reſcue thereof vpon Halidon hill, in ſleaing of them what in the fight and chaſe, ſeuen earles, nine hundred knights and baronets, foure hundred eſquiers, and vpon 32 thouſand of the common people: and of Engliſhmen were ſlaine but 15 perſons, as our Engliſh writers make mention. King Edward hauing thus ſped his buſineſſe, left a power of men with Edward Balioll, vnder the conduct of the lord Richard Talbot, and returned himſelfe backe into England, appointing the lord Percie to be gouernor of the towne of Berwike, and ſir Thomas Grey knight his lieutenant. The king of England paſſing further into the north parts, held his Whitſuntide at Newcaſtell vpon Tine, with great roialtie: and ſhortlie after, Edward Balioll king of Scots came thither, and vpon the nintéenth daie of Iune made his homage vnto the king of England, and ſware vnto him fealtie in the preſence of a great number of Nobles and gentlemen there aſſembled, as to his ſuperiour and chiefe lord of the realme of Scotland, binding himſelfe by that oth, to hold the ſame realme of the king of England, his heires and ſucceſſors for euer. And then were all ſuch lords reſtored againe to their lands and poſſeſſions in Scotland, which in the daies of Edward the ſecond had béene expelled from the ſame: and now they did their homage vnto the king of Scotland for thoſe lands as apperteined. ¶ Immediatlie after, the king of England called a councell of his lords ſpirituall and temporall at Notingham, commanding them to méet him there about the thirtéenth daie of Iulie, there to conſult with him of weightie cauſes concerning the ſtate of the realme. Inundation of the ſea.

In this meane time the French king was appointed to haue made a viage againſt the Saracens, enimies of our faith, and had ſent to the king of England, requiring him of his companie in that iournie. But the king of England being otherwiſe occupied with the affaires of Scotland, made no direct anſwer therevnto, ſo that the French king perceiuing that the king of England was not in all things well pleaſed with him, thought good before he ſet forward on that iournie to vnderſtand his meaning, and thervpon ſent eftſoones vnto him other ambaſſadours. The king entreth into Scotland with an armie

Although Edward Balioll by the puiſſance of the king of Englands aſſiſtance had got the moſt part of the realme of Scotland into his hands, yet diuerſe caſtels were holden againſt him, and the Scots dailie ſlipped from him, and by open rebellion moleſted him diuerſe waies. The king of England aduertiſed thereof called a parlement at London, wherein he tooke order for his iournie into Scotland, had a tenth and a fifteenth granted him, and ſo about Alhallontide he came to Newcaſtell vpon Tine, with his armie, and remained there till the feaſt of ſaint Katharine, and then entring into Scotland, came to Rockeſburgh, where he repared the caſtell which had beene aforetime deſtroied. After the third daie of Chriſtmaſſe was paſt, the king of England entred into Ethrike forreſt, beating it vp and downe, but the Scots would not come within his reach: where vpon he ſent the king of Scots that was there preſent with him, and the earles of Warwike and Oxenford, and certeine other barons and knights with their retinues vnto Carleill, to keepe and defend thoſe weſt parts of the realme from the Scots.

In their iournie thitherwards, they went by Peplis to apprehend certeine Scots, whome they heard to be lodged and abiding thereabouts, but when they found them not, they waſted the countrie, and turned ſtreight to Carleill, where after the Epiphanie there aſſembled an armie foorth of the counties of Lancaſter, Weſtmerland, and Cumberland, by the kings appointment, which armie togither with the king of Scots and the other lords there found, entred Scotland, and did much hurt in the countrie of Galloway, deſtroieng towns and all that they found abroad, but the people were fled and withdrawne out of their waie. And when they had taken their pleaſure, the king of Scots returned backe to Carleill. This yere there fell great abundance of raine, and therevpon inſued morren of beaſts: alſo corne ſo failed this yeare, that a quarter of wheat was ſold at fortie ſhillings.

Ambaſſadors ſent into France.

Finallie, when the king had finiſhed his buſineſſe in Scotland, as to his ſeeming ſtood with his pleaſure, he returned into England, and ſhortlie after he ſent the archbiſhop of Canturburie, ſir Philip de Montacute, and Geffrey Scroope vnto the French king, to conclude a firme amitie & league with him. Theſe lords comming into France, were not at the firſt admitted to the French kings preſence, till they ſhewed themſelues halfe greeued with that ſtrange dealing: for then finallie were they brought vnto him, who gentlie receiued them, and cauſed the matter to be intreated of about the which they were ſent, in furthering whereof, ſuch diligence was vſed, that finallie a concluſion of peace and concord was agreed, and ſo farre paſſed, that proclamation thereof ſhould haue beene made in Paris, and in the countrie thereabout the next day: but ſcarſe were the Engliſh ambaſſadours returned vnto their lodgings, when they were ſent for backe againe, and further informed, that the French king minded to haue Dauid king of Scotland compriſed in the ſame league, ſo that he might be reſtored vnto his kingdome, and the Balioll put out. The Engliſh ambaſſadors anſwered, that their commiſſion extended not ſo farre, and therfore they could not conclude any thing therein. Herevpon all the former communication was reuoked, and cleerelie made void, ſo that the Engliſh ambaſſadors returned home into England without anie thing concluded.

About the feaſt of the Aſcenſion, the king held a parlement at Yorke, ordeining for his iournie into Scotland, and alſo deuiſing by authoritie thereof diuerſe profitable ſtatutes for the common-wealth. About midſummer, he came with his armie vnto Newcaſtell vpon Tine, whither came to him from Carleill the king of Scots, and there order was taken, that the king of England, and his brother the earle of Cornwall, the earls of Warwike, Lancaſter, Lincolne, and Hereford, with all their retinues, and the earle of Gulikerland, that had married the kings ſiſter, and with a faire companie was come to ſerue the king in theſe warres, ſhould paſſe to Carleill, and on the twelfe of Iulie enter Scotland. The king of Scots, the earles of Surrie, and Arundell, and the lord Henrie Percie, a baron of great might and power, being all of kin vnto the king of Scots, with their retinues ſhould go to Berwike, and there enter the ſame day aboue mentioned, and as it was appointed, ſo it was put in practiſe. For both kings on the ſame day entring Scotland in ſeuerall parts paſſed forward without reſiſtance at their pleaſures, waſting and burning all the countries, both on this ſide, and beyond the Scotiſh ſea. The Welſhmen ſpared neither religious perſons nor their houſes, making no more accompt of them than of others: the mariners of Newcaſtell alſo burnt a great part of the towne of Dundee.

The earle of Namure about the ſame time comming into England, to ſerue the king in his warres, tooke vpon him to paſſe into Scotland with a band of an hundred men of armes, beſide ſeauen or eight knights which he brought ouer with him, and certeine Engliſhmen to be his guides from Berwike, but he was aſſailed before he could get to Edenburgh, by the earles of Murrey and Dunbarre, and the lord William Dowglas: ſo that notwithſtanding the ſtrangers bare themſelues verie manfullie, yet oppreſſed with multitude, they were forced to giue place, but yet ſtill fighting and defending themſelues till they came to Edenburgh, and there taking the hill where the ruines of the caſtell ſtood, kept the ſame all the night folowing. But the next day they deſpairing of all ſuccours, and hauing neither meat nor drinke, at length yeelded themſelues, whom the earle of Murrey receiuing right courteouſlie, ſhewed them ſuch fauour, that without ranſome he was contented they ſhould returne into their countries: and for more ſuertie, he conueied the ſaid earle of Namure (whome the Scotiſh books call earle of Gelderland) and his companie backe to the borders; but in his returne, or ſhortlie after, the ſame earle of Murrey that tooke himſelfe for gouernour of Scotland, was encountred by the Engliſhmen that laie in garriſon within Rockeſburgh, and by them taken priſoner. The lord William Dowglas being there alſo with him eſcaped, but Iames Dowglas brother to the ſaid lord William Dowglas, was at that bickering ſlaine with diuerſe other.

About the feaſt of the Aſſumption of our ladie, diuerſe of the Scotiſh nobilitie came and ſubmitted themſelues to the king, namelie the earle of Atholl and others, but earle Patrike of Dunbarre, and the earle of Roſſe, the lord Andrew de Murrey, the lord William Dowglas, and the lord William de Keth, and manie other would not come in, but aſſembling themſelues togither, did all the miſcheefe they could vnto thoſe that had receiued the kings peace. The earle of Atholl in the winter ſeaſon, beſieging the caſtell of Kildrummie beyond the Scotiſh ſea was ſet vpon by the earles of Dunbarre and Roſſe, ſo that they ſlue him there in field, for his men fled from him (through ſome traitorous practiſe as was thought) and left him and a few other in all the danger. ¶ The king of England being returned foorth of Scotland, remained for the moſt part of the winter in the north parts, and held his Chriſtmaſſe at Newcaſtell vpon

A truce granted to the Scots.

Time, and after the Epiphanie hauing aſſembled an armie readie to paſſe into Scotland, to reuenge the earle of Athols death, which he tooke verie diſpleaſantlie, there came in the meane time ambaſſadors both from the pope and the French king, and found the king of England at Berwike, readie with his armie to ſet forwards into Scotland. But theſe ambaſſadors did ſo much by intreatie with the two kings of England and Scotland, that about the feaſt of the Purification, a truce was agréed vpon to indure till midlent.

The ſtoutnes of Scots hindered the concluſion of the peace.

Then was a parlement to be holden at London, and herewith articles were drawne, and certeine petitions put forth, vpon the which if the parties in the meane time could agrée, the peace accordinglie might be eſtabliſhed, if not, then the warre to be proſecuted as before. The chiefeſt article and petition which the Scots propoſed, as deſirous to be therein reſolued, was to vnderſtand which of the two that claimed the crowne of Scotland, to wit, Edward Balioll, and Dauid Bruce, had moſt right thereto. But when in the parlement time the lord Maurice de Murrey ſlue ſir Geffrey de Roſſe a Scotiſh knight, that was ſhiriffe of Aire and Lenarke, being of the Baliols ſide, for that in time of open warre the ſame ſir Geffrey had ſlaine his brother, vpon reſpect of this preſumptuous part, and by reaſon of ſuch ſtoutneſſe as the Scots otherwiſe ſhewed, no concluſion of peace could be brought to effect.

Before the feaſt of the Aſcenſion, the king of England ſent forward the king of Scots, the earles of Lancaſter, Warwike, Oxford, and Anegos, and diuerſe lords and capteins with an armie, the which after Whitſuntide entring into Scotland, paſſed ouer the Scotiſh ſea, and comming to ſaint Iohns towne (which the Scots had burnt, deſpairing to defend it againſt the Engliſh power) they ſet in hand to fortifie it, compaſſing it with déepe diches and a ſtrong rampier of earth. ¶ About the ſame time the king called a parlement at Northampton, where leauing the prelats and other to treat of ſuch matters as were proponed, he himſelfe rode northwards, and comming to Berwike, tooke with him a ſmall band of men of armes, and ſetting forward, haſted forth till he came to ſaint Iohns towne, where he found the king of Scots, and other his nobles greatlie wondering at his comming thither ſo vnlooked for. After he had reſted there a little, he tooke with him part of the armie, and paſſed forward ouer the mounteines of Scotland euen vnto Elgen in Murrey and Inuernes, further by manie miles than euer his grandfather had gone.

About Lammas the earle of Cornewall with the power of Yorkeſhire and Northumberland, and the lord Anthonie Lucie with the Cumberland and Weſtmerland men entred Scotland, and deſtroied the weſt parts, as Carrike, and other which obeied not the Balioll. The lord William Douglas ſtill coaſted the Engliſhmen, dooing to them what damage he might. At length this armie loden with preies and ſpoile returned home, but the earle of Cornewall with his owne retinue came through to ſaint Iohns towne, where he found the king being returned thither frō his iournie which he had made beyond the mounteins. The king ſtaied not long there, but leauing the king of Scots with his companie in that towne, he went to Striueling, where, on the plot of ground vpon which the deſtroied caſtell had ſtood, he built an other fortreſſe, called a Pile. And now, bicauſe he had ſpent a great deale of treaſure in thoſe warres of Scotland, he ſummoned a parlement to be holden at Notingham, in which there was granted to him a tenth of the cleargie, and likewiſe of the citizens and burgeſſes of good townes, and a fiftéenth of other that dwelt forth of cities and boroughes.

About the latter end of October, Iohn of Eltham earle of Cornewall the kings brother departed this life at ſaint Iohns towne in Scotland: his bodie was afterwards conueied to Weſtminſter, & there buried with all ſolemne funerals. The Scotiſh writers affirme that he was ſlaine by his brother king Edward for the crueltie he had vſed in the weſt parts of Scotland, in ſleaing ſuch as for ſafegard of their liues fled into churches. Moreouer, in December there deceaſſed at S. Iohns towne aforeſaid, Hugh de Freſnes, that in right of the counteſſe of Lincolne was intituled earle of Lincolne. He died of the flix, or (as was ſaid) through exceſſiue cold, which in thoſe quarters in that cold time of the yeare ſore afflicted the Engliſh people. ¶ In the meane time, about the feaſt of ſaint Luke the euangeliſt, the king went with an armie into Scotland toward the caſtell of Bothuille, and comming thither repared the ſame, which by the Scots had latelie before béene deſtroied. Before Chriſtmaſſe the king returned into England, but the king of Scots remained all the winter in ſaint Iohns towne with a ſober companie. The king ſtudieth to gather monie to mainteine his warres.

The quéene was deliuered of hir ſecond ſonne at Hatfield, who was therfore named William of Hatfield, who liued but a ſhort time, departing this world when he was but yoong. The king being returned home out of Scotland, ſought by all waies poſſible how to recouer monie, both to ſupplie his charges for the Scotiſh wars, and alſo to furniſh the other wars which he meant to take in hand againſt the French king: he got ſo much into his hands (as it is reported by writers) that it was verie ſcant and hard to come by throughout the whole realme: by reaſon of which ſcarſitie and want of monie, or vpon ſome other neceſſarie cauſe, vittels, and other chaffer and merchandize were exceeding cheape: for at London a quarter of wheat was ſold for two ſhillings, a fat oxe for ſix ſhillings eight pence, a fat ſheepe for ſix pence or eight pence, halfe a dozen of pigeons for one penie, a fat gooſe for two pence, a pig for one penie, and ſo all other vittels after the like rate.

This yeare was the warre proclamed betwixt England and France, cheefelie by the procurement of the lord Robert Dartois, a Frenchman, as then baniſhed out of France, vpon occaſion of a claime by him made vnto the earldome of Artois. This lord Robert after he was baniſhed France, fled ouer vnto king Edward, who gladlie receiued him and made him earle of Richmond. ¶ All the goods of the Italians were by the kings commandement this yeare confiſcate to his vſe, and ſo likewiſe were the goods of the monks of the Cluniake and Ciſterceaux orders. ¶ This yeare alſo a comet or blaſing ſtarre appeared, with long and terrible ſtreames paſſing from it. In the eleuenth yeare of his reigne, the king held a parlement at Weſtminſter, about the time of Lent, during the which, of the earledome of Cornewall he made a duchie, and gaue it vnto his eldeſt ſonne Edward, that was then earle of Cheſter, whom alſo (as ſome write) he created at the ſame time prince of Wales.

Moreouer in reward of ſeruice, there were ſix noble men at this parlement aduanced to the honour and title of earles, as the lord Henrie ſonne to the earle of Lancaſter was created earle of Derbie, or after ſome writers, earle of Leiceſter; William Bohun was created earle of Northampton, William Montacute earle of Saliſburie, Hugh Audeley earle of Gloceſter, William Clinton earle of Huntingdon, and Robert Vfford earle of Suffolke. This creation was on the ſecond ſundaie in Lent, and the ſame day were twentie knights made, whoſe names for breefeneſſe we do here omit. The caſtell of Bothule taken.

The Scots this yeare tooke the caſtell of Bothuile by ſurrender, ſo as the Engliſhmen that were within it, departed with their liues and goods ſaued. Diuerſe other caſtels and fortreſſes were taken by the Scots in Fife, and in other parts, but the countrie of Galloway was by them ſpeciallie ſore afflicted, bicauſe the people there held with their lord Edward Balioll. Herevpon it was agreed in this laſt parlement, that the earle of Warwike being appointed to go thither, ſhould haue with him the power beyond Trent northwards. But when about the Aſcenſiontide the Scots had beſieged the caſtell of Striueling, the king of England in perſon haſted thitherwards, of whoſe approach the Scots no ſooner vnderſtood, but that ſtreightwaies they brake vp their ſiege, and departed thence: the king therefore returned backe into the ſouth parts. About the ſame time ſir Euſtace de Maxwell knight, lord of Carlauerocke, reuolted from Edward Balioll vnto Dauid le Bruſe his ſide, and ſo that part dailie increaſed, and alſo the warre continued, with damage inough vnto both parts.

Sir Euſtace Maxwell.

In the beginning of September the earle of Warwike with an armie entred Scotland by Berwike, and the lord Thomas de Wake, and the lord Clifford, with the biſhop of Carleill accompanied with the Weſtmerland and Cumberland men, entred by Carleill, and within two daies after met with the earle of Warwike, as before it was appointed, and ſo ioining togither, they paſſed forwards, ſpoiling and waſting Teuidale, Moſetdale, and Nidesdale. The lord Anthonie Lucie with a part of the armie entred into Galloway, and after he had waſted that countrie, he returned to the armie, which by reaſon of the exceeding great weat that fell in that ſeaſon, they could not keepe on their iournie into Douglaſdale, and to Aire, as they had appointed: but hauing remained in Scotland twelue daies, they returned altogither vnto Carleill. Edward Balioll was not with them in this iournie, but remained ſtill in England.

The earle of Warwike inuadeth Scotland.

The Scots in reuenge hereof made diuerſe rodes into England, withdrawing ſtill with their prey and booties, before the Engliſh power could aſſemble to giue them battell. About Alhallontide, the Scots beſieged the caſtell of Edenburgh, but the biſhop of Carleill, the lord Randoll Dacres of Gilleſland, with the power of the counties of Cumberland and of Weſtmerland, and the king of Scots Edward Balioll, with the lord Anthonie Lucie, and ſuch companie as they brought from Berwike, meeting at Rokeſburgh, marched forth vnto Edenburgh, and chaſing the Scots from the ſiege, tooke order for the ſafe keeping of the caſtell from thenceforth, and returned into England. In this meane time things happened ſo well to the purpoſe of king Edward, that by practiſe he alienated the hearts of the Flemings from the obedience of their earle, being altogither an earneſt freend to the French king. He therefore vnderſtanding the minds of his people, ſought to winne them by ſome gentle treatie, and ſo did euen at the firſt, concluding an agreement with them of Gaunt, which were fullie at a point to haue entred into league with the king of England, as with him whoſe freendſhip by reaſon of the traffike of merchandize, (and namelie of the Engliſh wools) they knew to be more neceſſarie for their countrie than the French kings.

This ſiege began euen in the beginning of the twelfth yeare of king Edwards reigne, and continued for the ſpace of ninetéene wéeks, with ſmall gaine and leſſe honour to the Engliſhmen, in ſo much that the ſame brake vp vnder a colour of a truce, when there was no hope of winning the place, and that the noble men that laie there at ſiege, haſted to make an end, that they might attend the king in his iournie ouer into Brabant. The morrow after Candlemaſſe day the parlement began, in which there was a grant made to the king by the laitie of the one halfe of their woolles through the whole realme for the next ſummer, which he receiued, and likewiſe he leuied of the cleargie the whole, cauſing them to paie nine marks of euerie ſacke of the beſt wooll. But after the rate of the one halfe he tooke in whoſe hands ſo euer it was found, aſwell merchants as others. After this, he tooke a fiftéenth of all the communaltie of his realme in wooll, the price of euerie ſtone conteining fouretéene pounds rated at two ſhillings. The one and twentith of March the two cardinals tooke the ſea at Douer, and in their companie went ouer the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and the biſhop of Durham to treat of a peace, if by any good means the two kings might be made fréends. But as it appeared, their trauell was in vaine, for although they abode togither for a time on the frontiers, dooing their beſt indeuor, yet their trauell nothing auailed, as by that which followeth is moſt manifeſt.

The Flemings that fauoured king Edward, were put in ſuch comfort by the late victorie obteined by the Engliſhmen in the Ile of Cadſant, that falling to their former practiſe, one Iaques or Iacob van Arteueld an honimaker of the towne of Gant, was choſen amongſt them to be as it were the defender of the people, and namelie of the weauers, and other clothworkers. Finallie, his authoritie grew ſo hugelie amongſt all the whole number of the commons in Flanders, that he might doo more with them than their earle; and yet the earle to reconcile the people to his fauour, ceaſſed not to vſe all courteous means towards them that he could deuiſe, as releaſing cuſtomes and duties of monie, pardoning offenſes, forfeitures, and other ſuch like, but all would not auaile him. The king of England had ſo woon them by the meanes of the ſaid Iaques van Arteueld, that in the end Iohn archbiſhop of Canturburie, & Richard the biſhop of Durham, came into Flanders as ambaſſadors from king Edward, and trauelled ſo earneſtlie to draw the Flemings vnto an amitie with their maſter king Edward, that finallie a league was concluded betwixt the countrie of Flanders, and the ſaid king at Gant, in the preſence of the earle of Gelderland, as then being there. He eftſoones fléeth.

But this Siger being immediatlie after apprehended by the earle of Flanders, was put to death. Which act procured the earle ſo much hatred of the people, that ſhortlie after comming to Bruges, and attempting to force the towne to his will, he was forced himſelfe to flée from thence, for otherwiſe he had béene either taken or ſlaine; the commons of the towne & namelie the fullers, of whome he had ſlaine ſome there in the ſtréets, roſe ſo faſt vpon him. Herevpon fléeing home to his houſe, he tooke his wife, and a ſonne which he had, and fled with them into France, ſo forſaking his countrie which was now gouerned by Iaques van Arteueld, as though he had béene immediatlie lord thereof. After this, the earle returned home againe, as it were with the French kings commiſſion, to perſuade the Flemings to renounce the league concluded with the king of England: but he could bring nothing to paſſe, but was ſtill in danger to haue béene arreſted and ſtaied of his owne ſubiects, both at Gant and in other places, but namelie at Dixmue, where if he had not made the more haſt awaie, he had béene taken by them of Bruges. Amongſt other of his ſtuffe which he left behind him in that haſtie departure, his ſignet was forgotten, and not miſſed till he came to ſaint Omers, whither he fled for his ſafegard.

The marques of Gulike.

The earle of Gelderland created a duke.

Thus ye may perceiue that Flanders reſted wholie at king Edwards commandement, who to eſtabliſh amitie alſo with the duke of Brabant, and other princes of the empire, about the middeſt of Iulie ſailed ouer vnto Antwerpe, with his wife quéene Philip, his ſonne the prince of Wales, and a great number of other of the péeres and barons of his realme, where he was moſt ioifullie receiued of the duke of Brabant, and other lords of the empire. There was ſent to the emperour to procure his fréendſhip, from the king of England, the marques of Gulike with certeine noble men of England, and alſo certeine of the duke of Gelderland his councell, the which marques was made at that time an earle, & the earle of Gelderland was made duke. This duke of Gelderland named Reginald had married the ladie Iſabell ſiſter of king Edward, and therefore in fauour of the king his brother in law, trauelled moſt earneſtlie to procure him all the fréends within the empire that he could make.

K. Edwards confederates.

The princes and lords then, with whom king Edward was alied and confederated at that time, I find to be theſe; the dukes of Brabant and Gelderland, the archbiſhop of Cullen, the marqueſſe of Gulike, ſir Arnold de Baquehen, and the lord of Valkenburgh, who all promiſed to defie the French king, in the king of Englands quarrell, and to ſerue him with notable numbers of men, where and whenſoeuer it ſhould pleaſe him to appoint. The aliance of the earle of Heinault firſt procured the king of England all theſe fréends, vnto the which earle he had ſent ouer the biſhop of Lincolne and other in ambaſſage, immediatlie after that he had reſolued to make warres againſt France, by the counſell and aduiſe of ſir Robert Dartois, as in the French hiſtorie more plainlie appeareth. In this meane ſeaſon was quéene Philip brought to bed at Antwerpe of hir third ſonne, which was named Lionell. ¶ The king of England earneſtlie followed his buſineſſe, and had manie treaties with his fréends and confederats, till at length he made ſure to him the fréendſhip of all thoſe townes & countries, which lie betwixt France and the riuer of Rhene: onelie the cities of Tournie and Cambrie held of the French kings part, though Cambrie belonged to the empire.

A ſubſidie vpon wooll.

The cleargie granteth a tenth.

In this twelfth yeare of king Edwards reigne at a councell holden at Northampton by the duke of Cornewall, lord warden of England in abſence of the king his brother, and by manie of the prelats and barons of the realme, there was granted to the king a ſubſidie in wooll, to the great burthen of the commons: but for ſo much as the cleargie of the land was not preſent at that councell, it was ordeined that they ſhould be called, and ſo they aſſembled in a conuocation at London the firſt day of October, in which the cleargie granted to the king a tenth for the third yeare then to come, ouer and beſides the two tenths before granted, and that the tenth of this preſent yeare ſhould be paid in ſhorter time than it was appointed: but they flatlie denied to grant their wools, which neuertheleſſe the laitie paid, and that to their great hinderance, for it roſe double to a fiftéene. From the beginning of October, to the beginning of December this yeare, fell ſuch abundance of raine that it hindered greatlie the huſbandmen in ſowing of their winter corne: and in the beginning of December came ſuch a vehement froſt continuing the ſpace of twelue wéeks, that it deſtroied vp all the ſéed almoſt that was ſowne, by reaſon whereof ſmall ſtore of winter corne came to proofe in the ſummer following: but though there was no plentie, yet all kinds of graine were ſold at a reaſonable price, through want of monie.

The Frenchmen by ſea ſore troubled the ſea coaſts of this realme, ſpeciallie where the champion countries ſtretch towards the ſea coaſts. At Haſtings in the feaſt of Corpus Chriſti, they burnt certeine fiſhermens houſes, and ſlue ſome of the inhabitants. Alſo in the hauens about Deuonſhire and Cornewall, and towards Briſtow, they tooke and burnt certeine ſhips, killing the mariners that came to their hands, and in the Whitſun-wéeke they landed at Plimmouth, and burnt the more part of the towne: but Hugh Courtnie earle of Deuonſhire, a man almoſt foureſcore yeares of age, and other knights and men of the countrie came againſt theſe Frenchmen, ſleaing ſuch as came into their hands to the number of fiue hundred, as was eſtéemed, and chaſed the reſidue. ¶ The Scots alſo about the ſame time did much hurt and great miſchéefe to the Engliſhmen both by ſea and land.

A floud.

In the beginning of Iulie the lord William Dowglas, with a number of men of warre, returned from France home into England, and to him vpon his returne the caſtell of Cowper was deliuered, with all the countrie thereabouts. After this, comming to the ſiege of S. Iohns towne, which the gouernour the earle of Murrey, the erle of March, Patrike de Dunbarre, and other of the Scotiſh lords had beſieged, at length it was ſurrendered by ſir Thomas Vthred capiteine there of the Engliſh gariſon, departing in ſafetie home into England. Thrée daies before the feaſt of the Aſſumption of our ladie, there chanced in the night ſeaſon ſuch a mightie and ſudden inundation of water at Newcaſtell vpon Tine, that it bare downe a péece of the towne wall, ſix perches in length, néere to a place called Walknow, where a hundred and twentie temporall men with diuerſe préeſts and manie women were drowned and lamentablie periſhed.

But now to returne to the king, which all this while remained in Brabant. Ye haue heard how the citie of Cambrie held with the French king: wherefore the K. of England aſſembling togither a mightie ſtrong armie aſwell of Engliſhmen as of the low countries of Dutchland, ment to beſiege it, but firſt he ſent the archbiſhop of Canturburie with the biſhops of Lincolne and Durham vnto Arras, as commiſſioners from him to méet there with the archbiſhop of Rouen, and the biſhops of Langres and Beauuais, appointed to come thither as commiſſioners from the French king, to treat with the Engliſhmen of a peace, but they could not agrée vpon anie concluſion, wherevpon king Edward, comming forward with his power, approched to Cambrie, and planted his ſiege round about it. But the biſhop, not meaning to deliuer the citie vnto king Edward nor vnto anie other that ſhould demand it to the behoofe of the emperour Ludouike of Bauiere, as then excommunicated of the pope, had receiued into the towne fiue thouſand Frenchmen, with the French kings eldeſt ſonne, the duke of Normandie latelie returned out of Guien, and the lord Theobald Maruiſe, with certeine companies of Sauoiſins, ſo that the citie was ſo defended, that the king of England perceiuing he ſhould but loſe time, leuied his ſiege, and entred into France, pitching his field at a place called Flaminguerie.

Alſo thirtéene ſailes of the French fléet met with fiue Engliſh ſhips, and after a ſore fight which continued nine houres, tooke two of thoſe fiue being tall and goodlie ſhips, the one called the Edward, and the other the Chriſtopher; the other thrée being ſmaller veſſels, as two of them barks and the other a caruell eſcaped by their ſwiftneſſe of ſailing. The king of England had not paſt thréeſcore thouſand in his armie at the moſt: but whileſt he laie there vpon the borders of France, his people did much hurt, making roads abroad beyond the water of Some, burning and ſpoiling abbies, towns, and villages, as Crignie, ſaint Benoit, Ribemont in Thieraſſe, ſaint Gouan, Marle, and Creſſie. Alſo the lord Beaumont of Heinault burnt the towne of Guiſe, though his daughter was as then within the ſame towne wife vnto Lewes earle of Blois: his brother William earle of Heinault was latelie before deceaſſed, leauing the earledome to his ſonne named alſo William, who continued with the king of England ſo long as he laie before Cambrie, & kept him within the bounds of the empire, as though his allegiance had bound him to no leſſe, but after the ſaid king was paſſed the riuer of Leſcault, otherwiſe called the Skell, and in Latine Scaldis, which diuideth the empire from the kingdome of France, he would no longer ſerue the king of England, but departed from him for feare to offend the French king, accounting that the matter perteined not now to the empire, but to the priuate quarell and buſineſſe of the king of England: notwithſtanding his vncle the ſaid ſir Iohn like a faithfull gentleman continued ſtill in king Edward his ſeruice.

The armies retire without battell.

The two armies of England and France approched within foure miles togither, ſo that euerie man thought that there would ſure haue béene battell betwixt them, as there had béene in déed, if the French king had béene willing; yet ſome ſaie, that he of himſelfe was diſpoſed thereto: but his councellors aduiſed him to the contrarie, by reaſon of certeine ſigns and tokens which they miſliked, as the ſtarting of an hare amongſt them, and ſuch like. Alſo it was ſaid that Robert king of Naples being then come into France, whoſe knowledge in aſtronomie was knowne to be great, diſſuaded the French king by his letters, that in no wiſe he ſhould fight with the king of England, for he had vnderſtanding by art of the heauenlie influences and diſpoſition of the bodies aboue, that if the French king fought with this Edward king of England, he ſhould aſſuredlie be put to the worſe. Whether this was the cauſe, or anie other, ſure it is that the Frenchmen had no mind to fight, ſo that theſe two mightie armies departed in ſunder without battell, and the king of England returned into Flanders, ſorie in déed that he had not with him halfe the number that the French king had, yet in truſt of the valiancie of his ſouldiers, choſen out of the pikedſt men through England and all the low countrie on this ſide the Rhene, he ment verelie to haue incountered his enimies, if they had come forward.

A councell at Bruſſels.

At his comming backe into Brabant, there was a councell called at Bruſſels, where were preſent all thoſe lords of the empire which had béene with him in that iournie, as the dukes of Brabant, Gelderland, and Gulike, the marques of Blankbourgh, the earle of Bergen, the lord Beaumont of Heinault otherwiſe called ſir Iohn de Heinault, the lord of Valkenbourgh, and manie others. Thither came alſo Iaques Arteueld chéefe gouernour of Flanders. Here in councell taken how the king of England might beſt mainteine the wars which be had begun thus againſt the French king, he was aduiſed that he ſhould in anie wiſe require them of Flanders to aid him, and in his quarell to defie the French king, and to go with him againſt the ſaid French king, and if they would thus doo, then ſhould he promiſe them to recouer and deliuer into their hands the towns of Liſle, Dowaie, and Bethon. The king of England, according to this aduiſe to him giuen, made ſuch requeſt to the Flemings, who therevpon deſired time to conſult togither, what they might doo therein, and finallie they declared for anſwer, that they would gladlie ſo doo, but yet whereas they were bound by faith and oth, and in the ſumme of two millians of florens in the popes chamber, not to make nor moue any warre againſt the king of France, whoſoeuer he were, on paine to loſe that ſumme, and beſide to run in the ſentence of curſing, they beſought him, that it might ſtand with his pleaſure, to take vpon him the title and armes of France, as the ſame apperteined to him of right, and then would they obey him as rightfull K. of France, and require of him acquittances in diſcharge of their bonds, and he to pardon them thereof, as rightfull king of France.

The king of England, though he had iuſt cauſe to claime the crowne of France, in right of his mother quéene Iſabell, yet to take vpon him the name and armes of that realme, before he had made conqueſt of any part thereof, he thought it ſtood not with much reaſon: but yet after he had cauſed the matter to be throughlie debated amongſt them of his councell, as well to ſatiſfie the Flemings, as for other reſpects, he ſaw it ſhould be the beſt waie that might be taken to the aduancement of his purpoſe. Then he anſwered the Flemings, that if they would ſweare, and ſeale to this accord, and promiſe to mainteine his warre, he would be contented to fulfill their deſire, and alſo he promiſed to get for them againe the townes of Liſle, Dowaie, and Bethune. Herevpon was a day aſſigned to méet at Gant: the king came thither, and the moſt part of the ſaid lords, and all the councellors of the good townes & places in Flanders were there aſſembled, and ſo all the foreſaid matters were rehearſed, ſworne, and ſealed, and the armes of France were then quartered with thoſe of England, and from thenceforth he tooke vpon him the name of king of France, in all his writings, proclamations, and commandements. This is noted by Chriſtopher Okland, where ſpeaking of the mingling of the French and Engliſh armes, he ſaith amongſt other things;

The iſſue of Philip le Beau.

Lewes Hutine.

Philip le Long.

¶ Sith then that we be come to this place, it ſhall not be much amiſſe to rehearſe ſomewhat of the right and title whereby king Edward did thus claime the crowne of France, hauing of purpoſe omitted to ſpeake thereof, till now that he intituled himſelfe with the name, & tooke vpon him to beare the armes alſo of France, vpon occaſion before expreſſed. It is well knowne that Philip le Beau king of France had iſſue by his wife quéene Ione thrée ſons, Lewes ſurnamed Hutine, Philip le Long, and Charles le Beau: alſo two daughters, the one dieng in hir infancie, and the other named Iſabell liued, and was maried vnto Edward the ſecond of that name king of England, who begot of hir this Edward the third, that made this claime. The thrée ſonnes of the foreſaid Philip le Beau reigned ech after other, as kings of France. Firſt after Philip the father, ſuccéeded his eldeſt ſonne Lewes Hutine, who had iſſue by his firſt wife Margaret, daughter to Robert duke of Burgogne, a daughter named Ione, the which was anon giuen in mariage vnto Lewes earle of Eureux: but ſhe liuing not long, died without iſſue. Hir father the ſaid Lewes Hutine married after the deceaſſe of his firſt wife, an other wife named Clemence, daughter to Charles Martell, the father of K. Robert of Sicill, whom he left great with child when he died. The child being borne proued a ſon, & was named Iohn, but liued not manie daies after. Then Philip the Long was admitted vnto the crowne of France, though manie ſtood in opinion that Ione the daughter of Lewes Hutine, which yet was aliue, onght to haue inherited the kingdome after hir father: and namelie Odo duke of Burgogne, vncle to the ſaid Ione, was moſt earneſt in that matter, in fauour uour of his neece. But might ouercame right, ſo that he was conſtreined to be quiet. Philip le Long, after he had reigned fiue yeares, died alſo, and left no iſſue behind him. Then laſtlie Charles le Beau tooke vpon him the kingdome, and the ſeuenth yeare after died, his wife big bellied, which ſhortlie after brought forth a maiden named Blanch, that ſtreightwaies haſting to follow hir father, liued no while in this world. By this means then the bloud roiall in the heires male of Philip le Beau was extinguiſhed in his ſonne the foreſaid Charles le Beau, whereof the contention tooke beginning about the right to the crowne of France, betwixt the Frenchmen and Engliſhmen, which hangeth as yet vndecided till theſe our daies. For king Edward auerred that the kingdome of France apperteined vnto him as lawfull heire, bicauſe that he alone was remaining of the kings ſtocke, and touched his mothers father Philip le Beau, in the next degree of conſanguinitie, as he that was borne of his daughter Iſabell.

The Flemings ſweare fealtie to the king of England.

Therefore immediatlie after the deceaſſe of the ſaid Charles le Beau, by ambaſſadours ſent vnto the peeres of France, he publiſhed to them his right, requiring that they would admit him king according therevnto: but his ambaſſadours could neuer be quietlie heard, and therefore returned home without anie towardlie anſwer, which moued him in the end to attempt the recouerie of his lawfull inheritance by force, ſith by law he could not preuaile, and now by aduiſe of his freends to take vpon him both the title and armes of France, to ſignifie to the world what right he had to the ſame. After that this league therefore was concluded with them of Flanders, and that king Edward had taken vpon him the name of king of France with the armes; the duke of Gelderland and Iaques van Arteueld went vnto all the good townes and iuriſdictions of Flanders, to receiue their oths of fidelitie vnto king Edward, perſuading with the people, that the ſupreme rule belonged vnto him, ſauing to the townes their ancient lawes and liberties, and to their earle his right of proprietie.

About the latter end of this thirteenth yeare of K. Edwards reigne, the mariners and ſea-men of the cinque ports, getting them abord into a number of ſmall ſhips and balingers, well trimmed and appointed for the purpoſe, paſſed ouer to Bullongne, where they tooke land one day in a thicke foggie weather, and ſetting on the Baſe towne, they burnt nineteene gallies, foure great ſhips, and to the number of twentie ſmaller veſſels, togither with their tackle and furniture. They ſet fire alſo on the houſes that ſtood neere to the water ſide, and namelie they burnt one great houſe, wherein laie ſuch a number of oares, ſailes, armour, and croſſebowes, as might haue ſufficed to furniſh ſo manie men as could be well abord in nineteene gallies. There were manie ſlaine on both parts in atchiuing this enterpriſe, but more of the Frenchmen than of the Engliſhmen. About the ſame time the queene of England was deliuered of hir fourth ſonne in the towne of Gaunt, the which was named Iohn, firſt created earle of Richmond, and after duke of Lancaſter. When king Edward had finiſhed his buſineſſe with the Flemings at Gaunt, he left his wife queene Philip there ſtill in that towne, and returned himſelfe vnto Antwerpe, and ſhortlie after about the feaſt of Candlemaſſe tooke the ſea, and came backe into England, to prouide for monie to mainteine his begun warres. And herevpon about the time of Lent following, he called his high court of parlement at Weſtminſter, in the which he aſked of his commons towards his charges, for the recouerie of his right in France, the fift part of their moueable goods, the cuſtomes of wools for two yeares to be paid aforehand, and the ninth ſheafe of euerie mans corne. At length it was agreed, that the king ſhould haue for euerie ſacke of wooll fortie ſhillings, for euerie three hundred wooll fels fortie ſhillings, and for euerie laſt of leather fortie ſhillings, and for other merchandize after the rate; to begin at the feaſt of Eaſter, in this fourteenth yeare of the kings reigne, and to indure till the feaſt of Pentecoſt then next following, and from that feaſt till the feaſt of Pentecoſt, then next inſuing into one yeare: for which the king granted, that from the feaſt of Pentecoſt, which was then to come into one yeare, he nor his heires ſhould not demand, aſſeſſe, nor take, nor ſuffer to be aſſeſſed or taken, more cuſtome of a ſacke of wooll of any Engliſhman, but halfe a marke, and vpon the wooll fels and leather the old former cuſtome.

Moreouer, there was granted vnto him the ninth ſheafe, the ninth fleece, and ninth lambe, to be taken by two yeares next comming. And for the leuieng thereof, the lords of euerie ſhire through the land, were appointed to anſwer him, euerie one for the circuit within the which he dwelled. And bicauſe the king muſt needs occupie much monie yer the receit of this ſubſidie could come to his hands, he borrowed in the meane time manie notable ſummes of diuerſe cities, and particular perſons of this land, amongſt the which he borrowed of the citie of London 20000 marks, to be paied againe of the monie comming of the foreſaid ſubſidie.

In the meane while, now that king Edward was come backe into England, the warres were hotlie purſued againſt his freends, that had their lands neere to the borders of France, and namelie againſt ſir Iohn de Heinault lord Beaumont, for the Frenchmen burned all his lands of Chimaie, except the fortreſſes, and tooke from thence a great preie. In this meane time the French king procured the pope to pronounce his curſſe againſt the Flemings for their rebellion, and to ſuſpend all diuine ſeruice that ought to be ſaid in anie hallowed place, ſo that there were no prieſts to be found that would take vpon them to ſaie any diuine ſeruice: wherevpon the Flemings ſent ouer into England certeine meſſengers to giue notice to king Edward how they were intreated, but he ſent them word that he would bring at his comming ouer vnto them, prieſts that ſhould ſaie maſſes and other ſeruice, whether the pope would or not, for he had priuilege ſo to doo. ¶ In Aprill, William Melton archbiſhop of Yorke departed this life, after whome variance roſe in the election of a new gouernour to that church, ſo that two were elected, William la Zouch, and William Killeſbie: but at length William la Zouch tooke place, being the 43 archbiſhop that had ſit in that ſeat. ¶ The earles of Saliſburie and Suffolke, which were left in Flanders by king Edward to helpe the Flemings, ſhortlie after Eſter, or (as other haue) in the time of Lent, were diſcomfited by the garriſon of Liſle, and taken priſoners as they would haue paſſed by that towne, to haue ioined with Iaques Arteueld, meaning to beſiege Tournie; but now by the taking of thoſe two earles that enterpriſe was broken. The duke of Normandie with a great armie entered into Heinault, burning and waſting the countrie, euen to the gates of Ualenciennes and Queſnoy. The king of England ſtaied, till the ſunne which at the firſt was in his face, came ſomewhat weſtward, and ſo had it vpon his backe, that it ſhould not hinder the ſight of his people, and ſo therewith did ſet vpon his enimies with great manhood, who likewiſe verie ſtoutlie incountered him, by reaſon whereof inſued a ſore and deadlie fight betwixt them. The nauies on both ſides were diuided into thrée battels. On the Engliſh part, the earles of Glouceſter, Northampton and Huntington, who was admerall of the fléet that belonged to the cinque ports, and the lord Robert Morley admerall of the northerne nauie had the guiding of the fore ward, bearing themſelues right valiantlie, ſo that at length the Engliſhmen hauing the aduantage, not onlie of the ſunne, but alſo of the wind and tide, ſo fortunatlie, that the French fléet was driuen into the ſtreights of the hauen, in ſuch wiſe that neither the ſouldiers nor mariners could helpe themſelues, in ſomuch that both heauen, ſea, and wind, ſéemed all to haue conſpired againſt the Frenchmen. And herewith manie ſhips of Flanders ioining themſelues with the Engliſh fléet, in the end the Frenchmen were vanquiſhed, ſlaine and taken, their ſhips being alſo either taken, bowged, or broken.

The victorie of the Engliſh men at the battell of Sluiſe.

When night was come vpon them, there were thirtie French ſhips, that yet had not entred the battell, the which ſought by couert of the night to haue ſtolne awaie, and one of them being a mightie great veſſell, called the Iames of Déepe, would haue taken awaie with hir a ſhip of Sandwich that belonged to the prior of Canturburie: but by the helpe of the earle of Huntington, after they had fought all the night till the next morning, the Engliſhmen at length preuailed, and taking that great huge ſhip of Déepe, found in hir aboue foure hundred dead bodies. To conclude, verie few of the French ſhips eſcaped, except ſome of their ſmaller veſſels, and certeine gallies with their admerall Barbenoir, who in the beginning of the battell got forth of the hauen, aduiſing the other capteins to doo the like, thereby to auoid the danger which they wilfullie imbraced. There died in this battell fought (as ſome write) on midſummer daie, in the yeare aforeſaid, of Frenchmen to the number of 30000, of Engliſhmen about 4000, or (as other haue that liued in thoſe daies) not paſt 400, amongſt whom there were foure knights of great nobilitie, as ſir Thomas Monhermere, ſir Thomas Latimer, ſir Iohn Boteler, and ſir Thomas Poinings.

It is ſaid alſo, that the king himſelfe was hurt in the thigh. The two Engliſh ſhips that had béene taken the yéere before, the Edward and the Chriſtopher, were recouered at this time, amongſt other of the French ſhips that were taken there. ¶ Sir Peter Bahuchet was hanged vpon a croſſe pole faſtened to a maſt of one of the ſhips. Through the wilfulneſſe of this man, the Frenchmen receiued this loſſe (as the French chronicles report) bicauſe he kept the nauie ſo long within the hauen, till they were ſo incloſed by the Engliſhmen, that a great number of the Frenchmen could neuer come to ſtrike ſtroke, nor to vſe the ſhot of their artillerie, but to the hurt of their fellows. Howſoeuer it was, the Engliſhmen got a famous victorie, to the great comfort of themſelues, and diſcomfort of their aduerſaries. ¶ The king of England, after he had thus vanquiſhed his enimies, remained on the ſea by the ſpace of thrée daies, and then comming on land, went to Gant, where he was receiued of the quéene with great ioy and gladneſſe.

In this meane while had the duke of Normandie beſieged the caſtell of Thuine Leueſques, néere to Cambrie, which was taken by ſir Walter of Mannie, a lord of Heinault, at the firſt beginning of the warres, and euer ſince till that time kept to the king of England his vſe. The earle of Heinault, who had béene of late both in England with king Edward, and alſo in Almaine with the emperour, to purchaſe their aſſiſtance for the defenſe of his countrie againſt the inuaſions of the Frenchmen, was now returned home, and meaning to reſcue ſuch as were beſieged in Thuine, ſent for ſuccours into Flanders, and into Almaine, and in the meane time leuieng ſuch power as he could make with his owne countrie, came therewith to Ualenciennes, whither forthwith reſorted vnto him the earle of Namure with two hundred ſpeares, the duke of Brabant with ſix hundred, the duke of Gelderland, the earle of Bergen, the lord of Ualkenburgh, and diuerſe other, the which togither with the earle of Heinault went and lodged alongſt by the riuer of Leſtault ouer againſt the French hoſt, which kept ſiege (as ye haue heard) vnder

The armies brake vp.

There came alſo to the aid of the earle of Heinault Iaques Arteueld, with his thrée ſcore thouſand Flemings. Now it was thought that they would haue fought yer they had departed in ſunder, but they did not. For after it was knowne how the king of England was arriued in Flanders, and had diſcomfited the French fléet, the duke of Brabant and others thought good to breake vp their enterpriſe for that time, and to reſort vnto the king of England, to vnderſtand what his purpoſe was to doo. Neither were the Frenchmen haſtie to giue battell, ſo that after the capteins of Thuine Leueſques, ſir Richard Limoſin knight an Engliſhman, and two eſquiers, brethren to the erle of Namure, Iohn and Thierrie, had left their fortreſſe void, and were come ouer the riuer by boats vnto the earle of Heinaults campe, the armies on both ſides brake vp and departed, the Frenchmen into France, and the other to Valenciennes, and from thence the princes and great lords drew to Gaunt, to welcome the king of England into the countrie, of whome they were right ioifullie receiued: and after they had communed togither of their affaires, it was appointed by the king, that they ſhould méet him at Willefort in Brabant at a daie prefixed, where he would be readie to conſult with them about his procéedings in his warres againſt his aduerſaries the Frenchmen.

Here it was ordeined, that the countries of Flanders, Brabant, and Heinault, ſhould be ſo vnited and knit in one corporation, that nothing ſhould be doone amongſt them in publike affaires, but by common conſent, and if anie warres were mooued againſt anie of them, then ſhould the other be readie to aid them, againſt whome anie ſuch warre was mooued: and if vpon anie occaſion anie diſcord roſe betwixt them for anie matter, they ſhould make an end of it amongſt themſelues; and if they could not, then ſhould they ſtand to the iudgement and arbitrement of the king of England, vnto whome they bound themſelues by oth to kéepe this ordinance and agréement.

Tournie furniſhed with a ſtrong power of men.

Tournie beſieged.

The French king being informed that the king of England ment to laie ſiege vnto Tournie, as it was indéed deuiſed at this councell holden at Willefort, tooke order for the furniſhing thereof with men, munition, and vittels in moſt defenſible wiſe. There were ſent to that towne the beſt men of warre in all France, as the earle of Ewe conſtable of France, the yoong earle of Guines his ſonne, the earle of Foiz and his brethren, the earle Amerie de Narbon, with manie other, hauing with them foure thouſand ſouldiers. Sir Godmar du Foie was there before as capteine of the towne, ſo that it was prouided of all things neceſſarie. Howbeit, the king of England (according as it was appointed at the councell holden at Willefort, about the feaſt of Marie Magdalen) departed from Gaunt, and came to Tournie, hauing with him ſeauen earles of his owne countrie, as Darbie, Penbroke, Hereford, Huntingdon, Northampton, Gloceſter, and Arundell, eight prelats, eight and twentie baronets, two hundred knights, foure thouſand men of armes, and nine thouſand archers, beſides other footmen. He lodged at the gate called ſaint Martine, in the waie that is toward Liſle and Dowaie.

Anon after came the dukes of Brabant and Gelderland, the earle of Gulike, the marqueſſe of Blanqueburgh, the marqueſſe of Muſſe, the earls of Bergen, Sauines, and Heinault: alſo Iaques Arteueld, who brought with him about fortie thouſand Flemings. So that there was at this ſiege to the number of ſix ſcore thouſand men, as ſome writers affirme. There was alſo an other armie of Flemings, as of the townes of Ypres, Poppringue, Furnes, Caſſell, of the Chateleinie, & of Bergis, being to the number of fortie thouſand, appointed to make warre againſt the Frenchmen that kept ſaint Omers, and other townes there on the frontiers of Arthois, which armie was led by the earle of Richmond, otherwiſe called the lord Robert Dartois, and by ſir Henrie de Flanders, the which approching one day to ſaint Omers, were ſharplie fought with; for within ſaint Omers at that time laie a ſtrong power of Frenchmen with the duke of Burgoine, the earle of Arminacke and others.

The variable fortune of fights.

Additions to Adam Merimuth.

The Flemings were not willing to ſerue, for neither had they any truſt in their capteine the ſaid erle of Richmond, neither would they willinglie haue paſſed out of their owne confines, but onlie to defend the ſame from the inuaſion of their enimies: yet through much perſuaſion, forward they went, diuided into ſundrie battels contrarie to their manner. The enimies perceiuing ſome aduantage, iſſued forth vpon them, and aſſailed them verie ſtoutlie, inſomuch that the earle of Arminacke ſetting vpon them of Ypres, ouerthrew them, and chaſed them vnto a towne called Arques, which they had a little before ſet on fire and burned. An other companie of Frenchmen, ſkirmiſhing with them of Franks, Furnes, and Bergis, put them alſo to the worſe. Contrarilie, thoſe Frenchmen that encountered with the lord Robert Dartois, and them of Bruges whome he led, ſuſteined great loſſe, and were beaten backe into the citie: the duke of Burgoine himſelfe being in no ſmall danger for a time, ſo ſharpe the bickering was betwixt them, and the euent ſo variable. Wherefore it is notablie and fitlie ſaid in this behalfe, that

Sir Thomas Vthred.

There be that write, that this fight continued from thrée of the clocke till euentide, and that the earle of Richmond was twiſe put to flight, for his people did leaue him in the plaine field: but at length by the aduiſe of ſir Thomas Vthred, whome the king of England had appointed to attend the ſaid earle, with manie Engliſhmen and archers, he aſſembled his people eftſoones togither againe, and ſetting on his enimies. Now when it was almoſt night, néere to the gates of ſaint Omers, he finallie ouercame them, where were ſlaine of the French part fiftéene barons and fourescore knights, beſide a great number of other people. Diuerſe alſo were ſlaine on the earle of Richmonds part at this laſt encounter, and among other an Engliſh knight, that bare armes eſchecked ſiluer and gules.

The earle of Richmond in danger to be ſlaine.

Finallie, as the earle of Richmond returned towards his campe, which laie in the vale of Caſſell, he met with certeine Arteſines and Frenchmen, which had béene chaſing the other Flemings, and though it was late in the euening, that one could not take good view of an other, yet here they fought againe, and ſo diuerſe of the Frenchmen were taken and killed, and amongſt other that were caught, was a knight of Burgoine, named ſir William de Nillie. But when the earle of Richmond and thoſe that were with him came to the place where the campe laie, they found that all the reſidue of the Flemings were fled and gone. And when the ſaid earle came to Caſſell, the people were readie to haue ſlaine him, their former malice towards him being now much increaſed with the euill ſucceſſe of this paſſed enterpriſe, ſo that he was glad to get him thence, and to repaire vnto king Edward, that laie yet at the ſiege before Tournie, during which ſiege manie proper feats of armes were doone betwixt thoſe within and them without: for few daies paſſed without the atchiuing of ſome enterpriſe.

The great armie raiſed by the French king.

Alſo the French king, hauing made his aſſemblie at Arras, and got thither a mightie hoſt, as well out of the empire as of his owne ſubiects, came and lodged at the bridge of Bouuins, thrée leagues from Tournie. There were with him the king of Bohem, the duke of Lorreine, the biſhop of Mentz, the earles of Bar, mount Belliard, & Sauoie, alſo the dukes of Burgogne and Burbone, with a great number of other earles and lords, ſo that the greateſt puiſſance of all France was iudged to be there with the king. Whileſt he laie incamped thus at Bouuins, and the king of England at Tournie, manie exploits were atchiued betwixt their people, who laie not idle, but ſtill rode abroad and oftentimes met, and then that part which was weakeſt paied for the others charges, ſo that manie were ſlaine & taken on both ſides as well of the nobilitie as other. Alſo diuerſe townes were ſacked and burned on the frontiers of France, during this ſiege at Tournie, namelie at the purſuit of the earle of Heinault, as Seclin, S. Amond, Orchies, Landas, and other.

The ladie Iane de Ualois treateth for a peace.

At length at the ſuit of the ladie Iane de Ualois, ſiſter to the French king, and mother to the earle of Heinault, trauelling ſtill betwixt the parties to bring them vnto ſome accord, it was granted that either partie ſhould ſend certeine ſufficient perſons to intreat of the matter, which ſhould méet at a little chappell, ſtanding in the fields called Eſplotin, and hereto alſo was a truce granted for thrée daies. For the Engliſh part were appointed the duke of Brabant, the biſhop of Lincolne, the duke of Gelderland, the earle of Gulike, and ſir Iohn de Heinault lord Beaumont. For the French part, the king of Bohem, Charles erle of Alanſon brother to the French king, the biſhop of Liege, the earle of Flanders, and the earle of Arminacke: and the ladie of Ualois was ſtill among them as a mediatrix, by whoſe meanes chéefelie they at length did agrée vpon a truce to indure for a yeare betwéene all parties and their men, and alſo betwéene them that were in Scotland, in Gaſcoigne, and Poictou.

A truce accorded.

It was agréed alſo by theſe commiſſioners, that there ſhould other commiſſioners of either part foure or fiue méet at Arras at a daie appointed, and thither alſo ſhould the pope ſend his legats, to treat of a perpetuall peace and full agréement to be made betwixt the two kings of England and France. There was alſo conſideration had of the Flemings, ſo that they were releaſed of all ſuch ſummes of monie as they were by anie bonds indangered to paie by forfeiture, or otherwiſe, for anie matter before that time vnto the crowne of France. Alſo they were releaſed of the interdiction and curſſe of the church, and then alſo was their earle reſtored home. It was further accorded, that the French king ſhould reſtore vnto the king of England certeine townes and places in Guien, which in the beginning of theſe warres the earle of Alanſon had taken from the Engliſhmen, as Penne in Agenois, and others. Alſo whereas the French king had ſeized the countie of Pontieu into his hands, which was the dower of quéene Iſabell, the mother of king Edward, he ſhould alſo reſtore the ſame vnto king Edward, to hold it as he did before.

Herevpon was the ſiege raiſed from Tournie, after it had continued there the ſpace of ten wéekes and foure daies. They within ſtood in great danger for lacke of vittels to haue béene conſtreined to the ſurrendring of the towne, if this truce had not béene concluded, which cauſed the French king the ſooner to agrée, in like caſe as the lacke of monie cauſed the king of England to take his truce, which otherwiſe (as was thought) he would not haue doone: ſo that by the violent conſtraint of neceſſitie they were forced thus to doo, againſt which there is no trieng of maiſteries, nor ſtrugling to make it ſtoope and obeie: for

After he had raiſed his ſiege he went to Gant, and thither came alſo the earle of Flanders being now reſtored home to his countrie, and made the king of England great cheare, feaſting and banketting him right princelie, togither with the quéene. Finallie, after that king Edward had refreſhed himſelfe a while at Gant, he tooke a verie few with him, and came into Zeland; and there taking the ſeas to paſſe ouer into England, he was ſore toſſed by force of outragious ſtormes of wind and weather. Yet at length after thrée daies and thrée nights ſailing, in the night of the feaſt of ſaint Andrew, he came on land at the tower of London about cocke-crowing, and with him the earle of Northampton, the lord Walter de Mannie, the lord Iohn Darcie, the ſonne of the lord Iohn Beauchampe, Giles Beauchampe, with two chapleins that were his ſecretaries, ſir William Killeſbie, and ſir Philip Weſton, beſide a few others.

Iudges and other officers committed to the tower.

After his arriuall he ſent for the biſhop of Chicheſter that was lord chancellor, for the biſhop of Couentrie and Lichfield being lord treaſuror, and for ſuch of the iudges as were then in London. The lord chancellor and the lord treaſuror he ſtreightwaies diſcharged of their offices, threatening to ſend them into Flanders, there to remaine as pledges for monie that he there owght, or if they refuſed to go thither, then to képe them priſoners in the towne. But when the biſhop of Chicheſter declared to him the danger of the canon eſtabliſhed againſt ſuch as impriſoned biſhops, he ſuffered them to depart: but the iudges, to wit, Iohn de Stonore, Richard de Willoughbie, William de Shareſhull, and alſo Nicholas or (as other haue) Matthew de la Bech, who was before gardian of his ſonne, and lieutenant of the tower: alſo Iohn de Pultnie, and William de Poole merchants; and the chiefe clerkes of the chancerie, Iohn de ſaint Paule, Michaell de Wath, Henrie de Stretford, and Robert de Chikewell; and of the eſcheker, Iohn de Thorpe, and manie other, were committed to diuerſe priſons, but yet bicauſe they were committed but onelie vpon commandement, they were within a while after deliuered.

New officers made in place of other that were diſcharged.

The lord Wake was alſo committed, but ſhortlie after, he was deliuered to his great honor, as Walſingham writeth. Robert de Bourchier was made lord chancellor, and Richard de Sadington lord treaſuror: all the ſhiriffes of ſhires, and other officers alſo were remoued, and other put in their places, and iuſtices appointed in euerie ſhire, to inquire vpon the defaults of collectors and other officers, ſo that few or none eſcaped vnpuniſhed, howſoeuer they had demeaned themſelues, ſo ſtreictlie thoſe iuſtices procéeded in their commiſſions. The king indeed was ſore offended with thoſe whom he had put in truſt to leuie monie, and to ſée it conueied ouer to him into the low countrie, bicauſe that for want thereof in time of néed, he was conſtreined to take truce with his aduerſarie the French king, and leaue off his enterpriſe, which he was in good forwardneſſe to haue gone through withall, if he had not béene diſappointed of treaſure which he had commanded to be ſent ouer vnto him, which was not doone but kept backe, in whom ſoeuer the fault reſted.

Neuertheles, he wiſhed that he ſhould trie out in whoſe hands the wools and monie remained, which were taken vp to his vſe, and that vpon a iuſt accompts had at their hands, it might appeare who were in fault, that he had not monie brought to him, whileſt he laie at ſiege before Tournie, as he had appointed; and that when the truth was knowne, they that were in fault might be worthilie puniſhed. And as for his owne cauſe, he ſignified, that he was readie to be tried by his peeres, ſauing alwaies the ſtate of holie church, and of his order, &c. Further, he beſought the king, not to thinke euill of him, and of other good men, till the truth might be tried, for otherwiſe, if iudgement ſhould be pronounced, without admitting the partie to come to his anſwere, as well the guiltleſſe as the guiltie might be condemned.

The archbiſh. writeth to the king.

Anno Reg. 15.
A letter ſent to the deane of Paules.

The king neuertheleſſe ſtill offended towards the archbiſhop, cauſed Adam biſhop of Wincheſter to indite a letter againſt him, directed from the king to the deane and chapiter of Paules, openlie to be publiſhed by them: the effect whereof was, to burthen the archbiſhop with vnthankfulneſſe, and forgetting of his bounden duetie towards his ſouereigne lord and louing maiſter, namelie, in that where he promiſed the king to ſee him throughlie furniſhed with monie, towards the maintenance of his warres: when it came to paſſe, none would be had, which turned not onelie to the hinderance of the kings whole proceedings, but alſo to his great diſcredit, and cauſing him to run greatlie in debt by intereſt, through borrowing of monie, for the paiment of the wages of his men of warre, when through the archbiſhops negligence, who had the cheefe rule of the land, the collectors and other officers ſlacked their duetie, whereby there was no monie ſent ouer, according to that was appointed: and wheras now, ſince his comming ouer, he had ſent to the archbiſhop to come vnto him, that by his information, he might the better learne who they were that neglected their duetie, he diſobedientlie refuſed to come, pretending ſome feare of bodilie harme, through the malice of ſome that were about the king. Wherevpon, when Rafe lord Stafford, lord ſteward of the kings houſe, was ſent with a ſafe conduct, for him to come in all ſafetie to the court, he flatlie made anſwer that he would not come, except in full parlement.

The archbiſhop refuſeth to come to the court.

Manie other miſdemeanors was the archbiſhop charged with towards the king in that letter, as maliciouſlie ſlandering the king for vniuſt oppreſſion of the people, confounding the cleargie, and greeuing the church with exactions, leuies of monie, tolles and tallages. Therefore, ſith he went about to ſlander the kings roiall authoritie, to defame his ſeruants, to ſtirre rebellion among the people, and to withdraw the deuotion and loue of the earles, lords, and great men of the land from the king: his highneſſe declared, that he meant to prouide for the integritie & preſeruation of his good name (whereof it is ſaid trulie, Dulcius eſt ære pretioſum nomen habere)

and to meet with the archbiſhops malice. And herewith diuerſe things were reherſed to the archbiſhops reproch, which he ſhould doo, procure, and ſuffer to be doone, by his euill and ſiniſter counſell, whileſt he had the rule of the realme in his hands vnder the king: wherein he had ſhewed himſelfe not onelie an acceptor of gifts, but alſo of perſons, in gratifieng diuerſe that nothing had deſerued ſundrie waies forth, and preſuming to doo raſhlie manie other things to the detriment of the kings roiall ſtate, and hurt of his regall dignitie, and to no ſmall damage of the people, abuſing the authoritie and office to him committed, ſo that if he perſiſted in his obſtinate wilfulneſſe, and rebellious contumacie, the king by thoſe his letters ſignified, that he meant to declare it more apparantlie in due time and place, and therefore commanded the ſaid deane and chapiter of Paules, to publiſh all thoſe things openlie, in places where they thought conuenient, according to their wiſedome giuen to them by God, ſo as he might haue cauſe to commend therein their carefull diligence. ¶ This letter was dated at Weſtminſter the tenth of Februarie, in the fifteenth yeare of his reigne ouer England, and ſecond ouer France.

Where the Londoners would not permit the kings iuſtices to ſit within the citie of London, contrarie to their liberties, the king appointed them to ſit in the tower; and when they would not make anie anſwer there, a great tumult was raiſed by the commons of the citie, ſo that the iuſtices being in ſome perill (as they thought) feigned themſelues to ſit there till towards Eaſter. Wherevpon, when the king could not get the names of them that raiſed the tumult, no otherwiſe but that they were certeine light perſons of the common people, he at length pardoned the offenſe. After this, thoſe iuſtices neither ſat in the tower, nor elſewhere, of all that yeare.

A parlement.

Adam Merimuth.

In the quindene of Eaſter, the king held a parlement at London, in the which, the prelats, earls, barons, and commons, preſented manie petitions; as to haue the great charter of liberties, and the charter of forreſts dulie obſerued, and that they which brake the ſame ſhould be diſcharged of their offices, if they were the kings officers, and that the high officers of the king ſhould be elected and choſen by their peeres in parlement. The king withſtood theſe petitions a certeine time, yet at length he granted to ſome of them; but as concerning the election of his officers, he in no wiſe would conſent, but yet he was contented that they ſhould receiue an oth in parlement, to doo iuſtice to all men in their offices, &c. Vpon which article and others, a ſtatute was made and confirmed with the kings ſeale.

The emperor woone frõ the king of Englands freendſhip.

In the meane while, the French king had with bribes woone Lewes of Bauaria, that named himſelfe emperour, from further fauouring the king of England; in ſo much that, vnder a colourable pretenſe of finding himſelfe greeued, for that the king of England had without his knowledge taken truce with the French king, he reuoked the dignitie of being vicar in the empire, from the king of England, but yet ſignified to him, that where the French king had at his requeſt put the matter in controuerſie betwixt him and the king of England into his hands, to make an end thereof, if it ſo pleaſed the king of England, that he ſhould treat as an indifferent arbitrator betwixt them, he promiſed to doo his indeuour; ſo as he doubted not, but that by his means he ſhould come to a good agreement in his cauſe, if he would follow his aduiſe. And to receiue anſwer hereof, he ſent his letters by one Eberhard a chapleine of his, the reader of the friers heremits to S. Auguſtins order, requeſting the king of England to aduertiſe him by the ſame meſſenger, of his whole mind in that behalfe.

The emperor offereth to be a meane to cõclude a peace.

The kings anſwer.

The king for anſwer, ſignified againe by his letters to the emperour, that for the zeale which he had to make an accord betwixt him and his aduerſarie Philip de Valois, that named himſelfe French king, he could not but much commend him, and for his part he had euer wiſhed, that ſome reaſonable agreement might be had betwixt them: but ſith his right to the realme of France was cleere and manifeſt inough, he purpoſed not to commit it by writing vnto the doubtfull iudgement or arbitrement of anie. And as concerning the agreement which the emperour had made with the French king, bicauſe (as he alledged) it was lawfull for him ſo to doo, ſith without the emperors knowledge he had taken truce with the ſame French king; he ſaid, if the circumſtances were well conſidered, that matter could not miniſter any cauſe to moue him to ſuch agreement: for if the emperour remembred, he had giuen to him libertie at all times to treat of peace, without making the emperour priuie thereto (ſo that without his aſſent, he concluded not vpon any finall peace) which he proteſted that he neuer meant to doo, till he might haue his prouident aduiſe, counſell, and aſſent therevnto. And as concerning the reuoking of the vicarſhip of the empire from him, he tooke it doone out of time; for it was promiſed, that no ſuch reuocation ſhould be made, till he had obteined the whole realme of France, or at the leaſt, the more part thereof. ¶ Theſe in effect were the points of the kings letters of anſwer vnto the emperour. Dated at London the thirtenth of Iulie, in the ſecond yeare of his reigne ouer France, and fifteenth ouer England.

The deceaſſe of the lord Geffrey de Scrope, & of the biſhop of Lincolne.

The queene brought to bed.

This yeare, about Midſummer, or ſomwhat before, at Gant in Flanders, died the lord Geffrey Scrope the kings iuſtice, and Henrie biſhop of Lincolne, two cheefe councellors to the king. The queene after hir returne into England, was this yeare brought to bed in the tower of London of a daughter named Blanch, that died yoong, and was buried at Weſtminſter. ¶ In this meane while, during the warres betwixt France and England, the French king in fauour of Dauid king of Scotland, had ſent men of warre into Scotland, vnder the conduct of ſir Arnold Dandreghen, who was after one of the marſhals of France, and the lord of Garrentiers, with other, by whoſe comfort and helpe, the Scots that tooke part with king Dauid, did indeuor themſelues to recouer out of the Engliſhmens hands, ſuch caſtels and fortreſſes as they held within Scotland, as in the Scotiſh hiſtorie ye ſhall find mentioned, and how about this time, their king the foreſaid Dauid returned forth of France into Scotland by the French kings helpe, who hauing long before concluded a league with him, thought by his friendſhip to trouble the king of England ſo at home, that he ſhould not be at great leiſure to inuade him in France.

The commiſſioners that met at Arras.

But now to tell you what chanced of the meeting appointed at Arras. For the cōmiſſioners that ſhuld there treat of the peace, when the day aſſigned of their meeting was come, there arriued for the king of England the biſhop of Lincolne, the biſhop of Dureſme, the earle of Warwike, the erle of Richmond, ſir Robert Dartois, ſir Iohn of Heinault, otherwiſe called lord Beaumont, and ſir Henrie of Flanders. For the French king, there came the earle of Alanſon, the duke of Burbon, the earle of Flanders, the earle of Blois, the archbiſhop of Sens, the biſhop of Beauuois, and the biſhop of Auxerre. The pope ſent thither two cardinals, Naples and Cleremont; theſe commiſſioners were in treatie fifteene daies, during the which, manie matters were put forth and argued, but none concluded: for the Engliſhmen demanded largelie, and the Frenchmen would depart with nothing, ſauing with the countie of Ponticu, the which was giuen with queene Iſabell in marriage to the king of England. So the treatie brake, the commiſſioners departed, and nothing doone, but onelie that the truce was prolonged for two yeares further.

This truce was prolonged about the feaſt of the decollation of S. Iohn, to indure till Midſummer next following, as the addition to Ad. Merimuth hath.

Thus were the wars partlie appeaſed in ſome part of France, but yet was the truce but ſlenderlie kept in other parts, by reaſon of the duke of Britaine. For whereas contention aroſe betwixt one Charles de Blois, and Iohn earle of Mountfort, about the right to the duchie of Britaine, as in the hiſtorie of France maie more plainelie appeare; the earle of Mountfort, thinking that he had wrong offered him at the French kings hands, who fauoured his aduerſarie Charles de Blois, alied himſelfe with the king of England. And (as ſome write) after he had woone diuerſe cities and townes within Britaine, he came ouer into England, and by doing homage to king Edward, acknowledged to hold it of him, as of the ſoueraigne lord thereof, ſo that he would promiſe to defend him and that duchie againſt his aduerſaries: which the king promiſed him to doo. After this, the French king made ſuch warres againſt this earle of Mountfort, that he was at length taken priſoner in the towne of Naunts, and committed to ſafe keeping within the caſtell of Loure at Paris. But his wife being a ſtout woman, and of a manlie courage, ſtood vp in the quarrell of hir huſband, and preſented a yoong ſonne which ſhe had by him, vnto ſuch capteins and men of warre as ſerued hir huſband, requiring them not to be diſmaid with the infortunate chance of hir huſbands taking; but rather like men of good ſtomachs, to ſtand in defenſe of his right, ſith whatſoeuer happened to him, the ſame remained in that yoong gentleman his ſonne: meaning that although the enimies ſhould deale tyrannicallie with him, & without regard of his nobleneſſe practiſe his ouerthrow; yet there was hope in hir ſon, as increaſe of yeares ſhould miniſter ſtrength and courage, both to be reuenged on his fathers enimies, and to ad an inlargement of glorie and renowne to his preſent honor by practiſes of his proweſſe: which to be ſingular the ſeemelie ſymmetrie or goodlie proportion of his perſon and his iolie countenance ſeemed to teſtifie; for

Hor. lib. car. 4. Ode 4.

This counteſſe of Mountfort was ſiſter vnto Lewes earle of Flanders, and named Margaret, and not Claudia (as ſome write.) She was verie diligent in hir buſineſſe, and ſpared no trauell to aduance hir cauſe, ſo that ſhe wan not onelie the harts of the men of warre, but alſo of the people of Britaine, the which fauoured hir huſband, and lamented the miſhap of his taking. She firſt furniſhed ſuch cities, townes, caſtels, and fortreſſes as hir huſband had in poſſeſſion, with men, munition and vittels, as Renes, Dinaunt, Guerand, Hanibout, and others. This doone, ſhe ſent ouer into England, ſir Emerie de Cliſſon, a noble man of Britaine, to require the king of England of ſuccors, with condition, that if it pleaſed him, hir ſonne Iohn ſhould marrie one of his daughters. ¶ The king of England glad to haue ſuch an entrie into France, as by Britaine, thought not to refuſe the offer, & therevpon granted to aid the counteſſe: & forthwith raiſing a power, ſent the ſame ouer into Britaine, vnder the conduct of the lord Walter of Mannie, and others: the which at length, after they had continued long vpon the ſea, by reaſon of contrarie winds, arriued in Britaine; in which meane time, a great armie of Frenchmen were entred into Britaine, and had beſieged the citie of Renes, and finallie woone it by ſurrender, & were now before the towne of Hanibout, which with ſtreict ſiege, and ſore bruſing of the walles, they were neere at point to haue taken, and the counteſſe of Mountfort within it; if the ſuccours of England had not arriued there, euen at ſuch time as the Frenchmen were in talke with them within, about the ſurrender. But after that the Engliſh

The lord of Mannie, and the Engliſhmen arriuing at Hanibout thus in time of imminent danger, wherein the counteſſe, and the other within that towne were preſentlie beſet, greatlie recomforted the ſaid counteſſe, as ſhe well ſhewed by hir cheerefull countenance in receiuing them. Shortlie after their arriuall, a certeine number of the Engliſh archers, iſſuing forth, beat the Frenchmen from an engine which they had reared againſt the walles, and ſet fire vpon the ſame engine. To conclude, the Frenchmen liked the Engliſhmen ſo well, that ſhortlie after being wearie of their companie, they raiſed their ſiege to get themſelues further from them: and in an other part of the countrie indeuoured themſelues to win townes and caſtels as they did indeed, hauing their armie diuided into two parts, the lord Charles de Blois gouerning the one part, and a Spaniard called the lord Lewes de Spaine the other (which was the ſame that thus departed from the ſiege of Hanibout, after the arriuall of the Engliſhmen) and then winning the townes of Dinant and Guerand, paſſed into the countrie of Britaine Britonant, and there not farre from Quinpercorentine, were diſcomfited by the Engliſhmen, who followed them thither. Of ſix thouſand Genowaies, Spaniards, and Frenchmen, which the lord Lewes of Spaine had there with him, there eſcaped but a few awaie. A nephue which he had there with him named Alfonſe was ſlaine, howbeit he himſelfe eſcaped, though not without ſore hurts.

This yeare, the fift of Iune queene Philip was deliuered of a ſonne at the towne of Langley, the which was named Edmund, and ſurnamed Langley of the place where he was thus borne. Alſo about the ſame time was a great iuſtes kept by king Edward at the towne of Dunſtable, with other counterfeited feats of warre, at the requeſt of diuerſe yoong lords and gentlemen, whereat both the king and queene were preſent, with the more part of the lords and ladies of the land. ¶The lord Charles de Blois, hauing in the meane time wonne Vannes, and other towns, brought his armie backe vnto Hanibout, and eftſoones beſieged the ſame, and the counteſſe of Mountfort within it. But for ſo much as it was well fortified, and prouided of all things neceſſarie to defend a ſiege, the Engliſhmen being returned thither againe after the ouerthrow of the lord Lewes de Spaine, it could not be eaſilie wonne. At length, by the labour of certeine lords of Britaine, a truce was taken for a time, during the which, the counteſſe of Richmond came ouer into England, to commune with king Edward, touching the affaires of Britaine, who appointed ſir Robert Dartois earle of Richmond, the earles of Saliſburie, Penbroke, and Suffolke, the lords Stafford, Spenſer, and Bourchier, with others, to go with hir ouer into Britaine, who made their prouiſion, ſo that they might take the ſea, to come thither againſt the time that the truce betwixt the counteſſe and the lord Charles de Blois ſhould be expired.

An armie ſent into Britaine

Additions to Adam Merimuth, and Nic. Triuet.

There be that write, how the lord Walter de Mannie, tooke a truce indeed with the lord Charles de Blois, to indure till Alhallontide next inſuing, but with condition, that if the king of England were contented therewith, then the ſame to be firme and fullie ratified, otherwiſe not. Wherupon, when about the beginning of Iulie, the ſaid lord Walter came ouer into England, bringing with him the lord of Lions, and other ſuch priſoners as he had taken, and ſignified to king Edward what he had concluded touching the truce, the king liked not thereof, and ſo ſent ouer the earles of Northampton and Deuonſhire, the lord Stafford, and ſir William de Killeſbie his chapleine, and one of his ſecretaries, with fiue hundred men of armes, and a thouſand archers, which taking ſhip, on the vigill of th'Aſſumption of our ladie, ſailed forth towards Britaine. The Frenchmen therfore vnderſtanding that this ſuccour was comming, appointed the lord Lewes of Spaine, ſir Charles Grimaldo, and ſir Antonie Doria, with thrée thouſand Genowaies, and a thouſand men of armes, imbarked in two and thirtie great ſhips, to lie on the ſea in wait to incounter with the Engliſh fleet, as the ſame ſhould approch towards Britaine.

The Engliſh men and Genowaies meet and fight on the Seas.

About Eaſter, the counteſſe of Mountford with the Engliſh armie, appointed to attend hir, tooke the ſea at Southampton, and at length met with the lord Lewes of Spaine, and his fléet, where betwixt them was fought a ſore battell. Of the Engliſhmen there were ſix and fortie veſſels, but the lord Lewes of Spaine had nine great ſhips, and of more force than anie of thoſe which the Engliſhmen had, and alſo he had thrée gallies. They began to fight about euenſong time, and continued till that night parted them, and had gone togither againe in the morning, if by a tempeſt that roſe about midnight, the ſame night, they had not béene ſcattered in ſunder. The Spaniards and Genowaies tooke awaie with them foure Engliſh ſhips, which being vittellers, were left behind. And bicauſe the ſame Spaniards and Genowaies were able to abide the ſea better than the Engliſhmen, by reaſon of their great ſhips, they kept the maine ſea; but the Engliſhmen were aduiſed by their mariners to drawe vnto the land, and ſo they did, arriuing at a little hauen, not farre from Vannes, where comming on land, they ſtreightwaie made towards that citie, and beſieged it, not ceaſſing to aſſault it both day and night, till at length they wan it, by giuing the aſſault in two places at once, whileſt an other number of them ſet vpon it in a third place, where was no ſuſpicion, and ſo entred.

Vannes won

After this, the moſt part of the Engliſhmen departed from Vannes, as ſome with the counteſſe, to bring hir vnto Hanibout, and ſome with the earls of Saliſburie, Suffolke, and Cornewall, who went and laid ſiege to Rennes, ſo that the earle of Richmond remained in Vannes, with the lords Spenſer and Stafford, to keepe it, hauing a certeine number of archers and other men of warre with them. The lord Cliſſon, and ſir Henrie de Leon, which were within Vannes, when it was taken by the Engliſhmen, and found means to eſcape, were abaſhed at the matter, that they had ſo loſt the citie, whervpon they ſecretlie aſſembled a great power of men thereabouts, and came againe vnto Vannes, and ſo fiercelie aſſailed the gates and wals, that in the end they entred by more force. The earle of Richmond was ſore hurt, but yet he eſcaped out at a poſterne gate, and the lord Stafford with him, but the lord Spenſer was taken by ſir Henrie de Leon.

Additions to Nic. Triuet.

Other write otherwiſe, both of the landing, and alſo concerning the misfortune of the lord Spenſer, alledging letters ſent from the earle of Northampton (whome the ſame authors repute as generall of that armie into Britaine) directed to the king, in which was ſignified, how that within the octaues of the Aſſumption of our ladie, they arriued on the coaſt of Britaine, néere to the towne and caſtell of Breſt, in the which the dutcheſſe of Britaine with hir children were of the enimies beſieged, both by ſea and land, by ſea with thirtéene great gallies, by land by the lord Charles de Blois, the earls of Sauoie and Foiz. But the gallies perceiuing the Engliſh fleet to be approched vpon them, yer they were aware, ſo that they were compaſſed in, to their great danger, thrée of the ſame gallies fled, and ſo eſcaped, the reſidue got vp into a riuer of the ſame hauen, where they that were abord, left their veſſels and fled to the land, and as well they, as the other that held ſiege before Breſt and ſuch as kept a caſtell there, not farre off, called Goule forreſt, packed awaie without anie more adoo. The Engliſh mariners following the gallies (that were withdrawen vp the riuer) with their ſmall boats and barges, ſet fire on the gallies, and ſo burnt them.

Thus all the Engliſhmen came on land, and leauing the lord Saie capteine in the ſaid caſtell of Goule forreſt, they paſſe forward into the countrie, and comming to a caſtell commonlie called Monſieur Relix, gaue an aſſault thereto, where manie of their men of warre were wounded, and ſir Iames Louell ſlaine. After this, ſtaieng a time for the comming of their confederats, which after a fortnights ſpace came to them on the mondaie, being the morrow after Michaelmas daie, they heard that the lords Charles de Blois was comming in all haſt with a power of thrée thouſand men of armes, twelue hundred Genowaies, & a great multitude of commons to raiſe the ſiege. Wherevpon the earle of Northampton with his armie marched ſoftlie towards them, and choſing a plot of ground conuenient for his purpoſe, fought with his enimies, ſlue and tooke of them at the leaſt thrée hundred men of armes. The earle of Northampton loſt not any noble man in this fight, the lord Edward Spenſer onelie excepted.

But now as touching the earle of Richmont, Froiſſard ſaith, that he comming to Hanibout, after he had thus loſt Vannes, tooke the ſea, and ſailed into England: but by reaſon of being toſſed on the ſeas, his wounds rankled ſo, that ſhortlie after his comming to London he died, & was buried in the church of S. Paule. The king of England was ſore diſpleaſed with his death, and immediatlie after paſſed ouer himſelfe into Britaine with a great armie: and landing there the nine and twentith of Nouember, at the ſame place where the earle of Richmond did land at his arriuall there, not far from Vannes, he went ſtraight and beſieged Vannes, but perceiuing that it would not be wonne but by long ſiege, he left the earle of Arundell, and the lord Stafford to continue the ſiege, whileſt he went to Rennes to aid his people, which ſtill laie at the ſiege thereof. Before the kings arriuall in Britaine, thoſe that were there vnder the earle of Northampton, as the lord Hugh Spenſer, and the lord Richard Talbot, with their retinues, fought with the Frenchmen néere to Morleis, where a few Engliſhmen, ſcarſe fiue hundred, diſcomfited a mightie power of Frenchmen, eſtéemed to be aboue fiftie thouſand, of whome ſome they ſlue, and ſome they tooke. Among other was taken the lord Geffrey de Charnie, accompted for one of the beſt and ſageſt knights in France, whome the lord Richard Talbot tooke and ſent into England.

An armie of Frenchmen diſcomfited by a few Engliſhmen.

But now as touching the kings doings, we find, that whileſt he remained for this winter ſeaſon in Britaine, his people forraied the countrie foure daies iournie in length, and two daies iournie in bredth. After his comming to Rennes, he ſtaied not paſt fiue daies, but leauing them whome he found there to continue the ſiege, he went himſelfe to Naunts, where he had knowledge, that the lord Charles de Blois was. At his comming thither, he inuironed the citie about with a ſtrong ſiege, & made manie fierce aſſaults to the walles and gates, but could not preuaile, then leauing certeine of his lords there to continue the ſiege, he raiſed with the reſidue, and went to Dinan, which towne with ſore and fierce aſſaults he laſtlie wonne, and after that drew againe towards Vannes, for that he was informed, how the duke of Normandie was comming downe towards him, with an armie of fortie thouſand men. Herevpon he ſent for them that laie at ſiege before Naunts to come vnto him, and ſuffered them at Rennes to kéepe their ſiege ſtill, till they heard other word from him.

Naunts beſieged.

The duke of Normandie with foure thouſand men of armes, and thirtie thouſand other men of warre, comming into Britaine to aid the lord Charles of Blois, was aduertiſed, that the king of England was with the moſt part of all his power withdrawen to Vannes, and there laie at ſiege, ſore conſtreining them within: wherefore he alſo drew thitherwards, and approching to the place, incamped with his armie ouer againſt the king of England, incloſing his field with a great trench. The king of England ſuppoſing he ſhould haue battell, ſent vnto thoſe which laie at ſiege before Rennes, commanding them to come from thence vnto him: ſo that by this meanes all the powers, both of the king of England, and of the duke of Normandie, generall to his father the French king in thoſe warres of Britaine, being aſſembled before Vannes, had fought ſome great and bloudie battell, as was ſuppoſed, for the whole triall of the right of Britaine, if the cardinals of Cleremont and Preneſti, as legats from pope Clement the ſixt, had not taken vp the matter, by concluding a truce betwixt them, for the tearme of thrée yeares.

The duke of Normandie commeth downe into Britaine.

Commiſſioners appointed to treat with theſe cardinals, on the behalfe of the king of England were theſe, Henrie of Lancaſter earle of Derbie, William Bohun earle of Northampton, William Montacute earle of Saliſburie, Rafe lord Stafford, Bartholomew lord Burgheſe, Nicholas lord Cantelow, Reginald lord Cobham, Walter lord of Mannie, Maurice lord Berkeley, and maiſter Iohn Vfford archdeacon of Elie. For the French king, Odo duke of Burgogne, and Piers duke of Burbon were deputed commiſſioners. Such diligence was vſed by the parties, that finallie they agréed vpon this truce of thrée yeares, with certeine articles for meane to conclude ſome finall peace, as that there ſhould be ſent from either king ſome perſonages of their bloud and others, vnto the court of Rome, with ſufficient authoritie, to agrée, confirme, and eſtabliſh vpon all controuerſies and diſſentions betwixt the ſaid kings, according to the agreement of the pope, and ſuch as ſhould be ſo ſent to treat thereof.

A truce for thrée yeares.

It was further agréed, that they ſhould haue libertie to declare and pronounce their arguments and reaſons before the pope, but not to haue power to decide and giue ſentence, but onlie by waie of ſome better treatie and order of agréement to be made. And theſe commiſſioners were appointed to appeare before the pope, afore the feaſt of ſaint Iohn Baptiſt next inſuing, and the pope to diſpatch the buſineſſe before Chriſtmaſſe after, if by conſent of the ſaid nobles, the terme were not prorogued. And if it ſo were that the pope could make no agréement, yet ſhould the truce indure the prefixed terme, to wit, till the feaſt of S. Michaell the archangell, and for the ſpace of thrée yeares then next inſuing, betwixt the kings of France, England and Scotland, the earle of Heinault and their alies, as the dukes of Brabant, and of Gelderland, alſo the marques of Gullikerland, the lord Beaumont, otherwiſe called ſir Iohn de Heinault, and the people of Flanders, in all their lands and dominions, from the date of the charter made hereof, by all the ſaid terme aforeſaid, to be obſerued, holden and kept. Alſo, the king of Scots, and the earle of Heinault were appointed to ſend certeine perſons, as commiſſioners for them, vnto the ſaid court of Rome.

The conditions of the truce.

This truce was alſo accorded to be kept in Britaine, betwixt the ſaid kings and their adherents, in which countrie, as well as in Guien, and other places, euerie man ſhould remaine in poſſeſſion of that which he held at the time of concluding this truce, ſaue that the citie of Vannes ſhould be deliuered into the hands of the cardinall, to be kept by them in the popes name, during the truce, and then to diſpoſe thereof, as ſhould ſeeme to them good. Manie other articles were compriſed in the charter of this truce, too long heere to rehearſe, all the which were confirmed with the oths of the ſaid dukes of Burgoigne, and Burbone, on the French kings behalfe; and of the earles of Derbie, Northampton and Saliſburie, the lord Burgherſh, and the lord of Mannie, for the king of England. In witneſſe whereof, the ſaid cardinals cauſed the charter to be made, putting thereunto their ſeales, the nineteenth daie of Ianuarie, in the yeare 1343 in preſence of diuerſe prelats, and of the earles of Bullongne, Auſſerre, Sancerre, Iuignie, and Porcien, the lord Miles de Noiers, the lord Ingram de Coucie, and the foreſaid lords, Cantelowe, Cobham, and Berkeley, with manie other lords, barons, nobles, and gentlemen.

Anno Reg. 17.

The king of England returneth by ſea forth of Britaine.

Shipwracke.

When this truce was thus confirmed, manie of the Engliſh armie returned home through France, ſo to paſſe ouer by the narrow ſeas into England, but the king himſelfe, with a few other, taking their ſhips to paſſe by long ſeas, were maruellouſlie tormented by tempeſt, ſo that their ſhips were ſcattered and driuen to take land at diuerſe hauens. The dutcheſſe of Britaine with hir ſonne and daughter, came on land in Deuonſhire. Sir Peers de Veele, and his ſonne ſir Henrie Veele, and ſir Iohn Raine knights, were drowned, togither with the ſhip in which they paſſed. The king eſcaping verie hardlie, landed at Weimouth, and on the fift day of March came to London to the queene. In the quindene of Eaſter, he held a parlement at Weſtminſter, in which he created his eldeſt ſonne Edward prince of Wales. In this parlement were diuerſe matters talked of, and ſpeciallie concerning wools, and of the aſſeſſement of a certeine price of them, more and leſſe, according to the ſeuerall parts of the realme, and of the cuſtomes to be made of them, to wit, three marks and an halfe, for euerie ſacke to be tranſported forth of the realme.

A parlement. The kings eldeſt ſonne created prince of wales.

Ambaſſadors appointed to go to the pope.

Alſo in the ſame parlement were ambaſſadors appointed forth, ſuch as ſhould go to the pope to treat of peace (as in the charter of the truce among other articles it was conteined) whoſe names follow, Iohn biſhop of Exceſter, Henrie de Lancaſter earle of Derbie, Hugh le Diſpenſer lord of Glamorgan, couſins to the king; Rafe lord Stafford, William de Norwich deane of Lincolne, William Truſſell knight, and maſter Andrew de Vfford a ciuillian. Theſe perſons were ſent with commiſſion to the pope, to treat with him, not as pope, nor as iudge, but as a priuat perſon, and a common freend to both parts, to be a meane or mediator, to find out ſome indifferent end of all controuerſie betwixt the parties. The date of their commiſſion was at Weſtminſter, the foure and twentith of Maie, in this ſeauenteenth yeare of the kings reigne.

Moreouer, in this parlement a greeuous complaint was exhibited, by the earles, barons, knights, burgeſſes, and other of the commons, for that ſtrangers, by vertue of reſeruations and prouiſions apoſtolike, got the beſt benefices of this land into their hands, and neuer came at them, nor bare any charges due for the ſame, but diminiſhing the treaſure of the realme, and conueieng it forth, ſore indamaged the whole ſtate. The biſhops durſt not, or would not giue their conſents in exhibiting this complaint, but rather ſeemed to ſtand againſt it, till the king compelled them to giue ouer.

Hereupon, a letter was framed by the lords of the temporaltie and commons, which they directed vnto the pope in all humble manner, beſeeching him to conſider of the derogation doone to the realme of England, by ſuch reſeruations, prouiſions, and collations of benefices, as had beene practiſed here in England. And therefore, ſith the churches of England had beene founded and endowed by noble and worthie men in times paſt, to the end the people might be inſtructed by ſuch as were of their owne language, and that he being ſo farre off, and not vnderſtanding the default, had (like as ſome of his predeceſſors more than in times paſt had beene accuſtomed) granted by diuerſe reſeruations, prouiſions, and collations, the churches and ſpirituall promotions of this land vnto diuerſe perſons, ſome ſtrangers, yea, and enimies to the realme, whereby the monie and profits were caried forth, the cures not prouided for, almes withdrawne, hoſpitalitie decaied, the temples and other buildings belonging to the churches ruinated and fallen downe, the charitie and deuotion of the people ſore diminiſhed, and diuerſe other greeuous enormities thereby growne cleane contrarie to the founders minds: wherefore, vpon due conſideration thereof had, they ſignified to him, that they could not ſuffer ſuch enormities any longer, & therefore beſought him wholie to reuoke ſuch reſeruations, prouiſions, collations, to auoid ſuch ſlanders, miſcheefes, and harmes as might inſue, and that the cures might therewith be committed to perſons meet for the exerciſe of the ſame: further alſo, beſeeching him without delaie, to ſignifie his intention, ſith they meant to imploie their diligence to remedie the matter, and to ſee that redreſſe might be had according to reaſon. The date of theſe letters was in full parlement at Weſtminſter, the eight and twentith of Maie, in the yeare of Grace 1343.

Sir Iohn Shordich ſent to the Pope.

Beſide theſe letters, were other written, and ſent from the king, conteining in ſumme, the tenor of the other aboue mentioned, and one ſir Iohn Shordich, knight a graue perſonage and well ſeene in the law, was appointed to go with the ſame, who comming to Auignion, and there preſenting his letters in the popes priuie chamber, where the pope ſat, with all his cardinals about him, receiued no great courteous welcome, after his letters were once read. And whie? Euen bicauſe the cõtents of the ſame miſliked his mind, tending to the impairing of his vſurped profits & cõmodities from time to time in this land,

Ambitioſus enim ſibi totum vendicat orbem,

The Popes words to ſir Iohn Shordich.

Now when the knight made anſwer to ſuch words as he heard the pope vtter, and charged him with giuing the deanrie of Yorke vnto one that was reputed the kings enimie, the pope ſaid; Well, it is not vnknowne to vs who made and indited theſe letters, and we know that thou madeſt them not, but there is one that pincheth at vs, and we ſhall puniſh him well inough: we know all. Hereunto he added thus much more, that there was a knight that ſpake defamous words of him, and the church of Rome, wherewith he ſeemed highlie offended. To conclude, he ſaid, that he would anſwer the letters of the king and commons, as touching the points conteined in the ſame. The cardinals, after they had heard theſe things, departed as if they had beene ſore offended and troubled therewith: and the knight taking his leaue of the pope, departed alſo forth of the chamber, and without anie longer abode, got him awaie toward Burdeaux, about other of the kings buſineſſe, doubting leaſt if he had ſtaied longer, he might haue beene kept there againſt his will. The pope ſent anſwer indeed, but neuertheleſſe, the king proceeded in prohibiting ſuch prouiſions, and collations within Iuſts in Smithfield.

This yeare about Midſummer, there were ſolemne iuſts proclaimed by the lord Robert Morley, which were holden in Smithféeld, where for challengers, came forth one apparelled like to the pope, bringing with him twelue other in garments like to cardinals, which tooke vpon them to anſwer all commers, for thrée courſes. On the defendants ſide, ran the prince of Wales, with manie earls, barons, knights and eſquires innumerable, ſo that thoſe iuſts continued thrée daies togither, to the great pleaſure of the beholders. ¶ This yeare, king Edward ordeined a certeine new coine of gold, which he named the floren, that is, the penie of ſix ſhillings eight pence, the halfe penie of the value of thrée ſhillings foure pence, and the farthing of the value of twentie pence. This coine was ordeined for his wars in France, the gold whereof was not ſo fine as the noble, which in the fourtéenth yeare of his reigne he had cauſed for to be coined. This yeare, the king cauſed a great number of artificers and labourers to be taken vp, whome he ſet in hand to build a chamber in the caſtell of Windſore, which was called the round table, the flore whereof, from the center or middle point, vnto the compaſſe throughout, the one halfe was (as Walſingham writeth) an hundred foot, and ſo the diameter or compaſſe round about, was two hundred foot. The expenſes of this worke amounted by the wéeke, firſt vnto an hundred pounds, but afterward by reaſon of the wars that followed, the charges was diminiſhed vnto two and twentie pounds the wéeke (as Thomas Walſingham writeth in his larger booke, intituled, the hiſtorie of England) or (as ſome copies haue) vnto 9 pounds. This yéere alſo, W. Montacute earle of Saliſburie conquered the Ile of Man, out of the hands of the Scots, which Ile the king gaue vnto the ſaid earle, and cauſed him to be intituled, and crowned king of Man. ¶ This Ile (as Robert Southwell noteth) was wonne by the Scots, about the ſecond yeare of Edward the ſecond his reigne, who in the yeare before, to wit, anno Chriſti 1307, had giuen the ſame Ile vnto Péers de Gaueſton, whom he had alſo made earle of Cornewall.

The Ile of Man.

Moreouer, about the beginning of this eightéenth yeare of his reigne, king Edward held a ſolemne feaſt at his caſtell of Windſore, where betwixt Candlemaſſe and Lent, were atchiued manie martiall feats, and iuſts, tornaments, and diuerſe other the like warlike paſtimes, at the which were preſent manie ſtrangers of other lands, and in the end thereof, he deuiſed the order of the garter, and after eſtabliſhed it, as it is at this daie. There are ſix and twentie companions or confrers of this felowſhip of that order, being called knights of the blew garter, & as one dieth or is depriued, an other is admitted into his place. The K. of England is euer chéefe of this order. They weare a blew robe or mantell, & a garter about their left leg, richlie wrought with gold and pretious ſtones, hauing this inſcription in French vpon it, Honi ſoit qui mal y penſe, Shame come to him that euill thinketh. This order is dedicated to S. George, as chéefe patrone of men of warre, and therefore euerie yeare doo the knights of this order kéepe ſolemne his feaſt, with manie noble ceremonies at the caſtell of Windſore, where king Edward founded a colledge of canons, or rather augmenting the ſame, ordeined therein a deane with twelue canons ſecular, eight peticanons, and thirtéene vicars, thirtéene clearks, and thirtéene choriſters.

Iuſts & tornies holden at Windſore.

The order of the garter founded.

The knights haue certeine lawes and rules apperteining to their order, amongſt the which this is chéeflie to be obſerued (as Polydor alſo noteth) that they ſhall aid and defend one another, and neuer turne their backes or runne awaie out of the field in time of battell, where he is preſent with his ſoueraigne lord, his lieutenant or deputie, or other capteine, hauing the kings power roiall and authoritie, and where as his banners, ſtandards, or pennons are ſpred. The reſidue of the lawes and rules apperteining vnto this noble order, I doo here purpoſelie omit, for that the ſame in * an other place more conuenient is expreſſed, ſo far as may be thought expedient. But now touching theſe ſix and twentie noble men & knights, which were firſt choſen and admitted into the ſame order, by the firſt founder thereof, this king Edward the third, their names are as followeth.

* Looke in the deſcription of Britaine.

Firſt the ſaid noble prince king Edward the third, the prince of Wales duke of Cornewall and earle of Cheſter his eldeſt ſonne, Henrie duke of Lancaſter, the earle of Warwike, the capitall de Beuch alias Buz or Beuſe, Raſe earle of Stafford, William Montacute earle of Saliſburie, Roger lord Mortimer, John lord Liſle, Bartholomew lord Burwaſch or Bergheſech, the lord John Beauchampe, the lord de Mahun, Hugh lord Courtnie, Thomas lord Holand, John lord Graie, Richard lord Fitz Simon, ſir Miles Stapleton, ſir Thomas Walle, ſir Hugh Wrotteſley, ſir Néele Loring, ſir John Chandos, Iames lord Audelie, ſir Otes Holand, ſir Henrie Eme, ſir Sanchet Dabrichcourt, ſir Walter Panell. ¶ Christopher Okland ſpeaking of the firſt inſtitution of this honorable order, dooth ſaie, that after foure daies were expired in the ſaid exerciſes of chiualrie, the king beſides the rich garter which he beſtowed vpon them that tried maiſteries, did alſo giue them a pretious collar of S S. but whether this collar had his firſt inſtitution then with the garter he ſaith nothing, belike it was an ornament of greater antiquitie. Oklands words are theſe as followeth;

In Angl. prælijs ſub Edwardo 3.

¶ The cauſe and firſt originall of inſtituting this order is vncerteine. But there goeth a tale amongſt the people, that it roſe by this means. It chanced that K. Edward finding either the garter of the quéene, or of ſome * ladie with whom he was in loue, being fallen from hir leg, ſtooped downe and tooke it vp, whereat diuerſe of his nobles found matter to ieſt, and to talke their fanſies merilie, touching the kings affection towards the woman, vnto whome he ſaid, that if he liued, it ſhould come ſo paſſe, that moſt high honor ſhould be giuen vnto them for the garters ſake: and there vpon ſhortlie after, he deuiſed and ordeined this order of the garter, with ſuch a poſie, whereby he ſignified, that his nobles iudged otherwiſe of him than the truth was. Though ſome may thinke, that ſo noble an order had but a meane beginning, if this tale be true, yet manie honorable degrées of eſtates haue had their beginnings of more baſe and meane things, than of loue, which being orderlie vſed, is moſt noble and commendable, ſith nobilitie it ſelfe is couered vnder loue, as the poet Ouid aptlie ſaith,

The occaſion that moued K. Edward to inſtitute the order of the garter.

Nobilitas ſub amore iacet.

William de Montacute earle of Saliſburie king of Man, and marſhall of England, was ſo bruſed at the iuſts holden here at Windſore (as before ye haue heard) that he departed this life, the more was the pitie, within eight daies after. ¶ The king about the ſame time, to wit, in the quindene of Candlemaſſe, held a councell at London, in the which with good aduiſe and ſound deliberation had vpon the complaint of the commons to him before time made, he gaue out ſtreict commandement, that no man, on paine of impriſonment and death, ſhould in time to come, preſent or induct anie ſuch perſon or perſons, that were ſo by the pope promoted, without the kings agreement, in preiudice of his roiall prerogatiue. Herevpon, he directed alſo writs to all archbiſhops, biſhops, abbats, priors, deanes, archdeacons, officials and other eccleſiaſticall perſons, to whome it apperteined, inhibiting them in no wiſe to attempt anie thing in preiudice of that ordinance, vnder pretext of anie bulles, or other writings, for ſuch manner of prouiſions to come from the court of Rome. Other writs were alſo directed to his ſonne the prince of Wales, and to all the ſhiriffes within the realme, for to arreſt all ſuch as brought into the land any ſuch buls or writings, and to bring them before the kings councell or his iuſtices, where they might be puniſhed according to the treſpaſſe by them committed.

Coine changed.

About the ſame time, the king ordeined a certeine coine of fine gold, and named it the floren, which coine was deuiſed for his warres in France, for the gold thereof was not ſo fine as was the noble, which in the fourteenth yeare he had cauſed to be coined: but this coine continued not long. ¶ After the feaſt of the holie Trinitie, the king held a parlement at London, in the which he asked a tenth of the cleargie, and a fifteenth of the laitie, about which demand there was no ſmall altercation, but at length he had it granted for one yeare. ¶ At the ſame time, the archbiſhop of Canturburie held a conuocation of all the cleargie at London, in the which manie things were in talke about the honeſt demeanor of churchmen, which ſildome is obſerued, as the addition to Nicholas Triuet ſaith. About the feaſt of the Aſſumption of our ladie, the king diſanulled the florens, to the great commoditie of his kingdome, ordeining a greater floren of halfe a marke, and a leſſer of thrée ſhillings foure pence, and the leaſt of all of twentie pence, and theſe were called nobles, and not without cauſe, for they were a noble coine, of faire & fine gold.

Anno Reg. 19.

This yeare, on the ſeauentéenth daie of Nouember, the pope in Auinion created the lord Lewes de Spaine, ambaſſador for the French king, prince of the Iles called Fortunatæ, for what purpoſe it was not knowne, but it was doubted, not to be for anie good meaning towards the kingdome of England, the proſperitie whereof, the ſame pope was ſuſpected not greatlie to wiſh. ¶ About the beginning of Lent the ſame yeare, the ſaid pope had ſent an archbiſhop and a biſhop, ambaſſadors to the king, who met them at Oſpring in Kent, and to the end they ſhould not linger long within the realme, he quicklie diſpatched them without effect of their meſſage. ¶ This yeare, ſhortlie after Eaſter, the duke of Britaine, that had béene deteined priſoner by the French king, and eſcaped out of priſon, came ouer into England. ¶ And about the ſame time, the king ordeined the exchange of monies at London, Canturburie, and Yorke, to the great commoditie of his people.

Bergerat wonne.

About Midſummer, or (as other haue) Michaelmas, the earle of Derbie, with the earle of Penbroke, the lord Rafe Stafford, the lord Walter de Mannie, the lord Iohn Graie of Codnore, and diuerſe other lords, knights, and eſquires, to the number of fiue or ſix hundred men of armes, and as manie archers, ſailed ouer into Gaſcoine, to aſſiſt the kings ſubiects there againſt the Frenchmen. This earle of Derbie, being generall of the armie, after his arriuall in Gaſcoine, about the beginning of December, wan the towne of Bergerat by force, hauing put to flight the earle of Liſle, as then the French kings lieutenant in Gaſcoine, who laie there with a great power, to defend the paſſage: but being driuen into the towne, and hauing loſt the ſuburbes to the Engliſhmen, he fled out in the night, and ſo left the towne, without anie ſouldiers to defend it, ſo that the towneſmen yéelded it vnto the earle of Derbie, and ſware themſelues to be true liege men vnto the king of England. After this, the earle of Derbie paſſed further into the countrie, and wan diuerſe caſtels and towns, as Lango, le Lake, Moundurant, Monguiſe, Punach, Laliew, Forſath, Pondair, Beaumont in Lallois, Bounall, Auberoch and Liborne, part of them by aſſault, and the reſidue by ſurrender. This doone, he returned to Burdeaux, hauing left capteins and ſouldiers in ſuch places as he had wonne.

Froiſſard.

This yeare, the king ſent foorth a commiſſion vnto certeine perſons in euerie countie within the realme, to inquire what lands and tenements euerie man, aboue fiue pounds of yéerelie reuenues, being of the laie fée, might diſpend; bicauſe he had giuen order, that euerie man which might diſpend fiue pounds and aboue, vnto ten pounds of ſuch yéerelie reuenues in land of the laie fée, ſhould furniſh himſelfe, or find an archer on horſſebacke, furniſhed with armour and weapon accordinglie. He that might diſpend ten pounds, ſhould furniſh himſelfe, or find a demilance or light horſſeman (if I ſhall ſo terme him) being then called a hobler with a lance. And he that might diſpend fiue and twentie pounds, ſhould furniſh himſelfe or find a man at armes. And he that might diſpend fiftie pounds, ſhould furniſh two men at arms. And he that might diſpend an hundred pounds ſhould find thrée men at armes, that is, himſelfe, or one in his ſtéed, with two other. And ſuch as might diſpend aboue an hundred pounds, were appointed to find more in number of men at armes, accordinglie as they ſhould be aſſeſſed, after the rate of their lands which they might yearelie diſpend, being of the laie fée, and not belonging to the church.

Additions to Nic. Triuet.

The duke of Britaine departed this life.

About this ſeaſon, the duke of Britaine, hauing with him the earles of Northampton and Oxenford, ſir William de Killeſbie one of the kings ſecretaries, and manie other barons and knights, with a great number of men of armes, paſſed ouer into Britaine, againſt the lord Charles de Blois, where they tarried a long time, and did little good to make anie accompt of, by reaſon that the duke, in whoſe quarrell they came into thoſe parts, ſhortlie after his arriuall there, departed this life, and ſo they returned home into England. But after their comming from thence, ſir Thomas Dagworth knight, that had béene before, and now after the departure of thoſe lords and nobles, ſtill remained the kings lieutenant there, ſo behaued himſelfe againſt both Frenchmen and Britains, that the memorie of his worthie doings deſerueth perpetuall commendation. Sir Iohn de Heinault lord Beaumont, about the ſame time, changed his cote, and leauing the king of Englands ſeruice, was reteined by the French king.

The lord Beaumont of Heinault forſaketh the K. of England his ſeruice.

The king goeth ouer into Flanders.

Ia. Mair.

In this ninetéenth yeare of king Edward I find, that about the feaſt of the Natiuitie of ſaint Iohn Baptiſt, he ſailed ouer into Flanders, leauing his ſonne the lord Lionell, warden of the realme in his abſence. He tooke with him a great number of lords, knights, and gentlemen, with whome he landed at Sluſe. The cauſe of his going ouer was, to further a practiſe which he had in hand with them of Flanders, the which by the labour of Iaques Arteueld, meant to cauſe their earle Lewes, either to doo homage vnto king Edward; or elſe if he refuſed, then to diſherit him, and to receiue Edward prince of Wales for their lord, the eldeſt ſonne of king Edward.

Froiſſard.

King Edward promiſing to make a dukedome of the countie of Flanders, for an augmentation of honour to the countrie, there came vnto Sluſe to the king, Iaques van Arteueld, and a great number of other, appointed as councellors for their cheefeſt townes. The king with all his nauie lay in the hauen of Sluſe, where, in his great ſhip called the Catharine, a councell was holden vpon this foreſaid purpoſe: but at length, thoſe of the councellors of the cheefeſt townes miſliked the matter ſo much, that they would conclude nothing, but required reſpit for a moneth, to conſult with all the cōmunaltie of the countries and townes, and as the more part ſhould be inclined, ſo ſhould the king receiue anſwer. The king and Iaques Arteueld would faine haue had a ſhorter daie, and a more towardlie anſwer, but none other could be gotten.

Hereupon the councell brake vp, and Iaques Arteueld tarieng with the king a certeine ſpace, after the other were departed, promiſed him to perſuade the countrie well inough to his purpoſe, and ſuerlie, he had a great gift of eloquence, and had thereby induced the countrie wonderfullie, to conſent to manie things, as well in fauour of king Edward, as to his owne aduancement: but this ſuit which he went now about to bring to paſſe, was ſo odious vnto all the Flemings, that in no wiſe they thought it reaſon to conſent vnto the diſheriting of the earle. At length, when Iaques Arteueld ſhould returne vnto Gant, king Edward appointed fiue hundred Welſhmen to attend him as a gard, for the preſeruation of his perſon, bicauſe he ſaid, that one Gerard Deniſe deane of the weauers, an vnquiet man, maliciouſlie purpoſed his deſtruction.

Welſhmen appointed to Iaques Arteueld for a gard againſt Gerard Deniſe.

Capteins of theſe Welſhmen were Iohn Matreuers, and William Sturine or Sturrie, and ſo with this crue of ſouldiers Arteueld returned vnto Gant, and earneſtlie went in hand with his ſuit in king Edwards behalfe, that either the earle ſhould doo his homage to the king of England to whome it was due; or elſe to forfeit his earledome. Then the foreſaid Gerard, as well of his owne mind, as procured thereto by the authoritie of earle Lewes, ſtirred the whole citie againſt the ſaid Arteueld, and gathering a great power vnto him, came and beſet Arteuelds houſe round about vpon each ſide, the furie of the people being wonderfullie bent againſt him, crieng; “Kill him, Kill him that hath robbed the treſurie of the countrie, and now goeth about to diſherit our “noble earle.

Iacob Arteuelds houſe beſet.

Iaques van Arteueld perceiuing in what danger he was, came vnto a window, and ſpake to that inraged multitude, in hope with faire and courteous words to appeaſe them, but it could not be: wherevpon he ſought to haue fled out of his houſe, but the ſame was broken vp, and ſo manie entred vpon him, that he was found out, and ſlaine by one Thomas Deniſe (as ſome write.) But other affirme, that on a ſundaie in the after noone, being the 17 of Iulie, a cobler, whoſe father this Iaques van Arteueld had ſometime ſlaine, followed him, as he was fleeing into a ſtable where his horſſes ſtood, & there with an ax cloue his head aſunder, ſo that he fell downe ſtarke dead on the ground. And this was the end of the foreſaid Iaques van Arteueld, who by his wiſedome and policie had obteined the whole gouernment of all Flanders. This wofull end was allotted vnto him by deſtinie, whoſe decree nothing is able by any ſhift to auoid, as is notablie ſaid of the poet in this diſtichon;

There were ſlaine alſo ten other perſons that were of his councell, and diuerſe of the Welſhmen in like manner; but the other eſcaped, and got awaie vnto king Edward, as yet remaining at Sluſe, vnto whome thoſe of Bruges, Caſſell, Curtrike, Ypres, Aldenard, and other townes, did afterwards ſend their orators to excuſe themſelues, as nothing guiltie nor priuie to the death of his freend, and their worthie gouernor Iaques van Arteueld, requiring him not to impute the fault vnto the whole countrie, which the raſh and vnaduiſed Gantiners had committed, ſith the countrie of Flanders was as readie now to doo him ſeruice and pleaſure as before, ſauing that to the diſheriting of their earle they could not be agreeable, but they doubted not to perſuade him to doo his homage vnto the king of England, and till then they promiſed not to receiue him. They put the king alſo in hope of a mariage to be had, betwixt the ſonne of their earle, and ſome one of the kings daughters. Herewith the king of England (who was departed from Sluſe, in great diſpleaſure with the Flemings) became ſomewhat pacified in his mood, and ſo renewed the league eftſoons with the countrie of Flanders: but the earle would neuer conſent to doo homage vnto the king of England, but ſtill ſticked to the French kings part, which purchaſed him much trouble, and in the end coſt him his life, as after ſhall appeare.

Ambaſſadors from the good townes in Flanders vnto king Edward.

But now to returne vnto the earle of Derbie, whome we left in Gaſcoigne. Ye ſhall vnderſtand, that ſhortlie after he was come backe to Burdeaux, from the conqueſt which he had made of Bergerat, and other townes thereabouts; the earle of Liſle, who (as ye haue heard) was the French kings lieutenant in that countrie, aſſembled an armie of twelue thouſand men, & comming before Auberoch (a towne in Gaſcoigne) beſieged it, ſore preſſing them within, in ſomuch that they were in great danger to haue beene taken, if the earle of Derbie, hauing knowlege in what caſe they ſtood, had not come to their reſcue, who with three hundred ſpeares or men of armes, as we maie call them, and ſix hundred archers, approching neere to the ſiege, laid himſelfe cloſelie within a wood, till the Frenchmen in the euening were at ſupper, & then ſuddenlie ſet vpon them in their campe, and diſcomfited them, ſo that the earle of Liſle was taken in his owne tent, and ſore hurt. There were alſo taken the earle of Valentinois, and other earles, vicounts, and lords of great accompt, to the number of nine, beſides thoſe that were ſlaine. The reſidue were put to flight and chaſed, ſo that the Engliſhmen had a faire iournie, and wan great riches by priſoners and ſpoile of the enimies campe.

Auberoch beſieged.

The French armie diſtreſſed, and the earle of Liſle taken.

After this, the earle of Derbie, being returned to Burdeaux, and hauing put the captiues in ſafe keeping, aſſembled his power, and marching foorth into the countrie, towards the Rioll (a towne in thoſe parts which he meant to beſiege) he wan diuerſe towns and caſtels by the way, as ſaint Baſill, Roch, Million, Montſegure, Aguillon, & Segart. At length he came to the towne of the Rioll, which he beſieged, and laie about it nine weekes yer he could win it, and then was the ſame towne ſurrendered into his hands, but the caſtell was ſtill defended againſt him for the ſpace of, eleuen weekes, at which time being ſore oppreſſed & vndermined, it was yeelded by them within conditionallie, that they ſhould depart onelie with their armour. After this, the earle of Derbie wan Montpeſance, Mauleon, Ville-Franche in Agenois, Miremont, Thomines, the caſtell of Damaſſen, and at length came before the citie of Angoleſme the which made appointment with the earle, that if no ſuccors came from the French king within the ſpace of a moneth, that then the citie ſhould be ſurrendered to the king of Englands vſe: and to aſſure this appointment, they deliuered to the earle foure and twentie of their cheefe citizens as hoſtages.

Blaues.

In the meane time, the earle laid ſiege to Blaues, but could not win it. His men rode abroad into the countrie, to Mortaigne, Mirabeau, and Aunay, but wan little, and ſo returned againe to the ſiege of Blaues. Now when the month was expired, that they of Angoleſme ſhould yeeld, the earle ſent his two marſhals thither, who receiued the homage and fealtie of the citizens, in the king of Englands name, and ſo they were in peace, and receiued againe their hoſtages. At length when the earle of Derbie ſaw that he did but loſe his time in the beſieging of Blaues, which ſir Guiſchart Dangle, and ſir Guilliaume de Rochfort, being capteins within, did ſo valiantlie defend, that he could obteine no aduantage of them, he raiſed his ſiege, and returned vnto Burdeaux, hauing furniſhed ſuch townes as he had woone in that tournie with conuenient gariſons of men to defend them againſt the enimies, and to keepe frontier warre, as they ſhould ſee cauſe.

Froiſſard ſaith they were an hundred thouſand. Gio. Villani writeth that they were a ſix thouſand horſmen and fiftie thouſand footemen, of Frenchmen, Gaſcoignes & Lombardes.

The French king being ſore moued at the conqueſts thus atchiued by the earle of Derbie, raiſed a mightie armie, and ſent the ſame foorth, vnder the leading of his ſonne the duke of Normandie, into Gaſcoigne, to reſiſt the ſaid earle, and to recouer againe thoſe townes which he had woone in thoſe parts. The duke of Normandie being come to Tholouz, where generall aſſemblie was appointed, ſet forward with his armie, and winning by the waie Miremount, and Ville Franche in Agenois; at length came to the citie of Angoleſme, which he inuironed about with a ſtrong ſiege, continuing the ſame, till finallie, the capiteine named Iohn Normell, required a truce to indure for one daie, which was granted, and the ſame was the daie of the Purification of our ladie, on the which, the ſame capiteine, with the ſouldiers of the garriſon departed, and left the citie in the citizens hands. The Frenchmen, bicauſe they had granted the truce to indure for that daie without exception, permitted them to go their waies without let or vexation. The citizens in the morning yeelded the citie to the duke. After this, he wan the caſtell of Damaſſen, Thonins, and Port S. Marie; Thonins by ſurrender, and the other two by force of aſſaults. Then he came to the ſtrong caſtell of Aiguillon, which he beſieged, and laie there at a long ſeaſon. Within was the earle of Penbroke, the lord Walter de Mannie, ſir Franke de Halle, and diuerſe knights and capteins, which defended themſelues, and the place ſo ſtoutlie, that the Frenchmen could win little aduantage at their hands.

Whileſt the ſiege continued before this fortreſſe, the ſeneſhall of Guien departed from the campe, with eight hundred horſſemen, and foure thouſand footmen, purpoſing to win a caſtell, belonging to a nephue of the cardinall Della Motte, a twelue leagues diſtant from Aiguillon. The archdeacon of Vnfort, owner of that caſtell, went to the Rioll, where the earle of Derbie with his armie as then was lodged, to whome he made ſuit, to haue ſome power of men to reſcue his caſtell. The earle appointed to him a ſufficient number, both of horſſemen, and alſo of Engliſh archers, with whome the ſaid archdeacon rode all the night, and the next morning betimes, being the one and thirtith of Iulie, they came to the caſtell where the Frenchmen were arriued the daie before, and had fiercelie aſſailed the caſtell, dooing their beſt to win it by force. But the Engliſhmen without anie delaie, immediatlie vpon their comming, ſet vpon the Frenchmen, and gaue them ſo ſharpe and fierce battell, that in the end, the Frenchmen were diſcomfited: the ſeneſhall with manie other gentlemen were taken priſoners, beſide thoſe that were ſlaine. To conclude, the number of them that were ſlaine, and taken priſoners in the whole, amounted to foure hundred horſſemen, and two thouſand footmen. Sir Godfrey de Harcourt being conſtreined to flee out of France, to auoid the French kings diſpleaſure, came ouer vnto the king of England, who receiued him verie ioifullie, for he was knowne to be a right valiant and a wiſe perſonage. He was brother to the earle of Harecourt, lord of ſaint Sauiour le Vicount, and of diuerſe other townes in Normandie. A little before that he fell into the French kings diſpleaſure, he might haue doone with the king of France, more than anie other lord within that realme.

Additions to Adam Merimuth.

In this twentith yeare of his reigne, king Edward vpon complaint of the people made againſt purueiours of vittels for his houſhold (the which vnder colour of their commiſſions, abuſed the ſame, in taking vp among the commons all manner of things that liked them, without making paiment for the ſame, further than the ſaid commiſſions did allow them) he cauſed inquirie to be made of their miſdemeanors, and ſuch as were found to haue offended, of whome there was no ſmall number, ſome of them were put to death on the gallowes, and other were fined, ſo to teach the reſt to deale more warilie in their buſineſſe from thenceforth. ¶ About the ſame time, he cauſed all the iuſtices within his dominions to renounce and giue ouer all their penſions, fees, and other bribing benefits and rewards, which they vſed to receiue of the lords and great men of the land, as well prelats, as of them of the temporaltie, to the end that their hands being free from gifts, iuſtice might more freelie haue courſe, and be of them dulie and vprightlie miniſtred. Alſo this yeare in the Lent ſeaſon, the king held a parlement at Weſtminſter, and tooke into his hands all the profits, reuenues, and emoluments, which the cardinals held within this land: for he thought it not reaſon, that they which fauoured the pope and the French king, being his aduerſaries, ſhould inioy ſuch commodities within his realme.

Froiſſard.

The king paſſeth ouer into Normandie.

After this, in the moneth of Iulie following, he tooke ſhipping, and ſailed into Normandie, hauing eſtabliſhed the lord Percie, and the lord Neuill, to be wardens of his realme in his abſence, with the archbiſhop of Yorke, the biſhop of Lincolne, and the biſhop of Dureſme. The armie which he had ouer with him, was to the number of foure thouſand men of armes, and ten thouſand archers, beſide Iriſhmen, & Welſhmen, that folowed the hoſt on foot. The cheefeſt capteins that went ouer with him were theſe. Firſt his eldeſt ſonne Edward prince of Wales, being as then about the age of thirteene yeares, the earles of Hereford, Northampton, Arundell, Cornewall, Huntington, Warwike, Suffolke, and Oxford; of barons the lord Mortimer, who was after erle of March, the lords, Iohn, Lewes, and Roger Beauchampe; alſo the lords Cobham, Mowbraie, Lucie, Baſſet, Barkeley, and Willoughbie, with diuerſe other lords, beſides a great number of knights and other worthie capteins. They landed by the aduiſe of the lord Godfrey of Harecourt, in the Ile of Conſtantine, at the port of Hague ſaint Waſt, neere to ſaint Sauiour le Vicount. The earle of Huntington was appointed to be gouernour of the fleet by ſea, hauing with him a hundred men of armes, and foure hundred archers.

Iohn Villani ſaith there were 2500 horſemen, and 30000 footmen and archers, that paſſed ouer with the K. but when he commeth to ſpeake of the battell, he ſeemeth to increaſe the number.

After that the whole armie was landed, the king appointed two marſhals, the lord Godfrey of Harecourt, and the earle of Warwike, and the earle of Arundell was made conſtable. There were ordeined three battels, one to go on his right hand, following by the coaſt of the ſea; and another to march on his left hand, vnder the conduct of the marſhals; ſo that he himſelfe went in the middeſt with the maine armie, and in this order forward they paſſed towards Caen, lodging euerie night togither in one field. They that went by the ſea, tooke all the ſhips they found in their waie, and as they marched foorth thus, what by water & land, at length they came to a towne called Harflew, which was giuen vp, but yet neuertheleſſe it was robbed, and much goods found in it. After this they came to Chierburge, which towne they wan by force, robbed it, and burnt part of it, but the caſtell they could not win. Then came they to Mountburge and tooke it, robbed it & burnt it cleane. In this manner they paſſed forth, and burnt manie towns and villages in all the countrie as they went. The towne of Carentine was deliuered vnto them againſt the will of the ſoldiers that were within it. The ſoldiers defended the caſtell two daies, and then yéelded it vp into the Engliſhmens hands, who burnt the ſame, and cauſed the burgeſſes to enter into their ſhips. All this was doone by the battell that went by the ſea ſide, and by them on the ſea togither.

Saint Lo.

On the other ſide, the lord Godfrie of Harecourt, with the battell on the right hand of the king, road forth ſix or ſeuen leagues from the kings battell, in burning and exiling the countrie. The king had with him (beſide thoſe that were with the marſhals) 3000 men of armes, ſix thouſand archers, and ten thouſand men on foot. They left the citie of Conſtance, and came to a great towne called ſaint Lo, a rich towne of draperie, hauing manie wealthie burgeſſes within it: it was ſoone taken and robbed by the Engliſhmen vpon their firſt approch. From thence the king marched ſtreight to Caen, wherein were capteins Raſe earle of Ewe and Guines conſtable of France, & the earle of Tankeruile. Theſe noble men meant to haue kept their defenſes on the walles, gate, bridge, and riuer, and to haue left the ſuburbes void, bicauſe they were not cloſed, but onelie with the riuer: but they of the towne ſaid they would iſſue forth, for they were ſtrong inough to fight with the king of England.

There were ſlaine in all without and within the towne 5000 men, as Gio. Villani writeth.

Peter Legh.

When the conſtable ſaw their good willes, he was contented to follow their deſire, and ſo forth they went in good order, and made good face to put their liues in hazard: but when they ſaw the Engliſhmen approch in good order, diuided into thrée battels, & the archers readie to ſhoot, which they of Caen had not ſéene before, they were ſore afraid, and fled awaie toward the towne without any order or arraie, for all that the conſtable could doo to ſtaie them. The Engliſhmen followed, and in the chaſe ſlue manie, and entered the towne with their enimies. The conſtable, and the earle of Tankeruile tooke a tower at the bridge foot, thinking there to ſaue themſelues, but perceiuing the place to be of no force, nor able long to hold out, they ſubmitted themſelues vnto ſir Thomas Holland. ¶ But here whatſoeuer Froiſſard dooth report of the taking of this tower, and of the yéelding of theſe two noble men, it is to be proued that the ſaid earle of Tankeruile was taken by one ſurnamed Legh, anceſtor to ſir Peter Legh now liuing, whether in the fight or within the tower, I haue not to ſaie: but for the taking of the ſaid earle, and for his other manlike prowes ſhewed here and elſewhere in this iournie, king Edward in recompenſe of his agréeable ſeruice, gaue to him a lordſhip in the countie of Cheſter called Hanley, which the ſaid ſir Peter Legh now liuing dooth inioy and poſſeſſe, as ſucceſſor and heire to his anceſtor the foreſaid Legh, to whom it was ſo firſt giuen.

Caen taken.

But to returne now to the matter where we left. The Frenchmen being entred into their houſes, caſt downe vpon the Engliſhmen below in the ſtréets, ſtones, timber, hot water, and barres of iron, ſo that they hurt and ſlue more than fiue hundred perſons. The king was ſo mooued therewith, that if the lord Godfrie of Harecourt had not aſſwaged his mood, the towne had béene burnt, and the people put to the edge of the ſword: but by the treatie of the ſaid lord Godfrie, proclamation was made, that no man ſhould put fire into any houſe, nor ſlea any perſon, nor force any woman, and then did the townesmen and ſouldiers ſubmit themſelues, and receiued the Engliſhmen into their houſes. There was great ſtore of riches gotten in this towne, and the moſt part thereof ſent into England, with the fléet which the king ſent home with the priſoners, vnder the guiding of the earle of Huntington, accompanied with two hundred men of armes, and foure hundred archers.

40000 clothes, as Gio. Villani writeth, were got by the Engliſhmen in one place and other in this iournie.

When all things were ordred in Caen as the king could deſire, he marched from thence in the ſame order as he had kept before, burning and exiling the countrie. He paſſed by Eureux & came to Louiers, which the Engliſhmen ſoone entred and ſacked without mercie. Then went they forth and left Roan, and came to Giſors, the towne they burnt, but the caſtell they could not get: they burnt alſo Vernon, and at Poiſſie they repared the bridge which was broken, and ſo there they paſſed ouer the riuer of Saine. The power of the Engliſhmen increaſed dailie, by ſuch numbers as came ouer forth of England in hope to win by pillage. Alſo manie gentlemen of Normandie, and other of the French nation, which loued not nor owght any good will vnto the French king, came to the king of England, offering to ſerue him, ſo that there were in his armie foure thouſand horſſemen and fiftie thouſand footmen with the Normans, and of this number there were thirtie thouſand Engliſh archers, as Giouan Villani writeth. The Engliſh marſhals ran abroad iuſt to Paris, and burnt S. Germans in Laie: alſo Mountioy, and S. Clowd, and petie Bullongne by Paris, & the quéenes Burge. In the meane time had the French king aſſembled a mightie armie vpon purpoſe to fight with the Engliſhmen. ¶ The lord Godfrey of Harecourt, as he rode forth with fiue hundred men of armes, and 13 hundred archers, by aduenture incountered with a great number of the burgeſſes of Amiens on horſſebacke, who were riding by the kings commandement to Paris. They were quickelie aſſailed, and though they defended themſelues manfullie for a while, yet at length they were ouercome, and eleuen hundred of them ſlaine in the field, beſide thoſe that were taken. The Engliſhmen had all their cariage and armour. Thus paſſed forth the king of England, and came into Beauuoiſin, and lodged néere vnto the citie of Beauuois one night in an abbeie called Meſſene, and for that after he was diſlodged, there were that ſet fire in the ſame abbeie, without any commandement giuen by him; he cauſed twentie of them to be hanged that were the firſt procurers of that fire.

The French kings armie.

So long the king of England paſſed forward, that finallie he approched néere to the water of Some, the which was large and déepe, and all the bridges broken and the paſſages well kept, wherevpon he cauſed his two marſhals with a thouſand men of armes, & two thouſand archers, to go along the riuer, to the end to find ſome paſſage. The marſhals aſſaied diuerſe places, as at Piqueney, and other where, but they could not find any paſſage vncloſed, capteins with men of warre being ſet to defend the ſame, in ſomuch that the marſhals returned to the king, and declared what they had ſéene and found. At the ſame inſtant time was the French king come to Amiens, with more than a hundred thouſand men, and thought to incloſe the king of England, that he ſhould no waie eſcape, but be conſtreined to receiue battell in ſome place greatlie to his diſaduantage.

The king of England well perceiuing himſelfe in danger, remoued from the place where he was incamped, and marched forward through the countries of Pontiew and Vimew, approching vnto the good towne of Abuile, and at length by one of the priſoners named Gobin de Grace, he was told where he might paſſe with his armie ouer the riuer of Some, at a ford in the ſame riuer, being hard in the bottome, and verie ſhallow at an eb water. The French king vnderſtanding that the K. of England ſought to paſſe the riuer of Some, ſent a great baron of Normandie, one ſir Godmare du Foy, to defend the paſſage of the ſame riuer, with a thouſand men of armes, and ſix thouſand on foot with the Genowaies. This ſir Godmare had with him alſo a great number of them of Mutterell and others of the countrie, ſo that he had in all to the number of twelue thouſand men, one and other, and hearing that the king of England was minded to paſſe at Blanchetake (which was the paſſage that Gobin Agace had informed the king of England of) he came thither. When the Engliſhmen approched, he arranged all his companie to defend the paſſage.

Sir Godmare du Foy.

Gobin Agace

And ſuerlie when the Engliſhmen at the lowe water entered the ford to paſſe ouer, there was a ſharpe bickering, for diuerſe of the Frenchmen incountred the Engliſhmen on horſſebacke in the water, and the Genowaies did them much hurt, and troubled them ſore with their croſbowes: but on the other ſide, the Engliſh archers ſhot ſo wholie togither, that the Frenchmen were faine to giue place to the Engliſhmen, ſo that they got the paſſage and came ouer, aſſembling themſelues in the field, and then the Frenchmen fled, ſome to Abuile, ſome to ſaint Riquier. They that were on foot could not eſcape ſo well as thoſe on horſſebacke, inſomuch that a great number of them of Abuile, Mutterell, Arras, and S. Riquier were ſlaine and taken, for the chaſe indured more than a great league. There were ſlaine in all to the number of two thouſand. When the K. of England had thus paſſed the riuer, he acquitted Gobin Agace, and all his companie of their ranſomes, and gaue to the ſame Gobin an hundred nobles, and a good horſſe, and ſo the king road forth as he did before. His marſhals road to Crotaie by the ſea ſide, and burnt the towne, and tooke all ſuch wines and goods as were in the ſhips and barks which laie there in the hauen.

One of the marſhals road to the gates of Abuile, and from thence to S. Riquier, and after to the towne of Rue ſaint Eſperit. This was on a fridaie, and both the marſhals returned to the kings hoſt about noone, and ſo lodged all togither about Creſſie in Pontiew, where hauing knowledge that the French king followed to giue him battell, he commanded his marſhals to chooſe a plot of ground, ſomewhat to his aduantage, that he might there abide his aduerſaries. In the meane time the French king being come with all his puiſſance vnto Abuile, and hearing how the king of England was paſſed ouer the riuer of Some, and diſcomfited ſir Godmare du Foy, was ſore diſpleaſed in his mind: but when he vnderſtood that his enimies were lodged at Creſſie, and meant there to abide him, he cauſed all his people to iſſue out of Abuile, and earlie on the ſaturdaie in the morning, anon after ſunne riſing he departed out of the towne himſelfe, and marched towards his enimies. The king of England vnderſtanding that his aduerſarie king Philip ſtill followed him, to giue him battell, & ſuppoſing that the ſame ſaturdaie he would come to offer it, roſe betimes in the morning, and commanded euerie man firſt to call vpon God for his aid, then to be armed, and to draw with ſpeed into the field, that in the place before appointed they might be ſet in order of battell. Beginning his enterpriſe at inuocation or calling vpon God, he was the more fortunate in his affaires, and ſped the better in the progreſſe of his actions, as the iſſue of the warre ſhewed. A notable example to euerie priuat man, to remember to call vpon God when he purpoſeth anie thing, for as the poet ſaith, and that verie chriſtianlie, Mar. Pal. in Sag.

Beſide this, he cauſed a parke to be made and cloſed by the wood ſide behind his hoſt, in the which he ordeined that all the carts and carriages ſhould be ſet, with all the horſſes (for euerie man was on foot.) Then he ordeined three battels; in the firſt was the prince of Wales, and with him the earle of Warwike, the lord Godfrey of Harecourt, the lord Stafford, the lord de la Ware, the lord Bourchier, the lord Thomas Clifford, the lord Reginald Cobham, the lord Thomas Holland, ſir Iohn Chandos, ſir Bartholomew de Browaſh, ſir Robert Neuill. They were eight hundred men of armes, and two thouſand archers, and a thouſand of other with the Welſh men. In the ſecond battell was the earle of Northhampton, the earle of Arundell, the lords Ros and Willowbie, Baſſet, S. Albine, Multon, and others. The third battell the king led himſelfe, hauing with him ſeauen hundred men of armes, and two thouſand archers, and in the other battell were to the number of eight hundred men of armes, and twelue hundred archers. Thus was the Engliſh armie marſhalled according to the report of Froiſſard. When euerie man was gotten into order of battell, the king leapt vpon a white hobbie, and rode from ranke to ranke to view them, the one marſhall on his right hand, and the other on his left, deſiring euerie man that daie to haue regard to his right and honour. He ſpake it ſo courteouſlie, and with ſo good a countenance, that euen they which before were diſcomforted, tooke courage in hearing him ſpeake ſuch ſweet and louing words amongſt them. It was nine of the clocke yer euer he had thus viſited all his battels, & thereupon he cauſed euerie man to eat and drinke a little, which they did at their leiſure.

Giouā Villani ſaith, that when they ſhould ioine in battell, the Engliſhmen were 30000. archers Engliſh & Welſh, beſide other footmen with axes & iauelins, and not fullie 4000 horſſemen.

Froiſſard. The kings demeanor before ỹ battell.

The French king, before he approched neere to his enimies, ſent forth foure ſkilfull knights to view the demeanor of his enimies, the which returning againe, made report as they had ſeene, and that forſomuch as they could geſſe, the Engliſhmen ment to abide him, being diuided into three battels, readie to receiue him and his puiſſance, if he went forward in purpoſe to aſſaile them. Here was the French king counſelled to ſtay and not to giue battell that day, but to aduiſe all things with good deliberation and regard, to conſider well how and what way he might beſt aſſaile them. Then by the marſhals were all men commanded to ſtaie, and not to go anie further, they that were formoſt and next to the enimies taried, but they that were behind would not abide but rode forth, and ſaid they would not ſtaie till they were as far as the formoſt: and when they before ſaw them behind come forward, then they marched on alſo againe, ſo that neither the K. nor his marſhals could rule them, but that they paſſed forward ſtill without order, or anie good arraie, till they came in ſight of their enimies: and as ſoone as the formoſt ſaw their enimies, then they reculed backe, whereof they behind had maruell, and were abaſhed, ſuppoſing that the formoſt companie had beene fighting. Then they might haue had roome to haue gone forward, if they had beene minded. The commons, of whome all the waies betwixt Abuile and Creſſie were full, when they ſaw that they were neere their enimies, they tooke their ſwords and cried; Downe with them, Let vs ſlea them all. There was no man, though he were preſent at the iornie, that could imagine or ſhew the truth of the euill order that was among the French partie, and yet they were a maruellous great number.

The Engliſhmen which beheld their enimies thus approching them, prepared themſelues at leiſure for the battell, which they ſaw to be at hand. The firſt battell, whereof the prince was ruler, had the archers ſtanding in maner of an herſe, and the men of armes in the botome of the battell. The earle of Northampton and the earle of Arundell with the ſecond battell, were on a wing in good order, readie to comfort the princes battell if néed were. The lords and knights of France came not to the aſſemblie togither, for ſome came after, in ſuch haſt and euill order, that one of them troubled another. There were of Genowaies croſbowes to the number of twelue or fiftéene thouſand, the which were commanded to go on before, and with their ſhot to begin the battell; but they were ſo werie with going on foot that morning ſix leagues armed with their croſbowes, that they ſaid to their conſtables; We be not well vſed, in that we are commanded to fight this daie, for we be not in caſe to doo any great feat of armes, we haue more néed of reſt. Theſe words came to the hearing of the earle of Alanſon, who ſaid; A man is well at eaſe to be charged with ſuch a ſort of raſcals, that faint and faile now at moſt néed.

Charles Grimaldi & Anthonie or Othone Doria were capteins of theſe Genowaies, which were not paſt ſix thouſand, as Gio. Villani ſaith.

Raine and thunder with an eclipſe.

Alſo at the ſame inſtant there fell a great raine, and an eclipſe with a terrible thunder, and before the raine, there came fleing ouer both armies a great number of crowes, for feare of the tempeſt comming: then anon the aire began to wax cleare, and the ſunne to ſhine faire and bright, which was right in the French mens eies, and on the Engliſhmens backs. ¶ When the Genowaies were aſſembled togither, and began to approch, they made a great leape and crie, to abaſh the Engliſhmen, but they ſtood ſtill and ſtirred not at all for that noiſe. Then the Genowaies the ſecond time made an other leape and huge crie, and ſtepped forward a little, and the Engliſhmen remoued not a foot. The third time againe the Genowaies leapt, and yelled, and went forth till they came within ſhot, and fiercelie therwith diſcharged their croſbowes. Then the Engliſh archers ſtept forth one paſe, and let flie their arrowes ſo wholie and ſo thicke togither, that it ſéemed to ſnowe. When the Genowaies felt the arrowes perſing their heads, armes and breaſts, manie of them caſt downe their croſbowes, and cut the ſtrings, and returned diſcomfited. When the French king ſaw them flee awaie, he ſaid: Slea theſe raſcals, for they will let and trouble vs without reaſon.

The Genowaies.

The battell is begun.

Then ye might haue ſéene the men of armes haue daſht in amongſt them, and killed a great number of them, and euer the Engliſhmen ſhot where they ſaw the thickeſt preaſe: the ſharpe arrowes ran into the men of armes, and into their horſſes, and manie fell horſſe and man amongſt the Genowaies, and ſtill the Engliſhmen ſhot where they ſaw the thickeſt preaſe, and when they were once downe they could not recouer againe. The throng was ſuch that one ouerthrew another; & alſo among the Engliſhmen, there were certeine of the footmen with great kniues, that went in among the men of armes, and killed manie of them as they laie on the ground, both earles, barons, knights, and eſquires. The valiant king of Bohem being almoſt blind, cauſed his men to faſten all the reines of the bridels of their horſſes ech to other, and ſo he being himſelfe amongſt them in the formoſt ranke, they ran on their enimies.

The king of Boheme.

The lord Charles of Boheme ſonne to the ſame king and late elected emperour, came in good order to the battell, but when he ſaw how the matter went awrie on their part, he departed and ſaued himſelfe. His father by the meanes aforeſaid went ſo far forward, that ioining with his enimies he fought right valiantlie, and ſo did all his companie: but finallie being entred within the preaſe of their enimies, they were of them incloſed and ſlaine, togither with the king their maſter, and the next daie found dead lieng about him, and their horſſes all tied ech to other. The earle of Alanſon came right orderlie to the battell, and fought with the Engliſhmen, and ſo did the earle of Flanders alſo on his part. Theſe two lords coaſted the Engliſh archers, and came to the princes battell, and there fought right valiantlie a long time. The French king perceiuing where their banners ſtood, would faine haue come to them, but could not, by reaſon of a great hedge of archers that ſtood betwixt them and him. This was a perillous battell and ſore foughten: there were few taken to mercie, for the Engliſhmen had ſo determined in the morning.

The earle of Alanſon.

Certeine Frenchmen and Almaines perforce opened the archers of the princes battell, and came to fight with the men of armes hand to hand. Then the ſecond battell of the Engliſhmen came to ſuccor the princes battell, and not before it was time, for they of that battell had as then inough to doo, in ſomuch that ſome which were about him, as the earle of Northampton, and others ſent to the king, where he ſtood aloft on a windmill hill, requiring him to aduance forward, and come to their aid, they being as then ſore laid to of their enimies. The king herevpon demanded if his ſonne were ſlaine, hurt, or felled to the earth? No (ſaid the knight that brought the meſſage) but he is ſore matched. Well (ſaid the king) returne to him and them that ſent you, and ſaie to them that they ſend no more to me for any aduenture that falleth, ſo long as my ſon is aliue, for I will that this iournie be his, with the honor thereof. With this anſwer the knight returned, which greatlie incouraged them to doo their beſt to win the ſpurs, being half abaſhed in that they had ſo ſent to the king for aid. At length when it drew toward euening, and that the Frenchmen were beaten downe and ſlaine on ech hand, king Philip as it were by conſtreint departed out of the field, not hauing as then paſt thrée ſcore perſons about him, of whome the lord Iohn of Heinault was one, by whoſe perſuaſion he chéerelie conſented to ride his waie for his owne ſafegard, when he ſaw the loſſe was ſuch as on that daie it could not be recouered.

The ſlaughter of the Frenchmen was great and lamentable, namelie for the loſſe of ſo manie noble men, as were ſlaine at the ſame battell, fought betwéene Creſſie and Broy on the ſaturdaie next following the feaſt of ſaint Bartholomew being (as that yeare fell) the 26 of Auguſt. Among other which died that daie, theſe I find regiſtred by name as chéefeſt, Iohn king of Boheme, Rafe duke of Loraine, Charles of Alanſo brother germane to king Philip, Charles earle of Blois, Lewes earle of Flanders, alſo the earle of Harecourt, brother to the lord Geffrie of Harecourt, with the earles of Auſſerre, Aumerle, and ſaint Poule, beſide diuerſe other of the nobilitie. The Engliſhmen neuer brake out of their battels to chaſe any man, but kept themſelues togither in their wards and ranks, and defended themſelues euer againſt ſuch as came to aſſaile them. This battell ended about euening.

When the Frenchmen were clearelie ouercome, and thoſe that were left aliue fled and gone, ſo that the Engliſhmen heard no more noiſe of them, king Edward came downe from the hill (on the which he ſtood all that day with his helmet ſtill on his head) and going to the prince, imbraced him in his armes, and kiſſed him, ſaieng; Faire ſonne, God ſend you good perſeuerance in this your proſperous beginning, you

The prince inclined himſelfe to the earth in honouring his father, as he beſt could. This done, they thanked God togither with their ſouldiers for their good aduenture. For ſo the king commanded, and willed no man to make anie boaſt of his owne power, but to aſcribe all the praiſe to almightie God for ſuch a noble victorie; ſeeming heerein to be affected as Dauid was in the foure and fortith pſalme; for he alſo referreth the happie ſucceſſe of warre, and all victorie, vnto almightie God, and not to the ſtrength of a multitude of men, ſaieng:

Tu nos ab hoſte ſubtrahis, ſternis ſolo

Non ergo ſemper iure te cantabimus

Georg. Buch. paraph. in pſal.

¶ On the ſundaie in the morning, there was ſuch a miſt, that a man could not ſee an acres bredth before him. Then by the kings commandement there departed from the hoſt fiue hundred ſpeares, and two thouſand archers, to trie if they might heare of anie Frenchmen gathered togither in anie place neere vnto them.

On the ſame morning there were departed out of Abuile and S. Requier in Pontiew, the commons of Roan and Beauuais, with other that knew nothing of the diſcomfiture the daie before. Theſe met with the Engliſhmen, ſuppoſing they had beene Frenchmen, and being fiercelie aſſailed of them, after ſore fight, and great ſlaughter, the Frenchmen were diſcomfited and fled, of whome were ſlaine in the hedges ⁊ buſhes, more than ſeuen thouſand men. The archbiſhop of Roan, and the grand prior of France, ignorant alſo of the diſcomfiture the day before, ⁊ ſuppoſing (as they were informed) the French ſhould not haue foughten till that ſundaie, were likewiſe incountred (as they came thitherward) by the Engliſhmen, with whome they fought a ſore battell, for they were a great number, but yet at length they were not able to ſuſteine the puiſſant force of the Engliſhmen, and ſo the moſt part of them were ſlaine, with the ſaid archbiſhop and grand prior, and few there were that eſcaped.

The archb. of Rouen and the lord grand prior of France ſlaine

On that ſundaie morning, the Engliſhmen met with diuerſe Frenchmen, that had loſt their waie on the ſaturdaie, and wiſt not where the king nor their capteins were become. They were all ſlaine in manner, ſo manie as the Engliſhmen could meet with, inſomuch that of the commons and footmen of the cities and good townes of France (as was thought) there were ſlaine this ſundaie foure times as manie as were ſlaine on the ſaturdaie in the great battell. When thoſe Engliſhmen that were ſent abroad thus to view the countrie, were returned againe, and ſignified to the king what they had ſeene and doone, and how there was no more appearance of the enimies, the king to ſearch what the number was of them that were ſlaine, and vpon the view taken, it was reported vnto him, that there were found dead eleuen princes, foure ſcore baronets, 12 hundred knights, and more than thirtie thouſand other of the meaner ſort. Thus was the whole puiſſance of France vanquiſhed, and that cheeflie by force of ſuch as were of no reputation amongſt them, that is to ſay, the Engliſh archers, by whoſe ſharpe and violent ſhot the victorie was atchiued, to the great confuſion of the French nation. ¶ Of ſuch price were the Engliſh bowes in that ſeaſon, that nothing was able to withſtand them; whereas now our archers couet not to drawe long and ſtrong bowes, but rather to ſhoot compaſſe, which are not meet for the warres, nor greatlie to be feared, though they come into the field.

The king of England with his armie kept ſtill his field, vntill mondaie in the morning, and then diſlodged, and came before Moturell by the ſea, and his marſhals ran towards Hedin. The next daie they road toward Bullongne, ⁊ at Wiſam the king and the prince incamped, and tarried a whole daie to refreſh their people, and on the wedneſdaie being the thirtith day of Auguſt, he came before the ſtrong towne of Calis, and there planted his ſiege, and erected baſtides betweene the towne and the riuer, and cauſed carpenters to make houſes and lodgings of great timber, which were couered with reed ⁊ broome, ſo manie and in ſuch order, that it ſeemed a new towne, and in it was a market place appointed of purpoſe, in the which the market was dailie kept of vittels, ⁊ all other neceſſarie things euerie tueſdaie and ſaturdaie, ſo that a man might haue bought what he would of things brought thither out of England ⁊ Flanders. ¶ But now, forſomuch as we haue ſpoken of this iournie and inuaſion made by king Edward into France, in this nineteenth yeere of his reigne, accordinglie as we haue gathered out of Froiſſard, and diuerſe other authors, I haue thought good to make the reader partaker of the contents of a letter written by a chapleine of the ſaid king, and attendant about him in the ſame iornie, conteining the ſucceſſe of his proceedings after his departure from Poiſſie, which letter is inſerted with others in the hiſtorie of Robert de Auesburie, and Engliſhed by maiſter Iohn Fox as followeth.

A letter of W. Northbourgh the kings confeſſor deſcribing the kings voiage into France.

Salutations premiſed. We giue you to vnderſtand, that our ſouereigne lord the king came to the towne of Poiſſie the daie before the Aſſumption of our ladie, where was a certeine bridge ouer the water of Saine broken downe by the enimie, but the king tarried there ſo long, till that the bridge was made againe. And whiles the bridge was in reparing, there came a great number of men at armes, and other ſouldiers well armed, to hinder the ſame. But the earle of Northampton iſſued out againſt them, and ſlue of them more than a thouſand, the reſt fled awaie: thankes be to God. And at another time, our men paſſed the water (although with much trauell) and ſlue a great number of the common ſouldiers of France, about the citie of Paris, and countrie adioining, being part of the French kings armie, and throughlie well appointed: ſo that our people haue now made other good bridges vpon our enimies, God be thanked, without anie loſſe and damage to vs. And on the morrow after the Aſſumption of our ladie, the king paſſed the water of Saine, and marched toward Poiſſie, which is a towne of great defenſe, and ſtronglie walled, and a maruellous ſtrong caſtell within the ſame, which our enimies kept. And when our vauntgard was paſſed the towne, our rergard gaue an aſſault therevnto, and tooke the ſame, where were ſlaine more than three hundred men at arms of our enimies part.

part. And the next daie following, the earle of Suffolke, and ſir Hugh Spenſer, marched foorth vpon the commons of the countrie aſſembled and well armed, and in fine diſcomfited them, and ſlue of them more than two hundred, & tooke thrée ſcore gentlemen priſoners, beſide others.

And after that, the king marched toward grand Villiers, and while he was there incamped, the kings vantgard was deſcried by the men at armes of the K. of Boheme: wherbvpon our men iſſued out in great haſt and ioined battell with them, but were inforced to retire. Notwithſtanding, thanks be vnto God, the earle of Northampton iſſued out, and reſcued the horſſemen with the other ſoldiers: ſo that few or none of them were either taken or ſlaine, ſauing onlie Thomas Talbot, but had againe the enimie in chaſe within two leagues of Amiens: of whome we tooke eight, and ſlue twelue of their beſt men at armes: the reſt being well horſſed, tooke the towne of Amiens. After this the king of England marched toward Pountiſe, vpon Bartholomew day, and came to the water of Some, where the French king had laid fiue hundred men at armes, and thrée thouſand footmen, purpoſing to haue kept and ſtopped our paſſage: but thanks be to God, the K. of England and his hoſt entered the ſame water of Some, where neuer man paſſed before, without loſſe of any of our men; and after that incountered with the enimie, and ſlue of them more than 2000, the reſt fled to Abuile, in which chaſe were taken manie knights, eſquiers, & men at armes. The ſame day ſir Hugh Spenſer tooke the towne of Crotaie, where he & his ſoldiers ſlue 400 men at armes, & kept the towne, where they found great ſtore of vittels.

The ſame night incamped the king of England in the forreſt of Creſſie vpon the ſame water, for that the French kings hoſt came on the other ſide of the towne, neere vnto our paſſage: but he would not take the water of vs, & ſo marched toward Abuile. And vpon the fridaie next following, the king being ſtill incamped in the ſaid forreſt, our ſcuriers deſcried the French K. which marched toward vs in foure great battels; and hauing then vnderſtanding of our enimies (as Gods will was) a little before the euening tide, we drew to the plaine field, and ſet our battels in arraie: and immediatlie the fight began, which was ſore and cruell, & indured long, for our enimies behaued themſelues right noblie. But thanks be giuen vnto God, the victorie fell on our ſide, & the king our aduerſarie was diſcomfited with all his hoſt & put to flight: where alſo was ſlaine the king of Boheme, the duke of Loraine, the earle of Alanſon, the earle of Flanders, the earle of Blois, the earle of Harecourt, with his two ſons, the earle of Daumarle, the earle de Neuers, and his brother the lord of Tronard, the archbiſhop of Niſmes, the archbiſhop of Sens, the high prior of France, the earle of Sauoie, the lord of Morles, the lord de Gues, le ſeigneur de Saint Nouant, le ſeigneur de Roſinburgh, with ſix earles of Almaine, and diuerſe other earles, barons, knights, and eſquiers, whoſe names are vnknowne. And Philip de Valois himſelfe, with an other marques, which was called lord elector among the Romans, eſcaped from the battell. The number of the men of armes which were found dead in the field, beſide the common ſoldiers and footmen, were a thouſand, fiue hundred, fortie and two: and all that night the king of England with his hoſt aboad armed in the field, where the battell was fought.

On the next morrow, before the ſunne roſe, there marched towards vs another great hoſt mightie & ſtrong, of the Frenchmen: but the earle of Northampton, and the earle of Norffolke iſſued out againſt them in thrée battels, & after long and terrible fight, them likewiſe they diſcomfited by Gods great helpe and grace (for otherwiſe it could neuer haue béene) where they tooke of knights and eſquiers a great number, and ſlue aboue two thouſand, purſuing the chaſe thrée leages from the place where the battell was fought. The ſame night alſo the king incamped himſelfe againe in the forreſt of Creſſie, and on the morrow marched toward Bullongne, and by the way he tooke the towne of Staples: and from thence he marched toward Calis, where he intendeth to plant his ſiege, and laie his batterie to the ſame. And therfore our ſoueraigne lord the king willeth and commandeth you, in all that euer you may, to ſend to the ſaid ſiege vittels conuenient. For after the time of our departing from Caen, we haue trauelled through the countrie with great perill & danger of our people, but yet alwaies had of vittels plentie, thanks be to God therefore. But now (as the caſe ſtandeth) we partlie néed your helpe to be refreſhed with vittels. Thus fare you well. Written at the ſiege before the towne of Calis, the fourtéenth daie of September.

But now touching the ſiege of Calis, and to returne where we left, ye ſhall vnderſtand, that (as ye haue heard) the Engliſh campe was furniſhed with ſufficient prouiſion of meat, drinke, apparell, munition, and all other things neceſſarie: and oftentimes alſo the ſoldiers made roads and forrais into the borders of France next adioining, as towards Guines, and ſaint Omer, ye euen to the gates of that towne, and ſometime to Bullongne. Alſo the earle of Northampton fetched a bootie out of Arthois, and as he returned toward the hoſt, he came to Terrouan, which towne the biſhop had fortified and manned, deliuering the cuſtodie therof vnto ſir Arnold Dandrehen: for when he heard the Engliſhmen approched, he durſt not tarrie within the citie himſelfe, but got him to ſaint Omers. Sir Arnold ſtood valiantlie to his defenſe, and would not yéeld, till by verie force the Engliſhmen entered the citie, ſlue the ſoldiers, and tooke their capteine the ſaid ſir Arnold priſoner. The citie was put to ſacke, and after ſet on fire. And when the Engliſhmen were departed, there came a number of Flemings from the ſiege, which they had laid laid before S. Omers, and began a new ſpoile, and fired ſuch houſes belonging to the canons and other, which the Engliſhmen had ſpared. Thus were thoſe confines in moſt miſerable caſe, for no houſe nor other thing was in ſafegard, but ſuch as were conteined within cloſure of ſtrong townes and fortreſſes.

Sir John de Vienne captaine of Calis.

The king of Englands pitie towards the poore.

The king of England would not aſſaile the towne of Calis by giuing anie aſſault to it, for he knew he ſhould but loſe his labour, and waſte his people, it was ſo ſtrong of it ſelfe, and ſo well furniſhed with men of warre. Capteine thereof alſo was one ſir John de Vienne, a valiant knight of Burgoigne, hauing with him diuerſe other right hardie and expert capteins, knights, and eſquiers. When the ſaid ſir John de Vienne ſaw the manner of the Engliſh hoſt, and what the kings intention was, he conſtreined all the poore and meane people to depart out of the towne. The king of England perceiuing that this was doone of purpoſe to ſpare vittels, would not driue them backe againe to helpe to conſume the ſame, but rather pitied them; and therefore did not onelie ſhew them ſo much grace to ſuffer them to paſſe through his hoſt, but alſo gaue them meat and drinke to dinner, and moreouer two pence ſterling to euerie perſon: which charitable déed wan him much praiſe, and cauſed manie of his enimies to praie right hartilie for his good ſucceſſe and proſperitie. A moſt notable example of pitie and compaſſion, teaching other to be in like ſort affected, and alſo to know, that

The duke of Normandie ſent for.

The earle of Derbie aſſembleth an armie.

Towns won by the earle of Derbie.

The French king meaning to raiſe the ſiege from Calis, which the king of England kept there, ſent for his ſonne the duke of Normandie, which had line long at the ſiege of Aiguillon, and now by commandement of his father left it ſore againſt his will. In this meane while, the earle of Derbie remained in the citie of Burdeaux, and there had held him during all the time that the ſiege laie before Aiguillon. When he once vnderſtood that the ſiege was raiſed, and that the duke of Normandie had broken vp his campe, he ſent into Gaſcoigne for all knights and eſquires that held of the Engliſh part. Then came to Burdeaux the lord Dalbret, the lord de Leſpare, the lord de Roſam, the lord of Muſident, the lord of Pumiers, and a great ſort more of the lords and nobles of Gaſcoigne, ſo that the earle had twelue hundred men of armes, two thouſand archers, and thrée thouſand other footmen. They paſſed the riuer of Garon, betwixt Burdeaux and Blaie, and tooke their waie to Zanctonge, ſo to go vnto Poictiers, and tooke by the waie the towne of Mirabell by aſſault: they wan alſo the towne and caſtell of Aunaie, Surgieres and Benon. Alſo they tooke Maraunt in Poictow by force, they burnt alſo the towne of Luſignen, but the caſtell they could not win. Moreouer, they did win the bridge, towne, and caſtell of Tailburge, and ſlue all that were found within it, bicauſe a knight of the Engliſh part was ſlaine in the aſſaulting. From thence the earle of Derbie went and laid ſiege to ſaint John Dangelie, which was yéelded to him by compoſition.

The citie of Poictiers won by force.

At Niort he made thrée aſſaults, but could not win it, and ſo from thence he came to Bourge ſaint Mariment, the which was woone by force, and all that were within it ſlaine; and in like manner the towne of Montreuill Bonin was woone, and the moſt part of them within ſlaine, that tooke vpon them to defend it, which were 200 coiners of monie that wrought in the mint, which the French king kept there. From thence he paſſed forward with his hoſt, and finallie came before the citie of Poictiers, which was great and large, ſo that he could not beſiege it but on the one ſide. The third daie after his comming thither, he cauſed the citie to be aſſaulted in thrée places, and the greateſt number were appointed to aſſaile the weakeſt part of the citie. As then there were no expert men of warre within Poictiers, but a great multitude of people vnſkilfull and not vſed to any feats of warre, by reaſon whereof the Engliſhmen entered in at the weakeſt place. When they within ſawe the citie woone, they fled out at other gates, but yet there were ſlaine to the number of ſeauen hundred perſons, for all that came in the Engliſhmens waie were put to the ſword, men, women, and children. The citie was ſacked and rifled, ſo that great ſtore of riches was gotten there, as well of the inhabitants as other that had brought their goods thither for ſafegard of the ſame. The earle of Derbie laie there ten or twelue daies, and longer might haue laine, if his pleaſure had ſo béene, for there was none that durſt go about to diſquiet him, all the countrie trembled ſo at his preſence.

Saint John Dangelie.

The king of Scots inuadeth England. Polydor.

At his departure from Poictiers he left the citie void, for it was too great to be kept: his ſouldiers and men of warre were ſo peſtered with riches, that they wiſt not what to doo therewith: they eſtéemed nothing but gold and ſiluer, and feathers for men of warre. The earle viſited by the waie as he returned homewards to Burdeaux the towne of ſaint John Dangelie, and other fortreſſes which he had woone in going towards Poictiers, and hauing furniſhed them with men, munition, and vittels neceſſarie, at his comming to Burdeaux he brake vp his hoſt, and licencing his people to depart, thanked them for their paines and good ſeruice. All this while the ſiege continued ſtill before Calis, and the French king amongſt other deuiſes which he imagined how to raiſe the K. of England from it, procured the Scots to make warre into England, inſomuch that Dauid king of Scotland, notwithſtanding the truce which yet indured betwixt him and the king of England, vpon hope now to doo ſome great exploit, by reaſon of the abſence of king Edward, intangled thus with the beſieging of Calis, he aſſembled the whole puiſſance of his realme, to the number of fortie or thréeſcore thouſand fighting men (as ſome write) and with them entered into England, burning, ſpoiling, and waſting the countrie, till he came as far as Durham.

The lords of England that were left at home with the quéene for the ſure kéeping and defenſe of the realme, perceiuing the king of Scots thus boldie to inuade the land, and in hope of ſpoile to ſend forth his light horſſemen to harrie the countrie on ech ſide him, aſſembled an hoſt of all ſuch people as were able to beare armour, both préeſts and other. Their generall aſſemblie was appointed at Newcaſtell, and when they were all togither, they were to the number of 1200 men of armes, thrée thouſand archers, and ſeauen thouſand other, with the Welſhmen, and iſſuing out of the towne, they found the Scots readie to come forward to incounter them. Then euerie man was ſet in order of battell, and there were foure battels ordeined, one to aid another. The firſt was led by the biſhop of Durham, Gilbert de Vinfreuile earle of Anegos, Henrie lord Percie, and the lord Henrie Scroope: the ſecond by the archbiſhop of Yorke, and the lord Rafe Neuill: the third by the biſhop of Lincolne, John lord Mowbraie, and the lord Thomas de Rokebie: the fourth was gouerned by the lord Edward Balioll capteine of Berwike, the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and the lord Ros; beſide theſe were W. lord d' Eincourt, Robert de Ogle, and other. The quéene was there in perſon, and went from ranke to ranke, and incouraged hir people in the beſt manner ſhe could, and that doone ſhe departed, committing them and their cauſe to God the giuer of all victorie.

gin the battell, and likewiſe did the Engliſhmen, and therewith the archers on both parts began to ſhoot: the ſhot of the Scots did little hurt, but the archers of England ſore galled the Scots, ſo that there was an hard battell. They began at nine of the clocke, and continued ſtill in fight till noone. The Scots had ſharpe and heauie axes, & gaue with the ſame great and mightie ſtrokes, howbeit finallie the Engliſhmen by the helpe of God obteined the victorie, although they loſt manie of their men. There were diuerſe of the nobles of Scotland ſlaine, to the number of ſeuen earles, beſide lords. The king was taken in the field ſore wounded, for he fought valiantlie. He was priſoner to an eſquier of Northumberland, who as ſoone as he had taken him, rode out of the field with him, accompanied onelie with eight of his ſeruants, and reſted not till he came to his owne caſtell where he dwelled, being thirtie miles diſtant from the place of the battell.

Countries of Scotlād ſubdued by the Engliſhmen. Froiſſard.

¶ He that will ſée more of this battell, may find the ſame alſo ſet forth in the Scotiſh hiſtorie, as their writers haue written thereof. And for ſomuch as by the circumſtances of their writings, it ſhould ſéeme they kept the remembrance of the ſame battell perfectlie regiſtred, we haue in this place onelie ſhewed what other writers haue recorded of that matter, and left that which the Scotiſh chronicles write, to be ſéene in the life of king Dauid, without much abridging therof. The Engliſhmen after this victorie thus obteined, tooke the caſtels of Roxburgh and Hermitage, and alſo without any reſiſtance ſubdued the countries of Anandale, Galloway, Mers, Tiuidale, and Ethrike forreſt, extending their marches forth at that time vnto Cokburnes Peth, and Sowtray hedge, and after vnto Trarlinlips, and croſſe Caue.

John Copland refuſeth to deliuer the K. of Scots.

John Copland rewarded.

The quéene of England being certeinelie informed that the king of Scots was taken, & that John Copland had conueied him out of the field, no man vnderſtood to what place, ſhe incontinentlie wrote to him, commanding him forthwith to bring his priſoner king Dauid vnto hir preſence: but John Copland wrote to hir againe for a determinate anſwer, that he would not deliuer his priſoner the ſaid king Dauid vnto any perſon liuing, man or woman, except onelie to the king of England, his ſouereigne lord and maſter. Herevpon the quéene wrote letters to the king, ſignifieng to him both of the happie victorie chanced to his people againſt the Scots, and alſo of the demeanor of John Copland, in deteining the Scotiſh king. King Edward immediatlie by letters commanded John Copland to repaire vnto him where he laie at ſiege before Calis, which with all conuenient ſpéed he did, and there ſo excuſed himſelfe of that which the quéene had found hirſelfe gréeued with him, for deteining the king of Scots from hir, that the king did not onelie pardon him, but alſo gaue to him fiue hundred pounds ſterling of yearelie rent, to him & to his heires for euer, in reward of his good ſeruice and valiant prowes, and made him eſquire for his bodie, commanding him yet vpon his returne into England to deliuer king Dauid vnto the quéene, which he did, and ſo excuſed himſelfe alſo vnto hir, that ſhe was therewith ſatiſfied and contented. Then the quéene, after ſhe had taken order for the ſafe kéeping of the king of Scots, and good gouernement of the realme, tooke the ſea and ſailed ouer to the king hir huſband ſtill lieng before Calis.

Ia. Meir. The Flemings.

Froiſſard.

1347 Anno Reg. 21.

The earle of Flanders conſtreined to promiſe mariage to the king of Englands daughter.

Whileſt Calis was thus beſieged by the king of England, the Flemings which had latelie before beſieged Betwine, and had raiſed from thence about the ſame time that the battell was fought at Creſſie, now aſſemble togither againe, and doing what damage they might againſt the Frenchmen on the borders, they laie ſiege vnto the towne of Aire. Moreouer, they wrought ſo for the king of England (earneſtlie requiring their fréendſhip in that behalfe) that their ſouereigne lord Lewes earle of Flanders being as then about fiftéene yeares of age, fianced the ladie Iſabell daughter to the king of England, more by conſtraint indéed of his ſubiects, than for any good will he bare to the king of England: for he would often ſaie, and openlie proteſt, that he would neuer marrie hir whoſe father had ſlaine his: but there was no remedie, for the Flemings kept him in maner as a priſoner, till he granted to follow their aduiſe. But the ſame wéeke that the mariage was appointed to be ſolemnized, the earle as he was abroad in hawking at the hearon, ſtale awaie and fled into France, not ſtaieng to ride his horſſe vpon the ſpurs till he came into Arthois, and ſo diſhonorablie diſappointed both the king of England, and his owne naturall ſubiects the Flemings, to their high diſpleaſure.

The lord Charles de Blois taken priſoner.

Sir Thomas Dagworth. Froiſſard.

Sir John Hartille an Engliſh knight was alſo there with him.

While the king laie thus before Calis, diuerſe lords and knights came to ſée him out of Flanders, Brabant, Heinault, and Almaigne. Amongſt other came the lord Robert of Namur, and was reteined with the king as his ſeruant, the king giuing him thrée hundred pounds ſterling of yearelie penſion out of his coffers to be paid at Bruges. During the time that the ſiege thus continued before Calis, the lord Charles de Blois, that named himſelfe duke of Britaine, was taken before a caſtell in Britaine, called la Roch Darien, and his armie diſcomfited, chéeflie by the aid of that valiant Engliſh knight ſir Thomas Dagworth, who had béene ſent from the ſiege of Calis by king Edward to aſſiſt the counteſſe of Montfort and other his fréends againſt the ſaid Charles de Blois, that with a gret armie of Frenchmen and Britains, had the ſame time beſieged the ſaid caſtell of Roch Darien, cõſtreining them within in ſuch forceable maner, that they ſtood in great néed of preſent ſuccors. The ſaid ſir Thomas Dagworth aduertiſed hereof, with thrée hundred men of armes, and foure hundred archers of his owne retinues, beſide certeine Britaines, approched to the ſiege, and on the 20 of June earlie in the morning, a quarter of an houre before day, ſuddenlie ſet vpon the enimies, who hauing knowledge of his comming, were readie to receiue him as the day before, but being now ſurpriſed thus on the ſudden, they were greatlie amazed: for they that were within Roch Darien, as ſoone as the appearance of daie had diſcouered the matter vnto them, ſo that they might know their freends from their enimies, they iſſued foorth, and holpe not a litle to the atchiuing of the victorie, which was cleerelie obteined before ſunne-riſing, and the French armie quite diſcomfited, greatlie to the praiſe of the ſaid ſir Thomas Dagworth and his companie, conſidering their ſmall number, in compariſon of their aduerſaries, who were reckoned to be twelue hundred good men of armes, knights, and eſquiers, beſide ſix hundred other armed men, two thouſand croſſebowes, ſix hundred archers of the countrie of Britaine, and footmen of commons innumerable.

There were taken, beſides the lord Charles de Blois naming himſelfe duke of Britaine, diuerſe other lords and men of name, as monſieur Guie de la Vaall ſonne and heire to the lord la Vaall, which died in the battell, the lord of Rocheford, the lord de Beaumanour, the lord of Loiacke, with other lords, knights, and eſquiers, in great numbers. There were ſlaine the ſaid lord de la Vaall, the Vicount of Rohan, the lord of Chaſteau Brian, the lord de Malleſtreit, the lord de Quintin, the lord de Rouge, the lord of Dereuall and his ſonne, ſir Rafe de Montford, and manie other worthie men of armes, knights and eſquiers, to the number of betwixt ſix and ſeuen hundred, as by a letter written by the ſaid ſir Thomas Dagworth, and regiſtred in the hiſtorie of Robert de Auesburie dooth appeare.

The French king aſſembleth an armie Froiſſard.

In this meane while, king Philip hauing dailie word how the power of his enimie king Edward did increaſe by aid of the Eaſterlings and other nations, which were to him alied, and that his men within Calis were brought to ſuch an extreme point, that without ſpeedie reſcue they could not long keepe the towne, but muſt of force render it ouer into the hands of his ſaid enimie, to the great preiudice of all the realme of France, after great deliberation taken vpon this ſo weightie a matter, he commanded euerie man to meet him in their beſt arraie for the warre, at the feaſt of Pentecoſt in the citie of Amiens, or in thoſe marches. At the daie and place thus appointed, there came to him Odes duke of Burgoigne, and the duke of Normandie eldeſt ſonne to the king, the duke of Orleance his yoongeſt ſonne, the duke of Burbon, the earle of Fois, the lord Lois de Sauoie, the lord Iohn of Heinalt, the earle of Arminacke, the earle of Forreſt, and the earle Valentinois, with manie others.

The French K. commeth towards Calis.

These noble men being thus aſſembled, they tooke councell which waie they might paſſe to giue battell to the Engliſhmen: it was thought the beſt waie had beene through Flanders, but the Flemings in fauor of the king of England denied, not onelie to open their paſſages to the Frenchmen, but alſo had leuied an armie of an hundred thouſand men of one and other, and laid ſiege to Aire, and burnt the countrie all about. Wherepon there were manie ſharpe bickerings and ſore incounters betwixt the Flemings and ſuch Frenchmen as king Philip ſent foorth againſt them both, now, whileſt the French armie laie about Amiens, and alſo before, during all the time that the ſiege lay at Calis. For all the French towns vpon the frontiers were ſtuffed with ſtrong garriſons of ſouldiers, as Liſle, ſaint Omers, Arras, Bullongne, Aire and Monttreuill, and thoſe men of war were euer readie vpon occaſion to attempt ſundrie exploits. After this, when the armie of the Flemings was broken vp, and returned home, or rather diuided into parts, and lodged along on the frontiers, the French king with two thouſand men one and other came forward, taking his way through the countrie called la Belme, and ſo by the countrie of Frankeberge, came ſtreight to the hill of Sangate, betwixt Calis and Wiſant.

The earle of Derbie.

The king of England had cauſed a ſtrong caſtell to be made betweene the towne of Calis and the ſea, to cloſe vp that paſſage, and had placed therein three ſcore men of armes, and two hundred archers, which kept the hauen in ſuch ſort that nothing could come in nor out. Alſo conſidering that his enimies could come neither to ſuccour the towne, nor to annoie his hoſt, except either by the downes alongſt the ſea ſide, or elſe aboue by the high waie, he cauſed all his nauie to drawe alongſt by the coaſt of the downes, to ſtop vp that the Frenchmen ſhould not approch that waie. Alſo the erle of Derbie being come thither out of Guien, was appointed to keepe Newland bridge, with a great number of men of armes and archers, ſo that the Frenchmen could not approch anie waie, vnleſſe they would haue come through the mariſhes, which to doo was not poſſible.

The requeſt of the French lords to the king of England.

His anſwer.

Fifteene hundred of the commons of Tournie wan a tower, which the Engliſhmen had made and kept for the impeachment of the Frenchmens paſſage by the downes, but that notwithſtanding, when the marſhals of France had well viewed all the paſſages and ſtreicts through the which their armie muſt paſſe, if they meant to fight with the Engliſhmen, they well perceiued that they could not come to the Engliſhmen to giue them battell, without the king would loſe his people, wherevpon (as Froiſſard ſaith) the French king ſent the lord Geffrey de Charnie, the lord Euſtace de Ribaumont, Guie de Neele, and the lord de Beauiew vnto the king of England, which required him on their maiſters behalfe to appoint certeine of his councell, as he would likewiſe appoint certeine of his, which by common conſent might aduiſe betweene them an indifferent place for them to trie the battell vpon: wherevnto the king of England anſwered, That there he was and had beene almoſt a whole yeare, which could not be vnknowne to his aduerſarie their maiſter, ſo that he might haue come ſooner if he would: but now, ſith he had ſuffered him there to remaine ſo long, without offer of battell, he meant not to accompliſh his deſire, nor to depart from that, which to his great coſt he had brought now at length to that point, that he might eaſilie win it. Wherefore if the French K. nor his hoſt could not paſſe thoſe waies which were cloſed by the Engliſh power, let them ſeeke ſome other paſſage (ſaid he) if they thinke to come hither.

Cardinals ſent to intreat of peace.

They depart.

The French K. returneth into France.

The conditions of the ſurrender of Calis.

In this meane while came two cardinals frõ pope Clement, to treat a peace betwixt the two kings, wherevpon commiſſioners were appointed, as the dukes of Burgoigne and Burbone, the lord Lewes de Sauoie, and the lord Iohn de Heinault, otherwiſe called lord Beaumont, on the French part: and the earles of Derbie and Northampton, the lord Reginald Cobham, and the lord Walter de Mannie, on the Engliſh part. Theſe commiſſioners and the legates (as intreators betweene the parties) met and communed three daies togither, but agreed not vpon anie concluſion, and ſo the cardinals departed; and the French king perceiuing he could not haue his purpoſe, brake vp his hoſt and returned to France, bidding Calis farewell. After that the French king with his hoſt was once departed from Sangate, without miniſtring anie ſuccour to them within the towne, they began to ſue for a parlee, which being granted, in the end they were contented to yeeld, and the king granted to receiue them and the towne on theſe conditions; that ſix of the cheefe burgeſſes of the towne ſhould come foorth bareheaded, barefooted, and barelegged, and in their ſhirts, with halters about their necks, with the keies of the towne and caſtell in their hands, to ſubmit themſelues ſimplie to the kings will, and the reſidue he was contented to take to mercie.

Six burgeſſes of Calis preſented to the king.

The queene obteined their pardon.

This determinate reſolution of king Edward being intimated to the commons of the towne, aſſembled in the market place by the ſound of the common bell before the capteine, cauſed manie a wéeping eie amongſt them: but in the end, when it was perceiued that no other grace would be obteined, ſix of the moſt wealthie burgeſſes of all the towne agréed to hazard their liues for the ſafegard of the reſidue, and ſo according to the preſcript order deuiſed by the K. they went forth of the gates, and were preſented by the lord Walter de Mannie to the king, before whom they knéeled downe, offered to him the keies of the towne, and beſought him to haue mercie vpon them. But the king regarding them with a fell countenance, commanded ſtreight that their heads ſhould be ſtriken off. And although manie of the noble men did make great intreatance for them, yet would no grace be ſhewed, vntill the quéene being great with child, came and knéeled downe before the king hir huſband, and with lamentable chéere & wéeping eies intreated ſo much for them, that finallie the kings anger was aſwaged & his rigor turned to mercie (for ſo that he gaue the priſoners vnto hir to doo hir pleaſure with them. Then the quéene commanded them to be brought into hir chamber, and cauſed the halters to be taken from their necks, clothed them anew, gaue them their dinner, and beſtowing vpon ech of them ſix nobles, appointed them to be conueied out of the hoſt in ſafegard, and ſet at libertie.

Calis yéelded to the king of England.

Thus was the ſtrong towne of Calis yéelded vp into the hands of king Edward, the third of Auguſt, in the yeare 1347. The capteine the lord Iohn de Vienne, and all the other capteins and men of name were ſtaied as priſoners, and the common ſoldiers and other meane people of the towne were licenced to depart and void their houſes, leauing all their armor and riches behind them. The king would not haue any of the old inhabitants to remaine in the towne, ſaue onlie a prieſt, and two other ancient perſonages, ſuch as beſt knew the cuſtomes, lawes and ordinances of the towne. He appointed to ſend ouer thither amongſt other Engliſhmen, there to inhabit, 36 burgeſſes of London, and thoſe of the wealthieſt ſort, for he meant to people the towne onelie with Engliſhmen, for the better and more ſure defenſe thereof. The king and quéene were lodged in the caſtell, and continued there, till the queene was deliuered of a daughter named Margaret.

Sir Amerie de Pauie.

The cardinals, of whome ye heard before, being come as legats from pope Clement to moue communication of peace, did ſo much in the matter, that a truce was granted betwixt the realme of England & France, for the terme of twelue moneths, or two yeares (as Froiſſard ſaith.) But the Engliſh chronicle and Iacobus Meir ſéeme to agrée, that this truce was taken but for nine moneths, though afterwards the ſame was proroged. To the which truce all parties agréed, Britaine excepted, for the two women there would not be quieted, but ſtill purſued the war the one againſt the other. After that this truce was accorded, the king with the quéene his wife returned into England, and left as capteine within Calis one ſir Amerie of Pauie an Italian knight, or (as other bookes haue) he was but capteine of the caſtell, or of ſome one of the towers of that towne, which ſéemeth more like to be true, than that the king ſhould commit the whole charge of the towne vnto his gouernement, being a ſtranger borne, and therefore Iacobus Meir is the more to be credited, that writeth how ſir Amerie of Pauie was left but in charge with the caſtell onelie, and that the towne was committed to the kéeping of the lord Iohn Beauchampe, and Lewes his brother.

A great mortalitie.

Dearth.

But now that there was a peace thus concluded betwixt the two kings, it ſéemed to the Engliſh people that the ſunne brake forth after a long cloudie ſeaſon, by reaſon both of the great plentie of althings, and remembrance of the late glorious victories: for there were few women that were houſekéepers within this land, but they had ſome furniture of houſhold that had béene brought to them out of France, as part of the ſpoile got in Caen, Calis, Carenten, or ſome other good towne. And beſide houſhold ſtuffe, the Engliſh maides and matrones were bedecked and trimmed vp in French womens iewels and apparell, ſo that as the French women lamented for the loſſe of thoſe things, ſo our women reioiſed of the gaine. In this 22 yeare, from Midſummer to Chriſtmaſſe for the more part it continuallie rained, ſo that there was not one day and night drie togither, by reaſon whereof great flouds inſued, and the ground therewith was ſore corrupted, and manie inconueniences inſued, as great ſickenes, and other, in ſomuch that in the yeare following in France the people died wonderfullie in diuerſe places. In Italie alſo, and in manie other countries, as well in the lands of the infidels, as in chriſtendome, this grieuous mortalitie reigned to the great deſtruction of people. ¶ About the end of Auguſt, the like death began in diuerſe places of England, and eſpeciallie in London, continuing ſo for the ſpace of twelue moneths following. And vpon that inſued great barrenneſſe, as well of the ſea, as the land, neither of them yéelding ſuch plentie of things as before they had doone. Whervpon vittels and corne became ſcant and hard to come by.

A practiſe to betraie Calis.

About the ſame time died Iohn Stretford archbiſhop of Canturburie, after whome ſucceeded Iohn Vfford, who liued not in that dignitie paſt ten moneths, and then followed Thomas Bredwardin, who deceaſſed within one yeare after his conſecration, ſo that then Simon Iſlep was conſecrated archbiſhop by pope Clement the ſixt, being the 53 archbiſhop that had ſit in that ſeat. Within a while after, William archbiſhop of Yorke died: in whoſe place ſucceeded Iohn Torſbie, being the 44 archbiſhop that had gouerned that church. Moreouer in this 23 yeare of king Edwards reigne, the great mortalitie in England ſtill continuing, there was a practiſe in hand for recouering againe of Calis to the French kings poſſeſſion. The lord Geffrie of Charnie lieng in the towne of S. Omers, did practiſe with ſir Amerie de Pauie, to be receiued into the towne of Calis by the caſtell, ſecretlie in the night ſeaſon. The Italian gaue eare to the lord Geffrie his ſute; and to make few words, couenanted for the ſumme of twentie thouſand crownes to betraie the towne vnto him, in ſuch ſort as he could beſt deuiſe.

Froiſſard.

The king ſecretlie paſſed ouer to Calis.

¶ Here writers varie: for Froiſſard ſaith that king Edward had information thereof, before that ſir Amerie de Pauie vttered the thing himſelfe; but the French chronicles, and alſo other writers affirme, that the Italian aduertiſed the king of all the drift and matter betwixt him & the lord Geffrie of Charnie, before he went through with the bargaine. But whether by him or by other, truth it is the king was made priuie to the matter at Hauering Bower in Eſſex (where he kept the feaſt of Chriſtmaſſe) & therevpon departing from thence, he came to Douer, and the daie before the night of the appointment made for the deliuerie of the caſtell of Calis (hauing ſecretlie made his prouiſion (he tooke ſhipping, and landed the ſame night at Calis, in ſo ſecret maner, that but few of the towne vnderſtood of his arriuall, he brought with him out of England thrée hundred men of armes, and ſix hundred archers, whom he laid in chambers and towers within the caſtell, ſo cloſelie that few or none perceiued it, the maner he knew by ſir Amerie de Pauie his aduertiſements (accordinglie as it was agréed betwixt them) that the lord Geffrie of Charnie was appointed to come and enter the towne that night, for the king had commanded ſir Amerie to procéed in merchandizing with the ſaid lord Charnie, and onelie to make him priuie of the day & houre in the which the feat ſhould be wrought.

The lord Geffrie de Charnie.

The lord Geffrie de Charnie being couenanted that he ſhould be receiued into Calis the firſt night of the new yeare, departed from S. Omers, where he had aſſembled fiue hundred ſpeares, the laſt day of December toward night, and ſo in ſecret wiſe he paſſed forth, till about the middeſt of the next night after, he approched neere to Calis, and ſending an hundred men of armes to take poſſeſſion of the caſtell, and to paie the Italian his twentie thouſand crownes, came to the poſterne of the caſtell, where ſir Amerie de Pauie hauing let downe the poſterne bridge, was readie to bring them in by the ſame poſterne, and ſo the hundred men of armes entered, and ſir Edward de Kentie deliuered to the Italian his twentie thouſand crownes in a bag, who when he had caſt the crownes into a coffer (for he had no leiſure to tell them) he brought the Frenchmen into the dungeon of the caſtell, as it were to poſſeſſe them of the chéefeſt ſtrength of the fortreſſe. Within this dungeon or tower was the king of England cloſelie laid, with two hundred men of armes, who iſſued out with their ſwords and axes in their hands, crieng Mannie to the reſcue, for the king had ſo ordeined, that both he and his ſonne ſhould fight vnder the banner of the lord Walter de Mannie, as chéefe of that enterpriſe.

The king crieth Mannie to the reſcue.

Then were the Frenchmen greatlie abaſhed, in ſuch wiſe, that perceiuing how no defenſe might aduance them, they yéelded themſelues without any great ſhew of reſiſtance. Herewith the Engliſhmen iſſued out of the caſtell into the towne, and mounted on horſſebacke, for they had the French priſoners horſſes, and then the archers road to Bullongne gate, where the lord Geffrie was with his banner before him of gules thrée ſcutchens ſiluer. He had great deſire to be the firſt that ſhould enter the towne: but ſhortlie the king of England with the prince his ſon was readie at the gate, vnder the banner of the lord Walter de Mannie to aſſaile him. There were alſo other banners, as the earles of Stafford and Suffolke, the lord Iohn Montacute brother to the earle of Saliſburie, the lord Beauchampe, the lord Berkley, and the lord de la Ware. Then the great gate was ſet open, and they all iſſued forth crieng Mannie to the reſcue. The Frenchmen perceiuing that they were betraied, alighted from their horſſes, and put themſelues in order of battell on foot, determining to fight it out like valiant men of war. The king perceiuing this, cauſed his people likewiſe to be ſet in order of battell, & ſent thrée hundred archers to Newland bridge, to diſtreſſe thoſe Frenchmen, which he heard ſhould be there. This was earelie in the morning but incontinentlie it was daie: the Frenchmen kept their ground a while, and manie feats of armes were doone of both parts, but the Engliſhmen euer increaſed out of Calis, and the Frenchmen diminiſhed, ſo that finallie they were ouercome, as well in the one place, as in the other.

Sir Euſtace de Ribaumont a right valiant knight.

It chanced that in the hoteſt of the fight, the king was matched with ſir Euſtace de Ribaumont, a right ſtrong and hardie knight. There was a ſore incounter betwixt him and the king, that maruell it was to behold them. At length they were put aſunder, for a great companie of both parts came that waie, and there fought fiercelie togither. The Frenchmen did behaue themſelues right valiantlie, and eſpeciallie ſir Euſtace de Ribaumont: he ſtrake the king that daie twiſe vpon his knées, but finallie he was taken priſoner by the king himſelfe. The lord Geffrie of Charnie was alſo taken priſoner, and wounded right ſore, but the king of his noble courteſie cauſed him to be dreſſed by ſurgions, and tenderlie looked vnto. There were ſlaine, ſir Henrie de Blois, and ſir Pepin de la Ware, with other, to the number of ſix hundred. Monſieur de Memorancie eſcaped with great danger. Froiſſard ſaieth, that this battell was fought in the yeare 1348, vpon the laſt of December, towards the next morning being Newyeares daie: but (as Aueſburie & Walſingham haue, who begin the yeare at our ladie day) this enterpriſe chanced 1349, and ſo conſequentlie in the 23 yeare of this kings reigne. All the priſoners were brought to the caſtell of Calis, where the K. the next night gaue them a ſupper, & made them right hartie cheare, and gaue to ſir Euſtace de Ribaumont a rich chaplet of pearles, which he then did weare on his owne head, in token that he had beſt deſerued it for his manfull prowes ſhewed in the fight; & beſide that in fauour of his tried valiancie, he acquit him of his ranſome, and ſet him at libertie. This fact of the king was roiall in déed, and his clemencie greatlie to be commended; & therfore it is well ſaid to this purpoſe,

He is taken priſoner by the king of England.

Anno Reg. 24. The death ceaſſeth. Aueſdurie.

About the end of Auguſt the death in London ceaſſed, which had bin ſo great & vehement within that citie, that ouer & beſide the bodies buried in other accuſtomed burieng places (which for their infinit number cannot be reduced into account) there were buried that yeare dailie, from Candlemaſſe till Eaſter, in the Charterhouſe yard of London, more than two hundred dead corpſes. Alſo this yeare, by the earneſt ſute of the two cardinals which were ſent (as ye haue heard) from pope Clement the ſixt, a peace was concluded for one yeare. There met néere vnto Calis for the treatie of this peace, the foreſaid two cardinals, as mediators; and for the king of England, the biſhop of Norwich treaſuror and high chancellor of the realme, with others came thither as commiſſioners; and in like maner for the French king, there appeared the biſhop of Lion, and the abbat of S. Deniſe. ¶ This yeare in Auguſt died Philip de Valois the French king. Here is to be noted, that all thoſe that were borne, after the beginning of that great mortalitie whereof ye haue heard, wanted foure chéeke téeth (when they came to the time of growth) of thoſe 32 which the people before that time commonlie vſed to haue, ſo that they had but 28. In this 24 yeare of this kings reigne, there was a combat fought in liſts within the kings palace of Weſtminſter, betwixt the lord Iohn, baſtard ſonne to Philip king of France, & a knight of the towne of Ypres in Flanders; but the baſtard had the vpper hand, and vanquiſhed his aduerſarie. ¶ About the feaſt of the decollation of ſaint Iohn Baptiſt, king Edward aduertiſed of a fléet of Spaniards returning forth of Flanders, that was laden with clothes and other riches, aſſembled a conuenient power of men of armes and archers, & at Sandwich tooke the ſea with them, ſailing forth, till vpon the coaſt of Winchelſie he met with the Spaniards, and there aſſailed them; ſo that betwixt him and thoſe Spaniards, there was a ſore fight, and long continued, to the great loſſe of people on both parts; but in the end, the bright beame of victorie ſhone vpon the Engliſh ſailes, ſo that all the Spaniards were ſlaine, for they were ſo proud and obſtinat (as Walſingham affirmeth) that they would not yéeld, but rather choſe to die, & ſo they did indéed,

Ambaſſadors ſent to the pope.

About the beginning of Auguſt, ſir Raoull de Cahors, and diuerſe other knights and eſquiers, to the number of ſix ſcore men of armes, fought before a caſtell called Auleon, with ſir Thomas Dagworth, and there ſlue the ſame ſir Thomas, and to the number of one hundred men of armes with him. There were ſent ſolemne meſſengers this yeare vnto Auignion, for the eſtabliſhing of a peace, mentioned betwixt the king of England and France, at the ſute of the pope, ſo that king Edward ſhould haue reſigned his title and claime to the crowne of France, and the French king ſhould haue giuen ouer vnto him the whole duchie of Guien, to hold the ſame freelie, without knowledging of reſort or ſuperioritie, or dooing any manner of homage for the ſame: but ſuch delaies were made, and the ſute ſo prolonged by the pope, that the erale of Derbie, who with others was ſent to him about this matter, returned without ſpeed of his purpoſe for the which he went.

In the fiue and twentith yeare of king Edwards reigne, the Frenchmen hauing laid ſiege vnto the towne of ſaint Iohn Dangeli, the lord Dalbrets ſon, hauing aſſembled ſix hundred men of armes, Gaſcoigns and Engliſhmen, meant to worke ſome feat for reliefe of them within, wher vpon, as he was marching through the countrie of Xainctonge neere vnto Xaincts the eighth of Aprill, or (as other haue) the firſt, he was incountered by the lord Guie de Neell, one of the marſhals of France, & other French lords, where at length, the Frenchmen were diſcomfited, manie alſo ſlaine, and diuerſe taken priſoners, of which number was the ſaid marſhall, with his brother the lord William, and ſir Arnold de Dandrehen, beſide others, to the number of 300 men of armes, but yet the ſiege remained, till for want of vittels the towne was rendered to the Frenchmen.

Polydor.

The ſame yeare in October, an Engliſh archer of the gariſon of Calis, named Iohn of Dancaſter, by licence of the lord deputie of Calis, tooke with him threeſcore perſons men of armes and archers, and in the night that goeth before the feaſt daie of S. Vincent, in the laſt quarter of the ſame night, he comming to the caſtell of Guines, found as well the watch as others faſt aſleepe, wherevpon he paſſed a water that adioined to the caſtell, wading vp to the girdle, and ſo came to the wall, where he & his companie rearing vp ladders, mounted by the ſame ſo ſecretlie, that ſlaieng the watch, being not paſt three or foure perſons that were on the wals, they entred the caſtell, and finding the Frenchmen aſleepe, ſlue thoſe that vpon their wakening made any defenſe, and tooke the reſidue, whome they ſuffered to depart: and by this meanes they wan the caſtell, finding great ſtore of vittels within, and ſo as they found it, they kept it to the king of Englands vſe. The French hiſtories declare, that one Guilliam de Beauconroy that was capteine of this caſtell, betraied the place to the Engliſhmen, for a ſumme of monie, and when the French king required reſtitution bicauſe the truce was not yet expired, he was ſhifted off with this forged anſwer, that nothing was excepted by the aſſurance of the truce, concerning things that ſhould be bought and ſold. The Frenchman that betraied it, was ſhortlie after put to execution at Amiens.

Grotes and halfe grotes firſt coined.

In this yeare were the firſt peeces of ſiluer called grotes and halfe grotes of foure pence & two pence the peece ſtamped, by the kings appointment, through the counſell of William de Edington biſhop of Wincheſter lord treaſuror. Before that time, there were no other coines, but the noble, halfe noble, and quarter noble, with the peeces of ſiluer called ſterlings. Bicauſe theſe new peeces wanted of the weight of the old ſterling coine, the prices as well of vittels as of other wares, did dailie riſe, and ſeruants and workemen waxing more craftie than before time they had beene, demanded great wages.

Statutes for making of clothes.
Weares and milles.

In the ſeuen and twentith yeare of his reigne, K. Edward held a parlement at Weſtminſter, after the feaſt of Eaſter, in which an ordinance was deuiſed, what wages ſeruants and laborers ſhould be allowed, prohibiting them to receiue aboue the rate which they were accuſtomed to take before the yeare of the great mortalitie. Seruants and laborers were in deed growen to be more ſubtill than before time they had beene; but by reaſon of the prices of things were inhanced, it is like they demanded greater wages than they had doone before time: and one cauſe of the dearth was imputed to the new coine of monie, being of leſſe weight in the value thereof, than before it had beene, ſo that the biſhop of Wincheſter being lord treaſuror, who had counſelled the king to ordeine thoſe grotes and halfe grotes, was euill ſpoken of amongſt the people. In this parlement there were ſtatutes alſo made, that clothes ſhould in length and in breadth through the realme, beare the ſame aſſiſe, as was ordeined in the parlement holden at Northampton. Alſo, that all weares, milles, and other lets, ſhould be remoued forth of riuers, that might be any hinderance of ſhips, boats, or lighters to paſſe vp and downe the ſame. But theſe good ordinances tooke little or none effect, by reaſon of bribes that walked abroad, and freendſhip of lords and great men, that ſought rather their owne commoditie, than the common-wealths.

The lord Charles of Blois.

Shortlie after the feaſt of Pentecoſt, the earle of Derbie and Lancaſter was made duke of Lancaſter, and Rafe lord Stafford was created earle of Stafford. Whereas there had beene a treatie betwixt the lords of Britaine, and the king of England, not onelie for the deliuerance of the lord Charles de Blois, but alſo for the matching of his eldeſt ſonne in mariage with one of king Edwards daughters, and ſo to inioy the dukedome in peace: this matter was ſo far forwards, that in the yeare laſt paſſed, the ſaid lord Charles, leauing two of his ſonnes and a daughter in pledge for the paiment of fortie thouſand florens, agreed vpon for his ranſome; he was permitted to returne into Britaine to prouide that monie: and withall, to procure a diſpenſation, that his eldeſt ſonne might marrie with one of K. Edwards daughters, notwithſtanding that otherwiſe they were within the degrees of conſanguinitie, prohibiting them to marrie. Herevpon this yeare about Michaelmas, he returned into England with the ſame diſpenſation: but bicauſe about the ſame time the Britains had taken by ſtealth an Iland with a caſtell therein, that the Engliſhmen had kept, & put all thoſe which they found therein, to the ſword, the ſaid lord Charles, otherwiſe duke of Britaine, loſt the kings fauour, ſo that he would heare no more of anie ſuch aliance, by waie of marriage, as had bæne communed of before: by reaſon whereof the Britiſh lords, that were in great number come ouer with the lord Charles de Blois, were conſtreined to returne home, without atchiuing anie part of their purpoſe, leauing the ſaid lord Charles and his children behind them ſtill héere in England.

Debate betwixt the dukes of Brunſwike & Lancaſter.

On the fourth day of September, the duke of Brunſwike and the duke of Lancaſter ſhould haue fought a combat in Paris, about words the duke of Lancaſter ſhould ſpeake, in derogation of the duke of Brunſwikes honor, for the which the ſaid duke had appealed him in the court of France: but when they were readie to haue tried it, and were on horſſebacke with their ſpeares in hand within the liſts, at point to haue runne togither, the French king cauſed them to ſtaie, and taking on him the matter, made them fréends, and agréed them. This yeare the king by aduiſe of his councell remoued the mart or ſtaple of wools from the townes in Flanders, and cauſed the ſame to be kept at Weſtminſter, Chicheſter, Lincolne, Briſtowe, Canturburie and Hull. This was done in deſpite of the Flemings, bicauſe they held not the couenants and agréements which they had made with the king, in the life time of Jaques Arteueld, by whoſe prouiſion the ſaid mart or ſtaple had béene kept in ſundrie townes in Flanders, to their great aduantage and commoditie.

Auesburie. Tho. Walſi. affirmeth that this remouing of the ſtaple of wols was the 28 yeare of K. Edwards reigne.

Sir walter Bentl e committed to the tower.

Sir Walter Bentlie, vpon his comming ouer forth of Britaine, where he had béene the kings lieutenant, was committed to the tower, where he remained priſoner for the ſpace of twelue moneths, bicauſe he refuſed to deliuer vp the caſtels within his gouernement, vnto ſir John Auenell knight, being appointed to receiue the ſame, to the vſe of the lord Charles de Blois, at the ſame time when the treatie of agréement was in hand, betwixt the king, and the ſaid lord Charles. But after, when it was perceiued what damage might haue inſued by deliuerie of thoſe caſtels, ſir Walter was ſet at libertie vpon ſuerties yet they were bound for his forth comming, and that he ſhould not depart the realme: at length, he was receiued againe into the kings fauour. In the ſummer of this ſeauen and twentith yeare, was ſo great a drought, that from the latter end of March, fell little raine, till the latter end of Julie, by reaſon whereof, manie inconueniences inſued: and one thing is ſpeciallie to be noted, that corne the yeare following wared ſcant, and the price began this yeare to be greatlie inhanced. Alſo béeues and muttons wared déere for the want of graſſe, and this chanced both in England and France, ſo that this was called the déere ſummer. The lord William duke of Bauiere or Bauarie, and earle of Zeland, brought manie ſhips into London, fraught with rie, for reléefe of the people, who otherwiſe had, through their preſent pinching penurie, if not vtterlie periſhed, yet pittifullie pined.

1354 Anno Reg. 28. Thom. Walſ. Aueſburie.

In the eight and twentith yeare of king Edwards reigne, vpon a treatie that was holden by commiſſioners, appointed by the two kings of England and France, after Eaſter, they were in maner fullie agréed vpon a peace, ſo that nothing wanted, but putting vnto their ſeales. In the articles whereof it was conteined, that the king of England ſhould inioy all the lands of his dutchie of Aquitaine, without holding the ſame of anie by homage, or reſort, and in conſideration thereof he ſhould reſigne all his claime to the crowne of France. Héerevpon were ambaſſadors ſent from either king, vnto the pope, and a truce taken, to indure till the feaſt of ſaint John Baptiſt in the yeare next following. Ambaſſadors for the king of England were theſe: Henrie duke of Lancaſter, John earle of Arundell, the biſhops of Norwich and London, and the lord Guie de Brian. For the French king, the archbiſhop of Rouen lord chancellor of France, the duke of Burbon, and others: but when the matter came to be heard before the pope about Chriſtmaſſe, all went to ſmoke that had béene talked of: for the Frenchmen denied that the articles were drawne according to the meaning of their commiſſioners, and the pope alſo winked at the matter, ſo that the Engliſh ambaſſadors (when they ſaw that nothing would be concluded) returned home all of them) the biſhop of Norwich excepted who departed this life there) and ſo their iournie came to none effect.

1355 Anno Reg. 29. Debate betwixt the ſcholers & townesmen of Oxenford.

This yeare, the tenth of Februarie, there roſe a ſore debate betwixt the ſcholers and townesmen of Oxenford. The occaſion roſe by reaſon of the falling out of a ſcholer with one that ſold wine: for the ſcholer perceiuing himſelfe euill vſed, powred the wine on the drawers head, knocking the pot about his pate, ſo as the bloud ranne downe by his eares. Héerevpon began a ſore fraie betwixt the ſcholers and townesmen, which continued for the moſt part of two daies togither. There were twentie townesmen ſlaine, beſide thoſe that were hurt: but at length, there came a great number of countrimen forth of the villages next adioining, to aid the townesmen, entring the towne with a blacke banner, and ſo fiercelie aſſailed the ſcholers, that they were conſtreined to fleé to their houſes and hoſtels, but their enimies purſuing them, brake vp their dores, entered their chambers, ſlue diuerſe of them, and threw them into priuies, tare their bookes, and bare awaie their goods. The ſcholers héerewith tooke ſuch diſpleaſure, that they departed the Uniuerſitie: thoſe of Merton colledge, and other the like colledges onelie excepted.

The biſhop of Lincolne inhibited préeſts to celebrate diuine ſeruice in preſence of anie laie man within that towne of Oxenford; and the king ſending his iuſtices thither, to take knowledge of this diſorderlie riot, there were diuerſe, both of the townesmen and ſcholers indited, and certeine of the burgeſſes committed to ward. ¶ This yeare, the firſt ſundaie in Lent, the king held a roiall iuſtes at Woodſtoke, for ioy of the quéenes purifieng, after the birth of hir ſixt ſonne, the lord Thomas, whome the biſhop of Durham (named Thomas) held at the fontſtone: he was borne the ſeauenth of Januarie laſt paſt. In the parlement holden at Weſtminſter this yeare after Eaſter, the king tooke vpon him to make an end of the quarrell betwixt the ſcholers and townesmen of Oxenford, and ſauing to euerie man his right, pardoned the ſcholers of all tranſgreſſions: and this he ſignified into euerie ſhire, by writs directed to the ſhiriffes, they to proclame the ſame for more notice of the thing. And ſo in the ſummer following, the Uniuerſitie began againe to flouriſh, ſtudents reſorting thither from each ſide, and falling afreſh to their academicall exerciſes, which they néeded not to haue diſcontinued, if either partie, I meane the townesmen or ſcholers, would haue tolerated and borne one with another, and not ſo raſhlie haue vndertaken the reuenge of one anothers wrath and iniurie; but,

Oderunt pacem ſtulti & certamina quærunt.

Thom. Walſ. Aueſburie. The quarrell appeaſed betwixt the ſcholers and townesmen of Oxenford.

In this parlement, the proceſſe of the iudgement had and made againſt Roger Mortimer, late earle of March, was reuoked, adnihilated, and made void, ſo that the lord Roger Mortimer was reſtored to the title and poſſeſſions of the earledome of March, as couſine and heire to his grandfather the ſaid erle of March. Moreouer, to this parlement came the biſhop of Carpentras, and the abbat of Clugnie, being ſent from pope Innocent the ſixt, to make ſute to haue the truce prorogued betwixt the two kings, of England and France, to whome the king himſelfe in perſon, made this reſolute anſwer, that he would not agrée to anie longer truce; for that, when diuerſe times, at the Frenchmens ſute, he had conſented to haue truce by mediation of two cardinals, ſent to him about the ſame matter, his aduerſaries in the meane time, whileſt ſuch truces indured, had doone much harme and damage by ſubtill practiſes to perſons and places beyond the ſea, that were vnder his rule and gouernement, yet he ſaid he would deliberate héereof with his councell, and after intimate his pleaſure to the pope, and to them of France by meſſengers which he would ſend ouer for that purpoſe: and ſo theſe ambaſſadors within foure daies after their comming, were thus diſpatched with anſwer. Herewith in this parlement it was ordeined, that the prince of Wales, being as then about foure and twentie yeares of age, ſhould paſſe ouer into Gaſcoigne, and haue with him a thouſand men of armes, and two thouſand archers, with a great number of Welſhmen.

Auesburie. A nauie prepared.

About the ſame time the king cauſed fortie ſhips to be prouided, rigged, and made readie at Rutherhithe, furniſhed with vittels for one quarter of a yéere, and euerie of the ſaid ſhips had principall ſtreamers of the duke of Lancaſters armes, who was appointed with a great power of choſen men of armes and archers to paſſe to the ſea with the ſame ſhips, but few or none of his companie knew whither; horſſes they had none. He had with him two of the kings ſonnes, Lionell of Antwerpe, and Iohn of Gant, the elder of them being about ſixtéene yeares of age. Alſo, there went with him the earles of Northampton, March, and Stafford, beſide manie lords, barons, & knights. On the tenth of Iulie, he made ſaile to Gréenewich, and there and at Sandwich he ſtaied, till the Aſſumption of our ladie, the wind for the moſt part continuing all that while at weſt and ſouth, contrarie to his iournie, as it might appeare. At length with much difficultie he came to Winchelſie, & after to the Wight. It was thought, that the dukes purpoſe was to paſſe into Normandie, to ioine with the king of Nauarre, who was at variance with the French king. But after it was knowen by eſpials that they were made fréends, the duke of Lancaſter doubting crooked meaſures, and hauing with him no horſſemen, returned home without further attempt.

The duke of Lancaſter.

Record.Tur.

On ſaint Kenelmes daie being fridaie, and the 17 of Iulie, maſter Humfrie Carleton profeſſor of diuinitie, and Iohn Carleton the yoonger, doctor of the lawes, on the behalfe of the Vniuerſitie of Oxford, and Iohn ſaint Frideſwide maior, Iohn Bereford, and Iohn Norton, burgeſſes of the ſaid towne of Oxford, on the behalfe of the communaltie of the ſame towne, came before the kings councell at Weſtminſter in the councell chamber there, néere to the excheker, where the allegations on both parties being heard, and vpon requeſt made, that it might pleaſe his maieſties councell, according to the ſubmiſſions by both parties made vnto the king and to his councell, to take order in the matter in controuerſie betwixt them, concerning the late tumult and buſineſſe which had chanced in the ſaid towne, by the diſorder of the communaltie of the ſame, in breaking downe, and burning vp of houſes, in taking awaie the bookes and other goods of the ſaid maſters and ſcholers, & in committing other tranſgreſſions. The councell hauing conſideration thereof, to auoid the decaie that might haue inſued to the ſaid towne, made this end betwixt them, that the ſaid towne (Iohn Bereford, being in the kings priſon, and Robert Lardiner onelie excepted) ſhould be bound to paie vnto the ſaid maſters and ſcholers, damnified in the ſaid tumult and buſineſſe, for amends, and reformation of iniuries and loſſes ſuſteined (death and maime excepted) two hundred and fiftie pounds, beſide the goods taken and borne awaie, to be reſtored againe, and this monie to be paid to the ſaid chancellor, maſters and ſcholers, on that ſide the mondaie next before the feaſt of ſaint Iames, or elſe ſufficient ſuerties put in for the paiment thereof, at certeine termes, as the parties ſhould agrée vpon: and in reſpect thereof, the ſaid Iohn Bereford, and Iohn Norton, ſhall be releaſſed out of priſon of the Marſhalſea, at the baile of the ſaid maior, and of Robert de Menkes, and Iohn Dimmoks, till the next ſeſſions of gaole deliuerie, with condition, that the ſaid ſummes of monie be paid, or ſuerties put in for the paiment thereof, as before is ſaid, or elſe the bodies of the ſaid Iohn Bereford, & Iohn de Norton, ſhall be returned to the ſaid priſon, within thrée daies after the feaſt of Peter ad Vincula, there to remaine in manner as before they did.

The end and award made of the quarrell betwixt the Vniuerſitie and townes-men of Oxford.

It was alſo ordeined by the councell, with the aſſent of the ſaid Humfrie and Iohn Carleton, that all and euerie manner of perſons of the ſaid towne of Oxford, and the ſuburbes of the ſame, indited and arreigned of the fellonies and tranſgreſſions before mentioned, that ſhould yéeld themſelues to the kings priſon to be tried by law, and alſo all other that were at that preſent in priſon, which the ſaid Humfrie and Iohn de Carleton ſhould name (Iohn de Bereford and Robert Lardiner excepted) might be let to baile, vpon ſufficient ſuerties, that ſhould vndertake for them, bodies for bodies, to appeare at the next ſeſſions of gaole deliuerie, there to be tried, according to the order of law. And further it was ordered, that all ſuch goods and cattels as were taken and carried awaie from the ſaid maſters and ſcholers in the ſaid tumult and buſineſſe, by the men of the ſaid towne and ſuburbes, in whoſe hands, and in what places ſoeuer within the ſaid towne and ſuburbes, by inquiſitions, informations, or other meanes, they ſhould or might be found, ſhould be deliuered to the ſaid chancellor, and procurators of the ſaid Vniuerſitie, to be by them reſtored vnto thoſe perſons, to whome they belonged. This was the effect of the order taken at that daie and place, before the reuerend fathers, Iohn archbiſhop of Yorke primat and chancellor of England, William biſhop of Wincheſter lord treaſuror, Thomas de Brembre lord kéeper of the priuie ſeale, and Dauid de Wollore maſter of the rolles, Henrie de Ingelbie clearke, and other of the kings councell then and there preſent.

Tho.Walſ. The prince of Wales goeth ouer into Gaſcoigne.

The prince of Wales (as ye haue heard) being appointed to paſſe ouer into Gaſcoigne, ſet forward from London the laſt daie of Iune, and comming to Plimmouth, where his nauie was appointed to be made readie, he ſtaied there, for want of conuenient wind and weather a long time after. Finallie, hauing with him the earles of Warwike, Suffolke, Saliſburie & Oxford, alſo the lord Iohn Chandois, ſir Robert Knols, ſir Franke de Hall, the lord Iames Audelie, with diuerſe other of the nobilitie, and of men of armes and archers a great number, then in parlement to him aſſigned, he firſt ſet from Plimmouth on the daie of the Natiuitie of our ladie. They were in all thrée hundred ſaile, and finding the wind proſperous, they paſſed ouer into Gaſcoigne, where of the Gaſcoignes they were ioifullie receiued. In Auguſt, the Engliſhmen that were in Britaine, warring againſt the Frenchmen, that tooke part with the lord Charles de Blois, ſlue manie of them, & tooke the lord of Beaumanor, the vicount of Roan, and diuerſe other. ¶ This yeare alſo, about Michaelmaſſe, the king hauing ſummoned an armie to be readie at Sandwich, paſſed ouer to Calis with the ſame. There went ouer with him his two ſonnes, Lionell of Antwerp earle of Vlſter, and Iohn of Gant earle of Richmond. He found at Calis a thouſand men of armes that came to ſerue him for wages, forth of Flanders, Brabant, and Almaigne, ſo that he had about thrée thouſand men of armes, and two thouſand archers on horſebacke, beſide archers on foot a great number. The citie of London had ſent to him fiue hundred men of armes, and fiue hundred archers all in one ſute or liuerie, at their owne coſts and charges. On the ſecond of Nouember, he ſet from Calis, marching forth towards ſaint Omers, waſting the countrie by the waie as he paſſed.

The king inuadeth Fra͂ce. The lord Bouſicant.

Froiſſard. The king for want of vittels returneth

Auesburie.

The French king being at the ſame time within the towne of ſaint Omers, ſent the lord Bouſicant vnto the king of England, that vnder colour of communication, he might view the kings power, who made ſuch report thereof, vpon his returne backe to the French king, that he determined not to fight with the king of England, but rather to paſſe before him, and ſo to deſtroie vittels, that for want thereof, the king of England ſhould be conſtreined to returne. And as he determined, ſo it came to paſſe, for the vittels were ſo cut off, that the Engliſhmen for thrée full daies togither, dranke nothing but water. When therefore king Edward had followed his enimies ſo farre as Heiden, where he brake the parke, and burnt the houſes within and about the parke, although he entered not into the towne nor caſtell, at length, for default of vittels, he returned backe, and came againe to Calis on ſaint Martins day, being the tenth after his ſetting forth from thence.

The conſtable of France demandeth battell.

The anſwer made to him.

Berwike taken by Scots

The morrow after being thurſdaie, and the twelfe of Nouember, the conſtable of France, and other Frenchmen, came to the end of the cauſie of Calis, with letters of credence, offering battell on tueſdaie next following vnto the king of England, in preſence of the duke of Lancaſter, the earles of Northampton, and the lord Walter de Mannie, who in the kings behalfe declared to the conſtable, that the king of England, to eſchew ſhedding of bloud, would fight with the French king bodie to bodie, ſo to trie their right: and if he liked not of that match, then if he would chooſe thrée or foure knights to him that were néereſt to him in bloud, he ſhould chooſe the like number. But when this offer would not be accepted, the Engliſh lords offered battell the next day, being fridaie, or elſe on ſaturdaie following, at the Frenchmens choice: but the conſtable of France and his companie, continuing in their firſt offer, refuſed both thoſe daies. Then the Engliſh lords accepted the daie by them aſſigned, with condition, that if they brought not king Edward to giue battell that day, they would yéeld themſelues priſoners, ſo that the Frenchmen would likewiſe vndertake for their king. The conſtable hauing no anſwer readie, ſtaied a while, and after flatlie refuſed to make any ſuch couenant. Finallie, when the Engliſh lords perceiued their aduerſaries, not to meane battell, as their words at the firſt pretended, they brake off, and both parties returned home. The king of England ſtaied till the tueſdaie, and paid the ſtrangers their wages, and ſo came backe into England. On the ſixt of Nouember, whileſt the king was thus abroad in Picardie, the Scots verie earlie in the morning of that daie, came priuilie to Berwike, entred by ſtealth into the towne, and ſleaing thrée or foure Engliſhmen, tooke it, with all the goods and perſons within it, thoſe excepted, which got to the caſtell.

A parlement.

The procéedings of the prince of wales in Aquitaine.

In a parlement ſummoned this yeare, the mondaie after the feaſt of ſaint Edmund the king, the lords and commons granted to king Edward fiftie ſhillings of euerie ſacke of wooll, that ſhould be caried ouer the ſea, for the ſpace of ſix yeares next inſuing. By this grant it was thought, that the king might diſpend a thouſand markes ſterling a day, ſuch vent of wools had the Engliſh merchants in that ſeaſon. ¶The parlement being ended, the king about S. Andrews tide ſet forward towards Scotland, and held his Chriſtmaſſe at Newcaſtell. About which time by letters ſent from the prince, the king was aduertiſed of his procéedings after his arriuall in Gaſcoigne, where being ioifullie receiued of the nobles, and other the people of that countrie (as before yée haue heard) he declared to them the cauſe of his thither comming, and tooke aduiſe with them how to procéed in his buſineſſe; and ſo about the tenth of October, he ſet forward to paſſe againſt his enimies, firſt entring into a countrie called Iuliake, which togither with the fortreſſes yéelded to him, without anie great reſiſtance. Then he rode through the countie Armignac, waſting and ſpoiling the countrie, and ſo paſſed through the lands of the vicounts de la Riuiere, and after entered into the countie de l'Eſtrac, and paſſing through the ſame, came to the countie of Commiges, finding the towne of S. Matain void, being a good towne & one of the beſt in that countrie.

Carcaſſon.

Narbonne.

Two biſhops ſent from the pope to the prince of wales,

After this, he paſſed by the land of the earle of Liſle, till he came within a league of Tholouſe, where the earle of Armignac, being the French kings lieutenant in thoſe parts, and other great lords and nobles were aſſembled. The prince with his armie tarried there two daies, and after paſſed ouer the riuer of Garonne, and after ouer an other riuer thereabouts, a league aboue Tholouſe, lodging that night a league on the other ſide of Tholouſe: and ſo they paſſed thorough Tholouſe, dailie taking townes & caſtels, wherein they found great riches, for the countrie was verie plentifull. Vpon Alhallowes éeuen, they came to caſtell Naudarie, and from thence they tooke the waie to Carcaſſon, into the which a great number of men of armes and commons were withdrawne. But vpon the approch of the Engliſhmen, they ſlipt awaie, and got them to a ſtrong caſtell that ſtood néere at hand. The third day after, the Engliſhmen burnt the towne, and paſſing forth, trauerſed all the countrie of Carcaſſonois, till they came to the towne of Narbonne. The people there were fled into the caſtell, in which the vicount of Narbonne was incloſed, with fiue hundred men of arms. The prince ſtaied there two daies. The pope ſent two biſhops towards the prince, to treat with him of peace, but bicauſe the prince would not hearken to anie treatie without commiſſion from his father, they could not get anie ſafe conduct to approch néerer.

The prince hauing aduertiſments héere, that his enimies were aſſembled, and followed him, he turned backe to meet them, but they had no will to abide him: for although the earle of Armignac, the conſtable of France, the marſhall Cleremont, and the prince of Orange, with diuerſe other néere to Tholouſe, made ſome ſhew to impeach the prince his paſſage, yet in the end they withdrew, not without ſome loſſe, for the lord Bartholomew de Burwaſch aliàs Burgherſch, ſir Iohn Chandois, the lord Iames Audeley, and ſir Thomas Felton, being ſent forth to view them, ſkirmiſhed with two hundred of their men of armes, and tooke of them fiue and thirtie. After this, they had no mind to abide the Engliſh power, but ſtill ſhranke awaie, as the prince was readie to follow them, and ſo he perceiuing that the Frenchmen would not giue him battell, he withdrew towards Burdeaux, after he had ſpent eight wéekes in that his iournie, and ſo comming thither, he wintered there, whileſt his capteins in the meane time tooke diuerſe townes and caſtels abroad in the countrie. ¶And now to the end yée may haue more plaine information of the princes doings in thoſe parties, I haue thought good to make you partakers of a letter or two, written by ſir Iohn Winkefield knight, attendant on the prince there in Gaſcoigne.

The copie of ſir Iohn Winke*fields letters.*

MY lord, as touching the newes in theſe parts, may it pleaſe you to vnderſtand, that all the earles, barons, baronets, knights, and eſquiers, were in helth at the making hereof, and my lord hath not loſt either knight or eſquier in this voiage, except the lord Iohn Liſle, who was ſlaine after a ſtrange maner with a quarrell, the third day after we were entered into our enimies countries, he died the fiftenth of October. And pleaſe it you to vnderſtand, that my lord hath ridden through the countrie of Arminac, and hath taken many fenſed townes, and burnt and deſtroied them, except certeine which he hath fortified. After this, he marched into the vicountie of Rouergne, where he tooke a good towne named Pleaſance, the chiefeſt towne of that countrie, which he hath burnt and deſtroied, with the countrie round about the ſame. This doone, he went into the countie d'Aſtrike, wherin he tooke manie townes, waſted and deſtroied all the countrie. After this, he entred into the countie of Cominge, and tooke manie townes there, which he cauſed to be deſtroied & burnt, togither with all the countrie abroad. He tooke alſo the towne of S. Matan, which is the cheefeſt towne of that countrie, being as large in compaſſe as Norwich.

Afterward, he entered into the countie of Liſle, and tooke the moſt part of the fenſed townes therin, cauſing diuerſe of them to be burnt and deſtroied as he paſſed. And after entring into the lordſhip of Tholouſe, we paſſed the riuer of Girond, and an other a league aboue Tholouſe, which is verie great: for our enimies had burnt all the bridges, as well on the one ſide of Tholouſe, as the other, except the bridges within Tholouſe, for the riuer runneth through the towne. And the conſtable of France, the marſhall Cleremont, and the earle of Arminac, were with a great power within the towne the ſame time. And Tholouſe is a great towne, ſtrong, faire, and well walled, and there was none in our hoſt that knew the foord there: but yet by the grace and goodneſſe of God we found it. So then we marched through the ſeigniorie of Tholouſe, & tooke manie good townes incloſed, and burnt and deſtroied them, and all the countrie about.

Then we entred into the ſeigniorie of Carcaſon, and we tooke manie good towns, before we came to Carcaſon, which towne we alſo tooke, which is greater, ſtronger, & fairer than Yorke. And as well this towne as all other townes in the countrie were burnt and deſtroied. And after we had paſſed by manie iournies through the countrie of Carcaſon, we came into the ſeigniorie of Narbon, and we tooke manie townes, and waſted them, till we came to Narbon, which towne was holden againſt vs, but it was woone by force, and the ſaid towne is little leſſe than London, and is ſituat vpon the Greekiſh ſea, for that the diſtance from the ſaid towne vnto the Greekiſh ſea is not paſt two leagues, and there is an hauen and a place to arriue at, from whence the water cōmeth vp to Narbon. And Narbon is not but eleuen leagues diſtant from Mountpellier, & eighteene from Eguemortz, & thirtie from Auignion. And may it pleaſe you to vnderſtand, that the holie father ſent his meſſengers to my lord, that were not paſt ſeuen leagues frō him, and they ſent a ſergeant at armes, that was ſergeant at armes attendant on the doore of our holie fathers chamber, with their letters to my lord, praieng him to haue a ſafe conduct to come to declare to his highneſſe their meſſage from the holie father, which was to treat betwixt my L. and his aduerſaries of France: and the ſaid ſergeant was two daies in the hoſt before my lord would ſee him, or receiue his letters. And the reaſon was, bicauſe he had vnderſtanding, that the power of France was come forth of Tholouſe toward Carcaſon, ſo that my lord was driuen to turne backe towards them ſuddenlie, and ſo did.

He meaneth the Mediterrane ſea.

On the third daie when we ſhould haue come vpon them, they had knowlege giuen before day, and ſo retiring, got them to the mounteins, haſting faſt toward Tholouſe; and the countrie people that were their guides to lead them that waie, were taken as they ſhould haue paſſed the water. And bicauſe the popes ſergeant at armes was in my keeping, I cauſed him to examine the guides that were ſo taken; and for that the guide which was thus examined, was the conſtables guide, and his countrieman, he might well ſee and know the countenance of the Frenchmen vpon this examining him. And I ſaid to the ſame ſergeant, that he might well declare to the pope, and to all them of Auignion, that which he had heard or ſeene. And as touching the anſwer which my lord made to them that were ſent to treat with him, you would be well apaid if you vnderſtood all the maner; for he would not ſuffer in any wiſe that they ſhuld come neerer vnto him. But if they came to treat of any matter, he would that they ſhould ſend to the king his father: for my lord himſelfe would not doo any thing therin, except by commandement from my lord his father.

And of my lords turning backe to follow after his enimies, and of the paſſage of the riuer of Garonne, and of the taking of caſtels and townes in this iournie, and of other things which he hath doone againſt his enimies in purſuit of them in this iournie, being things right worthie and honorable, as manie know verie well, in like maner as ſir Richard Stafford, & ſir William Burton can more plainelie declare, than I to you can write, for it were too much to put in writing. And my lord rode thus abroad in the countrie of his enimies eight whole weekes, and reſted not paſt eleuen daies in all thoſe places where he came. And know it for certeine, that ſince this warre began againſt the French king he had neuer ſuch loſſe or deſtruction as he hath had in this iournie: for the countries and good townes which were waſted at this iournie, found to the king of France euerie yeare more to the maintenance of his warre than halfe his realme hath doon beſide, except the exchange of his monie which he maketh euerie yeare, and the aduantage and cuſtome which he taketh of them of Poictou, as I can ſhew you by good remembrances, which were found in diuerſe townes in the receiuers houſes: for Carcaſon and le Moignes, which is as great as Carcaſon, and two other townes in the coaſts of Carcaſon, found to the king of France yeerelie wages for a thouſand men of armes: and beſide that 100000 old crowns to mainteine the war.

And know you, that by the remembrances which we found, that the townes in Tholouſe which are deſtroied, and the townes in the countrie of Carcaſon, and the towne of Narbonne and Narbonnois did find euerie yeare with the ſums aforeſaid, in aid of his war, foure hundred thouſand old crownes, as the burgeſſes of the great townes & other people of the countrie which ought to know it, haue told vs. And ſo by Gods aſſiſtance if my lord had wherewith to mainteine this warre, and to make the kings profit and his owne honor, he ſhould well inlarge the Engliſh marches, and gaine manie faire places: for our enimies are greatlie aſtonied. And at the making heereof, my lord hath appointed to ſend all the earles and baronets to abide in certeine places on the marches, to make roads, and to annoie his enimies. Now my lord, at this preſent I know none other newes to ſend, but you may by your letters command me as yours to my power. My right honorable lord, God grant you good life, ioy, and health, long to continue. Written at Burdeaux, the tueſdaie next before Chriſtmaſſe.

The tenor of an other letter written by *ſir Iohn Wingfield, directed to ſir Richard Staf*ford knight, who had beene in Gaſcoigne, and there leauing his familie, was now returned into England.

RIght deare ſir, and right louing freend, touching newes after your departure, you may vnderſtand, that there be taken and yeelded fiue townes incloſed, to wit, port ſaint Marie, Cleirac, Tonings, Burgh, ſaint Pierre, Chaſtiell Sacret or Satrat and Braſſake. Alſo ſeauenteene caſtels, to wit, Coiller, Buſet, Lemnake, two caſtels called Boloines, which ioine the one neere ſo the other, Mounioy, Vireſch, Frechenet, Mountender, Pudeſchales, Mounpoun, Montanac, Valeclare, Cenamont, Leiſtrake, Plaſſac, Cont Deſtabliſon, and Mounriuell. And will it pleaſe you to know that my lord Iohn Chandois, my lord Iames Audeley, and your men that are with them, and the other Gaſcoignes that are in their companie, & my lord Baldwine Butetort, & that companie, & my lord Reignald Cobham, tooke the ſaid towne, which is called Chaſtiell Sacret or Satrat, by aſſault: and the baſtard of Liſle which was capteine of the ſaid towne was alſo ſlaine there, as they aſſaulted it, being ſtriken with an arrow thorough the head: and my lord Reignold is returned backe toward Languedocke: and my lord Baldwin towards Braſſacke, with their companies: and the lords Iohn & Iames, and thoſe of their companie remaine in Chaſtiell Satrat, and haue vittels plentie of all ſorts to ſerue them betweene this and Midſummer, except freſh fiſh and cabages as they haue certified vs by letters, wherefore yee need not take care for your men.

And there be in that towne more than three hundred glaiues, and three hundred yeomen, and a hundred and fiftie archers. And they haue rid before Agen, and burnt and deſtroied all their milles, and haue burnt and broken downe all their bridges that lie ouer Garon, and haue taken a caſtell without the ſame towne, and haue fortified it. And monſieur Iohn Darminake, and the seneſhall of Agenois, which were in the towne of Agen, would not once put forth their head, nor anie of their people, and yet haue they beene twiſe before that towne. And monſieur Buſgaud was come, and monſieur Ernald de Spaine, and Grimoton de Chambule, with three hundred glaiues, and three ſergeants Lombards, and they are in the towne of Muſchacke, which is in Creſſie, and it is but a mile from Chaſtiell Satrat or Sacret, and a league from Breſſake, and yee may well thinke that there will be good companie one with another.

Buſcicault

And further may it pleaſe yee to know, that monſieur Bartholomew is at Coniake with ſix ſcore men of armes of my lords houſe, & ſix ſcore archers, & the capitall de Buche or Beuf, the L. Monferrant, & the L. of Crotonie, which haue with them 300 glaiues, & ſix ſcore archers, and two hundred ſergeants, beſide them which are in Tailbourgh, Tanney, and Rochford, ſo that when they are togither, they may be well ſix hundred glaiues, and at the making heereof, they were vpon a iournie towards Aniou and Poictou, and the earles of Suffolke, Oxford, and Saliſburie, the lord of Muſeden, monſieur Ellis de Pomiers, and other Gaſcoignes, with the which are well more then fiue hundred glaiues, and two hundred ſergeants, and three hundred archers, and they were at the making hereof toward the parties of Noſtredame de Rochemade, and haue beene forth aboue twelue daies, and were not returned at the ſending of theſe preſents. My lord Iohn Chandois, my lord Iames, and my lord Baldwin, and thoſe which be in their companie are alſo forth vpon a iournie toward their parties; my lord Reinold and thoſe of the houſhold, with the Gaſcoigns which be in their companie, are alſo forth vpon a iournie towards their parties.

The earle of Warwike hath beene at Tonings & Clerake, to take thoſe towns, and at the making hereof was gone towards Mermande to deſtroie their vines, and all other things which he can deſtroie of theirs. My lord is at Leiborne, and the lord of Pomiers at Fronſak, which is but a quarter of a leage from Leiborne: and my lords people lie as well at ſaint Milion, as at Leiborne, and monſieur Berard de Bret is there with him, and my lord looketh for newes which he ſhould haue, and according to the news that he ſhall haue, he will behaue himſelfe: for as it ſeemeth, he ſtandeth much on his honor. At the making hereof, the earle of Arminac was at Auignion, and the king of Aragon is there alſo: & of all other parleis which haue beene in diuerſe places (wherof you know) I can not certifie you at the making herof. Right deere ſir, other thing I can not ſend vnto you, but that you remember your ſelfe to ſend newes to my lord prince as ſoone as in anie wiſe you may, and ſo the Lord grant you good life and long. Written at Leiborne the 21 of Ianuarie.

¶ Theſe letters haue I thought good to make the reader partaker of, as I find them in the chronicle of Robert Auesburie, to the end ye may perceiue how other writers agree therewith, ſith the ſame letters may ſerue as a touchſtone to trie the truth of the matter. And ſo now I will returne to ſpeake of the kings doings in the north part where we left him. On the fourteenth of Ianuarie K. Edward hauing his armie lodged neere the towne of Berwike, and his nauie readie in the hauen to aſſaile the Scots that were within the towne, he entered the caſtell which the Engliſhmen had in their hands, the lord Walter de Mannie being their capteine, who had gotten certeine miners thither from the forreſt of Deane, and other parts of the realme, which were buſie to make paſſage vnder the ground by a mine, through which the Engliſhmen might enter into the towne. Hereupon, when the Scots perceiued in what danger they ſtood, and knew that they could not long defend the towne againſt him, they ſurrendered it into his hands without further reſiſtance.

In the Scotiſh hiſtories it is recorded, that when thoſe which were within the towne of Berwike, heard how that an armie of Engliſhmen came to the ſuccours of the caſtell, they raced the walles and burnt the houſes of the towne, and ſo departed with all the ſpoile which they had gotten there. But howſoeuer it was, king Edward being againe poſſeſſed of the towne, he ſet men a worke to repare it, and paſſing forth to Roxburge, there met with him the rightfull king of Scots Edward Balioll, who transferred & reſigned all the right, title and intereſt, which he had or might haue to the crowne and realme of Scotland into king Edwards hands: which reſignation he confirmed by his letters patents thereof made and giuen vnder his hand and ſeale, dated the 25 of Ianuarie 1356, requiring king Edward to perſeuere in purſute of his title to the vttermoſt.

Anno Reg. 30.

The reſignation of the realme of Scotland made by the Balioll.

King Edward hauing thus receiued the reſignation and releaſe of the crowne of Scotland, marched forth with his armie, till he came to Hadington, burning and deſtroieng the countrie on ech ſide round about him, as he paſſed. And whileſt he laie there, abiding for his ſhips, his men of warre were not idle, but ranged abroad in the countrie, and did all the damage to their enimies that they could deuiſe. At length his armie which he had at the ſame time on the ſea, arriued on that coaſt, and landing, ſpoiled a church of our ladie, called the White kirke: but being returned to their ſhips, there aroſe ſuch a tempeſt and vehement north wind, that manie of their veſſels ruſhing and beating againſt the banks and ſands, were drowned togither with the men that were within them, for diſpleaſure whereof king Edward fell to the ſpoile of the countrie againe, not ſparing one place more than another: by reaſon wherof, as well abbeis as all other churches and religious houſes both in Hadington, in Edenborough, and thorough all other the parts of Louthian, whereſoeuer he came, were defaced and put to ſacke. At length when he had accompliſhed his will, and ſo ſet things in order, he returned backe into England with the foreſaid Edward Balioll in his companie, whome he kept with him, for doubt leaſt he ſhould reuolt, and procure ſome new trouble. In the moneth of Iulie the duke of Lancaſter being ſent to the aid of the K. of Nauarre, came into Conſtantine, which is a portion of Normandie, & there ioined with the lord Philip of Nauarre, brother to the king of Nauarre, and with the lord Godfrie de Harecourt, the which being returned into France, and reſtored to the French kings fauour, was latelie againe reuolted, vpon diſpleaſure taken for the death of his nephue the lord Iohn de Harecourt, as in the French hiſtories ye may read more at large. They were in all about the number of foure thouſand fighting men, and being aſſembled togither, they went to Liſcur, to Orbec, to Ponteau, & reſcued the caſtell there, which had beene beſieged by the lord Robert de Hotetot maſter of the croſſebowes in France, more than two moneths: but now hearing that the Engliſhmen and Nauarrois approched, he departed from thence, leauing behind him for haſt his engins and artillerie.

The caſtell of Orbec reſcued.

The duke of Lancaſter paſſed forward vnto Bretueill, which he cauſed to be relieued and furniſhed with neceſſarie things as was conuenient. And then leauing the citie of Eureux, which was as then in the Frenchmens hands, latelie yeelded to them after a long ſiege, he went forward with the lord Philip de Nauarre in companie till they came to Vernueill in Perch, and there tooke both the towne and caſtell, and robbed the towne and burnt a great part therof. The French king, who had aſſembled a mightie armie, being aduertiſed of theſe matters, haſted forward towards the duke of Lancaſter, fullie purpoſing to giue him battell. The duke and the lord Philip de Nauarre, hauing knowledge that the French king followed them, withdrew towards the towne of the Eagle, and the king ſtill went after them, till he came to Tuebeuf two leages from the towne of the Egle, and there it was ſhewed to him that he could not follow his enimies any further, by reaſon of the thicke forreſts, which he could not paſſe without great danger of his perſon and loſſe of his people. Then returned he with all his hoſt, and tooke from the Nauarrois the caſtell of Thilliers, and alſo the caſtell of Bretueill, which was yeelded to him after two moneths ſiege.

The citie of Eureux yeelded to the Frenchmen.

About

Froiſſard.
The prince of wales inuadeth ẏ French dominions.

About the ſame time, that is to ſaie, in Julie, the prince of Wales, hauing aſſembled an armie of men of warre, to the number of eight thouſand, entred into the French dominions, and firſt paſſing through Auuergne, at length he came into the countrie of Berrie, waſting and burning the townes and villages as he went, taking eaſie iournies for the better releefe of his people, and deſtruction of his enimies: for when he was entered into anie towne that was ſufficientlie ſtored of things neceſſarie, he would tarie there two or thrée daies to refreſh his ſoldiers and men of warre, and when they diſlodged, they would ſtrike out the heads of the wine veſſels, and burne the wheat, oates and barlie, and all other things which they could not take with them, to the intent their enimies ſhould not therewith be ſuſteined and nouriſhed.

The citie of Burges.
Iſſoldune aſſaulted.
Vierzon wonne.
The paſſages ſtopped.

After this, they came before the citie of Burges, and there made a great ſkirmiſh at one of the gates, and there were manie feats of armes doone. The hoſt departed from thence, without dooing anie more, and comming to a ſtrong caſtell called Iſſoldune, they fiercelie aſſailed it, but could not win it: the gentlemen within defended the walles and gates ſo manfullie. Then paſſed they forward, and came to Vierzon, a great towne and a good caſtell, but it was nothing ſtronglie fortified; and therefore was it woone perforce, the people within it being not ſufficient to reſiſt the valiant puiſſance of the Engliſhmen. Here they found wine and other vittels in great plentie, and hervpon they taried there thrée daies to refreſh themſelues at eaſe. But before they departed, the prince had aduertiſement giuen him that the French king was come to Chartres, with an huge aſſemblie of men of warre, and that all the townes and paſſages aboue the riuer of Loire were cloſed and kept. Then was the prince counſelled to returne and paſſe by Touraine and Poictow, and ſo that waie to Burdeaux.

The prince returneth.

The prince following their aduiſe that thus counſelled him, ſet forward toward Remorentine. The French king had ſent into that countrie to kéepe the frontiers there, the lord of Craon, the lord Bouciquault, and the heremit of Chaumount, the which with thrée hundred men of armes had followed the Engliſhmen ſix daies togither, and could neuer find anie conuenient occaſion to ſet vpon them: for the Engliſhmen gouerned themſelues ſo ſagelie, that their enimies could not lightlie aſſaile them, but to their owne diſaduantage. One day the Frenchmen laid themſelues cloſelie in an ambuſh néere to the towne of Remorentine, at a maruellous ſtreict paſſage, by which the Engliſhmen muſt néeds paſſe.

Remorentine.

On the ſame daie there were departed from the princes battell, by licence of the marſhals, certeine capteins, Engliſhmen and Gaſcoignes, as the lord Bartholomew de Burgherſce or Burwaſche (as ſome write him) the lord of Mucident Gaſcongne, monſieur Petiton de Courton, the lord de la Ware, the lord Baſſet, ſir Daniell Paſſelew, ſir Richard Ponchardon, ſir Noell Loring, the yoong lord Spenſer, and two of the Danbreticourts, ſir Edward, and an other, who hauing with them two hundred men of armes, went forth to run before Remorentine, that they might view the place. They paſſed forth alongſt by the Frenchmen which laie in ambuſh, as yée haue heard, and they were not aduiſed of them, and they were no ſooner paſſed, but that the Frenchmen brake out, and galloped after the Engliſhmen with great randon, hauing their ſpeares in their reſts.

A ſkirmiſh.
The Frenchmen fled.
The prince lodgeth in the towne of Remorentine.

The Engliſhmen and the Gaſcoignes hearing horſſes to come galloping after them, turned, and perceiuing them to be their enimies, ſtood ſtill to abide them. The Frenchmen couragiouſlie gaue the charge, and the Engliſhmen as valiantlie defended them, ſo that there inſued a great ſkirmiſh, which continued a long while, ſo that it could not be eaſilie iudged who had the better, nor on which ſide the fortunate iſſue of the preſent conflict would then fall (for —— mutabilis alea Martis) till that the battell of the Engliſh marſhals approched, the which when the Frenchmen ſaw comming by a wood ſide, they fled ſtreightwaies towards Remorentine, and the Engliſhmen followed in chaſe ſo faſt as their horſſes might beare them, and entered the towne with the Frenchmen: but the French lords and the one halfe of their companie got into the caſtell, and ſo ſaued themſelues. The prince hearing what had happened, came into the towne, and there lodged that night, ſending ſir John Chandois to talke with the capiteines of the caſtell, to know if they would yéeld: and bicauſe they refuſed ſo to doo, on the next morrow he cauſed his people to giue an aſſault to the place, which continued the moſt part of the day, but yet miſſing their purpoſe, he commanded that they ſhould draw to their lodgings, and reſt them for that night.

The caſtell of Remorentine aſſaulted.
It is ſet on fier.
They within ſubmitted themſelues.
The French king foloweth the prince of wales.

In the morning as ſoone as the ſunne was vp, the marſhals cauſed the trumpets to ſound, and thoſe that were appointed to giue the aſſault againe, prepared themſelues to it. The prince himſelfe was preſent perſonallie at this aſſault, ſo that the ſame was inforced to the vttermoſt: but when they ſaw that by aſſaults they could not win the caſtell, they deuiſed engines, wherewith they caſt wild fire into the baſe court, and ſo ſet it on fire, which increaſed in ſuch vehement ſort, that it tooke into the couering of a great tower, which was couered with reed: and then they within perceiuing they muſt either yéeld or periſh with fire, came downe and ſubmitted themſelues to the prince, who as priſoners receiued them. The caſtell of Remorentine being thus woone and defaced with fire, the prince left it void, and marched forth with his armie as before, deſtroieng the countrie, and approched to Aniou and Touraine. The French king came forwards toward the prince, and at Ambois heard how the prince was in Touraine, meaning to returne through Poictow. He was dailie aduertiſed of the princes dooings by ſuch as were appointed to coaſt him euer in his iournie.

Froiſſard.
Seuen thouſand choſen men ſaith Tho. Walſi.
Chauignie.

Then came the king to Haie in Touraine, and his people were paſſed the riuer of Loire at ſundrie paſſages, where moſt conuenientlie they might. They were in number twentie thouſand men of armes; of noble men there were ſix and twentie, dukes and earles, beſide a great number of other lords and barons: the foure ſonnes of the king were there, as the lord Charles duke of Normandie, the lord Lewes after duke of Aniou, the lord John after duke of Berrie, and the lord Philip which was after duke of Burgongne. The French king doubting leaſt the prince ſhould eſcape by ſpéedie iournies out of his countrie, before he could come to giue him battell, remooued to Chauuignie, and there paſſed the riuer of Creuſe by the bridge, ſuppoſing that the Engliſhmen had béene before him, but they were not. Some of the Frenchmen taried behind at Chauuignie for one night, and in the morning followed the king. They were about two hundred men of armes vnder the leading of the lord Craon, the lord Raoull de Coucie, and the earle of Joignie. They chanced to incounter with certeine of the auaunt currours of the Engliſh armie, which remooued that day from a little village faſt by. Thoſe Engliſhmen were not paſt thrée ſcore men of armes, but well horſſed, and therefore perceiuing the great number of the Frenchmen, they fled towards the princes battell, which they knew was not farre off. Capteins of the Engliſhmen were two knights of Heinault, the lord Euſtace Dambreticourt, and the lord John of Guiſtelles.

The lord Raoull de Coucie taken.

Frenchmen diſtreſſed.

The Frenchmen beholding them in this wiſe to flée, rode after amaine, and as they followed in chaſe, they came on the princes battell before they were aware. The lord Raoull of Coucie went ſo far forward with his banner, that he entred vnder the princes banner, and fought right valiantlie, but yet he was there taken, and the earle of Joignie, alſo the vicount of Bruce, the lord Chauuignie, and diuerſe other, ſo that the moſt part of thoſe Frenchmen were either taken or ſlaine, and verie few eſcaped. The prince vnderſtood by the priſoners, that the French king was ſo farre aduanced forward in purſute of him, that he could not auoid the battell. Then he aſſembled his men togither, and commanded them to kéepe order, and ſo rode that day being ſaturdaie from morning till it was toward night, & then came within two leagues of Poictiers: and herewith ſending forth certeine capteins, to ſearch if they could heare where the king was, he incamped himſelfe that night in a ſtrong place amongſt hedges, vines, and buſhes. They that were ſent to diſcouer the countrie, rode ſo far, that they ſaw where the French king with his great battell was marching, and ſetting vpon the taile of the Frenchmen, cauſed all the hoſt to ſtir: whereof knowledge being giuen to the king, the which as then was entring into Poictiers, he returned againe, and made all his hoſt to doo the like, ſo that it was verie late yer he and his people were beſtowed in their lodgings that night. The Engliſh currours returning to the prince, declared what they had ſéene and doone. So, that night, the two armies being lodged within a ſmall diſtance either of other, kept ſtrong and ſure watch about their campes.

The ordering of the French battell.

On the morrow after being ſundaie, and the eightéenth daie of September, the French king cauſed his hoſt to be diuided into thrée battels or wards, and in each of them were ſixtéene thouſand armed men, all muſtered and paſſed for armed men. The firſt battell was gouerned by the duke of Orleance, wherein were ſix and thirtie banners, and twiſe as manie penons. The ſecond was led by the duke of Normandie and his brethren, the lord Lewes & the lord John. The third the French king himſelfe conducted. And while theſe battels were ſetting in arraie, the king cauſed the lord Euſtace de Ribaumount, and two other noble men to ride on before, to ſée the dealing of the Engliſhmen, and to aduiſe of what number they were. Thoſe that were thus ſent, rode forth and beheld the order of the Engliſhmen at good leiſure: and returning, infourmed the king, that as they could iudge, the enimies were about two thouſand men of armes, foure thouſand archers, and fiftéene hundred of others, and that they were lodged in ſuch a ſtrong place, and ſo well fenſed with ditches and hedges, that it would be hard aſſaulting them therein.

The cardinal of Piergort.

The prince of wales contented to come to a treatie.

The cardinall of Piergort the popes legat, as then lieng in the citie of Poictiers, came that morning to the king, and required him to abſteine from battell, till he might vnderſtand whether the prince would condeſcend vnto ſuch conditions of peace as he himſelfe ſhould thinke reaſonable, which if it might be brought to paſſe, the ſame ſhould be more honorable for him, than to aduenture ſo manie noble men as were there with him at that preſent in hazard of battell. The king was contented that the cardinall ſhould go to the prince, and ſée what he could doo with him. The cardinall rode to the prince, and talked with him till he was contented to come to a treatie. The cardinall returned to the French king, and required of him that a truce might be granted till the next daies ſun-riſing: which truce obteined, he ſpent that daie in riding to and fro betwixt them.

The offer of the prince of Wales.

The French kings preſumptuous demand.

The prince offered to render into the kings hands all that he had woone in that voiage, as well townes as caſtels, and alſo to releaſe all the priſoners, which he or any of his men had taken in that iournie: and further he was contented to haue béene ſworne not to beare armour againſt the French king within the terme of ſeuen yeares next following. But the French king would not agrée thereunto: the vttermoſt that he would agrée vnto, was this, that the prince and an hundred of his knights ſhould yéeld themſelues as priſoners vnto him, otherwiſe he would not haue the matter taken vp. But it was the French kings hap after (notwithſtanding his hautines) to be taken captiue, as Okland noteth, ſaieng,

——— ſeruilia ſub iuga miſſus
Diſceret vt domino regi parêre Britanno.

But the prince in no wiſe cold be brought to any ſuch vnreaſonable conditions, and ſo the cardinall could not make them fréends, although he trauelled earneſtlie betwixt them all that daie. When it drew towards night, he returned toward Poictiers.

The Engliſhmen fortifie their campe.

The cardinall trauelled in vaine.

The Engliſhmen were not idle, whileſt the cardinall was thus in hand to bring the parties to ſome good agréement, but caſt great ditches, and made hedges, and other fortifications about the place where their archers ſtood, and on the next morning, being mondaie, the prince and his people prepared themſelues to receiue battell, as they had doone before, hauing paſſed the day before and that night in great defect of neceſſarie things, for they could not ſtir abroad to fetch forrage or other prouiſions without danger to be ſurpriſed of their enimies. The cardinall came againe earlie in the morning vnto the French king, and found the French armie readie in order of battell by that time the ſunne was vp, and though he eftſoones fell in hand to exhort the king to an agréement, yet it would not be. So he went to the prince, and declared to him how he could doo no good in the matter, and therefore he muſt abide the hazard of battell for ought that he could ſée: wherewith the prince was content, and ſo the cardinall returned vnto Poictiers.

Tho. Walſ. A propheſie of a prelate.

¶ Here is to be remembred, that when (as Thomas Walſingham writeth) this cardinall of Piergort was ſent from the pope to trauell betwixt the parties for a peace to be had, and that the pope exhorted him verie earneſtlie to ſhew his vttermoſt diligence and indeuour therein: at his ſetting forth to go on that meſſage, the ſaid cardinall (as was ſaid) made this anſwer: Moſt bleſſed father (ſaid he) either we will perſuade them to peace and quietneſſe, either elſe ſhall the verie flintſtones crie out of it. But this he ſpake not of himſelfe, as it was ſuppoſed, but being a prelate in that time, he propheſied what ſhould follow; for when the Engliſh archers had beſtowed all their arrowes vpon their enimies, they tooke vp pebles from the place where they ſtood, being full of thoſe kind of ſtones, and approching to their enimies, they threw the ſame with ſuch violence on them, that lighting againſt their helmets, armor, and targets, they made a great ringing noiſe, ſo that the cardinals propheſie was fulfilled, that he would either perſuade a peace, or elſe the ſtones ſhould crie out thereof.

The exhortation of the prince.

The worthie prince like a couragious chiefteine, when he ſaw that he muſt néeds fight, required his people not to be abaſhed at the great number of their enimies, ſith the victorie did not conſiſt in the multitude of men, but where God would ſend it: and if it fortuned that the iournie might be theirs and his, they ſhould be the moſt honored people of the world: and if they ſhould die in that righteous quarrell, he had the king his father and alſo his brethren, in like caſe as they had fréends and kinſmen, that would ſéeke their reuenge. And therefore he deſired them that Noble men with the prince of wales.

There were with him of earles, Warwike, Suffolke, Saliſburie, Stafford; of lords, Cobham, Spenſer, Audeley, Berkley, Baſſet, Warren, de la Ware, Bradeſton, Burwaſch, Felton, Mallow, and diuerſe other: alſo ſir Iohn Chandois, by whome he was much counſelled, ſir Richard Stafford, ſir Richard of Penbruche, and manie other knights and valiant eſquires of England. Moreouer, there was of Gaſcoigne, the capitall of Buz or Beuf, the lords of Prumes, Burguenrie, Chaumount, de Leſpare, Roſen, Monferant, Landuras, the Souldich of Leſtrad or Leſcard, and other: and of Heinault, ſir Euſtace Daubreticourt, ſir Iohn de Guiſtelles, and other ſtrangers. All the princes companie paſſed not the number of eight thouſand men one and other, of the which (as Iacobus Meirc ſaith) thrée thouſand were archers: though Froiſſard (as I haue rehearſed before) reporteth the number of archers to be more, as in one place ſix thouſand, and in an other place foure thouſand.

The number of the French.

The French king hauing in his armie thrée ſcore thouſand fighting men, whereof there were more than thrée thouſand knights, made ſo ſure account of victorie, as anie man might of a thing not yet had, conſidering his great puiſſance, in regard to the ſmall number of his aduerſaries: and therefore immediatlie after that the cardinall was departed, he cauſed his battels to march forward, and approching to the place where the Engliſhmen ſtood readie to receiue their enimies, cauſed the onſet to be giuen. There were certeine French horſſemen, to the number of thrée hundred, with the Almains alſo on horſſebacke appointed to breake the arraie of the Engliſh archers, but the archers were ſo defended and compaſſed about with hedges and ditches, that the horſſemen of the French part could not enter to doo their feat, and being galled with the ſharpe ſhot of the Engliſh bowes, they were ouerthrowne horſſe and man, ſo that the vaward of the Frenchmen, wherein was the duke of Athens, with the marſhals of France, the lord Iohn de Clermont, and the lord Arnold Dandrehen or Odenhen, began to diſorder within a while, by reaſon of the ſhot of the archers, togither with the helpe of the men of armes, amongſt whom in the forefront was the lord Iames Audeley, to performe a vow which he had made, to be one of the firſt ſetters on.

The battell is begun.

The lord Iames Audeley.

There was the lord Arnold Dandrehen taken priſoner, and the lord Iohn de Clermont ſlaine, ſo that the noble proweſſe of the ſaid lord Iames Audeley, breaking through the Frenchmens battell with the ſlaughter of manie enimies, was that day moſt apparant. The loiall conſtancie of the noble earles of Warwike and Suffolke, that fought ſo ſtoutlie, ſo earneſtlie, and ſo fiercelie, was right manifeſt. And the prince himſelfe did not onelie fulfill the office of a noble chéefteine, but alſo of a right valiant and expert ſouldiour, attempting what ſoeuer any other hardie warriour would in ſuch caſes haue done. Neither was this battell quicklie diſpatched, nor eaſilie brought to end; but it was fought out with ſuch obſtinate earneſtneſſe, that thrée times that daie were the Engliſhmen driuen to renew the fight, through the multitude of enimies that increaſed and came ſtill vpon them.

Tho. Walſi. The earles of Warwike and Suffolke.

Finallie, the marſhals battell was quite diſcomfited: for the Frenchmen and Almains fell one vpon an other, and could not paſſe forth; and thoſe that were behind, & could not get forward, reculed backe: and while the marſhals battell being on horſſebacke thus aſſailed the Engliſh armie with great diſaduantage, and was in the end beaten backe, the two battels of the dukes of Normandie and Orleance came forward, and likewiſe aſſailed the Engliſhmen, but could not preuaile. The archers ſhot ſo fercelie, that to conclude, the Frenchmen behind, vnderſtanding the diſcomfiture of the marſhals battell, and how their fellowes before could not enter vpon their enimies, they opened and ran to their horſſes, in whome they did put more truſt for their ſafegard by galloping on them awaie, than in their manlike hands, for all their late brauerie and great boaſts. One thing ſore diſcouraged the Frenchmen, and that was this: beſide thoſe Engliſhmen that were within the cloſure of their campe, there were certeine men of armes on horſſebacke, with a number of archers alſo on horſſebacke, appointed to coaſt vnder the couert of a mounteine, adioining to the place, where they thought to ſtrike into a ſide of the duke of Normandies battell, ſo that with the terrour hereof, and with the continuall ſhot of the Engliſh archers, the Frenchmen not knowing where to turne themſelues, ſought to ſaue their liues by flight.

The Frenchmen ſéeke to ſaue themſelues by flight. Polydor.

The prince of Wales, perceiuing how his enimies (for the more part of them) were fléeing awaie as men diſcomfited, ſent out his horſſemen as well on the one hand as on the other, and he himſelfe with his whole power of footmen ruſhed forth, and manfullie aſſailed the maine battell of the Frenchmen, where the king himſelfe was, who like a valiant prince would not flée, but fought right manfullie: ſo that if the fourth part of his men had doone halfe their parts as he did his, the victorie by likelihood had reſted (as Froiſſard ſaith) on his ſide: but he was forſaken of his thrée ſonnes, and of his brother the duke of Orleance, which fled out of the battell with cleare hands. Finallie, after huge ſlaughter made of thoſe noblemen, and other which abode with him euen to the end, he was taken, and ſo likewiſe was his yongeſt ſonne Philip, and both put in great danger to haue béene murthered after they were taken, by the Engliſhmen and Gaſcoignes, ſtriuing who ſhould haue the king to his priſoner, where in déed a knight of Flanders or rather Artois, borne in ſaint Omers, called ſir Deniſe Morbecke, tooke him, but he was ſtraightwaies taken from the ſame ſir Deniſe by other that came in the meane ſeaſon, better prouided (béelike) of ſtrength, and lead him awaie vnreſiſted.

There were ſlaine in this battell, of noblemen, the dukes of Burbon and Athens, the marſhall Clermont, ſir Geffrey Charnie that bare the chéefe ſtandert of France, the biſhop of Chaalons, ſir Euſtace de Ribaumont, with diuerſe other to the number of eight hundred lords, knights, and gentlemen of name. In all there died on the French part ſix thouſand of one and other. The chaſe was continued euen to the gates of Poictiers, and manie ſlaine and beaten downe in the ſtréet before the gates, which the citizens had cloſed, for doubt leaſt the Engliſhmen ſhould enter with them that fled thither for ſafegard. There were taken beſide the king and his ſonne, the lord Iaques de Burbon earle of Ponthieu, brother to the duke of Burbon that was ſlaine there, the erle of Ew, the lord Charles his brother earle of Longuile, the archbiſhop of Sens, the earles of Vandoſme, Saleſbruch, Ventadore, Tankeruille, Eſtampes, and Dampmartine: alſo Archembald Dowglas a noble man of Scotland, ſonne to the honorable lord William Dowglas that was killed in Spaine, the marſhall Dandrehen or Odenhen (as Iacobus Meir ſaith) with others to the number of ſeuentéene hundred earles, lords, knights, and gentlemen, beſide thoſe of the meaner ſort; ſo that the Engliſhmen had twiſe as manie priſoners as they themſelues were in number: and therefore it was deuiſed amongſt them, to put the moſt part of their priſoners to ranſome there in the field, and ſo they did for doubt of further danger, the multitude being ſo great as it was.

The battell of Poictiers when it was.

The prince ſuppeth the priſoners.

Thus was the prince of Wales victor in that notable battell fought in the fields of Beauuoir and Malpertuſe, two leagues from Poictiers, the nineteenth day of September being monday, in the yeere a thouſand, three hundred, fiftie and ſix, which began in the morning and ended at noone. But bicauſe the Engliſhmen were ſcattered abroad in chaſe of their enimies, the princes banner was ſet vp in a buſh, to draw all his men togither. It was almoſt night yer they were all returned from the chaſe. The prince made a great ſupper in his lodging that night to the French king, and to the moſt part of his nobles that were taken priſoners, and did all the honour that he could deuiſe to the king. And where he perceiued by his cheere and countenance, that his heart was full of penſiue greefe, carefull thought and heauineſſe, he comforted him in the beſt maner that he might, and ſaid to him: as followeth.

The meeke and comfortable oration of the Engliſh prince to the French king being taken priſoner.

Moſt noble king, there is no cauſe wherefore your grace ſhould be penſiue, though God this day did not conſent to follow your will. For your noble prowes and dignitie roiall, with the ſupreme type of your kinglie maieſtie, remaineth whole and inuiolate, and what ſoeuer may rightlie be called yours; ſo that no violent force of time ſhall blot out or diminiſh the ſame. The almightie God hath determined that the chance of war ſhall reſt in his diſpoſition and will, as all other things. Your elders haue atchiued both by land & ſea manie noble enterpriſes. The whole compaſſe of Europe, all the eaſt parts of the world, all places and countries, both far & neere, are full of monuments, witneſſing the noble victories atteined by the French people.

The cauſe of godlie liuing and religion, the dignitie and preheminence of chriſtianitie hath beene defended and augmented by you, againſt the moſt mightie and puiſſant capteins of the infidels, enimies to the ſaid chriſtian religion. All ages ſhall make mention of your worthie praiſes, no nation there is but ſhall confeſſe it ſelfe bounden at one time or other for benefits receiued at your hands; nether is there any people but ſuch as hope to be hereafter bounden to you for reliefe and benefits, to proceed from you in time to come. One or two battels happilie haue chanced among ſo manie triumphs otherwiſe than you would haue wiſhed; chance would it ſhould be ſo, which may infeeble and make weake the power of horſſes, armor, and weapon: your inuincible courage and roiall magnanimitie lieth in your power to reteine: neither ſhall this day take any thing from you or yours. And this realme of France which hath procreat and brought forth and noriſhed ſo many of my noble progenitors, ſhall perceiue my good meaning towards hir, as not forgetfull of mine elders, and toward your maieſtie (if you will vouchſafe that I ſhould glorie of that name) a moſt humble kinſman. There are manie occaſions of loue and freendſhip betwixt you and my father, which I truſt ſhall take place, for I know all his thoughts and inward meanings: you ſhall agree and come to an atonement right eaſilie togither, & I praie God he neuer take me for his ſonne, except I haue you in the ſame degree of honor, reuerence, and faithfull loue, which I owe towards him.

The French king thanketh the prince.

The prince returneth to Burdeaux. Froiſſard.

The lord Audelie rewarded.

The king (as reaſon would) acknowledged this to proceed of great courteſie ſhewed toward him in the prince, and thanked him accordinglie. And the prince performing in deed that which he ſpake with word, ceaſſed from further vſing of fire, or other indamaging of the French dominions, and taking his waie through the countries of Poictou and Xaintonge, by eaſie iournies, he and his people came to Blaie, and ſo paſſed ouer the water to Burdeaux in good ſafetie with all their riches and priſoners. The prince gaue to the lord James Audelie (who had receiued in the battell manie ſore wounds) fiue hundred marks of yearelie reuenues aſſigned forth of his lands in England. The which gift the knight granted as freelie as he had receiued it vnto foure of his eſquiers, which in the battell had beene euer attendant about his perſon, without whoſe aid & valiant ſupport, he knew well that he had beene ſlaine ſundrie times in the ſame battell by his enimies, and therefore thought it a dutie of humanitie and gratitude to make them amends with ſome temporall recompenſe, that had ſaued his life, than the which nothing is more deere, nor of greater price in the world, as the poet ſaith, ———nihil eſt vita pretioſius ipſa.

When the prince heard that he had ſo doone, he meruelled what his meaning was therby, and cauſed him to be brought before his preſence, and demanded of him wherefore he had ſo lightlie giuen awaie that reward which he had beſtowed vpon him, and whether he thought that gift too meane for him or not. The lord Audelie ſo excuſed himſelfe in extolling the good ſeruice doone to him by his eſquiers, through whome he had ſo manie times eſcaped the dangers of death, that the prince did not onelie confirme the reſignation of the fiue hundred marks giuen to the eſquiers, but alſo rewarded the lord Audelie with ſix hundred marks more of like yearelie reuenues, in maner and forme as he had receiued the other.

The prince bringeth the French king ouer into England.

When the newes of this great victorie came into England of the ouerthrow of the Frenchmen, and taking of the French king, ye may be ſure there was great ioy ſhewed by outward tokens, as bonfiers made, feaſts and bankets kept, through the whole realme. Likewiſe the Gaſcoignes and Engliſhmen being come to Burdeaux, made great reuell and paſtime there, ſpending freelie that gold and ſiluer which they had woone in the battell of Poictiers, and elſewhere in that iournie. ¶ This yeare in Aprill the prince of Wales tooke ſhipping with his priſoners at Burdeaux, and on the fift of Maie arriued at Plimmouth. On the foure and twentith day of Maie he was with great honour ioifullie receiued of the citizens into the citie of London, and ſo conueied to the palace of Weſtminſter, where the king ſitting in Weſtminſter hall, receiued the French king, and after conueied him to a lodging appointed for him, where he laie a ſeaſon; but after he was remoued to the Sauoie, which was at that time a goodlie houſe, perteining to the duke of Lancaſter, though afterwards it was burnt and deſtroied by Wat Tiler, Iacke Straw, and their companie. In this place the French king laie, and kept houſe a long time after.

Iuſts holden in Smithfield

In the winter following were roiall iuſtes holden in Smithfield, at the which were preſent the kings of England, France, and Scotland, with manie great eſtates of all their thrée kingdoms, of the which the more part of the ſtrangers were as then priſoners. It was reported, that the French king could not ſo diſſemble nor cloake his inward thought, but that there appeared ſome tokens of gréefe in his countenance, whileſt he beheld theſe warlike paſtimes. And when the king of England, & his ſonne prince Edward with comfortable words required him after ſupper to put all penſiue cares out of his fantaſie, and to be merrie and ſing as other did, he ſhould make this anſwer with a ſmiling countenance, alluding to the complaint of the Iſraelits in time of their captiuitie vnder the gentiles, & ſaieng, Cardinals ſent into England.

About the ſame time there came ouer into England two cardinals, the one called Taliran being biſhop of Alba (commonlie named the cardinall of Pierregort) and the other named Nicholas intituled cardinall of S. Vitale or (as Froiſſard ſaith) of Dargell, they were ſent from pope Innocent the ſixt, to intreat for a peace betwixt the kings of England and France: but they could not bring their purpoſe to anie perfect concluſion, although they remained here for the ſpace of two yeares: but yet onelie by good means they procured a truce betwéene the ſaid kings, and all their aſſiſtants, to indure from the time of the publication thereof, vnto the feaſt of S. Iohn Baptiſt, which ſhould be in the yeare 1359: out of the which truce was excepted the L. Philip of Nauarre, and his alies, the counteſſe of Montfort, and the whole duchie of Britaine.

A truce for two yeares.

The French king remoued to windſor.

Anon after, the French king was remoued from the Sauoie vnto the caſtell of Windſor with all his houſhold, and then he went on hunting and hawking there about at his pleaſure, and the lord Philip his ſonne with him, all the reſidue of the priſoners abode ſtill at London, but were ſuffered to go vp and downe, and to come to the court when they would. In the ſame yeare the duke of Lancaſter beſieged the citie of Rennes in Britaine, in the title of the counteſſe of Richmond, & hir yong ſonne Iohn of Montfort, that claimed to be duke of Britaine. Thoſe that were within the citie, as the vicount of Rohan, and Berthram de Claiquin (who as then was a luſtie yong bacheler) and others defended themſelues manfullie for a time, but yet at length they were compelled to render the citie into their enimies hands.

About the ſame time two Franciſcane friers were burnt at London, for matters of religion. ¶ Moreouer quéene Iſabell, mother vnto king Edward the third, departed this life the ſeauen and twentith daie of Auguſt, and was buried the ſeauen and twentith daie of Nouember, in the church of the friers minors at London, not yet dedicated. ¶ Dauid king of Scotland, ſhortlie after the truce was concluded betwixt England and France, was ſet at libertie, paieng for his ranſome the ſumme of one hundred thouſand marks (as Fourdon ſaith) but whether he meaneth Scotiſh or ſterling monie, I cannot ſaie. He alſo was bound by couenant now vpon his deliuerance, to cauſe the caſtels in Nideſdale to be raiſed, which were knowne to be euill neighbors to the Engliſh borderers, as Dunfriſe, Dalſwinton, Morton, Dunſdere, and nine other.

Alſo he couenanted neuer to weare armour againſt king Edward, within his realme of England, nor to conſent that his ſubiects ſhould ſo doo: and further ſhould vpon his returne home, doo the beſt he could to cauſe the Scots to agrée that their countrie ſhould hold of him in fée, and that he and his ſucceſſours, kings of Scotland, ſhould doo homage to the king of England, and his ſucceſſors for the realme of Scotland.

Anno Reg. 32.

In this two and thirtith yeare, as witneſſeth the French chronicles, ſir Robert Knolles, Iames Pipe, and one Thomlin Foulke, with other capiteins and men of warre as ſouldiours to the king of Nauarre vpon the tenth day of March earlie in the morning ſcaled the walles of the citie of Auxerre, and behaued them ſo manfullie, that they were maiſters of the towne before the ſunne was vp. They got excéeding much by the ſpoile of that citie, and by ranſoming the priſoners which they tooke there. At length after they had remained eight daies in that citie, and taken their pleaſures of all things within it, they wrought ſo with the citizens, that to haue poſſeſſion of their citie againe, and to haue it ſaued from fire, they agréed to giue to ſir Robert Knolles, and to his companie, fiftie thouſand motons of gold, which amounted to the ſumme of twelue thouſand and fiue hundred pounds ſterling or there about; and yet was it agréed, that the Engliſhmen ſhould burne the gates, and throw downe the walles in diuers places. In Aprill next inſuing, the towne of Daubignie ſir le Metre was likewiſe wonne by the Engliſhmen; and the ſecond daie of Maie Chaſtelon ſir Loigne was taken by the ſaid ſir Robert Knolles, and put to ſacke as the other were. From thence they went to Newcaſtell vpon Loire. Thus did the Engliſhmen and other, in title of the K. of Nauarre, greatlie indamage the realme of France, dailie winning townes and caſtels, ranſoming the people, and waſting the countries in moſt miſerable wiſe, as in the hiſtorie of France you may read more at large.

Great diſcord roſe alſo about this time, or rather afore, betwixt the cleargie, and the foure orders of friers, as in the booke of acts & monuments ſet forth by maſter John Fox ye may read more at large. In this yeare John of Gant earle of Richmond, ſonne to the king, the ninetéenth day of Maie married the ladie Blanch daughter to Henrie duke of Lancaſter at Reading; and bicauſe they were couſins within the degrées of conſanguinitie, forbidden by the church lawes to marrie, a diſpenſation was procured of the pope to remoue that obſtacle and let. In this yeare the king ſet workemen in hand to take downe much old bildings belonging to the caſtell of Windſore, and cauſed diuerſe other faire and ſumptuous works to be erected and ſet vp, in and about the ſame caſtell, ſo that almoſt all the maſons and carpenters that were of any accompt within this land, were ſent for and imploied about the ſame works, the ouerſéer thereof was William Wickham the kings chaplein, by whoſe aduiſe the king tooke in hand to repare that place, the rather in déed bicauſe he was borne there, and therefore he tooke great pleaſure to beſtow coſt in beautifieng it with ſuch buildings, as may appeare euen vnto this daie. Moreouer, this yeare in the Rogation wéeke was ſolemne iuſts enterpriſed at London, for the maior and his foure and twentie brethren as challengers did appoint to anſwer all commers, in whoſe name and ſtéed the king with his foure ſonnes, Edward, Lionell, John, and Edmund, and ninetéene other great lords, in ſecret manner came and held the field with honor, to the great pleaſure of the citizens that beheld the ſame. ¶ Ye haue heard how the Frenchmen refuſed the peace, which was accorded betwirt K. Edward & their king, as then priſoner here in England. Wherupō K. Edward determined to make ſuch warre againſt the realme of France, that the Frenchmen with all their harts ſhould be glad to condeſcend and agrée to reaſon: and firſt he commanded all manner of Frenchmen (other than ſuch as were priſoners) to auoid out of England. He alſo appointed the French king to be remoued from the caſtell of Hertford, where he then remained, vnto the caſtell of Somerton in Lincolneſhire, vnder the gard and conduct of the lord William Deincourt, being allowed fourtie ſhillings the day for the wages of two and twentie men at armes, twentie archers, & two watchmen: as thus, for himſelfe and ſir John Kirketon baronets, either of them foure ſhillings the daie; for thrée knights, ſir William Colleuill (in place of the lord Robert Colleuill, that could not trauell himſelfe by reaſon of ſickneſſe) ſir John Deincourt, and ſir Saer de Rochfort, ech of them two ſhillings the daie; ſeuentéene eſquiers ech of them twelue pence the day, eight archers on horſſe backe euerie of them ſix pence the day, and twelue archers on foot thrée pence, and the two watchmen either of them ſix pence the day, which amounteth in the whole vnto nine and thirtie ſhillings the day; and the od twelue pence was allowed to the ſaid lord Deincourt to make vp the ſumme of 40 ſhillings. ¶ This haue I noted the rather, to giue a light to the reader to conſider how chargeable the reteining of men of war in theſe daies is, in reſpect of the former times. When the Engliſhmen ſaw they could win nothing there, they departed, and following the water of Some, came to a towne called Cherſie, where they paſſed the riuer, and there tarried Alhallowen daie, & the night following.

On the ſame daie the duke of Lancaſter was aduertiſed, that the king was arriued at Calis the ſeuentéenth daie of October, commanding him by letters to draw towards him with all his companie. The duke according to the kings commandement obeied, and ſo returned toward Calis. The king being there arriued with all his power, tooke counſell which way he ſhould take. Some aduiſed him firſt to inuade Flanders, and to reuenge the iniurious dealing of the earle and the Flemings: but he would not agrée to that motion, for he purpoſed fullie either by plaine force to make a conqueſt of France, or elſe vtterlie to deſtroie and waſt the countrie throughout with fier and ſword. Herevpon he ſet forwards the fourth of Nouember, and paſſing through the countries of Arthois, and Uermendois, he came before the citie of Reimes. There went ouer with him in this iournie, & with the duke of Lancaſter, his foure ſonnes, Edward prince of Wales, Lionell earle of Ulſter, John earle of Richmond, and the lord Edmund his yoongeſt ſonne. Alſo there was Henrie the ſaid duke of Lancaſter, with the earles of March, Warwike, Suffolke, Hereford (who alſo was earle of Northampton) Saliſburie, Stafford, and Oxford, the biſhops of Lincolne, and Durham, and the lords Percie, Neuill, Spenſer, Kirdiſton, Roſſe, Mannie, Cobham, Mowbray, de la Ware, Willoughbie, Felton, Baſſet, Fitz Water, Charleton, Audelie, Burwaſch, and others, beſide knights and eſquiers, as ſir John Chandois, ſir Stephan Goſſanton, ſir Nowell Loring, ſir Hugh Haſtings, ſir John Liſle, ſir Richard Pembruge, and others.

Reimes beſieged.

The ſiege was laid before Reimes about ſaint Andrewes tide, and continued more than ſeuen wéekes: but the citie was ſo well defended by the biſhop and the earle of Porcien, and other capiteins within it, that the Engliſhmen could not obteine their purpoſe, and ſo at length, when they could not haue forrage nor other neceſſarie things abroad in the countrie for to ſerue their turne, the king raiſed his field, and departed with his armie in good order of battell, taking the way through Champaigne, and ſo paſſed by Chaalons, and after to Merie on the riuer of

From Merie he departed and came vnto Tonnere, which towne about the beginning of the foure and thirtith yeare of his reigne was wonne by aſſault, but the caſtell could not be wonne, for there was within it the lord Fiennes conſtable of France, and a great number of other good men of war, which defended it valiantlie.

After the king had reſted there fiue daies, and that his men were well refreſhed with the wines and other ſuch things, which they found in that towne in good plentie, he remooued and drew towards Burgognie, comming to a towne called Guillon or Aguillon, where he lay from Aſhwedneſday vnto Midlent, hauing good prouiſion of all maner of vittels by the means of an eſquier of his called Iohn Alanſon, which had taken the towne of Flauignie not farre thence, wherein was great ſtore of bread and wine and other vittels: and ſtill the marſhals rode forth, and oftentimes refreſhed the hoſt with new prouiſion. The Engliſhmen had with them in their carriages, tents, pauillions, milles, ouens, and forges; alſo boates of leather cunninglie made and deuiſed, able to receiue thrée men a péece, and to paſſe them ouer waters and riuers. They had at the leaſt ſix thouſand carts with them, and for euerie cart foure horſſes which they had out of England.

A Compoſitiō made to ſpare the countrie of Burgognie.

In this meane while, the Frenchmen made certeine veſſels forth to the ſea, vnder the gouernance of the earle of S. Paule, the which vpon the fiftéenth daie of March landed earlie in the morning at Winchelſie, and before ſunne riſing entred the towne, and finding the inhabitants vnprouided to make anie great reſiſtance, fell to and ſacked the houſes, ſlue manie men, women and alſo children, and after ſet fier on the towne; and vpon knowledge had that the people of the countrie next adioining were aſſembled, and comming to the reſcue, he cauſed his men to draw to their ſhips, and ſo they taking their pillage and ſpoile with them, got them abord, not without ſome loſſe of their companie, which were ſlaine in the towne by ſuch as reſiſted their violence. Whileſt the king laie at Aguillon, there came to him Anſcaume de Salilans chancellor of Burgognie, Iaques de Vienne, and other lords of the countrie, being ſent from their duke, to agrée with the king for the ſparing of the lands and ſeigniories apperteining to the duchie of Burgognie.

Franks hath Paradine, in Les Annales de Burgognie. Froiſſard.
The king of England draweth towards Paris

The chancellor, and the other Burgognian lords found the king ſo agréeable to their requeſt, that a compoſition was made betwixt him and the countrie of Burgognie, ſo that he ſhould make to them an aſſurance for him, and all his people, not to ouerrun or indamage that countrie, during the ſpace of thrée yeares, and he to haue in readie monie the ſumme of two hundred thouſand florens of gold, which of ſterling monie amounted to the ſumme of fiue and thirtie thouſand pounds. When this agréement was ingroſſed vp in writing, and ſealed, the king diſlodged, and all his hoſt, taking the right waie to Paris, and paſſing the riuer of Yonne, entered into Gaſtinois, and at length by eaſie iournies, vpon a tueſdaie being the laſt of March in the wéeke before Eaſter, he came and lodged betwéene Mont le Herie, and Chartres, with his people in the countrie there abouts.

A treatie.

Here the duke of Normandie made meanes for a treatie of peace, which was laboured by a frier called Simon de Langres prouinciall of the friers Iacobins and the popes legat: he did ſo much, that a treatie was appointed to be holden on good fridaie in the Malederie of Longegimew, where appeared for the king of England the duke of Lancaſter, the erls of Warwike and Northampton, with ſir Iohn Chandois, ſir Walter de Mannie, and ſir William Cheinie knights: and for the French king thither came the earle of Eu conſtable of France, and the marſhall Bouciquaut, with other; but their treatie came to none effect: wherfore the king vpon the tueſdaie in the Eaſter wéeke remooued néerer vnto Paris, and vpon the fridaie following, being the tenth of Aprill, by procurement of the abbat of Clugnie newlie come from pope Innocent the ſixt, the foreſaid commiſſioners eftſoones did méet to treat of an agréement, but nothing they could conclude, the parties in their offers and demands were ſo farre at ods.

Vpon the ſundaie next following, a part of the kings hoſte came before the citie of Paris, and imbattelled themſelues in a field faſt by ſaint Marcilles, abiding there frō morning till thrée of the clocke in the after noone, to ſée if the Frenchmen would come forth to giue battell: but the French would not taſte of that veſſell. For the duke of Normandie (well conſidering what loſſe had inſued within few yeares paſt vnto the realme of France, by giuing battell to the Engliſhmen, and taught by late triall and féeling of ſmart to dread imminent danger, for would not ſuffer anie of his people to iſſue forth of the gates, but commanded them to be readie onelie to defend the walles and gates, although he had a great power of men of warre within the citie, beſide the huge multitude of the inhabitants. The Engliſhmen to prouoke their enimies the ſooner to ſaile forth, burnt diuerſe parts of the ſuburbs, and rode euen to the gates of the citie. When they perceiued that the Frenchmen would not come forth, about thrée of the clocke in the afternoone they departed out of the field and withdrew to their campe, and then the king and all the Engliſh hoſt remooued towards Chartres, and was lodged at a place called Dones. Thither came to him the biſhop of Beauuois then chancellor of Normandie, with other, and ſo handled the matter with him, that a new daie of treatie was appointed to be holden at Bretignie, which is little more than a mile diſtant from Chartres, vpon the firſt day of Maie next inſuing.

A new treatie
The duke of Lancaſter perſuadeth the king to agrée.

In which daie and place appointed, the foreſaid duke of Lancaſter, and the ſaid earles and other commiſſioners met with the ſaid biſhop, and other French lords and ſpirituall men to him aſſociate, on the behalfe of the duke of Normandie then regent of France, to renew the former communication of peace, in full hope to bring it to a good concluſion; bicauſe king Edward began to frame his imagination more to accord with his aduerſaries, than he had doone of late, chéefelie for that the duke of Lancaſter with courteons words and ſage perſuaſions, aduiſed him not to forſake ſuch reaſonable conditions as the Frenchmen were contented now to agrée vnto, ſith that by making ſuch manner of warre as he had attempted, his ſouldiers onelie gained, and he himſelfe loſt but time, and conſumed his treaſure: and further he might warre in this ſort all the daies of his life, before he could atteſne to his intent, and looſe perhaps in one daie more than he had gained in twentie yeares.

An hideous ſtorme & tempeſt of wether

Such words ſpoken for the wealth of the king and his ſubiects, conuerted the kings mind to fanſie peace, namelie by the grace of the Holie-ghoſt chéefe worker in this caſe. For it chanced on a daie, as he was marching not farre from Chartres, there came ſuch a ſtorme and tempeſt of thunder, lightening, haile and raine, as the like had neuer béene ſéene by anie of the Engliſh people. This ſtorme fell ſo hideous in the kings hoſt, that it ſéemed the world ſhould haue ended: for ſuch vnreaſonable great ſtones of haile fell from the ſkie, that men and horſſes were ſlaine therewith, ſo that the moſt hardie were abaſhed. There periſhed thouſands thereby, as ſome haue written. Then the king remembring what reaſonable offers of agreement he had refuſed, vpon remorſe of conſcience (as by ſome writers ſhould appeare) aſked forgiueneſſe of the damage doone by ſword and fire in thoſe parts, and fullie determined to grant vnto indifferent articles of peace, for releaſe of the chriſtian inhabitants of that land: and ſo ſhortlie after, by the good diligence of the commiſſioners on both parts, an vnitie and finall peace was accorded, the conditions whereof were compriſed in fortie and one articles, the chiefe whereof in effect were theſe.

A peace concluded.

The articles.

Fabian. Froiſſard.

1 Firſt that the king of England ſhould haue and enioy (ouer and beſide that which he held alreadie in Gaſcoigne and Guien) the caſtell, citie, and countie of Poictiers, and all the lands and countrie of Poictou, with the fee of Touars, and the lands of Belleuille; the citie and caſtell of Xaintes, and all the lands and countrie of Xaonctonge on both ſides the riuer of Charent, with the towne and fortreſſe of Rochell, with their appurtenances; the citie and caſtell of Agent, and the countrie of Agenois; the citie and caſtell of Piergort, and all the land and countrie of Periguenr; the citie and caſtell of Limoges, and all the lands and countrie of Limoſin; the citie and caſtell of Cahors, and the lordſhip of Cahorſin; the caſtell and countrie of Tarbe; the lands countrie and countie of Bigorre; the countie, countrie, and lands of Gaure; the citie and caſtell of Angoleſme; and the countie, land, and countrie of Angoleſmois; the citie, towne and caſtell of Rodair; and all the countie, and countrie of Rouergne; and if there were in the duchie of Guien any lords, as the earles of Foiz, Arminacke, Liſle, and Perigueux, the vicounts of Carmain, and Limoges, or other holding any lands within the foreſaid bounds, it was accorded that they ſhould doo homage and other cuſtomarie ſeruices due for the ſame vnto the king of England.

Homages and ſeruices.

2 It was alſo agreed, that Calis and Guines, with the appurtenances, the lands of Montreuill on the ſea with the countie of Ponthieu, wholie and entirelie ſhould remaine vnto the king of England. All the which countries, cities, townes, and caſtels, with the other lands and ſeigniories, the ſame king ſhould haue and hold to him and his heires for euer, euen as they were in demaine or fee, immediatlie of God, and free without recognizing any maner ſouereingtie to any earthlie man. In conſideration whereof, king Edward renounced all ſuch claimes, titles and intereſt as he pretended vnto any part of France, other than ſuch as were compriſed within the charter of couenants of this peace firſt agreed vpon at Bretignie aforeſaid, and after confirmed at Calis, as appeareth by the ſame charter dated there the foure & twentith daie of October, in the yeare of our Lord 1360.

The date of the charter of the peace.

The French kings ranſome.

3 It was alſo couenanted, that the French king ſhould paie vnto the king of England thirtie hundred thouſand crownes in name of his ranſome: for aſſurance of which paiment, & performance of all the couenants afore mentioned, and other agreed vpon by this peace, the dukes of Orleance, Aniou, Berrie, and Burbon, with diuerſe other honorable perſonages, as earles, lords, and burgeſſes of euerie good towne, ſome were appointed to be ſent ouer hither into England to remaine as hoſtages.

Hoſtages.

The French not to aid the Scots.

4 It was further agreed, that neither the French king nor his ſucceſſors ſhould aid the Scots againſt the king of England or his ſucceſſors; nor that king Edward nor his heirs kings of England ſhould aid the Flemings againſt the crowne of France.

Britaine.

5 And as for the title or right of the duchie of Britaine, which was in queſtion betweene the earles of Blois and Mountfort, it was accorded, that both kings being at Calis, the parties ſhould be called before them, and if the two kings could not make them freends, then ſhould they aſſigne certeine indifferent perſons to agree them, and they to haue halfe a yeeres reſpit to end the matter: and if within that terme thoſe that ſhould be ſo appointed to agree them, could not take vp the matter betwixt the ſaid earles, then either of them might make the beſt purchaſe for himſelfe that he could, by helpe of freends, or otherwiſe: but alwaies prouided, that neither of the kings nor their ſonnes ſhould ſo aid the ſaid earles, whereby the peace accorded betwixt England and France, might by any meanes be broken or infringed. Alſo, to whether of the ſaid earles the duchie of Britaine in the end chanced to fall by ſentence of iudges, or otherwiſe, the homage ſhould be doone for the ſame vnto the French king.

All theſe ordinances, articles and agreements, with manie mo (which here would be too long to rehearſe) were accorded and ratified by the inſtruments and ſeales of the prince of Wales on the one part, and of the duke of Normandie regent of France on the other part, as by their letters patents then ſealed further appeared, bearing date, the one at Loures in Normandie the ſixteenth daie of Maie in the yeare of Grace 1360, and the other at Paris the tenth day of the ſame moneth, and in the yeare aforeſaid. Ouer & beſide this, both the ſaid princes tooke on them a ſolemne oth, to ſee all the ſame articles and couenants of agreement throughlie kept, mainteined and performed. This doone, king Edward imbarked himſelfe with his foure ſonnes and the moſt part of his nobles at Hunfleu the twentith daie of Maie, and ſo ſailed into England, leauing behind him the earle of Warwike to haue the gouernement of all the men of warre which he left behind him, either in Guien or in any other place on that ſide the ſea.

Tho. Walſin. The French king goeth ouer to Calis.

There died in this iournie diuerſe noble men of this land, as the earles of March and Oxford, the lord Iohn Graie then ſteward of England, and the lord Geffrie de Saie, with diuerſe other. The eight of Iulie next inſuing, the French king hauing licence to depart, landed at Calis, and was lodged in the caſtell there abiding till the king of England came thither, which was not till the ninth day of October next after. On the foure and twentith daie of October, both the kings being in two trauerſes and one chappell at Calis, a maſſe was ſaid before them, and when they ſhould haue kiſſed the pax, either of them in ſigne of greater freendſhip kiſſed the other, & there they were ſolemnelie ſworne to mainteine the articles of the ſame peace; and for more aſſurance thereof, manie lords of both parts were likewiſe ſworne to mainteine the ſame articles to the vttermoſt of their powers. Whileſt theſe kings laie thus at Calis, there was great banketting and cheere made betwixt them.

The kings receiue a ſolemne oth to ſee the peace performed.

The duke of Normandie.

Alſo the duke of Normandie came from Bullongne to Calis, to viſit his father, and to ſee the king of England, in which meane time two of king Edwards ſonnes were at Bullongne. Finallie, when theſe two kings had finiſhed all matters in ſo good order and forme that the ſame could not be amended nor corrected, and that the French king had deliuered his hoſtages to the king of England, that is to ſaie, ſix dukes, beſide earles, lords, and other honorable perſonages, in all to the number of eight and thirtie: on the morrow after the taking of their oths, that is to ſaie on the fiue and twentith daie of October, being ſundaie, the French king was freelie deliuered, and the ſame daie before noone he departed from Calis, and rode to Bullongne. The king of England brought him a mile foreward on his waie, and then tooke leaue of him in moſt louing maner. The prince atten-attended him to Bullongne, where both he and the duke of Normandie with other were eftſoons ſworne to hold and mainteine the foreſaid peace without all fraud or colourable deceit: and this doone, the prince returned to Calis. Thus was the French king ſet at libertie, after he had béene priſoner here in England the ſpace of foure yeares, and as much as from the ninetéenth daie of September, vnto the fiue and twentith of October. When the king of England had finiſhed his buſineſſe at Calis, according to his mind, he returned into England, and came to London the ninth daie of Nouember.

The French king ſet at libertie.

¶Thus haue yée hard the originall begining, the proceſſe, and iſſue of ſundrie conflicts and battels, and ſpeciallie of two, one of Iohn the French king vnluckilie attempted againſt England; the other of Dauid the Scotiſh king as vnfortunatlie ended. For both kings were ſubdued in fight, vanquiſhed, and taken priſoners; with a great number of their noblemen, whereas they were in hope to haue gone awaie with the conqueſt, and to haue had renowme for their reward. Of which ouerthrow giuen to both theſe kings, with the clemencie of king Edward (in whoſe hands though their liues laie to be diſpoſed as he liſt, yet he was ſo far from violating the ſame, that he ſhewed himſelfe a woonderfull fauourer of their eſtates, and in fine not onelie put them to their reaſonable ranſoms, but reſtored them to their roialties, from the which their ſiniſter lot had depoſed them) Chriſtopher Okland hath left this remembred:

Strange woonders.

In this foure and thirtith yeare of king Edward, men and cattell were deſtroied in diuerſe places of this realme, by lightening and tempeſt; alſo houſes were ſet on fier and burnt, and manie ſtrange and woonderfull ſights ſéene. ¶The ſame yeare Edward prince of Wales married the counteſſe of Kent, which before was wife vnto the lord Thomas Holland: and before that, ſhe was alſo wife vnto the erle of Saliſburie, and diuorſed from him, and wedded to the ſame lord Holland. She was daughter vnto Edmund earle of Kent, brother to king Edward the ſecond, that was beheaded in the beginning of this kings reigne, as before yée haue heard. And bicauſe the prince and ſhée were within degrées of conſanguinitie forbidden to marrie, a diſpenſation was gotten from the pope to remooue that let. In this yeare alſo was a great death of people (namelie of men, for women were not ſo much ſubiect thereto.) This was called the ſecond mortalitie, bicauſe it was the ſecond that fell in this kings daies.

Moreouer, this yeare appeared two caſtels in the aire, of the which the one appeared in the ſoutheaſt, and the other in the ſouthweſt, out of which caſtels about the houre of noone ſundrie times were ſéene hoſts of armed men (as appeared to mans ſight) iſſuing forth, and that hoſt which ſailed out of the caſtell in the ſoutheaſt ſéemed white, and the other blacke. About the ſame time, the ſouldiors, which were diſcharged in France and out of wages, by the breaking vp of the warres, aſſembled togither, and did much hurt in that realme, as in the French hiſtories yée may read. Their chéefe leaders were Engliſhmen and Gaſcoignes ſubiects to the king of England. The king aſſembled the ſtates of his realme in parlement at Weſtminſter in the feaſt of the Conuerſion of S. Paule, and there was declared vnto them the tenor and whole effect of the peace concluded betwixt England and France, wherewith they were greatlie pleaſed, and herevpon the nobles of the realme, and ſuch Frenchmen as were hoſtages, came togither at Weſtminſter church on the firſt ſundaie of Lent next following: and there ſuch as were not alreadie ſworne, receiued the oth for performance of the ſame peace, in a right ſolemne manner, hauing the tenour of their oths written in certeine ſcrols; and after they had taken their oths vpon the ſacrament and maſſe booke, they deliuered the ſame ſcrols vnto certeine notaries appointed to receiue and regiſter the ſame.

After diner, he tooke his horſſe and rode toward London, and vpon Blacke heath, the citizens of London clad in one kind of liuerie, and verie well horſſed, met him, and conueied him from thence through to London, to the Sauoy, where his lodging was prepared. The battell of Aulroy.

Froiſſard.

This yeare, by reaſon of an extreme ſore froſt, continuing from the ſeuen and twentith day of September laſt paſſed, vnto the beginning of Aprill, in this eight and thirtith yeare (or rather from the ſeuenth day of December till the nineteenth day of March, as Walſingham and other old writers doo report) the ground laie vntild, to the great hinderance and loſſe of all growing things on the earth. This yeare on Michaelmaſſe day, before the caſtell of Aulroy, not far diſtant from the citie of Vannes in Britaine, a ſore battell was fought betwixt the lord Charles de Blois, and the lord Iohn of Mountford. For when there could be no end made betwixt theſe two lords, touching their title vnto the duchie of Britaine, they renewed the wars verie hotlie in that countrie, and procured all the aid they might from each ſide. The king of France ſent to the aid of his couſine Charls de Blois a thouſand ſpeares; and the earle of Mountford ſent into Gaſcoigne, requiring ſir Iohn Chandois, and other Engliſhmen there to come to his ſuccour. Sir Iohn Chandois gladlie conſented to this requeſt, and therevpon got licence of the prince, and came into Britaine, where he found the earle of Mountford at the ſiege of the foreſaid caſtell of Aulroy. In the meane time, the lord Charles de Blois, being prouided of men, and all things neceſſarie to giue battell, came and lodged faſt by his enimies.

Thrée thouſand and ſix hundred fighting men, as Walſing. ſaith.

The earle of Mountford aduertiſed of his approch, by the aduiſe of ſir Iohn Chandois and other of his capteins, had choſen out a plot of ground to lodge in, and meant there to abide their enimies. With the lord Charles of Blois was that valiant knight ſir Berthram de Cleaquin or Gueſclin (as ſome write him) by whoſe aduiſe there were ordeined thrée battels, and a reregard, and in each battell were appointed a thouſand of good fighting men. On the other part, the earle of Mountford diuided his men likewiſe into thrée battels and a reregard. The firſt was led by ſir Robert Knols, ſir Walter Hewet, and ſir Richard Bruſle or Burlie. The ſecond by ſir Oliuer de Cliſſon, ſir Euſtace Daubreticourt, and ſir Mathew Gournie. The third the earle of Mountford himſelfe guided, and with him was ſir Iohn Chandois aſſociat, by whom he was much ruled: for the king of England, whoſe daughter the earle of Mountford ſhould marie, had written to ſir Iohn Chandois, that he ſhould take good héed to the buſineſſe of the ſaid earle, and order the ſame as ſagelie as he might deuiſe or imagine.

The worthie actiuitie of the Engliſh archers.

In ech of theſe thrée armies were fiue hundred armed men, and foure hundred archers. In the reregard were appointed fiue hundred men of warre, vnder the gouernance of ſir Hugh Caluerlie. Beſide ſir Iohn Chandois, & other Engliſhmen recited by Froiſſard, there was the lord William Latimer, as one of the chiefe on the earle of Mountfords ſide. There were not paſt ſixtéene hundred good fighting men on that ſide, as Thomas Walſingham plainelie writeth. Now when the hoſts were ordred on both ſides (as before we haue ſaid) they approched togither, the Frenchmen came cloſe in their order of battell, and were to the number of fiue and twentie hundred men of armes, after the manner of that age, beſide others. Euerie man had cut his ſpeare (as then they vſed, at what time they ſhould ioine in battell) to the length of fiue foot, and a ſhort ax hanging at his ſide. At the firſt incounter, there was a ſore battell, and trulie the archers ſhot right fiercelie, howbeit their ſhot did litle hurt to the Frenchmen, they were ſo well armed and furniſhed: the archers perceiuing that (being big men and light) caſt awaie their bowes, and entered in amongſt the Frenchmen that bare the axes, and plucked them out of their hands, wherwith they fought after right hardlie. There was doone manie a noble feat of armes, manie taken, and reſcued againe.

Againſt the earle of Montfords battell, fought the battell which the lord Charles de Blois ruled, and at the firſt, the earle of Montfords part was ſore oppreſſed, and brought out of order in ſuch ſort, that if ſir Hugh Caluerlie had not in time releeued them, the loſſe had runne on that ſide, but finallie ſo long they fought, that all the battels aſſembled and ioined each to other, except the reregard of the Engliſhmen, whereof (as is ſaid) ſir Hugh Caluerlie was cheefe. He kept alwaies his battell on a wing, and euer ſuccoured where he ſaw need. At length, the Frenchmen not able to indure the valiant doings of their aduerſaries, began to breake. Firſt the earle of Auxerres batell was diſcomfited, and put to flight, and the ſaid earle ſore wounded, and taken priſoner, but the battell of ſir Berthram de Cleaquin as yet ſtood manfullie at defenſe, howbeit at length the Engliſhmen perforce opened it, and then was the ſaid ſir Berthram taken priſoner, vnder the banner of ſir Iohn Chandois.

Heerewith alſo, all the other battels of the Frenchmen and Britaines, on the part of the lord Charles de Blois, were cleane diſcomfited, and put out of araie, ſo that ſuch as reſiſted, and ſtood at defenſe, were ſlaine and beaten downe, and amongſt others, the lord Charles was there ſlaine himſelfe, and all other either taken or ſlaine, except thoſe that eſcaped by flight, amongſt the which there were not manie of the nobilitie. For (as Thomas Walſingham ſaith) there were ſlaine about a thouſand men of armes, and there were taken two earles, ſeuen and twentie lords, and fifteene hundred men of armes. The chaſe was followed to the citie of Reimes, eight great leagues from the place where the battell began. After this victorie, the earle of Montford conquered manie townes and caſtels in Britaine, whereof the French king being aduertiſed, ſent his brother the duke of Anion, vnto the wife of the lord Charles of Blois now deceaſſed, to comfort hir in ſuch an heauie caſe, and to take order for things as ſhould be thought expedient, vntill further prouiſion might be made.

Shortlie after, there were ſent vnto the earle of Montford, the archbiſhop of Reimes, the marſhall Bouciquault, and the lord of Cran, as commiſſioners, to commune with him of a finall agreement. Wherevpon, after he had ſignified the matter vnto the king of England, and vnderſtood his pleaſure therein, this treatie was ſo handled, that peace thereof followed, and the parties were agreed in the moneth of Aprill next inſuing. ¶ This yeare (as ſome haue written) king Edward finiſhed his warres vpon S. Stephans daie, and began the foundation of S. Stephans chappell at Weſtminſter in memorie thereof, which chappell was afterwards finiſhed by king Richard the ſecond that ſucceeded him. ¶ In the nine and thirtith yeere of king Edwards reigne, and in the moneth of Februarie, in the citie of Angoleſme, was borne the firſt ſonne of prince Edward, and was named after his father, but he departed this life the ſeuenth yeare of his age.

Alſo this yeare, the ſeuen and twentith of Iulie, Ingeram de Guines lord de Coucie a Frenchman, married the ladie Iſabell daughter to K. Edward. The ſolemnization of the marriage feaſt was kept at Windſor in moſt roiall and triumphant wiſe. The ſaid lord Coucie was created earle of Bedford, with an yeerelie annuitie of thirtie markes, going foorth of the iſſues and profits of that countie, ouer and beſide a thouſand marks by yeare, aſſigned to him and his ſaid wife, and to the heires male of their bodies begotten, to be paid forth of the excheker. About this time, there was a treatie alſo for marriage to be had, betwixt the lord Edmund earle of Cambridge, and the ladie Margaret, daughter and heire to the earle of Flanders, which treatie went ſo far, that the earle came ouer to Douer, where the king was readie to receiue him, and there the earle promiſed by words of affiance, to giue his ſaid daughter vnto the ſaid lord Edmund in marriage: and after that the earle had beene at Douer, the ſpace of three daies, paſſing the time in great ſolace and banketting, when he had finiſhed his buſineſſe, he returned backe againe into his countrie.

Whileſt the king was thus at Douer with the earle of Flanders, the lord Latimer came from the lord Iohn de Montford, to vnderſtand his pleaſure, touching the offers that were made for peace, vpon whoſe returne with anſwer, the peace was concluded as before yee haue heard. This yeare was Peter king of Caſtile chaſed out of his realme, by his baſtard brother Henrie, which was aided in that enterpriſe by ſir Berthram de Cleaquin latelie deliuered, and other Frenchmen; ſo that the ſaid Henrie was crowned at Burgus, vpon Eaſter daie: wherefore the ſaid Peter was conſtreined to flee, and ſo came to Burdeaux to ſue for aid at the hands of the prince of Wales. This yeare by the kings commandement, a reſtraint was ordeined, that Peter pence ſhould not be from thenceforth anie more gathered within this realme, nor anie ſuch paiment made at Rome, which had beene vſed to be paid there, euer ſince the daies of Ine, king of Weſtſaxons, which ordeined this paiment toward the maintenance of a ſchoole for Engliſh ſcholers. But howſoeuer this paiment was abrogated at this time by king Edward, it was after renewed againe, and the monie gathered in certeine ſhires of this realme, till the daies of king Henrie the eight, ſo greatlie preuailed the vſurped power of that beaſt of Rome, which had poiſoned the princes of the world with the dregs of his abhomination, whoſe glorie ſhall end in ſhame, his honor turne to horror, and his ambitious climing vp aloft aboue all principalitie (to be compeere with God) ſhall haue an irrecouerable ruine; as long agone, and of late likewiſe hath beene and now is propheſied of him, that he may readilie read his owne downefall into hell:

In rapidas acherontis aquas, qui gloria mundi
Papa fuit, lapſu corruet ille graui:
Corruet vt rapidum deſcendit ab æthere fulmen,
Corruet in ſtygios tempus in omne lacus.

In this yeare fell great abundance of raine in the time of haie harueſt, ſo that much corne and haie was loſt. ¶ There was alſo ſuch fighting amongſt ſparrowes in that ſeaſon, that they were found dead on the ground in great numbers. Alſo, there followed great mortalitie of people, the ſickneſſe being ſo ſharpe and vehement, that manie being in perfect health ouer night when they went to bed, were found dead in the morning. Alſo, manie died of the ſmall pocks, both men, women, and children. ¶ Moreouer this yeare, Simon Iſlep archbiſhop of Canturburie departed this life, and Simon Langham biſhop of Elie ſucceeded in his place. This yeare at Burdeaux, was borne the ſecond ſonne of prince Edward named Richard, on the third daie of Aprill; his godfather at the fontſtone was Iames K. of Maiorke. ¶ Peter the king of Spaine, who (as yee haue heard) was expelled out of his realme by his baſtard brother, made ſuch earneſt ſute to the prince of Wales for aid to be reſtored home, that finallie the prince aduertiſing his father king Edward of the whole matter, by aduiſe from him, determined to bring home the ſaid king Peter, and to reſtore him againe to his kingdome, by force of armes, in deſpite of all his aduerſaries.

The prince indeed was verie deſirous to take this enterpriſe vpon him, both of a certeine pitifull affection tion to relieue the miſerable ſtate of king Peter, and alſo of an ardent deſire which he had to purchaſe a glorious fame thorough martiall déeds, and noble acts of chiualrie. Therfore hauing this occaſion to imploie his time in ſuch exerciſes, and now commanded thereto of his father, he was excéedinglie glad in his mind, and with all ſpéed that might be, made his prouiſion both of a ſufficient armie of men of warre, and alſo of all other things neceſſarie for the furniture of ſuch an enterpriſe: but firſt, he tooke good aſſurance of king Peter, for the paiment of the ſoldiers wages: ſo the king left at Baionne thrée of his daughters, Beatrice, Conſtance, and Iſabell as pledges, for performance of all the couenants agréed betwixt him and the prince.

Anno Reg. 41.

The prince ſetteth forward towards Spaine.

He entreth into Nauarre.

Thus when the prince, by the aduiſe and counſell of ſir Iohn Chandois, and ſir Robert Knols (by whome he was much ruled) had taken direction in his buſineſſe, for that his iournie into Spaine, in each condition as was thought behoouefull, he with the king of Spaine in his companie, paſſed foorth with a puiſſant armie, and came to the ſtreicts of Ronceualle, at the entrie into Nauarre, and obteining ſo much fréendſhip of the king of Nauarre, as to haue the paſſages of his countrie opened, they entered into his realme through the ſame, as fréends, without finding anie reſiſtance. In this meane time, Henrie king of Spaine, hauing knowledge that the prince of Wales was thus comming againſt him, to reſtore his brother king Peter to his former degrée, by aduiſe of ſir Berthram de Cleaquin, got a great number of ſoldiers out of France, by whoſe aid he might the better defend himſelfe againſt his enimies.

Sir Martin de Care.

Saint Muchaule.

Now it chanced, that whileſt the prince of Wales was paſſing thorough Nauarre, toward the entrie of Spaine, certeine of thoſe Frenchmen, vnder the leading of ſir Oliuer Mannie, tooke the king of Nauarre priſoner, as he was riding from one towne to an other. Manie maruelled at that chance, and ſome there were that thought he ſuffered himſelfe to be taken for a cautele, bicauſe he would not aid the prince of Wales anie further, nor conduct him through his realme, as he had promiſed to doo. But the prince nothing diſmaid herewith, paſſed forward, by the guiding of a knight of Nauarre, called ſir Martin de Care, and finallie came to the confines of Spaine, and lodged at Victoria, not far from his enimies. For king Henrie of Spaine, vnderſtanding which waie the prince drew, came forward to incounter him, and pight downe his field, not far from the borders of his realme, at a place called ſaint Muchaule: and thus were both the hoſts lodged within a ſmall diſtance the one againſt the other.

The king of Spaine ſendeth to the prince.

Victoria.
Viana.

Polydor.

King Henrie had ſent to the prince an herauld of armes with a letter, requiring to know of him for what cauſe he moued warre againſt him, ſith he had neuer offended him. The prince taking deliberation for anſwer of this letter, kept the meſſenger with him, and perceiuing that king Henrie came not forward, but laie ſtill at ſaint Muchaule, ſtronglie incamped, he remoued from Victoria, and came to a towne called Viana, where he ſtaied two daies to refreſh his people, and after went forward, and paſſed the riuer which diuideth the realmes of Caſtile and Nauarre, at the bridge of Groigne. King Henrie aduertiſed hereof, departed from ſaint Muchaule, and came before the towne of Nauarret, ſituat on the ſame riuer. Not manie daies before the prince paſſed the riuer at Groigne, king Henrie had ſent foorth two of his brethren, the earle Dom Teille, and the lord Sanches, with ſix hundred horſſemen, to view the princes hoſt.

Sir William Felton ſlaine. Froiſſard.

They chanced to incounter two hundred Engliſh horſſemen, whom after long and ſharpe fight they diſtreſſed, & ſlue ſir William Felton, one of the chiefe leaders of thoſe Engliſhmen, and tooke ſir Thomas Felton his brother, ſir Hugh Haſtings, and diuerſe other, both knights and eſquiers. Whether that king Henrie was greatlie incouraged by this good lucke in the beginning, or that he truſted through the great multitude of his people, which he had there with him, to haue the vpper hand of his enimies, true it is, that he coueted ſore to giue them battell; and although he might haue wearied the prince, and conſtreined him for want of vittels to haue returned, or to haue fought with him at ſome great aduantage, if he had deferred the battell, as the marſhall of France Dandrehen gaue counſell, yet he would néeds fight in all the haſt, and therefore did thus approch his enimies.

The prince perceiuing that his aduerſarie came forward to incounter him, diſpatched the herauld with an anſwer to the letter which he had of him receiued, conteining in effect, that for great conſiderations, he had taken vpon him to aid the rightfull K. of Spaine, chaſed out of his realm by violent wrong, and that if it might be, he would gladlie make an agréement betwixt them; conditionallie, that king Henrie of neceſſitie muſt then forſake the adminiſtration, and all the title of the kingdome of Spaine, which by no rightfull meane he could inioy, and therefore if he refuſed thus to doo, he was for his part reſolued how to procéed. The herauld departed with this anſwer, and came therewith vnto king Henrie, and deliuered it vnto him, as then lodged with his puiſſant armie at Nauarre, ſo that then both parties prepared themſelues to battell.

The number of the princes armie.

The chiefteins of the ſame armie.

The prince hauing with him thirtie thouſand men of Engliſhmen, Gaſcoignes, and other ſtrangers, ordeined thrée battels, of the which, the firſt was led by the duke of Lancaſter, and with him was ſir Iohn Chandois conſtable of Guien, ſir William Beauchampe ſon to the earle of Warwike, the lord Dalbret, ſir Richard Dangle, and ſir Stephan Couſenton, marſhals of Guien, & diuerſe other. The middle ward was gouerned by the prince, and with him was the foreſaid Peter king of Spaine, and diuerſe other lords and knights of England, Poictou, and other countries, as the vicounts of Chatelareault and Rochcort, the lords of Partnie, Pinan, Taneboton, and others, ſir Richard Pontchardon, ſir Thomas Spenſer, ſir Iohn Orendon, and a great ſort more, whoſe names it would be too long to rehearſe. The rereward was vnder the gouernance of the king of Malorques, & with him were aſſociat the earls of Arminacke, Dalbreth, Piergort, Gominges, the captoll of Bueſz, ſir Robert Knols, and manie other valiant lords, knights, and eſquiers.

The order of the Spaniards.

On the ſecond day of Aprill, the prince with his battell thus ordered, remoued from Groigne, and marching that day two leagues forward, came before Nauarret, and there tooke his lodging, within a ſmall diſtance from his enimies, ſo that both parties prepared to giue battell the next day in the morning, commanding that euerie man at the ſounding of the firſt trumpet, ſhould apparell themſelues, that they might be readie vpon the next ſound to be ſet in order of battell, and to go againſt their enimies. The Spaniards verie earlie in the morning drew into the field, and ordeined thrée battels in this wiſe. The firſt was led by ſir Berthram de Cleaquin, wherein were all the Frenchmen and other ſtrangers, to the number of foure thouſand knights and eſquiers, well armed and appointed, after the maner of France. In the ſecond battell was the earle Dom Tielle, with his brother the lord Sanches, hauing with them fiftéene thouſand men on foot, and on horſſebacke. The third battell and the greateſt of all was gouerned by king Henrie

The number of ÿ Spaniſh armie.

Henrie himſelfe, hauing in that battell ſeuen thouſand horſſemen, and thréeſcore thouſand footmen, with croſſebowes, darts, ſpeares, lances, and other abillements of war: ſo in all thrée battels he had foureſcore and ſix thouſand men on horſſebacke and on foot.

The duke of Lancaſter.

The capitall of Beuf.

The prince of Wales, at the breaking of the daie was readie in the field with his people arranged in order of battell, and aduanced forward with them toward his enimies, an hoſting pace; and as they paſſed a little hill, they might ſée as they were deſcending downe the ſame, their enimies comming likewiſe towards them, in good order of battell. When they were approached néere togither, and readie to ioine, the duke of Lancaſters battell incountered with the battell of ſir Berthram de Cleaquin, which two battels verie eagerlie aſſailed each other, ſo that there was betwixt them a ſore conflict, and well continued. The erle Dom Teille, and his brother the lord Sanches, vpon the firſt approach of the princes battell towards them, fled out of the field, and with them two thouſand ſpeares, ſo that the reſidue of their battell were ſhortlie after diſcomfited, for the capitall of Buz otherwiſe Beuf, and the lord Cliſſon, came vpon them on foot, and ſlue and hurt manie of them, ſo that they brake their arraie, and fled to ſaue themſelues.

The archers.

King Peter.

This chance diſcomforted the hearts of the Spaniards right ſore, but yet king Henrie like a valiant gentleman came forward, and incouraged his men all that he might, ſo that there was a cruell battell, and well foughten a long time. For the Spaniards with ſlings caſt ſtones in ſuch fierce manner, that they claue therewith manie an helmet and baſſenet, hurt manie, and ouerthrew them to the earth. On the other part, the Engliſh archers ſhot freſhlie at their enimies, galled and ſlue the Spaniards, and brought them to great confuſion: yet king Henrie nothing abaſhed herewith, whereſoeuer he perceiued his men to ſhrinke, thither he reſorted, calling vpon them, and exhorting them to remember their eſtimations and duties, ſo that by his diligence and manfull incouragement, thriſe that daie did he ſtaie his people, being at point to giue ouer, and ſet them in the faces of his enimies againe. Neither did the ſouldiers alone manfullie behaue themſelues, but the capteins alſo ſtoutlie laid about them. King Peter like a lion preſſed forward, coueting to méet with his brother Henrie, that he might ſéeke his reuenge on him with his owne hands. Cruell was the fight, and tried throughlie with moſt eger and fierce minds.

The Spaniards put to flight.

At length, when the Spaniards were no longer able to ſuſteine the force and violence of the Engliſhmen, Gaſcoignes, & other which were there againſt them, they brake their arraie, and fled; ſo that neither the authoritie nor bold exhortation of king Henrie, could cauſe them to tarrie anie longer: wherevpon, when he ſaw himſelfe forſaken of his people, and that few abode with him to reſiſt his enimies, he alſo to ſaue himſelfe fled out of the field, being fullie perſuaded, that if he had béene taken, no ranſome ſhould haue ſaued his life. The battell that was beſt fought, and longeſt held togither, was that of the ſtrangers, which ſir Berthram de Cleaquin led. For if the Spaniards had doone halfe their parts as well as the Frenchmen, & other in this battell, the matter had gone harder againſt the Engliſhmen than it did: yet finallie, by the noble courage of the duke of Lancaſter, and the valiant proweſſe of ſir Iohn Chandois, ſir Hugh Caluerlie, & others, the Frenchmen were put to flight, and their battell quite diſcomfited. The ſlaughter in this battell was great, both of them that were ſlaine in the field, and of thoſe that were drowned in the riuer that runneth by the towne of Nauarret.

After that the battell was ended, and that ſuch as had followed the chaſe were returned, the prince cauſed the fields to be ſearched, to vnderſtand what number had béene ſlaine in the battell: they that were appointed to take the view, vpon their returne reported, that there was dead of men of armes fiue hundred and thréeſcore, and of commons about ſeauen thouſand, and fiue hundred of the Engliſh part: there were ſlaine of men of name, but foure knights, two Gaſcoignes, one Almaine, and the fourth an Engliſhman, and of other meane ſouldiers, not paſt fortie (as Froiſſard ſaith.) But others affirme, that there were ſlaine of the princes part about ſixtéene hundred; which ſhould ſéeme to be more like a truth, if the battell was fought ſo ſore and fiercelie, as Froiſſard himſelfe doth make report. Howbeit, there be that write, how the duke of Lancaſter wan the field by great fortune and valiancie, yer the prince came néere to his enimies. But howſoeuer it was, the Engliſhmen obteined the victorie in this battell, fought on a ſaturdaie being the third of Aprill, in the yeare 1367. There were taken priſoners, to the number of two thouſand, and amongſt them the erle of Dene, ſir Berthram de Cleaquin, the marſhall Dandrehen or Odenhen, and manie other men of name.

Froiſſard.

After the battell, king Peter went to Burgus, and was receiued into the citie, and ſhortlie after, that is to ſay, on the wedneſdaie folowing, the prince came thither, and there held his Eaſter with king Peter, and tarried there aboue thrée wéekes. In the meane time, they of Aſturgus, Toledo, Liſbone, Cordoua, Galice, Siuill, and of all other places of the kingdome of Spaine, came in, and did homage vnto king Peter, promiſing him to be true to him euer after: for they ſaw that reſiſtance would not auaile ſo long as the prince ſhould be in the countrie. After this, the prince was in hand with king Peter, for the ſouldiers wages, by whoſe aid he was thus reſtored into his former eſtate. King Peter went vnto Siuill, to make ſhift for monie accordinglie, promiſing to returne againe, within a few wéekes, and to ſée euerie man paid, according as he had couenanted. For when he was driuen out of his realme, and came to Burdeaux to craue aid of the prince, he promiſed, that ſo ſoone as he ſhould be reſtored to his kingdome, he would ſée the ſouldiers contented of their wages, and bound himſelfe thereto, both by his oth and writing giuen vnder his ſeale. But when he obteined his purpoſe, he forgat all fréendlie dutie, and was ſo farre from performing his promiſe, that he cloaked his ill meaning with a feigned tale, and ſent the prince a meſſage ſpiced with hypocriſie and vnthankfulneſſe, two foule faults in a priuat man, much more odious in a prince and great ſtate, as the poet wiſelie and truelie ſaith in this diſtichon:

Omne animi vitium tantò conſpectius in ſe
Crimen habet, quantò maior qui peccat habetur.

King Peters diſſimulation.

The prince tarried for the returne of king Peter, both wéekes and moneths, but could not heare anie tidings of him. He therefore ſent vnto him, to vnderſtand the cauſe of the ſtaie: his anſwer was, that he had prouided monie, and ſent it by certeine of his men toward the prince, but the companions that ſerued vnder the prince, had met with it by the way, and taken it from them that had the conueiance of it: he therefore required the prince to rid the realme of thoſe ſnaphances, and to leaue behind him ſome of his officers, to whome in name of him he would make paiment of ſuch monie as was due. This anſwer pleaſed not the prince, but there was no remedie, for other at that preſent he could not haue, for anie likeliehood he ſaw: and therefore, taking order with king Peter how the paiment ſhould be made, he prepared to returne into Gaſcoigne. The order therefore taken betwixt them, was this. Within foure moneths next inſuing, king Peter ſhould paie the one halfe of the wages due to the ſoldiers for this iournie, vnto ſuch as the prince ſhould leaue behind him to receiue the ſame, and the other halfe within one yeare.

Tho. Walſi.

The prince put to his ſhifts for default of paie.

The prince was compelled to breake his plate, and to make monie thereof to paie his ſoldiers, namelie, the companions, which he had called forth of France, ſo that he left himſelfe bare of all riches, to kéepe touch with them, although king Dampeter failed in his promiſe each waie forth. For where the prince ſhould haue had in recompenſe towards his charges, the countie of Algezara, and other lands, by the ſaid Dampeters aſſignement, ſo that he ſent one of his knights to take ſeizine of the ſame lands, he was neuertheles diſapointed, for he could not come by any peaceable poſſeſſion of thoſe lands, and ſo returned greatlie impouer iſhed, hauing ſpent in this iournie all that he could make. In the meane time the baſtard Henrie, hauing eſcaped out of the field by flight, got him into France, and there through fauor of the duke of Aniou, ſo purchaſed for himſelfe, that he got togither a certeine number of Britains and other ſoldiers, & comming to the frontiers of the princes land in Gaſcoigne, got a towne in Bigore, called Bannieres, and made war vpon the princes ſubiects.

The prince returneth into Gaſcoigne.

The prince obteining paſſage for himſelfe and his men, of the kings of Aragon and Nauarre, returned to Burdeaux, and then did the baſtard Henrie forſake his garriſon at Bannieres, and went into Arragon, and there got the king of Arragons aſſiſtance: & finallie, in the yeare 1369, returning into Spaine, recouered the kingdome, and ſlue his brother king Peter, as in the hiſtorie of Spaine it may appeare, which for that it apperteineth not to this hiſtorie of England, I doo here paſſe ouer. This yeare, in the moneth of March, appeared a blaſing ſtarre, betwixt the north and weſt, whoſe beames ſtretched towards France as was then marked, threatning (as might be thought) that within a ſmall time after it ſhould againe be wrapped and ſet on fire with new troubles of warre, and euen then, that countrie was not in quiet, but harried in diuerſe parts, by ſuch ſoldiers as had béene with the prince in Spaine, & were now out of wages. The leaders of which people were for the more part Engliſhmen and Gaſcoignes, as ſir Robert Briquet, ſir Iohn Treſmelle, Robert Cenie, ſir Gaollard Vigier, the bourge of Bertueill, the bourge Camois of Cominges, as Deniſe Sauage thinketh, the bourge of Leſpare, Nandon or Nawdon of Bargerant, Bernard de la Salle, Ortigo, Lamut, and manie other.

The duke of Clarence goeth into Italie.

The ladie Violant.

In this 42 yeare of king Edwards reigne, his ſecond ſon the lord Lionell duke of Clarence and earle of Vlſter paſſed the ſea, with a noble companie of lords, knights, and gentlemen, and went thorough France into Lombardie, there to marrie the ladie Violant, daughter to the duke of Millane. He was honorablie receiued in all places where he came, and ſpeciallie at Paris, by the dukes of Berrie and Burgognie, the lord Coucie and other, the which brought him to the court, where he dined and ſupped with the king, and lodged within the palace. On the next day he was had to a place where the quéene lodged, and dined with hir, and after was conueied to the court againe, and ſupped that night with the king, and on the morrow following, he toke his leaue of the king and quéene the which gaue to him great gifts, and likewiſe to the noble men of England that came ouer with him, to the value of twentie thouſand florens and aboue: he was conueied from place to place, with certeine of the French nobilitie, till he came to the borders of the realme, and then entring into Sauoy, he came to Chamberie, where the earle of Sauoy was readie to receiue him, and there he remained foure daies, being highlie feaſted amongſt the ladies and damoſels: and then he departed, and the earle of Sauoy brought him to Millane, to doo him the more honor, for his ſiſter was mother to the bride, which the duke ſhould marrie.

His interteinement in Sauoy.

His receiuing into Millane.

Corio in the hiſtorie of Millane.

To ſpeake of the honorable receiuing of him into the citie of Millane, and of the great feaſt, triumph, and banketting, and what an aſſemblie there was in Millane of high eſtates, at the ſolemnizing of the mariage betwixt him and the ſaid ladie Violant, it were too long a proceſſe to remember. The gifts that the father of the bride, the lord Galeas gaue vnto ſuch honorable perſonages as were there preſent, amounted in value to an ineſtimable ſumme. ¶ The writers of the Millane hiſtories affirme, that this mariage was celebrated on the fiftéenth daie of Iune, in the yeare 1367, which being true, the ſame chanced in the 41 yeare of this kings reigne, and not in this 42 yeare, though other authors agrée, that it was in the yeare 1368. But to returne to other doings where we left.

Ye haue heard how the prince of Wales could get no monie of the king of Spaine, for the wages of his men of warre, which he had reteined to ſerue him in the reducing of the ſaid king home into his countrie: wherfore the prince hauing béene at great charges in that iournie, was neither able to ſatiſfie them, nor mainteine his owne eſtate, without ſome great aid of his ſubiects, and therefore he was counſelled to raiſe a ſubſidie called a fuage, through all the countrie of Aquitaine, to run onelie for the ſpace of fiue yeares. To this paiment, euerie chimnie or fire muſt haue béene contributorie, paieng yearely one franke, the rich to haue borne out the poore. And to haue this paiment granted, all the eſtates of the countrie were called togither at Niort. The Poictouins, and they of Xaintonge, Limoſin, Rouergne, and of Rochell, agréed to the princes requeſt, with condition, that he ſhould kéepe the courſe of his coine ſtable, for the terme of ſeuen yeares.

The prince of Wales conſtreined to burden his ſubiects with a ſore ſubſidie.

Coine not to be inhanced nor abaſed.

But diuerſe of the other parts of Guien refuſed that ordinance, as the earles of Arminake, and Cominges, the vicount of Carmaigne, the lords Dalbret, de la Barde, Cande, Pincornet, and diuerſe other great barons: but yet to depart quietlie from the aſſemblie, they required a time to take better aduiſe, and ſo they repairing into their countries, determined neither to returne againe according to their promiſes, nor to ſuffer any fuage to run amongeſt them at all, and were ſo much offended with the motion, that they ſought occaſion forthwith to reuolt from the Engliſh obeiſance and ſubmiſſion, knowing that

Paſtores tondere boni haud deglubere cultris

The demand of this fuage the cauſe of the Gaſcoignes reuolting to the French king.

And therefore diuerſe lords of them went to the French king, and there exhibited into the chamber of the péeres of France, their complaints of the grieuous impoſitions & wrongs, which the prince went about to laie vpon them, affirming that their reſort ought of ſpeciall duty to be to the crowne of France, and to the king there, as to their lord Peramount. The French king, who would not ſéeme to breake the peace betwéene him and the king of England, diſſembled the matter, and told them that he would peruſe the tenor of the charters and letters of the peace, and ſo far forth as he might by permiſſion of the ſame, he would be glad to doo them good. The earles of Arminake, Perigourd, Cominges, and the lord Dalbret, with other that were come thither about this matter, were contented with this anſwer, and ſo ſtaied in France, till they might vnderſtand further, both of the French kings mind, and of the princes dooings. ¶ This yeere in October, was Simon Langham archbiſhop of Canturburie elected to the dignitie of a cardinall, and then William Witleſlie, biſhop of Worceſter, was remooued vnto the ſée of Canturburie.

The earle of Saint Paule

About the ſame time, the earle of ſaint Paule, one of the hoſtages in England, ſtale from hence, without taking any leaue, or ſaieng farewell. At his comming into France, he greatlie furthered the ſute of the lords of Gaſcoigne, & finallie ſo much was doone on their behalfe, that the French king was contented that the prince of Wales ſhould be appealed, and ſummoned to appeare before the French king as iudge in that point, for reformation of the wrongs which he offered to them that had made their reſort vnto him, as reaſon was they ſhould. This appeale was written, and dulie examined.

1369.

The prince of wales appealed to appeare.

The tenor of the ſaid prince of Wales his appeale or ſummons of appearance before the French king, &c.

CHarles by the grace of God king of France, to our nephue the prince of Wales and Aquitaine, ſend gréeting. So it is, that diuerſe prelats, barons, knights, vniuerſities, communalties, and colledges of the marches and limits of the countrie of Gaſcoigne, and the dwellers and inhabitants in the bounds of our realme, beſides diuerſe other of the duchie of Aquitaine, are reſorted, and come to our court, to haue right of certeine gréefes, and vnlawfull troubles, which you, by vnaduiſed counſell, and ſimple information, haue purpoſed to doo vnto them, whereof we greatlie maruell. Therfore, to withſtand, and to redreſſe ſuch things, we are ſo conioined to them, that we haue thought good, by our roiall power, to command you to repaire to our citie of Paris, in proper perſon, and there to ſhew and preſent your ſelfe before vs, in the chamber of our péeres, that you may be conſtreined to doo right to your people, concerning the gréefes which they alledge that you are about to oppreſſe them with, who claime to haue their reſort into our court: and that you faile not thus to doo, in as ſpéedie manner as yée can, immediatlie vpon the ſight and hearing of theſe preſent letters. In witneſſe whereof, we haue to the ſame ſet our ſeale. Yeuen at Paris, the fiue and twentith day of Ianuarie.

Anno Reg. 43.

The princes anſwer to the meſſenger.

Theſe letters were giuen to a knight and a clerke, to beare and preſent to the prince, which according to that they had in charge, went to Burdeaux, and there getting licence to come before his preſence, they read the letters, wherewith he was not a little chafed, and openlie told them for a plaine anſwer, that he meant to accompliſh the French kings requeſt, for his comming to Paris, but that ſhould be with his helmet on his head, and thréeſcore thouſand armed men, to beare witneſſe of his appearance. The meſſengers perceiuing the prince to be ſore offended with their meſſage, got them awaie, without taking their leaue: but before they were paſſed the limits of the Engliſh dominion, they were ſtaied by commandement of the prince, and committed to priſon, within the citie of Agen.

The duke of Berrie.

About the ſame time, the duke of Berrie returned into France, hauing licence of king Edward for an whole yeare; but he bare himſelfe ſo wiſelie, that he returned not againe at all: for he excuſed himſelfe, till time that the warre was open. In like manner, the more part of all the other hoſtages, by one meane or other were returned into France, and ſome indéed were deliuered vpon their ranſomes, or other conſiderations, ſo that the French king being deliuered of that obſtacle, was the more readie to breake with the king of England, and therefore vpon knowledge had of the princes anſwer, to thoſe that he ſent with the appeale, by ſuch of the meſſengers ſeruants as were returned, and declared how their maiſters were delt with, he couertlie prepared for the warre.

The lord Chandois.

Chimniage.

The lord Iohn Chandois, and other of the princes councell foreſaw what would inſue of leauieng the fuage, and therefore counſelled the prince, not to procéed any further in it. But he hauing onlie regard to the reléefe of his ſouldiers and men of warre, would néeds go forward with it. ¶ Indéed, if he might haue brought it to paſſe, as it was denied, that euerie houſholder ſhould haue paid a franke for chimniage, the ſumme would haue growne to twelue hundred thouſand frankes by the yeare, which had béene a great reléefe, and that made him the more earneſt, bicauſe he might haue béene able ſo to haue paid his debts.

Now, when it was perceiued certeinlie that open rebellion would therof inſue, and that king Edward was certified of the whole ſtate of the matter, and how diuerſe of the lords of Aquitaine were withdrawne vnto the court of France, in manner as before yée haue heard, he deuiſed a letter, which he cauſed to be publiſhed through all the parts of Aquitaine the effect whereof was this; That where the people of that countrie found themſelues gréeued for ſuch exactions as were demanded of them, he meant therefore vpon examination of their iuſt complaints, to ſée their wrongs redreſſed. And further, he was contented to pardon all ſuch as were withdrawne to the French king, ſo that within a moneths ſpace they would returne home; requiring them, that in no wiſe they ſhould ſtirre anie ſeditious tumult, but to remember their oths of allegiance, and to continue in the ſame, according to their bounden duties; and as for him, he would be readie to ſée them eaſed, that would ſhew by plaine proofe how they had béene otherwiſe gréeued than reaſon might beare. This was his meaning, and this was the aduiſe of all his councellours.

A letter publiſhed by the prince to appeaſe the Gaſcoignes.

Ia. Meir.

But this courteous letter little auailed, for dailie the Gaſcoignes reuolted from the prince, and turned to the French part. Moreouer, another occaſion of grudge chanced to renew the malice betwixt the K. of England, and the French king. For whereas yée haue heard, that the earle of Flanders had affianced his daughter and heire to the lord Edmund of Langlie, earle of Cambridge, a ſhift was made, namelie by the earles mother the counteſſe of Arthois, who was all French, that notwithſtanding the ſame affiance, ſhe was married to Philip duke of Burgognie, who was ſurnamed the Hardie, by this occaſion, as I. Meir ſaith. It chanced, that whileſt he was priſoner in England with his father, he was vpon a time appointed to wait at the table, where his father and the king of England ſat togither at meat. And bicauſe a noble man of England that was appointed likewiſe to attend at the ſame table, ſerued firſt the king of England before the king of France, this Philip vp with his fiſt, and tooke the Engliſh lord a blow on the eare, ſaieng; Wilt thou ſerue the king of England firſt, where the French king ſitteth at the ſame table? The Engliſhman out with his dagger, & would haue ſtriken the ſaid Philip, but the king of England ſtreictlie charged him to the contrarie, and praiſing the déed of the yong ſtripling, ſaid vnto him, Vous eſtes Philip le hardie, Thou art (ſaid he) the hardie Philip. And ſo from that daie he bare that name euer after. There be other that ſaie, how he toke that ſurname, bicauſe in the batell of Poictiers he abode ſtill with his father till the end of the battell, without ſhewing any token of feare, or faintnes of courage.

The earles of Arminacke & Perigord.
Froiſſard.

The earles of Arminacke and Perigord, with the other lords of Gaſcoigne, that had made their appeale (as ye haue heard) to the chamber of the péeres of France, when they vnderſtood that the prince had impriſoned the meſſengers, that brought to him the French kings letters, began to make warre on the princes lands. The firſt enterpriſe they made, was the diſcomfiting of the lord Thomas Wake ſeneſhall of Rouergne, as he was riding from Agen vnto the citie of Rodais, with thréeſcore ſpears, and two hundred archers in his companie. Alſo the French king being now prouided for the war, and vnderſtanding the minds of the people within certeine towns vnder the dominion of the Engliſhmen, in his high court of parlement holden at Paris, procéeded in iudgement vpon the appellation before made by the earles of Arminacke, Perigord, and others, againſt prince Edward. And moreouer he ſent ouer into England the earle of Saliſburch, and a knight called ſir William Dorman, to ſignifie to the king of England, how he thought himſelfe not honorablie vſed, & that the king of England did but ſlenderlie kéepe the couenants of the peace, conſidering that he did not find meanes to reforme ſuch of his ſubiects Engliſhmen and Gaſcoignes, as dailie robbed and waſted the countries & lands belonging to the crowne of France.

Theſe ambaſſadors were ſtaied for the ſpace of two moneths, & ſtill they complained of the wrongs that the Engliſhmen had doone, contrarie to the couenants of the peace, but the king made ſmall account thereof, bicauſe he perceiued it was a forged matter that they alledged, and ſo in the end ſent them awaie. At Douer being vpon their returne, there met them a Britaine that was comming with letters of defiance to the king of England from the French king, and as he had in commandement, he declared to them the effect of his meſſage, wherevpon with all ſpéed they paſſed ouer to Bullongne, and were glad they had ſo eſcaped. The Britaine came to the court, and deliuered the defiance to the king, according to the inſtructions which he had receiued. When the king had heard the letters read, and perceiued by good view taken of the ſeale and ſignet, that the ſame were of authoritie, he licenced the meſſenger to depart, and fell in councell with the péeres of his realme, what he ſhould doo in ſo weigthie a matter. Wherevpon it was thought neceſſarie by them, that he ſhould aſſemble his court of parlement, and ſo he did. In the which (vpon declaration made how iniuriouſlie the French king after manie wrongfull dealings had now broken the peace, and ſent his defiance vnto the king in ſo deſpitefull wiſe as might be) there was granted towards the maintenance of the warre thus begun, thrée fiftéens of the temporaltie, and thrée diſmes of the ſpiritualtie, to be paied in thrée yeares.

At the ſelfe ſame time that the defiance was made to the king here in England, the earle of S. Paule, and Guie de Chatillon maſter of the croſbowes in France, entered into the countie of Ponthieu, toke Abuile, and an Engliſh knight called ſir Nicholas Louaigne ſeneſhall of that countrie vnder the king of England, as then being within it. They toke alſo ſaint Valerie, Crotoie, Rue, Pont ſaint Renie, and to be ſhort, reduced the whole countrie of Ponthieu vnder the French obeiſance, which had remained in poſſeſſion of the Engliſhmen for the ſpace of a hundred and twelue yeares, euer ſince Edward the firſt had the ſame aſſigned to him in name of a dowrie, with his wife quéene Elianor, ſiſter to Alfonſe K. of Caſtile. And yet were the people of that countrie readie now to reuolt to the French dominion, notwithſtanding their former long continued obeiſance to the Engliſhmen: for otherwiſe could not the Frenchmen ſo eaſilie haue come to their purpoſe, but that the people were couenanted before to receiue them, and betraie thoſe few Engliſhmen that were amongſt them.

Sir Nicholas Louaigne taken.

The countie of Ponthieu taken by the French king.

About the ſame time alſo, it fell ſo ill for the Engliſhmen, that the prince of Wales was troubled with a ſore ſickeneſſe, that had continued long with him, euer ſince his being in Spaine, by reaſon whereof his enimies were the more bold to make attempts againſt him, and dailie went about to allure and intiſe his ſubiects of the marches of Guien to reuolt from him, in ſomuch that the citie of Cahors, and diuerſe other townes thereabout turned to the French part. Thus was the peace which had béene ſo ſuerlie made, and with ſo manie ſolemne oths confirmed, violated and broken, and the parties fallen togither by the eares againe in ſundrie places, and namelie in Aquitaine, where ſundrie armies were abroad in the fields, diuers ſieges laid, manie townes taken, often incounters and ſkirmiſhes made, ſometime to the loſſe of the one part, and ſometime of the other, and the countries in the meane time harried and ſpoiled, that maruell it is to conſider, and too long a proceſſe it ſhould be to rehearſe the tenth part of ſuch chances as dailie happened amongſt them, ſo that it might well haue béene ſaid of that ſore & tumultuous time:

King Edward ſent ouer into Gaſcoigne the earls of Cambridge and Penbroke, with a certeine number of men of armes and archers, the which arriuing in Britaine, paſſed through that countrie by licence of the Duke, and came to the prince as then lieng at Angoleſme in Poictou, by whom they were ſent to ouerrun the earle of Perigords lands, and ſo they did, and after laid ſiege to Burdille, hauing with them about thrée thouſand men one and other. There came with them forth of England foure hundred men of armes, foure hundred archers, and (as Froiſſard ſaith) beſide their capteins, theſe earles which he nameth, to wit, the lord of Labeſtone (or rather Bradſtone as I take it) ſir Brian Stapleton, ſir Thomas Balaſter, and ſir Iohn Triuet. Whileſt the ſaid earles went thus to make warre againſt the earle of Perigord, ſir Hugh Caluerlie with two thouſand men of warre was ſent alſo to ouerrun the lands of the earle of Arminacke, and of the lord Dalbret; ſir Iohn Chandois laie in the marches of Tholouſe at Mountaubon, & afterwards beſieged Terrieres, and in the end wan it; and ſo likewiſe did the earles of Cambridge and Penbroke win Burdille, by reaſon of a ſaillie that they within made forth, and paſſed ſo far from their fortreſſe, that the Engliſhmen got betwixt them and home.

Sir Robert Knols came from ſuch lands as he had in Britaine, to ſerue the prince now in theſe warres of Gaſcoigne, and was by him made chéefe gouernor of all his men of warre, who bare himſelfe right worthilie in that charge. The firſt iournie which he made at that time, was into Quercie, hauing with him beſide his owne bands, certeine knights of the princes retinue, as ſir Richard Ponchardon, ſir Stephan Gouſenton, ſir Noell Loring, ſir Hugh Haſtings, ſir

Sir Robert Knols.

John Triuet, ſir Thomas Spenſer, ſir Thomas Balaſter, ſir Nicholas Bond, ſir William le Moine ſeneſchall of Aigenois, ſir Baldwin de Freuille, and others. At their comming into Quercie, they beſieged a ſtrong fortreſſe called Durmell, within the which were diuerſe capteins of the companions, as Aimon d'Ortigo, the little Mechin, Jaques de Bray, Perot de Sauoie, and Arnaudon de Pons, the which ſo valiantlie defended the place, that although the lord Chandois, accompanied with ſir Thomas Felton, the capitall of Beuſ, ſir John de Pommiers, ſir Thomas Percie, ſir Euſtace Daubreticourt, and others came with their retinues from Montaubon, to reenforce that ſiege, yet could they not obteine their purpoſe, but raiſing from thence after fiue weekes ſiege (conſtreined thereto through want of vittels) they marched ſtreight to a towne called Domme, which they beſieged, hauing in their armie fifteene hundred men at armes, beſide two thouſand archers and brigands, ſo called in thoſe daies, of an armor which they ware named brigandines, vſed then by footmen, that bare alſo targets, or pauoiſſes, and certeine darts or iauelines to throw at their enimies.

Be Gerard.

The towne and caſtell of Domme were ſo ſtrong of themſelues, and ſo well prouided of men of warre that were appointed to the gard of the ſame, with the lord thereof called ſir Robert de Domme, that after the Engliſh capteins perceiued they ſhould but loſe time to linger about the winning of that towne, they raiſed their ſiege, and marching further into the countrie, wan Gauaches, Freins, Rochmador, and Ville Franche, vpon the marches of Toulouzain, greatlie to the diſpleaſure of the duke of Aniou that lay at the ſame time in the citie of Toulouze, & could not remedie the matter. ¶ But to recite euerie particular enterpriſe, as the ſame was atchiued by the Engliſh capteins and men of warre in that ſeaſon, it ſhould be more than the purpoſe of this volume might permit, and therefore I paſſe ouer diuerſe things, which I find regiſtred by Froiſſard and other writers, onelie aduertiſing you, that as the Engliſhmen thus made ſore warres againſt their aduerſaries abroad in thoſe quarters: ſo the Frenchmen on the other part had aſſembled great numbers of men of warre, not onelie to defend their frontiers, but alſo by inuaſions to win from the Engliſhmen towns and caſtels, and to waſt ſuch countries as would not turne to their ſide. Thus were all thoſe countries in troubles of warre.

Aquitaine full of warre.

The two kings alſo of England and France, ſignified to their neighbours the cauſes of this warre, laieng the fault either to other, and excuſing themſelues as cleare and innocent therein. Edward duke of Gelderland, nephue to the king of England, as ſonne to his ſiſter, and the duke of Gulike couſine to the kings children by their mother that was daughter to the earle of Heinault, tooke great deſpite that the French king had broken the peace, as they were throughlie perſuaded; and that he had defied king Edward (as before ye haue heard.) Wherevpon they ſent their defiance vnto the French king, threatning to be reuenged on him to the vttermoſt of their powers. Duke Albert of Bauier, was once minded alſo to haue aided king Edward in this warre: but afterwards ſuch perſuaſions were vſed on the French kings part, that he choſe to remaine as neuter betwixt them both, refuſing to take anie part.

The duke of Bauier.

Among the ſouldiers alſo called companions, which ſerued the prince in this ſeaſon, there were three capteins, right hardie and verie expert men of warre, Ortigo, Bernard de Wiſke, & Bernard de la Sale. Theſe three remaining as then in Limoſin, hearing that the duke of Burbons mother, which was alſo mother to the French queene, laie within the caſtell of Belleperch in Burbonnois, with a ſmall companie about hir, rode thither in one daie and a night, ſo that in the morning they approched the caſtell, ſcaled it, and tooke it, with the ladie within it. And though they were after beſieged in the ſame caſtell by the duke of Burbon and other Frenchmen, yet they defended it, till the earls of Cambridge and Penbroke, with fifteene hundred ſpeares, and three thouſand of other men of warre, came and offered the Frenchmen battell, lodging afore them fifteene daies. And when they perceiued that the Frenchmen would not iſſue out of the baſtide (in which they laie) to giue battell, the earles of Cambridge and Penbroke cauſed all them within the caſtell to come forth, and to bring with them the duches of Burbon, whome they led awaie in ſight of hir ſonne, leauing the caſtell void and free for him to enioy.

The duke of Burbons mother taken.

The French king prouided a great number of ſhips to aſſemble togither at Harflew, and leuied a great power of men, minding to beſtow them aboord in the ſame ſhips, that they might ſaile into England, and make warre againſt king Edward in his owne countrie. Cheefteine of this armie ſhould haue beene his brother the duke of Burbon, but this iournie was broken, for the Frenchmen were eaſed of the paine to come to ſeeke the Engliſhmen at home in England, they comming ouer into France, and profering them battell euen at their owne doores. For the king of England hauing leuied a power of archers, and other men of warre, ſent them ouer vnder the leading of his ſonne the duke of Lancaſter. There went with him in this iournie, the earles of Hereford and Saliſburie, the lord Ros, the lord Baſſet, the lord Willoughbie, the lord de la Ware, the lord de la Pole, the lord Walter of Mannie, the lord Henrie Percie, the lord Thomas Grantſon, ſir Alane Burhul, ſir Richard Sturrie, & diuerſe other. They went ouer about Midſummer. And after they had reſted a little, the duke ſet forward and roded forth into the countrie, ſpoiling and harrieng the ſame, and when he ſaw time, returned againe to Calis.

The French king prepareth a nauie.

The duke of Lancaſter ſet into France with an armie.

The French king being at Roan, heard of the arriuall of this armie at Calis, and that his countrie of Picardie was in great danger: he changed his purpoſe therefore of ſending an armie into England, and with all ſpeed appointed that his power ſhould with his brother the duke of Burgognie turne toward Calis, to reſiſt the duke of Lancaſter. Herevpon when the duke of Lancaſter heard that the duke of Burgognie was thus comming toward him, he iſſued forth of Calis, and comming into the vallie beneath the hill of Turneham, there tooke his field, and fortified the place with ſtrong hedges and rampiers, the better to be able to reſiſt his enimies if they would aſſaile him. The duke of Burgognie came ſtill forward, till he approched verie neere to the duke of Lancaſters campe, and pight downe his field aloft vpon the hill of Turneham, ſo that the fronts of both hoſts were within leſſe than a mile either of other.

There was come to the duke of Lancaſter a knight of the marches of Almaine, called ſir Robert de Namur with an hundred ſpeares: but yet the duke of Lancaſters hoſt was but one handfull of men, in reſpect of the huge number of the French armie, wherin were (as Froiſſard writeth) foure thouſand knights beſide others. But yet for all his great puiſſance and number of men, he would not aduenture to aſſaile the Engliſhmen in their lodgings, as it was thought he would haue doone, but kept himſelfe and his men vpon the hill, from the foure and twentith of Auguſt, vnto the twelfth of September, and then diſlodged not much to his honour, howſoeuer writers doo ex-

In this meane while, that is to ſaie, on the euen of the Aſſumption of our ladie, died that noble princeſſe, the ladie Philip quéene of England. It is ſaid that when ſhe perceiued that ſhe muſt néeds depart out of this tranſitorie life, ſhe deſired to ſpeake with the king hir huſband, and when he was come to hir with a ſorowfull hart to ſée hir in that ſtate, ſhe tooke him by the hand, and after courteous words of induction, ſhe required of him to grant hir thrée requeſts.

Hir thrée petitions to the king.

1 The firſt requeſt was, that all ſuch merchants, and other men, with whom ſhe had bargained in any condition, might be anſwered of all ſuch debts as ſhe owght them, whether they dwelled on this ſide the ſea or beyond.

2 The ſecond requeſt was, that all ſuch ordinances and promiſes, as ſhe had made to churches, as well within this realme, as in the parts of the further ſide the ſea, might be performed.

3 The third requeſt was, that it might pleaſe him to chooſe out none other ſepulchre when God ſhould call him out of this world, but beſide hir at Weſtminſter.

The duke of Lancaſter maketh a iournie into France.
S. Riquier.

But now to returne to the duke of Lancaſter. Ye ſhall vnderſtand that after the departure of the French armie beſide the hill of Turneham, the ſaid duke returned to Calis, and there refreſhed himſelfe and his people the ſpace of thrée daies. And then he ſet forward againe, ⁊ with him as marſhals of the hoſt, was the earle of Warwike, and the lord Roger Beauchampe, with the lords and knights before remembred. They tooke their iournie to S. Omers, and by Turwin, and then through the countie of ſaint Paule, ſtill burning the countrie as they went. They rode not paſt thrée or foure leages in a daie, and kéeping on their waie, they came by ſaint Riquier, and at the planches vnder Abuile paſſed the riuer of Some, and then entred into the countrie of Vimew, in purpoſe to go vnto Harflew, and there to burne the French kings nauie. Thus paſſing forward thorough Vimew, and the countie of Ewe, they entered into the archbiſhoprike of Roan, and marching forth by Déepe, came vnto Harflew: but the earle of ſaint Poule, and the lord of Fiennes conſtable of France which had coaſted the Engliſh armie in all this iournie, with a great power of men, was gotten before them, and entred into this towne, ſo that they knew how they ſhould but loſe their paine, if they did aſſaile it, and ſo therefore after they had lien before it thrée daies, on the fourth day they diſlodged, ⁊ went backe againe towards Calis, returning through the countrie of Ponthieu, and before Abuile chanced to incounter a number of Frenchmen, which gaue to the duke battell. In the which was taken ſir Hugh de Chatellon, maſter of the croſbowes of France, with other knights, eſquiers, and burgeſſes of that towne, and about ſixtéene ſcore of the French part ſlaine.

There be that write otherwiſe herof, ſhewing how the ſaid ſir Hugh Chatellon was taken by an ambuſh laid by ſir Nicholas Louaine, as the ſame ſir Hugh was come forth of the towne, with not paſt ten or twelue with him, to ſée how the paſſage of Rowraie was kept by them that had charge thereof. How ſoeuer it came to paſſe, taken he was, ⁊ brought to the duke of Lancaſter, that reioiſed greatlie of that good hap: and ſo marching forward, he paſſed the riuer at Blanchetaque, and drew towards the towne of Rew on the ſea ſide, and ſo to Montreuill, and finallie to Calis. Then were the ſtrangers licenced to depart: and bicauſe it was far in the winter, as about ſaint Martines tide, the duke and the moſt part of his armie returned into England. In this yeare chanced the third mortalitie, which was excéeding great both of men and beaſts, that the like had not béene heard of. And amongſt other people that periſhed of that peſtilentiall ſickeneſſe, that worthie knight and noble capteine the earle of Warwike died at Calis in the moneth of Ianuarie, after his returne from Harflew. ¶ The countrie of Aquitaine was full of trouble in this meane time, either part ſéeking to grieue other to the vttermoſt of their powers. ¶ John Haſtings earle of Penbroke, hauing with him certeine bands of men of warre, recouered diuerſe towns and caſtels in thoſe parts: but when he perceiued how the enimies that were not far from the place where he was lodged, ſhewed maniſeſt tokens of feare, in marching one while vncerteinelie forward, and an other while fetching great compaſſes about, he ſomewhat at vnwarilie ſetting vpon them in their campe, was diſcomfited and put to flight, ſo that getting him into a place of the Templers, that was cloſed about with a wall, he remained there in great danger to be taken priſoner of his enimies that aſſailed him, if the lord John Chandois ſeneſchall of Poictou had not come to the reſcue, and pledged him forth.

The death of this right famous, wiſe, and valiant knight, was bewailed as well of the Frenchmen as Engliſhmen. The French king himſelfe, when he heard that he was ſlaine, greatlie lamented the miſhap, affirming that now he being dead, there was not any left aliue able to agrée the kings and realmes of England and France: ſo much was he feared, eſteemed, and beloued of all men. Sir Robert Knolles with an armie ſent into France.

This yeare, after that the king had gotten togither a great ſumme of monie, as well by borowing of the clergie as of the laitie, he leuied an armie, & ſent the ſame ouer to Calis about Midſummer, vnder the gouernance of that worthie chéefteine ſir Robert Knolles, accompanied with the L. Fitz Walter, the lord Granſon, ſir Alaine Burhull, ſir John Bourchier, ſir William Neuille, ſir Geffrey Wourſeley, and diuerſe other noblemen, knights, and worthie capteins. About the ſame time, the king of England concluded an abſtinence of warre with the Scots for the tearme of nine yeares, yet ſo that the Scots might arme themſelues, and at their pleaſure ſerue and take wages, either of the Engliſh or French, by reaſon whereof, ſir Robert Knolles had in his companie an hundred ſpeares of the realme of Scotland.

Truce with Scots.

When this armie had lien and reſted in Calis about the ſpace of ſeauen daies, ſir Robert Knolles cauſed euerie man to depart the towne, and to take the fields, marching the firſt daie néere to the caſtell of Fiennes, and there lodged for that night. The whole number of this armie was not aboue twelue thouſand men. Froiſſard ſaith, they were but fiftéene hundred ſpeares, & foure thouſand archers. Within the caſtell of Fiennes was the conſtable of France, that was lord thereof, with ſuch a number of ſouldiers and men of warre, that the Engliſhmen thought they ſhould but loſe their labour to aſſaile it. And ſo they paſſed forth by Turrouane, and toward Arras, riding not paſt foure leages a daie, bicauſe of their cariages and footmen. They tooke their lodging euer about noone, and laie néere vnto great villages.

Iac. Meir. The number of men of war in this armie. Froiſſard.

The French king had furniſhed all his townes and fortreſſes in Picardie with ſtrong garriſons of ſouldiers, to defend the ſame againſt all chances that might happen either by ſiege or ſudden aſſault. The Engliſhmen therefore thought not good to linger about the winning of anie of the ſtrong townes, but paſſed by them, waſting or ranſoming the countries. At Arras they ſhewed themſelues before the barriers, and when none would iſſue to ſkirmiſh with them, they ſet fier on the ſuburbs, & departed. From thence they tooke the waie by Baupalmes, and ſo came into Vermendois, and burnt the towne of Roy. Then went they to Han in Vermendois, into the which all the people of the countrie were withdrawne, with ſuch goods as they might carie with them. And in like manner had thoſe doone which inhabited about S. Quintine, Peronne, and other ſtrong townes, ſo that the Engliſhmen found little abroad, ſauing the barnes full of corne for it was after harueſt.

The ſuburbs of Arras burnt.

The towne of Roy burnt.

The French mẽ withdraw into their fortreſſes & ſtrõg townes.

Thus they rode faire and eaſilie, two or thrée leages a daie, and ſometime to recouer monie of their enimies, they would compound with them within ſtrong townes, to ſpare the countrie from burning and deſtruction, for ſuch a ſumme as they agréed vpon, by which meanes ſir Robert Knolles got in that voiage aboue the ſumme of an hundred thouſand frankes. For the which he was after accuſed to the king of England, as one that had not dealt iuſtlie in ſo doing. In this ſort paſſing the countrie, they came before Noion, and after they had reſted a while afore the towne, they went forth waſting and burning the countrie, and finallie paſſed the riuer of Marne, and ſo entered into Champaigne, and paſſed the riuer of Aube, and alſo diuerſe times they paſſed to and fro ouer the riuer of Saine: at length drawing toward Paris, and comming before that citie, they lodged there in the field a day and two nights, and ſhewed themſelues in order of battell before the citie. This was on the twentie fourth daie of September.

The Engliſhmen before Paris.

The French king was at the ſame time within the citie, & might behold out of his lodging of S. Paule, the fiers and ſmokes that were made in Gaſtenois, through burning the townes and villages there by the Engliſhmen, but yet he would ſuffer none of his people to go forth of the citie, although there was a great power of men of warre within the citie, both of ſuch as had coaſted the Engliſh armie in all this iournie, and alſo of other which were come thither by the kings commandement, beſide the burgeſſes, and inhabitants of the citie. When ſir Robert Knolles perceiued that he ſhould haue no battell, he departed and drew toward Aniou, where they wan by ſtrength the townes of Vaas and Rueſlie. But now in the beginning of winter, there fell ſuch diſcord amongſt the Engliſh capteins, through couetouſneſſe and enuie, that finallie they diuided themſelues in ſunder, greatlie to the diſpleaſure of ſir Robert Knolles their generall, who could not rule them.

Thom. Walſ. Sir Simon Minſterworth.

There was a knight among them named ſir John Minſterworth, that had the leading of one wing of this armie, a good man of his hands (as we call him) but peruerſe of mind, and verie deceitfull, and to ſir Robert Knolles (to whome he was much beholden) moſt vnfaithfull. This knight, perceiuing the wilfull minds of certeine yong lords and knights there in the armie, that repined at the gouernement of ſir Robert Knolles, as the Romans did ſometime at the gouernance of Camillus (the chéefe of whome were the lord Grantſon, the lord Fitz Walter, and others) did his beſt to pricke them forward, ſounding them in the eare, that it was a great reproch for them being of noble parentage, to ſerue vnder ſuch an old raſcall as he was, ech of them being able to guide their enterpriſe of themſelues, without his counſell, by which flattering of them, and diſgracing of him, the ſaid Minſterworth did much miſchéefe, for

Sir Robert Knolles borne in Cheſhire.

Indéed this ſir Robert Knolles was not deſcended of anie high linage, but borne in the countie of Cheſter of meane ofſpring, neuertheleſſe through his valiant proweſſe, and good ſeruice in warre, growne to ſuch eſtimation, as he was reputed worthie of all honour due to a noble and ſkilfull warriour, ſo that it was thought the king could not haue made his choiſe of one more able or ſufficient to ſupplie the roome of a chéefteine, than of him: but yet, although this was moſt true, his aduiſe could not be heard, nor the authoritie appointed him by the king beare anie ſwaie. For where he counſelled that they ſhould now vpon the approching of winter draw forth of France into Britaine, and there remaine for the winter ſeaſon, they would not ſo agrée, nor obeie his will. Whervpon it came to paſſe, that ſir Berthram de Cleaquin, at that time newlie made conſtable of France, vnderſtanding this diuiſion to grow amongſt the Engliſhmen, liſhmen, and that they were diuided into parts, ſet vpon them ſo much to their diſaduantage, that he diſtreſſed them, and tooke or ſlue the more part of them: but ſir Robert Knols with the flower of the archers and men of warre went into Britaine, and there ſaued himſelfe, and thoſe that followed him. ¶ Here you may ſée, how thoſe that before through amitie and good agréement were of ſuch force as their enimies durſt not once aſſaie to annoie them, now by ſtrife and diſſention among themſelues were ſlaine or taken by the ſame enimies, and brought to confuſion. To which purpoſe it is properlie and trulie ſaid, Froiſſard. The citie of Limoges beſieged.

In this meane time that ſir Robert Knols made this voiage through the realme of France, the prince of Wales laid ſiege to the citie of Limoges, which was reuolted to the Frenchmen. There were with him at the laieng of this ſiege, his brethren, the duke of Lancaſter, and the earle of Cambridge, ſir Guichard Dangle, ſir Lois de Harecourt, the lord of Pons, the lord of Partenaie, the lord of Pinane, the lord of Tannaibouton, ſir Perciuall de Coulongne, ſir Geffrie de Argenton, Poictouins: and of Gaſcoignes, the lord of Mountferrant, the lord de Chaumount, the lord de Longueren, ſir Aimerie de Tharſe, the lords of Pommiers, Mucident de l'Eſparre, the Souldich de Leſtrade, the lord of Gerond, and manie other: of Engliſhmen there were, ſir Thomas Percie, the lord Ros, the lord William Beauchampe, ſir Michaell de la Pole, ſir Stephan Goulſenton, ſir Richard Pontchardon, ſir Baldwin Freuille, ſir Simon Burlie, ſir Dangouſſe, ſir Iohn Deuereux, ſir William Menille or (as ſome copies haue) Neuille, and manie other. There was alſo ſir Euſtace Dambreticourt, and of the companions, ſir Perducas Dalbreth, who in the beginning of theſe warres being turned French, was by the perſuaſion of ſir Robert Knols procured to returne againe to the princes ſeruice before the ſiege of Durmelle.

Limoges taken by force.

The prince being thus accompanied with theſe worthie capteins and men of armes, to the number of twelue hundred, beſide a thouſand archers and other footmen, indeuored by all waies he could deuiſe to indamage them within. In the end he cauſed the walles to be vndermined, and quite reuerſed into the ditch, & then giuing aſſault, entered by the breach, and made an huge ſlaughter of them within, in ſomuch that of men, women, and children (for none were ſpared in reſpect of age or ſex) there were ſlaine and beheaded that daie aboue thrée thouſand. The biſhop with certeine knights and capteins were taken and had their liues granted, though the biſhop was in great danger to haue loſt his head, bicauſe he was a chéefe dooer in yéelding the citie before vnto the Frenchmen.

Polydor. Froiſſard.

Whileſt the prince laie at ſiege before Limoges (a litle before he wan it) thither came to him his brethren, the duke of Lancaſter, and the earle of Cambridge, the lord Ros, ſir Michaell de la Pole, ſir Robert Rous, ſir Iohn Saintlo, and ſir William Beauchampe, with a faire number of men of war, ſpears, and archers. The prince then after he had wonne Limoges, and executed ſome crueltie there to the terrour of other; his maladie which ſtill continued vpon him, rather increaſed than diminiſhed, ſo that he was aduiſed by phyſicians to returne into England, in hope that change of aire ſhould reſtore him to health. For the which conſideration and other cauſes of buſineſſe which he had to doo with his father, touching certeine weightie affaires he tooke the ſea, and came ouer into England, leauing the gouernement of Aquitaine vnto his brother the duke of Lancaſter, as his lieutenant there: he landed at Plimmouth in the beginning of Ianuarie.

The king of Nauarre commeth ouer into England.

Polydor.

Moreouer in this 44 yeare of king Edward, the king of Nauarre came ouer into England, and at Claringdon found the king, and there talked with him of ſuch matters as they had to conclude betwixt them two. But for that the king of Nauarre could not aſſure the king of ſuch couenants as ſhould haue paſſed betwixt them two, it was not thought méet by the kings councell to worke too far vpon his bare word, that had before time ſhewed apparant prooues of his inconſtant dealing. And ſuerlie this doubt aroſe not without cauſe, as his doings ſhortlie after declared: for although he ſéemed now at this preſent to be a verie enimie to the French king, yet ſhortlie after he was reconciled to him againe, and became his great fréend for the time it laſted. This yeare in the moneth of Februarie was a parlement called, in the which there was demanded of the ſpiritualtie a ſubſidie of fiftie thouſand pounds, and as much of the laitie. The temporall men ſoone agréed to that paiment, but the cleargie excuſed themſelues with faire words and ſhifting anſwers: in ſomuch that the king tooke diſpleſure with them, and depoſed certeine ſpirituall men from their offices of dignitie, as the chancellor, the priuie ſeale, the treaſuror, and ſuch others, in whoſe roomes he placed temporall men.

Cardinals appointed to treat of peace.

The biſhop of Wincheſter, and the biſhop of Beauuois being both cardinals, were put in commiſſion by pope Gregorie the eleuenth to treat betwixt the kings of England and France for a peace. But albeit they did their indeuour therein, and mooued both kings to the vttermoſt of their powers, yet their motions tooke none effect, and therefore was the warre purſued to the vttermoſt betwixt the parties, & namelie in Aquitaine, where the fortreſſes were ſo intermedled one with an other, ſome Engliſh, and ſome French, that one knew not how to beware of an other, nor to auoid the danger, ſo that the countrie of Poictou and other the marches thereabout were in great tribulation. Sir Robert Knols, ſir Thomas Spenſer, ſir Iohn Triuet, and ſir Hugh Haſtings, diuiding their powers inſunder, went to recouer townes, ſome in one quarter, and ſome in an other, and certeine they aſſaied, but preuailed not: the inhabitants doubting to be puniſhed for their vntruths, made ſuch ſtout reſiſtance.

Polydor.

After this, the duke of Lancaſter appointed ſir Robert Knols to repaire againe to Calis, and by the waie (if occaſion ſerued) to attempt the recouerie of Ponthieu. Sir Robert taking his iournie through France by Paris, came into the marches of Picardie: and bicauſe in compariſon to this man, all the Engliſh capteins were litle feared of the Frenchmen, ſir Berthram de Cleaquin, the conſtable of France, leauing the fortreſſes in the marches of Aquitaine ſufficientlie ſtuffed with men of warre and munition, followed ſir Robert Knols, ſtill readie to aſſaile the hindermoſt companies, or elſe to ſet on the ſides of his enimies. So that there chanced manie ſkirmiſhes betwixt them, & manie men were ſlaine on both parts; but at length, when ſir Robert Knols ſaw no likelihood to atchiue his purpoſed intent in recouerie of the townes of Ponthieu, as Abuile and other, he drew ſtreight to Calis, and the conſtable retired backe into France.

Sir Berthram de Cleaquin.

1372 Anno Reg. 46.

In this 46 yeare, ſir Robert Aſhton was ſent into Ireland as lord deputie there, and in the ſame yeare, the duke of Lancaſter being as then a widower, maried the ladie Conſtance eldeſt daughter to Peter king of Spaine, which was ſlaine by his baſtard brother Henrie (as before ye haue heard.) ¶ Alſo the lord Emund earle of Cambridge maried the ladie Iſabell, ſiſter to the ſame Conſtance. ¶ Their other ſiſter named Beatrice, affianced to Don Ferdinando, ſon to Peter king of Portingale, was departed this life liſe a little before this time at Baionne, where they were all three left as hoſtages by their father, when the prince went to bring him home into his countrie (as before yee may read.) Froiſſard writeth, that the duke married the ladie Conſtance in Gaſcoigne, and that ſhortlie after he returned into England with his ſaid wife and hir ſiſter, leauing the capitall de Bueſſz, and other lords of Gaſcoigne and Poictou in charge with the rule of thoſe countries. By reaſon of that marriage, the duke of Lancaſter, as in right of his wife being the elder ſiſter, cauſed himſelfe to be intitoled king of Caſtile, and his ſaid wife queene of the ſame realme.

The earle of Hereford being ſent to the ſea, with certeine ſhips of warre, was incountered by the Flemiſh fleet, before an hauen in Britaine called the Baie, where was fought a ſore battell, and long continued for the ſpace of three houres: howbeit finallie the victorie abode with the Engliſhmen, notwithſtanding that the Flemings were more in number, and better prouided for the matter. There were taken of them fiue and twentie ſhips, with their Admerall John Peterſon. They had beene at Rochell for wine, and now were come to the Baie for ſalt vpon their returne homeward, and hearing that the Engliſhmen would come that waie, ſtaied for them, and firſt gaue the onſet. For yee muſt remember, that by reaſon that the earle of Flanders had married his daughter to the duke of Burgognie, which he had firſt promiſed to the earle of Cambridge, there was no perfect freendſhip betwixt the realme of England, and the countries of the ſaid earle of Flanders.

Sir Guichard Dangle made knight of the Garter.
Polydor.
Caxton.

Sir Guichard Dangle a knight of Poictou, that was come ouer with the duke of Lancaſter, to procure the king to ſend ſome new aid into Aquitaine, was for his approoued vallancie and tried truth to the king of England, made knight of the garter. And moreouer at his inſtance the king rigged a nauie of ſhips, and appointed the earle of Penbroke as generall, to ſaile with the ſame into Aquitaine, and there to remooue the ſiege which the Frenchmen had laid to Rochell. The earle according to his commiſſion tooke the ſea with a fleet of fortie ſhips prepared for him: but yer he could enter the hauen of Rochell, he was aſſailed by an huge fleet of Spaniards, and there vanquiſhed, taken priſoner, & led into Spaine. The Spaniards had for capteins foure ſkilfull warriours, Ambroſe Bouquenegre, Cabeſſe de Vake or Vakadent, Dom Ferand du Pion, and Rodigo de la Rochell, who had vnder their gouernement fortie great carrauels, and thirteene trim barkes throughlie furniſhed and appointed with good mariners and men of warre.

The earle of Penbroke ſent into Guien.

Froiſſard.

The earle of Penbroke had with him nothing the like number of ſhips, nor men: for (as Froiſſard writeth) he had not paſt two and twentie knights with him, or (as other haue) not paſt twelue, being for the more part of his owne retinue or houſhold: and yet thoſe few Engliſhmen and Poictouins that were there with him, bare themſelues right valiantlie, and fought it out to the vttermoſt. There were ſlaine ſir Simon Houſſagre, ſir John de Mortague, and ſir John Tuchet; and there were taken priſoners, beſides the earle himſelfe, ſir Robert Buffort, ſir John Curſon, ſir Othes de Grandſon, ſir Guichard Dangle, the lord of Pinane, ſir John de Griueres, ſir Jaques de Surgieres, the lord of Tannaibouton, ſir John de Hardane, and others. This battell was fought on Midſummer euen, in this ſix and fortith yeare of king Edwards reigne. The earle had (as Froiſſard writeth) treaſure with him, to haue waged three thouſand men of warre, which neuer did anie man good, for (as he was informed) the ſhip wherein he was aboord, periſhed with diuerſe other being burnt or ſunke. ¶ The Engliſh writers ſaie, that it was no maruell though this miſhap chanced vnto him, bicauſe he had in parlement ſpoken againſt men of the church, in giuing counſell that they might be conſtreined to paie greeuous ſubſidies, towards the maintenance of the kings warre, and that no leſſe heauie paiments and ſubſidies ſhould be impoſed vpon them, than vpon the ſecular ſort. Wherein he ſeemed to bewraie a malicious mind againſt the clergie, who as in no age they haue wanted foes, ſo in his time they found few freends, being a generation appointed and ordeined in their cradels to be contemned of the world, ſpeciallie of great men, of whoſe fauour and goodwill it is truelie & rightlie ſaid,

These foure laſt remembred came forth of Rochell to aid the earle.

Gratia magnatum neſcit habere ſtatum.

By reaſon of this miſfortune thus happened to the Engliſh fleet, the Frenchmen recouered manie townes and caſtels out of the Engliſhmens hands, in the countries of Poictou, Xaintonge, Limoſin, and other the marches of Aquitaine.

Yuans a Welſh gentleman.

About the ſame time the French king ſent foure thouſand men to the ſea, vnder the guiding of one Yuans a baniſhed Welſh gentleman, the which landing in the Ile of Gerneſey, was incountered by the captein of that Ile called ſir Edmund Rous, who had gathered eight hundred men of his owne ſouldiers togither, with them of the Ile; and boldlie gaue battell to the Frenchmen: but in the end the Engliſhmen were diſcomfited, and foure hundred of them ſlaine, ſo that ſir Edmund Rous fled into the caſtell of Cornet, & was there beſieged by the ſaid Yuans, till the French king ſent to him to come backe from thence, and ſo he did, leauing the caſtell of Cornet, and ſir Edmund Rous within it as he found him. The Frenchmen this yeare recouered the citie of Poictiers, Rochell alſo, and the moſt part of all Poictou, and finallie laid ſiege to Towars in Poictou, wherein a great number of the lords of that countrie were incloſed, the which fell to a compoſition with the Frenchmen to haue an abſtinence of warre for themſelues, and their lands, till the feaſt of ſaint Michaell next inſuing, which ſhould be in the yeare 1362. And in the meane time they ſent to the king of England their ſoucreigne lord, to certifie him what conditions they had agreed vnto, that if they were not aided by him, or by one of his ſonnes within the ſaid tearme, then they to yeeld them and their lands to the obeiſance of the French king.

Sir Edmund Rous.

The proſperous ſucceſſe of the French men in Poictou.

Not long before this, the capitall of Bueſſz was taken priſoner, and ſir Thomas Percie, with diuerſe other Engliſhmen and Gaſcoignes before Soubiſe by ſir Yuans of Wales and other French capteins, ſo that the countries of Poictou and Xaintonge were in great danger to be quite loſt, if ſpeedie ſuccours came not in time. Whervpon king Edward aduertiſed of that agreement which they within Towars had made, raiſed an armie, rigged his ſhips, and in Auguſt tooke the ſea, purpoſing to come before the day aſſigned, to the ſuccours of that fortreſſe: but the wind continued for the ſpace of nine weekes ſo contrarie vnto his intent, that he was ſtill driuen backe and could not get forward toward the coaſt of Rochell, where he thought to haue landed, ſo that finallie when the daie of reſcuing Towars came, he nor anie of his ſonnes could appeare in thoſe parts, and ſo to his great diſpleaſure he returned home, and licenced all his people to depart to their houſes. By this means was Towars deliuered to the Frenchmen, which ceaſſed not in ſuch occaſions of aduantage to take time, and follow the ſteps of proſperous fortune.

Anno Reg. 47.
The duke of Britaine.

About this ſeaſon the duke of Britaine being ſore diſpleaſed in his mind, that the Engliſhmen ſuſteined ned daſlie loſſes in the parts of Aquitaine, would gladlie haue aided their ſide, if he might haue got the nobles of his countrie to haue ioined with him, but the lords Cliſſon and de la Vale, with the vicount of Roan, and other the lords and barons of Britaine, ſo much fauoured the French king, that he perceiued they would reuolt from him, if he attempted any thing againſt the Frenchmen. He therefore meaning by one way or other to further the king of England his quarell, and fearing to be attached by his owne ſubiects, and ſent to Paris, diſpatched meſſengers to K. Edward, requiring him to ſend ſome power of men of warre into Britaine, to defend him againſt the malice of ſuch as were altogither French and enimies to England.

The lord Neuill ſent into Britaine.

King Edward forthwith ſent ouer the lord Neuill, with foure hundred men of armes, and as manie archers, the which arriuing at ſaint Matthewes de fine Poterne, remained there all the winter. Wherevpon the Britaines being ſore offended therewith, cloſed their townes and fortreſſes againſt their duke, and ſhewed much euill towards him. The conſtable of France ſir Berthram de Cleaquin, laieng ſiege to the towne and caſtell of Sireth in Poictou, diſcomfited a number of Engliſhmen that came to raiſe his ſiege, by meanes whereof he got not onelie Sireth, but alſo Niort, Lucignen, and all other the townes and fortreſſes which the Engliſhmen held till that day within Poictou, Xaintonge, and Rochellois. Shortlie after this, the conſtable returned into France, and was appointed by the king there to go with an armie of men of warre into Britaine, and there to take into his hands all ſuch townes and fortreſſes as belonged to the duke of Britaine, bicauſe he had alied himſelfe with the king of England, and receiued Engliſhmen into his countrie, to the preiudice of the realme of France.

The conſtable of Frāce ſent into Britaine

Sir Robert Knols.

The duke being aduertiſed of the conſtables comming, was counſelled by ſir Robert Knols (whom the king of England had ſent to aid him) that he ſhould paſſe ouer into England, and there to be a ſuter in his owne cauſe for more aid to be ſent into Britaine, to reſiſt the Frenchmen that now ſought to bring the whole countrie into their poſſeſſion. The duke inclining to this aduiſe, went ouer into England, and in the meane time the conſtable came and wan the moſt part of all the townes and fortreſſes of that duchie, except Breſt, where ſir Robert Knols was, and certeine other. The earle of Saliſburie with a great nauie of ſhips, well furniſhed with men of armes and archers, laie vpon the coaſt of Britaine all that time, and greatlie comforted them within Breſt, in ſomuch that he came on land, and offered battell to the conſtable if he would haue come forward & receiued it.

The duke of Britaine cōmeth ouer into England.

The earle of Saliſburie.

Polydor. The duke of Lancaſter ſent ouer into France with an armie.

In the moneth of Iulie in this ſeuen and fourtith yeare of king Edwards reigne, the duke of Lancaſter was ſent ouer vnto Calis with an armie of thirtie thouſand men (as ſome write) but as Froiſſard ſaith, they were but thirteene thouſand, as three thouſand men of armes, and ten thouſand archers. This voiage had beene in preparing for the ſpace of three yeares before. The duke of Britaine was there with them, and of the Engliſh nobilitie, beſide the duke of Lancaſter that was their generall, there were the earles of Warwike, Stafford and Suffolke, the lord Edward Spenſer that was conſtable of the hoſt, the lords Willoughbie, de la Pole, Baſſet, and diuerſe others. Of knights, ſir Henrie Percie, ſir Lewes Clifford, ſir William Beauchampe, the Chanon Robertſart, Walter Hewet, ſir Hugh Caluerlie, ſir Stephan Couſington, ſir Richard Ponchardon, and manie other.

Ia. Meir. Froiſſard.

Noble men that went with him in that iournie.

When they had made readie their cariages and other things neceſſarie for ſuch a iournie which they had taken in hand, that is to ſay, to paſſe through the realme of France vnto Burdeaux, they ſet forward, hauing their armie diuided into three battels. The earles of Warwike and Suffolke did lead the foreward: the two dukes of Lancaſter and Britaine, the middle ward or battell, and the rereward was gouerned by the lord Spenſer conſtable of the hoſt. They paſſed by S. Omers, by Turrouane, and coaſted the countrie of Arthois, and paſſed the water of Some at Corbie. They deſtroied the countries as they went, and marched not paſt three leages a day. They aſſailed none of the ſtrong townes, nor fortreſſes. For the French king had ſo ſtuffed them with notable numbers of men of warre, that they perceiued they ſhould trauell in vaine about the winning of them. At Roy in Vermandois, they reſted them ſeuen daies, and at their departure ſet fire on the towne, bicauſe they could not win the church which was kept againſt them. From thence they drew towards Laon, and ſo marched forward, paſſing the riuers of Yſare, Marne, Saine, and Yonne. The Frenchmen coaſted them, but durſt not approch to giue them battell.

They paſſe through the countrie without aſſaulting any townes.

Fabian.

Neere to Ribaumount, about 80 Engliſhmen of ſir Hugh Caluerlies band were diſtreſſed by 120 Frenchmen: & likewiſe beſide Soiſſons, 120 Engliſh ſpeares, or (as other writers haue) fiftie ſpeares, and twentie archers were vanquiſhed by a Burgonian knight called ſir Iohn de Vienne, that had with him three hundred French ſpeares. Of more hurt by anie incounters I read not that the Engliſhmen ſuſteined in this voiage. For the Frenchmen kept them aloofe, and meant not to fight with their enimies, but onelie to keepe them from vittels, and fetching of forrage abroad, by reaſon whereof the Engliſhmen loſt manie horſſes, and were in deed driuen to great ſcarſitie of vittels. When they had paſſed the riuer of Loire, and were come into the countrie of Berrie, they vnderſtood how the Frenchmen laid themſelues in ſundrie ambuſhes to diſtreſſe them, if they might eſpie the aduantage: but the duke of Lancaſter placing his light horſſemen, with part of the archers in the foreward, and in the battell the whole force of his footmen with the men at armes, diuided into wings to couer that battell, wherein he himſelfe was, the reſidue of the horſſemen with the reſt of the archers he appointed to the rereward, and ſo cauſing them to keepe cloſe togither, marched forth till he came into Poictou, & then in reuenge of the Poictouins that had reuolted from the Engliſh obeiſance, he began a new ſpoile, killing the people, waſting the countrie, and burning the houſes and buildings euerie where as he paſſed, & ſo finallie about Chriſtmaſſe came to Burdeaux.

The Frenchmen meant not to fight with the Engliſhmen.

The archb. of Rauenna ſent from the pope.

Whileſt the duke of Lancaſter was thus paſſing through the realme of France, pope Gregorie the eleuenth ſent the archbiſhop of Rauenna and the biſhop of Carpentras as legats from him, to treat for a peace betwixt the realms of England and France. They rode to & fro betwixt the French king and his brethren, and the duke of Lancaſter: but the duke and the Engliſhmen kept on their waie, and ſo finallie keeping forwards about Chriſtmaſſe came to Burdeaux. The legats purſued their treatie, but the parties were ſo hard, that no reaſonable offers would be taken. The two dukes of Lancaſter and Britaine laie in Burdeaux all the reſidue of the winter, and the Lent following. The ſame yeare that the duke of Lancaſter made this iournie thorough France, the king of England ſent certeine ambaſſadors to the pope, requiring him not to meddle with the reſeruations of benefices within his realme of England, but that thoſe which were elected biſhops might inioy their ſees, and be confirmed of their metropolitane, tropolitane and archbiſhop, as of ancient time they had beene accuſtomed.

The pope would not at that preſent determine anie thing herein, but commanded them that were ſent, that they ſhould certifie him againe of the kings pleaſure and further meaning, in thoſe articles and other touching him and his realme. Alſo this yeare it was decreed in parlement, that cathedrall churches might inioy the right of their elections, and that the king ſhould not hinder them that were choſen, but rather helpe them to their confirmations. ¶ In the ſame parlement was granted to the king a diſme of the cleargie, and a fifteenth of the laitie. ¶ Moreouer at the ſute of the popes legats, a reſpit of war was granted betwixt the kings of England and France, but ſo that the Engliſhmen loſt in Gaſcoine a great number of caſtels and townes, by reaſon of a compoſition made before, that if they were not reſcued by the middeſt of Auguſt, they ſhould then yeeld themſelues French: and bicauſe the truce was agreed vpon to indure till the laſt of Auguſt, the Engliſhmen tooke no heed to the matter. It was further agreed vpon, that in the beginning of September, there ſhould meet in the marches of Picardie, the duke of Lancaſter, and other of the Engliſh part, as commiſſioners to intreat of peace; and the duke of Aniou and other on the French part, the popes legat to be there alſo as mediator. When this agreement was thus accorded, the duke of Lancaſter, and the duke of Britaine, with the earls of Warwike, Suffolke and Stafford, the lords Spenſer, Willoughbie and others, tooke the ſea at Burdeaux the eight of Iulie, and returned into England.

Cõmiſſioners appointed to meet and commune of peace

This yeare the fifth of Iune, died William Witteſey archbiſhop of Canturburie, after whoſe death the monks choſe to that ſee the cardinall of Wincheſter, with which election the king was nothing contented, ſo that after much monie ſpent by the monks to obteine their purpoſe, at length they were diſappointed, and doctor Simon Sudberie was admitted to that dignitie, who before was biſhop of London, being the ſeauen and fiftith archbiſhop that had ruled that ſee. He was choſen by the appointment of the king, and conſent of the pope. For alredie was that decree worne out of vſe, whereby the elections of biſhops haue reſted in the voices of them of the cathedrall church: for not onelie this Simon archbiſhop of Canturburie, but other alſo were ordeined biſhops from thenceforth, by the will and authoritie of the popes and kings of this realme, till at length it came to paſſe, that onelie the kings inſtituted biſhops, and the biſhops ordeined other gouernours vnder them of meaner degrees.

Death of the archb. of Can.

Simon Sudberie elected archbiſhop.

Thus the popes within a while loſt all their authoritie, which they had before time within this relme in the appointing of biſhops, and other rulers of churches; and in like manner alſo they loſt ſhortlie after their authoritie of leuieng tenths of ſpirituall promotions, the which they in former times had vſed, to the great detriment of the realme, which loſt nothing by this new ordinance: for the Engliſh people were not compelled afterwards to depart with their monie vnto ſtrangers, ſo largelie as before, to content the greedineſſe of that corruorant generation of Romaniſts, whoſe inſatiable deſires would admit no ſtint, as infected with the dropſie of filthie auarice, for

Omnia des cupido, ſua non perit inde cupido,
Quò plus ſunt potæ plus ſitiuntur aquæ.

This reſtraining reformation concerned the benefit of the whole land verie much: for K. Edward the third was the firſt that cauſed an act to be made, that none vnder a great penaltie ſhould ſeeke to obteine anie ſpirituall promotions within this realme of the pope, or bring anie ſutes to his court, except by waie of appeale: and that thoſe that were the aiders of any ſuch offendors againſt this act, ſhould run in danger of the ſame paine, which act by thoſe kings that ſucceeded was not onelie commanded to be kept, but alſo confirmed with new penalties, and is called the ſtatute of Premunire.

Anno Reg. 49.

About Candlemaſſe there met at Bruges as commiſſioners for the king of England, the duke of Lancaſter, the earle of Saliſburie, and the biſhop of London. For the French king, the dukes of Aniou, and Burgognie, the earle of Salebruce, and the biſhop of Amiens with others. Finallie, when they could not agree vpon anie good concluſion for peace, they accorded vpon a truce, to indure to the firſt of Maie next inſuing in all the marches of Calis, and vp to the water of Some; but the other places were at libertie to be ſtill in warre: by report of other writers, the truce was agreed vpon to continue till the feaſt of All ſaints next inſuing. About the ſame time that the foreſaid commiſſioners were at Bruges intreating of peace, the duke of Britaine did ſo much with his father in law king Edward, that about the beginning of Aprill he ſent ouer with him into Britaine the earles of Cambridge, March, Warwike, and Stafford, the lord Spenſer, ſir Thomas Holland, ſir Nicholas Camois, ſir Edward Twiford, ſir Richard Ponchardon, ſir Iohn Leſſelles, ſir Thomas Grandſon, ſir Hugh Haſtings, and diuerſe other worthie capteins with a power of three thouſand archers, and two thouſand men of armes, all verie well furniſhed to fight.

An armie ſent ouer into Britaine with the duke.

They landed at ſaint Matthews or Mahe de fine Poterne, where they tooke the caſtell by force, and the towne by ſurrender. From thence they went to Pole de Lion, and wan it likewiſe by force of aſſault, and then went to Brieu de Vaux, a towne ſtronglie fenſed, and well manned. In hope yet to win it, the duke of Britaine and the Engliſh lords laid ſiege to it, but hearing that an Engliſh knight, one ſir Iohn Deureux was beſieged in a fortreſſe which he had newlie made, by the vicount of Roan, the L. Cliſſon, and other of the French part, they raiſed from Brieu de Vaux, and haſted forward to the ſuccor of ſir Iohn Deureux, erneſtlie wiſhing to find their enimies in the field, that they might giue them battell: but the Britiſh lords hearing that the duke and the Engliſhmen approched, made no longer abode, but got them with all ſpeed vnto Campellie a towne of great ſtrength not farre off, and therein cloſed themſelues for their more ſafetie. The duke of Britaine hearing that they were fled thither, followed them, and laid ſiege round about the towne, inforcing himſelfe to obteine the place, and ſo had doone in deed by all likelihood verie ſhortlie, if at the ſame time, by reaſon of a truce taken for twelue moneths, he had not beene commanded by the duke of Lancaſter, without delaie to ceaſſe his war, and breake vp his campe: as he did.

This truce was cõcluded to indure from midſummer in this 1375, vnto midſummer in ẏ yeare next inſuing.

There were ſundrie meetings of the commiſſioners for this treatie of peace, and ſtill they tooke longer time for continuance of the truce. And bicauſe that Britaine and all the other countries of France (as ſhould ſeeme) were included in this truce, it ſeemeth that this was ſome ſecond truce, and not the firſt truce, which included onelie the marches of Calis, and thoſe parts vp to the water of Some. But howſoeuer it was, the duke of Britaine being in a great forwardneſſe to haue recouered his duchie out of the Frenchmens hands, and to haue reduced his rebellious ſubiects vnder due obeiſance againe, was now by this truce concluded out of time, greatlie diſappointed, and ſo brake vp his ſiege from before Campellie, and ſent home the Engliſh armie. He went himſelfe to Aulroie, where his wife was; and taking order for the fortifieng and keeping of thoſe places, which were in his poſſeſſion, he came backe againe into England, and brought his wife with him.

A litle before the concluding of this truce, the Engliſhmen and others within the fortreſſe of ſaint Sauiour le vicount, in the Ile or rather Cloſe (as they call it) of Conſtantine, which had béene long beſieged, made a compoſition, that if they were not reſcued by a certeine daie, then ſhould they yéeld vp the place to the Frenchmen. Now bicauſe this truce was agréed before the daie appointed for the reſcue of that place, with condition that either part ſhould inioy and hold that which at that preſent they had in poſſeſſion, during the terme of the truce; the Engliſhmen thought that ſaint Sauiour le vicount ſhould be ſaued by reaſon of that treatie: but the Frenchmen to the contrarie auouched, that the firſt couenant ought to paſſe the laſt ordinance. So that whẽ the daie approched, the French king ſent thither ſix thouſand ſpeares, knights, and eſquiers, beſide other people: and bicauſe none appeared to giue them battell, they had the towne deliuered to them.

¶ In this 49 yeare of K. Edwards reigne, a great death chanced in this land, and in diuerſe other countries, ſo that innumerable numbers of people died and periſhed of that contagious ſickeneſſe. Amongſt other the lord Edward Spenſer died the ſame yeare, a man of great renowme and valiantneſſe. Alſo the earle of Penbroke, hauing compounded for his ranſome, as he was vpon his returne from Spaine, comming homewards through France, he fell ſicke, and being brought in an horſſelitter to Arras, he died there, on the 16 daie of Aprill, leauing a ſonne behind him not paſt two yeares of age, begot of the counteſſe his wife called Anne, daughter vnto the lord Walter de Mannie. Polydor miſtaking the matter, ſaith that Marie the counteſſe of Penbroke, who builded Penbroke hall in Cambridge, was wife to this John Haſtings earle of Penbroke, whereas in déed ſhe was wife to his anceſtor Aimer de Valence earle of Penbroke (as Iohn Stow in his ſummarie hath trulie noted.) She was daughter to Guy earle of ſaint Pole, a worthie ladie and a vertuous, tendering ſo much the wealthfull ſtate of this land (a great part wherof conſiſteth in the good bringing vp of youth, and training them to the knowledge of learning) that for maintenance of ſtudents ſhe began the forſaid commendable foundation, about the yeare of Chriſt 1343, vpon a plot of ground that was hir owne, hauing purchaſed licence thereto of the king, to whom ſhe was of kin.

And at ſaint Omers laie the duke of Aniou, the archbiſhop of Rauenna; and the biſhop of Carpentras tooke great paine to go to and fro betwéene the parties: but they were ſo far at ods in their demands, and as it were of ſet purpoſe on the French behalfe, that no good could be doone betwixt them. The French king required to haue Calis raced, and to haue againe fourtéene hundred thouſand franks, which were paid for the ranſome of king John. The king of England demanded to haue all the lands reſtored to him in Gaſcoigne and Guien cléerelie exempt of all reſorts. A parlement.

In this fiftith yeare, king Edward aſſembled his high court of parlement at Weſtminſter, in the which was demanded a ſubſidie of the commons for the defenſe of the kings dominions againſt his enimies. Wherevnto anſwer was made by the common houſe, that they might no longer beare ſuch charges, conſidering the manifold burthens by them ſuſteined in time paſt. And further they ſaid, it was well knowne the king was rich inough to withſtand his enimies, if his monie and treaſure were well imploied: but the land had béene of long time euill guided by euill officers, ſo that the ſame could not be ſtored with chaffer, merchandize, or other riches. The commons alſo declared whom they tooke and iudged to be chéefe cauſer of this diſorder, as the duke of Lancaſter, & the L. Latimer lord chamberleine to the king; alſo dame Alice Perers, whom the king had long time kept to his concubine; and alſo one named ſir Richard Sturrie, by whoſe ſiniſter meanes and euill counſell the king was miſled, and the land euill gouerned. Wherefore the commons by the mouth of their ſpeaker ſir Péers de la Mere, required that thoſe perſons might be remooued from the king, and other more diſcréet ſet in their roomes about his perſon, and ſo put in authoritie, that they might ſée to his honour and weale of the realme, more than the other had doone before them.

But yer this monie could be leuied, the king was conſtreined to borrow certeine great ſummes in ſundrie places, and therefore he ſent to the citie of London for foure thouſand pounds. And bicauſe Adam Staple the maior was not diligent in furthering that lone, he was by the kings commandement diſcharged on the 22 daie of March, and Richard Whitington mercer choſen in his place.

His bodie was conueied to Canturburie with great ſolemnitie, and there honorablie buried. Comiſſioners ſet to Bruges

This yeare being the one and fiftith and laſt of king Edwards reigne, there were ſent againe to Bruges as commiſſioners to treat of peace on the part of king Edward, John lord Cobham, the biſhop of Hereford, and the maior of London. And for the French part thither came the earle of Salebruch, monſieur de Chatillon, and Phillibert Leſpoit. And ſtill the two legats were preſent as mediatours betwixt the parties, móouing a mariage to be had, betwixt Richard prince of Wales, and the ladie Marie, daughter to the French king. But they departed in ſunder for this time without anie concluſion. But ſhortlie after in Lent following, there was a ſecret méeting appointed to be had at Montreuill by the ſea, whither came from the king of England, ſir Richard Dangle a Poictouine, ſir Richard Stan, & Geffrie Chaucer. For the French king there appeared the lord Coucie, and others. Theſe commiſſioners treated a long ſeaſon concerning the mariage, and when they had vnderſtanding and felt each others meaning, they departed and made report of the ſame to their maiſters. The truce was againe prolonged till the firſt daie of Maie.

Cõmiſſioners ſent to Montreuill.

The truce eftſoones prolonged.

And in the meane time, the earle of Saliſburie, the biſhop of ſaint Dauie lord chancellour of England, and the biſhop of Hereford went ouer to Calis. In like caſe the lord of Coucie, and ſir William Dorman chancellor of France came to Montreuill. But they durſt not méet at anie indifferent place on the frontiers, for the doubt that either partie had of other, for anie thing the legats could ſaie or dóo. Thus theſe commiſſioners abode in that ſtate till the truce was expired. And when the warre was open, then ſir Hugh Caluerlie was ſent ouer to Calis, to remaine vpon ſafe kéeping of that towne, as deputie there. The earle of Saliſburie, and the other commiſſioners returned into England, and with them the duke of Britaine. On the twelfth day of Aprill this yeare, one ſir John Minſterworth knight, was drawne, hanged, headed, and quartered at Tiborne, being firſt condemned and adiudged to ſuffer that execution before the maior of London, and other the kings iuſtices in the Guildhall, for treaſon by him committed, in defrauding ſouldiers of their wages: for where he had receiued great ſummes of monie to make paiment thereof to them, he reteined the ſame to his owne vſe.

Moreouer (as in the fortie foure yeare of this king yée haue heard) he was the chéefe procurer and ſetter forward of the diſſention that roſe in the armie, which vnder the leading of ſir Robert Knolles was ſent into France. And when in that iournie he had loſt moſt of his men, and was eſcaped himſelfe into England, he laid all the blame on ſir Robert Knolles, accuſing him to the king of heinous treaſon; ſo as the king tóoke no ſmall diſpleaſure againſt the ſaid ſir Robert, inſomuch that he durſt not returne into England, till he had pacified the kings wrath with monie, and that the knowne fidelitie of the man had warranted him againſt the malicious and vntrue ſuggeſtions of his enimies. Wherevpon the ſaid Minſterworth perceiuing his craft to want the wiſhed ſucceſſe, he fled to the French king, and conſpiring with him to annoie the realme of England by bringing the Spaniſh nauie to inuade the ſame, at length he was taken in the towne of Pampilona in Nauarre, and brought backe into England, where he taſted the deſerued fruit of his contriued treaſon (as before yée haue heard.)

Thom.Walſi.
John wiclife.

About this ſeaſon, there roſe in the vniuerſitie of Oxenford a learned man John Wiclife, borne in the north parts, who being a ſecular préeſt, and a ſtudent in diuinitie, began to propone certeine concluſions greatlie contrarie to the doctrine of the church in thoſe daies eſtabliſhed, ſpeciallie he argued againſt móonks, and other men of religion that inioied great riches, and large poſſeſſions. There were diuerſe that gaue góod eare to him, inſomuch that ſundrie learned men of that vniuerſitie preached and ſet foorth the doctrine that he taught. ¶ Amongſt other articles which they held, theſe were the chéefe and principall.

The chéefeſt articles preached by Wiclife.

1 That the ſacrament of the altar, after conſecration, was not the bodie of Chriſt, but a figure thereof.

2 That the church of Rome was no more head of the vniuerſall church than any one other, nor more authoritie was giuen by Chriſt vnto Peter, than to anie other of the apoſtles, and that the pope had no more power in the keies of the church than anie other préeſt whatſoeuer.

3 That temporall lords might both lawfullie and meritoriouſlie take the temporall góods and reuenues from the church, if it offended; and if anie temporall lord knew the church to offend, he was bound vnder paine of damnation to take from it the temporalties.

4 That the goſpell is ſufficient in this life to direct by rule euerie chriſtian man.

5 That all other rules of ſaints, vnder the obſeruing whereof diuers religious dóo liue, ad no more perfection to the goſpell, than waſhing ouer with lime dooth the wall.

6 That the pope, nor anie other prelat of the church, ought to haue anie priſons wherein to puniſh offendors.

Theſe and manie other opinions did theſe men hold and mainteine, and diuerſe lords and great men of the land fauoured their cauſe. But when theſe concluſions were brought before the pope, he condemned the number of 23 of thoſe articles as vaine and hereticall, directing his buls to the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and to the biſhop of London, that they ſhould cauſe the ſaid Wiclife to be apprehended, and examined vpon the ſaid concluſions, which they did in preſence of the duke of Lancaſter, and the lord Percie, and hearing his declaration, commanded him to ſilence, and in no wiſe to deale with thoſe matters from thenceforth, ſo that for a time, both he and his fellowes kept ſilence: but after at the contemplation of diuerſe of the temporall lords, they preached and ſet forth their doctrine againe.

Wiclife & his felowes mainteined by certeine lords.

The ſame day that Wiclife was conuented thus at London, before the biſhops and other lords, thorough a word ſpoken in reproch by the duke of Lancaſter vnto the biſhop of London, ſtreightwaies the Londoners getting them to armour, meant to haue ſlaine the duke, & if the biſhop had not ſtaid them, they had ſuerlie ſet fire on the dukes houſe at the Sauoie: and with much adoo might the biſhop quiet them. Among other reprochfull parts which in deſpite of the duke they committed, they cauſed his armes in the publike ſtréet to be reuerſed as if he had béene a traitor, or ſome notorious offendor. The duke and the lord Henrie Percie, whom the citizens ſought in his owne houſe to haue ſlaine him, if he had béen found, hearing of this riotous ſtur and rebellious commotion, forſooke their dinner and fled to Kenington, where the lord Richard, ſonne to the prince, togither with his mother then remained, exhibiting before their preſence, a grieuous complaint of the opprobrious iniuries doone vnto them, by the wilfull outrage of the Londoners. For this and other cauſes, the citizens were ſore hated of the duke, in ſo much that he cauſed the maior & aldermen that then ruled to be diſcharged of their roomes, and other put in their places.

The duke of Lancaſter in danger by the Londoners.

The lord Percie.

The king being more grieuouſlie vexed with ſickneſſe from daie to daie, either increaſing by the courſe therof, or renewed by ſome new ſurfet, finallie this yeare departed out of this tranſitorie life at his manour of Shéene, now called Richmond, the 21 daie of Iune, in the yeare of our Lord 1377, after he had liued 65 yeares, & reigned fiftie yeares, foure moneths, & 28 daies. His corpſe was conueied from Shéene by his foure ſonnes, namelie Lionell duke of Clarence, Iohn of Gant duke of Lancaſter, Edmund of Langlie duke of Yorke, and Thomas of Woodſtoke earle of Cambridge, with other nobles of the realme, and ſolemnelie interred within Weſtminſter church, with this epitaph in his memoriall:

Tho. Walſi.
The deceaſſe of K. Edward the third.

Fabian, pag. 262, 263.

Hic decus Anglorum, flos regum præteritorum,
Forma futurorum, rex clemens, pax populorum,
Tertius Edwardus, regni complens iubileum,
Inuictus pardus, pollens bellis Machabeum.

His iſſue.

He had iſſue by his wife quéene Philip 7 ſonnes, Edward prince of Wales, William of Hatfield that died yoong, Lionell duke of Clarence, Iohn of Gant duke of Lancaſter, Edmund of Langlie earle of Cambridge & after created duke of Yorke, Thomas of Woodſtoke erle of Buckingham after made duke of Gloceſter, and an other William which died likewiſe yoong. He had alſo thrée daughters, Marie that was maried to Iohn of Mountford duke of Britaine, Iſabell wedded to the lord Coucie earle of Bedford, and Margaret coupled in mariage with the earle of Penbroke.

His praiſe.

This king, beſides other his gifts of nature, was aided greatlie by his ſéemelie perſonage. He had a prouident wit, ſharpe to conceiue and vnderſtand: he was courteous and gentle, dooing all things ſagelie and with good conſideration, a man of great temperance and ſobrietie. Thoſe he chiefelie fauoured and aduanced to honour, and roomes of high dignitie, which excelled in honeſt conuerſation, modeſtie, and innocencie of life, of bodie well made, of a conuenient ſtature, as neither of the higheſt nor loweſt ſort: of face faire and manlike, eies bright and ſhining, and in age bald, but ſo as it was rather a ſéemelineſſe to thoſe his ancient yeares than any diſfiguring to his viſage; in knowledge of martiall affaires verie ſkilfull, as the enterpriſes and worthie acts by him atchiued doo ſufficientlie witneſſe.

His proportion of bodie.

In what eſtimation he was had among ſtrangers it may appeare, in that he was not onelie made vicar of the empire by the emperour Lewes of Bauiere, but alſo after the deceaſe of the ſame emperour, diuerſe of the electours, as Lewes marques of Brandenbourgh, Robert or Rupert count Palatine of the Rhene, and the yoong duke of Saxonie, with Henrie archbiſhop of Mentz, elected him to ſuccéed in place of the ſaid emperour Lewes. Neuertheleſſe, he giuing them hartie thanks for the honour which they did vnto him herein, refuſed to take the charge vpon him, alledging that he could not haue time to ſupplie the roome, by reaſon of the warres that he had in France, to recouer his right which he had to that realme.

This is noted by writers to be a token of great wiſedome in this noble king, that would not go about to catch more than he might well gripe. Examples of bountious liberalitie, and great clemencie he ſhewed manie, and the ſame verie notable; ſo that in maner he alone amongſt all other kings was found to be one, ſubiect to none, or at the leaſt, to verie light and ſmall faults. But yet he was not void of euill haps: for whereas, during the terme of fortie yeares ſpace he reigned in high felicitie, and as one happie in all his dooings: ſo in the reſt of his time that followed, he felt a wonderfull change in fortune (whom writers compare to the moone for hir variableneſſe, and often alterations, as neuer at a ſtaie, ſaieng, Creſcit, decreſcit, in eodem ſiſtere neſcit) ſhewing hir ſelfe froward to him in moſt part of his procéedings: for ſuch is the ſtate of this world, ſeldome dooth proſperitie continue, and guide the ſterne of our worldlie dooings, as it well appeared by this noble prince. For in the firſt yeares of his reigne, after he once began to gouerne of himſelfe, he recouered that which had béene loſt in Scotland, by great victories obteined againſt his aduerſaries in that land, and paſſed further into the ſame, than euer his grandfather king Edward the firſt had doone before him, ſubduing the countrie on each hand, ſo that he placed gouernors, and beſtowed offices, lands, and liuings in that realme at his pleaſure.

Vultus fortunæ variatur imagine lunæ,

Proſperitie vnſtable.

¶ Amongſt other (as I remember) there is yet remaining a charter vnder his great ſeale conteining a grant made vnto Iohn Eure and his heires for his good ſeruice doone in thoſe parts, of a manour called Ketnes in the countie of Forfar (which lieth in the north of Scotland) with a market euerie mondaie, and a faire for thrée daies togither at Michaelmaſſe, as the euen, the daie, and the morrow after. Alſo he granted to the ſame Iohn Eure, frée warren thoroughout the ſame lordſhip. This Iohn Eure was anceſtor vnto the lord Eure that now liueth, who hath the ſame charter in his poſſeſſion. ¶ As for this kings victories in France, the ſame were ſuch as might ſéeme incredible, if the conſent of all writers in that age confirmed not the ſame. But as theſe victories were glorious, ſo yet they proued not ſo profitable in the end: for whereas he had ſore burdened his ſubiects with taſkes and ſubſidies, at length they wared wearie, and began to withdraw their forward minds to helpe him with ſuch ſummes as had beene requiſit for the maintenance of the warres, which the Frenchmen prolonged of purpoſe, and refuſed to trie their fortune any more in pight fields, wherby when he was conſtreined to be at continuall charges in ſuch lingering warres, to defend that which he had erſt gotten by force, and couenants of the peace; the ſinewes of warre, to wit monie, began to faile him, and ſo the enimies recouered a great part of that which before time they had loſt, both on the further ſide the ſeas, and likewiſe in Scotland.

Iohn Stow vpon conference referreth this to the laſt yeare of king Edward the firſt.

This muſt needs be a great greefe vnto a prince of ſuch a ſtout and valiant ſtomach, namelie ſith he had beene ſo long time before accuſtomed to find fortune ſtill ſo fauourable vnto him in all his enterpriſes. But finalie the thing that moſt greeued him, was the loſſe of that moſt noble gentleman, his deere ſonne prince Edward, in whom was found all parts that might be wiſhed in a worthie gouernour. But this and other miſhaps that chanced to him now in his old yeares, might ſeeme to come to paſſe for a reuenge of his diſobedience ſhewed to his father in vſurping againſt him, although it might be ſaid, that he did it by conſtreint, and through the aduiſe of others. But whether the remorſe hereof, or of his other offenſes moued him, it may ſeeme (as ſome write) that the conſideration of this worlds mutabilitie, which he tried to the full, cauſed him (as is thought) to haue in mind the life in the world to come, and therefore of a pure deuotion founded the church and colledge of ſaint Stephan at Weſtminſter, and another at Cambridge called The kings hall, giuing therevnto lands and reuenues, to the maintenance of them that would giue themſelues vnto learning.

Mines of gold & ſiluer.

Towards the maintenance of his warres, and furniſhing forth of ſuch other charges and expenſes as he tooke in hand to beare out, he had ſome helpe by the ſiluer mines in Deuonſhire and Cornewall, in like manner as his grandfather king Edward the firſt had. For one Matthew Crowthorne keeper of his mines in thoſe parts, yeelded diuerſe accounts of the iſſues and profits of the ſame, betweene the ſecond and fifteenth yeare of his reigne, as well for the ſiluer as for the lead, after the ſiluer was fined from it. Alſo Iohn Moneron ſucceeding in the ſame office, accomptant of the profits of the ſame mines, from Michaelmaſſe in the nineteenth yeare of his reigne, vnto the ſecond of Nouember in the three and twentith yeare, yeelded vpon his accounts, both the ſiluer and the lead thereof remaining. Moreouer he let by indenture in the two and thirtith yeare of his reigne, vnto Iohn Ballancer, and Walter Goldbeater, his mines of gold, ſiluer, and copper, in the countie of Deuonſhire, for terme of years. There is an account thereof remaining, and by the ſame (as it appeareth) was anſwered for the firſt yeare twentie markes. The ſecond yeare the patentees died, and the king then diſpoſed the ſame to others. In the eight and twentith yeare of his reigne, he committed by indenture his ſaid mines in Deuonſhire, to one maſter Iohn Hanner, and one Herman Raineſthorpe of Boheme, minors, yeelding to the king the tenth part of the oare, as well of the gold and ſiluer, as of the lead and copper that ſhould be gotten forth of the ſaid mines.

In this kings daies, there liued manie excellent men, both in learning, in vertue, and in martiall proweſſe, as partlie is touched in this diſcourſe of his reigne; and firſt, the ſaid noble and moſt valiant king, the prince of Wales his ſonne ſurnamed the blacke prince, the duke of Lancaſter Iohn of Gant ſonne to the king, and his father in law duke Henrie, Edmund earle of Cambridge, and after duke of Yorke; the earles of Warwike, Huntington, Saliſburie, Stafford, Northampton, Arundell and others; the lord Reginald Cobham, the lord Baſſet, the lord Thomas Holland, the lord Walter de Mannie and Henuier, the lord Edward Spenſer, the lord Iohn Chandois, the lord Iames Audeley, Sir Iohn Copland, ſir Thomas Felton, ſir Robert Knolles, who (as I haue ſaid) being borne in Cheſhire of meane parentage, through his manlie proweſſe, and moſt ſkilfull experience in the warres, grew to be right famous.

Moreouer, ſir Hugh Caluerlie borne in the ſame ſhire, the capitall de Beuſe a Gaſcoigne, ſir Thomas Percie, ſir Hugh Haſtings, ſir Baldwine Freuill, ſir Iohn Harleſton, ſir Iames Pipe, ſir Thomas Dagworth, & that valiant Engliſh knight ſir Iohn Hawkewood, whoſe fame in the parts of Italie ſhall remaine for euer, where (as their hiſtories make mention) he grew to ſuch eſtimation for his valiant atchiued enterpriſes, that happie might that prince or common-wealth accompt themſelues, that might haue his ſeruice, and ſo liuing there in ſuch reputation, ſomtimes he ſerued the pope, ſomtimes the lords of Millane, now this prince or common-wealth, now that, and other whiles none at all, but taking one towne or other, would keepe the ſame, till ſome liking enterteinment were offered, and then would he ſell ſuch a towne, where he had thus remained, to them that would giue him for it according to his mind. Barnabe lord of Millane gaue vnto him one of his baſe daughters in marriage, with an honorable portion for hir dower.

This man was borne in Eſſex (as ſome write) who at the firſt became a tailor in London, & afterwards going to the warres in France, ſerued in the roome of an archer, but at length he became a capteine and leader of men of war, highlie commended and liked of amongſt the ſouldiers, in ſo much that, when by the peace concluded at Bretignie, in the yeare 1360, great numbers of ſoldiers were diſcharged out of wages, they got themſelues togither in companies, and without commandement of any prince, by whoſe authoritie they might make warre, they fell to of themſelues, and ſore harried and ſpoiled diuerſe countries in the realme of France, as partlie yee haue heard: amongſt whome this ſir Iohn Hawkewood was one of the principall capteins, & at length went into Italie, to ſerue the marques of Montferrato, againſt the duke of Millane: although I remember that ſome write, how he came into that countrie with the duke of Clarence, but I thinke the former report be true: but it may well be, that he was readie to attend the ſaid duke at his comming into Italie. And thus much concerning ſuch famous capteins as ſerued this noble king Edward the third, although for breefeneſſe I paſſe ouer diuerſe other, no leſſe famous and worthie for their high manhood and tried valiancie to be remembred, than theſe afore mentioned.

Of learned men, theſe we find by Iohn Bale regiſtred in the Centuries; Iohn Baconthrop borne in Blackney in Northfolke, a frier Carmelite, and prouinciall of his order, ſo excellentlie learned, as well in diuinitie, as in both the ciuill and canon lawes, that he proceeded doctor in either facultie at Oxenford and Paris, and wrote diuerſe treatiſes, to his high and ſingular commendation; William Ockam, Iohn Bloxham a Carmelite frier, Nicholas Triuet borne in Northfolke, ſonne to ſir Thomas Triuet knight, & one of the kings iuſticiers, proued excellentlie learned, and wrote diuerſe treatiſes, and amongſt other, two hiſtories, and one booke of annales, he was by profeſſion a blacke frier, and departed this life about the ſecond yeare of this king Edward the third, in the yeare of Chriſt 1328; William Alnewike borne in Northumberland, in the towne whereof he tooke name, a frier Minor; John Tanet borne in the Ile of Tanet, an excellent muſician, and a monke in Canturburie; Hugh of ſaint Neot, a Carmelite frier in Hertfordſhire, a notable diuine as thoſe daies gaue; William Alton borne in Hampſhire, a blacke frier and a diuine.

Furthermore, Richard Stradley borne in the marches of Wales, a monke and a diuine, writing certeine treatiſes of the ſcripture; William Herbert a Welſhman and a frier Minor, wrote alſo certeine goodlie treatiſes of diuinitie; Richard Comington a frier of the order of the Cordeliers, a preacher, and a writer of diuinitie; William Exeter a doctor of diuinitie, and a prebendarie canon in Exeter, whereas it is thought he was borne; Lucas Boſden a weſterne man, and by profeſſion a Carmelite frier; Thomas Walleis a Dominike frier, a great diuine, as by ſuch bookes as he wrote it may appeare; Thomas Pontius a monke of Canturburie, John Ridewall a graie frier, Henrie Coſteſay or Coſſey a frier Minor, Geffrie Aleuant borne in Yorkeſhire, a frier Carmelite; John Euerſden, a monke in Burie in Suffolke, an hiſtoriographer; Simon Burneſton, a doctor of the Vniuerſitie of Cambridge, and prouinciall of the friers Dominike or blacke friers, as they called them here in England; Walter Burlie a doctor of diuinitie, who in his youth was brought vp, not onlie in Martine college in Oxford, but alſo in the Vniuerſities and ſchooles abroad beyond the ſeas, in France and Germanie, & afterwards for his wiſedome, good demeanor & learning, he was reteined with the biſhop of Vlmes in Suabenland, a region in high Germanie.

Amongſt other treatiſes which he compiled, being manie, and namelie of naturall philoſophie, he wrote a commentarie of the ethikes of Ariſtotle, and dedicated the ſame vnto the ſaid biſhop, a worke which hath beene highlie eſteemed, not onelie in the Vniuerſities of Italie, Germanie and France, but alſo here in our Vniuerſities of England. To conclude, ſuch was the fame of this doctor Burlie, that when the ladie Philip, daughter to the earle of Henault ſhould come ouer into England to be married to king Edward, this doctor Burlie was reteined by hir, and appointed to be hir almoner, and ſo continued in great eſtimation, in ſo much that after Edward prince of Wales, eldeſt ſonne to king Edward commonlie called the blacke prince, was borne, and able to learne his booke, the ſaid Burlie among other was commanded to be one of his inſtructors.

By reaſon hereof, ſir Simon Burlie, of whom I haue made ſome mention heretofore in this kings life, and more intend to ſpeake, as occaſion ſerueth in the next king, being ſonne to ſir John Burlie, neere kinſman to the ſaid doctor Burlie, was admitted among other yoong gentlemen, to be ſchoolefelow with the ſaid prince, by occaſion whereof he grew in ſuch credit and fauour with the ſaid prince, that afterwards when his ſon Richard of Burdeaux, that ſucceeded king Edward his father, was borne, the ſaid prince for ſpeciall truſt and confidence which he had in the ſaid ſir Simon Burlie, cōmitted the gouernance & education of his ſon the ſaid Richard vnto him, whereby he was euer after highlie in fauour with the ſaid Richard, and no leſſe aduanced by him, when he came to inioy the crowne of this realme.

But now to other learned men of that age. John Barwike a frier Minor, and reader to his fellowes of that order in Oxford; William Notingham, Roger Olacton, borne in Huntingtonſhire, an Auguſtin frier; John Poleſteed borne in Suffolke, a Carmelite frier in Ipſwich or Gippeſwich as they write it; Walter Kingham a frier alſo of the order of thoſe Dominikes, which they called pied friers; Roger of Cheſter a monke of that citie and an hiſtoriographer; Thomas de Hales a frier Minor, Robert Eliphat a graie frier, Geffrie Grandfield an Auguſtine or blacke frier, Hugh Wirlie a Carmelite frier of Norwich, William Eincourt a blacke frier of Boſton, Hugh Ditton borne in Cambridgeſhire a frier preacher, Adam Carthuſianus a doctor of diuinitie, John Luttrell an excellent philoſopher and well ſeene in the mathematicals, Walter Cotton and Thomas Eckleſton both graie friers, John Folſham a Carmelite frier in Norwich, Benet of Northfolke, William Southhampton ſo called of the towne where he was borne, a blacke frier.

Moreouer, John Burgh a monke wrote an hiſtorie, and certeine homilies; Adam Nidzard a maſter of art, Edmund Albon, Robert Counton a graie frier, William Liſſie a frier Minor, John Kepingale borne in Lincolneſhire a Carmelite or white frier, as they called them; Chriſtopher Mothuſenſis a blacke frier, Richard Aungeruile borne in Suffolke, who was biſhop of Dureſme, and lord chancellor of England; John Manduith, Walter Heminford a canon of Giſborne an hiſtoriographer, John Olnie borne in Gloceſterſhire, in an Ile ſo called, whereof he tooke his ſurname a Chartreux monke; Thomas Staueſhaw a frier Minor in Briſtow, Robert of Leiceſter taking that ſurname of the towne where he was borne, a Franciſcane or graie frier; John of Northhampton borne in that towne, and a Carmelite frier, an excellent mathematician.

Adde to the foreſaid learned men, Robert Worſop borne in Yorkeſhire, and a blacke frier in Tickill; William Bruniard a blacke frier, Richard Chicheſter, a monke of Weſtminſter wrote an excellent chronicle, beginning the ſame at the comming in of the Saxons, about the yeare of our Lord 449, and continued it till the yeare 1348; Richard Rolle alias Hampole an excellent diuine wrote many treatiſes; John Guent a Welſhman, a Franciſcane frier, and prouinciall of the order; Rodulph Radiptorius a frier Minor, Robert Holcoth a blacke frier, borne in Northampton, excellentlie learned, and wrote manie works, both of diuinitie and other arguments; William Miluerlie a logician or rather a ſophiſter, John Teukeſburie, Thomas Bradwardin borne in Hartfield, a towne within the dioceſſe of Chicheſter, archbiſhop of Canturburie ſucceeding John Offord, he wrote againſt the Pelagians; Richard Wetherſet, William Breton a graie frier, a Welſhman borne, as Bale ſuppoſeth; John of ſaint Faith, borne in Northfolke, a Carmelite frier of Brumham.

Furthermore, John Goodwicke borne alſo in Northfolke, an Auguſtine frier of Lin; William Rothwell a blacke frier, Geffrie Waterton monke of Burie, Richard Fitz Rafe, whom ſome take to be an Iriſhman, but a ſtudent in Oxford, and ſcholer to John Baconthorpe profited highlie, & wrote manie treatiſes, he was firſt archdeacon of Lichfield, and after chancellor of the Vniuerſitie of Oxford, and at length archbiſhop of Ardmachan in Ireland; Richard Kilington a doctor of diuinitie, William Griſant a notable phyſician, ſurnamed of the countrie where he was borne Anglicus, he led the later end of his life at Marſeilles in Prouance, & had a ſon that was abbat of the regular canons of that citie, who at length was aduanced to gouerne the ſee of Rome, & named Vrbane the fift; John Paſchall borne in Suffolke, a Carmelite frier in Gippeſwich, and by K. Edward the third preferred to the biſhoprike of Landaffe; Adam Woodham a frier Minor, Simon Henton a blacke frier, William de Pagula; of John Wicliffe ye haue heard before.

Pope Vrban the fift.

Moreouer, Geffrie Hardebie a blacke frier of Leiceſter, William Binham, Roger Counwey a Welſhman borne in Counwey a grey frier, Richard Billingham, William Doroch a lawier, John Billingworth an excellent philoſopher, aſtronomer, and phyſician; William of Couentrie a frier Carmelite, profeſſed and borne in the ſame citie; Ranulfe Higden a moonke of Cheſter and borne in thoſe parts, an hiſtoriographer; John Eaſtwood alias Aſchenton an excellent philoſopher, Thomas Ratclife borne in Leiceſter, and an Auguſtine frier in Leiceſter towne; Bartholomew Glanuille deſcended of noble parentage, as of the linage of thoſe Glanuilles that were ſometimes earles of Suffolke, as Bale ſaith; Robert Computiſta a moonke of Burie, John Wilton a moonke of Weſtminſter, Simon Wichingham a frier Carmelite of Norwich, John Deir a northerne man borne a notable diuine.

Furthermore, Simon Iſlep, founder of Canturburie colledge in Oxenford, wrote diuerſe treatiſes, he was archbiſhop of Canturburie, as before yee haue heard; George Chadley, John of Tinmouth vicar of that towne in the biſhoprike of Durham, Peter Babion, Walter Wiborne or Wimborne, Nicholas de Lin borne in the towne of that name in Northfolke, a Carmelite frier by profeſſion, but as excellent an aſtronomer as was in thoſe daies: John Ridington borne in Lincolneſhire a frier minor in Stafford, Adam a moonke of the Ciſteaux order, Roger Wihelpedale a mathematician, Simon de Feuerſham parſon of Birton in Kent, Matthew Weſtmonaſterienſes, who wrote the booke called Flores hiſtoriarum; John Elin a Carmelite borne in Northfolke, liued in theſe daies, but departed this life in king Richard the ſeconds daies; Thomas de Sturey an Auguſtine frier, Sertorious Gualenſis a Welſhman borne.

Moreouer, Simon de Tunſteed a gray frier, borne in Northfolke, prouinciall of the gray friers in England; Thomas Stubs borne in Yorkeſhire a blacke frier, Robert Langland a ſecular preeſt borne in Salopſhire in Mortimers Cliberie, Lewes Kaerleon a Welſhman an excellent aſtronomer and mathematician, John Garanſon, Nicholas Durham a Carmelite frier of Newcaſtell, William Fleet an heremite wrote ſundrie treatiſes, exhorting his countrimen of England to repentance, to auoid the vengeance elſe likelie to come; John Stafford a frier minor, borne in Stafford, whereof he tooke name; Thomas Rugſteed a blacke frier, Rafe Stride an excellent logician, William de ſancta Fide, or of ſaint Faith, ſo called of the towne in Northfolke, where he was borne, a Carmelite frier.

To conclude, John Mandeuille knight, that great traueller, liued in thoſe daies, and departed this life at Liege, the ſeuenteenth of Nouember, in the yeare 1372. Thomas of Douer a moonke of the abbeie there, Henrie Knighton wrote an hiſtorie intituled De geſtis Anglorum, John Stokes borne in Suffolke an Auguſtine frier, John Hornebie a frier Carmelite of Boſton, Henrie Bederike or (as other rather will) of Burie an Auguſtine frier, Simon Alcocke a diuine, Utred Balton borne in the marches of Wales a moonke of Durham, William Jordan an Auguſtine frier, John Hilton a frier minor, William de Lincolne a Carmelite, borne and profeſſed in that citie, whereof he tooke his ſurname; Adam Sarlingham a frier of the ſame order, but borne in Northfolke; Simon Mepham a prebend of Chicheſter, and a great diuine; John Bamton a Carmelite, and ſtudent in Cambridge; John Wichingham a gray frier: and diuerſe other, which for that we are not certeine in what age they liued, we here paſſe ouer.

Thus farre Edward the third, ſonne to Edward the ſecond and queene Iſabell.

Richard the ſecond, the ſecond ſonne to Edvvard prince of Wales.

Anno Reg. 1.

Fabian.

RIchard, the ſecond of that name, and ſonne to prince Edward, called the blacke prince, the ſonne of king Edward the third, a child of the age of eleuen yeares, began to reigne ouer the realme of England the two and twentith daie of June, in the yeare of the world 5344, of our Lord 1377, after the conqueſt 310, about the two and thirtith yeare of the emperour Charles the fourth, and in the foureteenth yeare of Charles the fift king of France, and about the ſeuenth yeare of the reigne of Robert the ſecond king of Scotland: he was named Richard of Burdeaux, bicauſe he was borne at Burdeaux in Gaſcoigne, whileſt his father ruled there. The day before it was vnderſtood, that his grandfather king Edward was departed this life, being the one and twentith of June (on which daie neuertheleſſe he deceaſſed) the citizens of London hauing certeine knowledge that he could not eſcape his ſickneſſe, ſent certeine aldermen vnto Kingſton, where the prince with his mother the princeſſe then laie, to declare vnto the ſaid prince their readie good wils, to accept him for their lawfull king and gouernour, immediatlie after it ſhould pleaſe God to call to his mercie his grandfather, being now paſt hope of recouerie of health. Wherefore they beſought him, to haue their citie recommended vnto his good grace, and that it would pleaſe him to viſit the ſame with his preſence, ſith they were readie in all ſorts to honour and obeie him, and to ſpend both liues and goods in his cauſe, if need required.

Moreouer, they beſought him, that it might pleaſe his grace to make an end of the diſcord betwixt the citizens, and the duke of Lancaſter, which through the malice of ſome had beene raiſed, to the commoditie of none, but to the diſcommoditie of diuerſe. When John Philpot, one of the foreſaid aldermen, that had the words in all their names, had ended his oration, he was anſwered by the prince and his councell, that he would indeuour himſelfe in all things to ſatiſfie their requeſts, and ſo were they ſent home to bring a ioifull anſwer of their meſſage to the citie. The morrow after, there were ſent to London from the king, the lord Latimer, ſir Nicholas Bond, ſir Simon Burlie, ⁊ ſir Richard Adderburie, knights; to bring them ſorrowfull newes of the aſſured death of king Edward, who (as we haue ſaid) deceaſſed the day before; but comfortable newes againe, of the great towardlineſſe and good meaning of the yoong king, who promiſed to loue them and their citie, and to come to the ſame citie, as they had deſired him to doo. And further, that he had ſpoken to the duke of Lancaſter in their behalfe, and that the duke had ſubmitted himſelfe to him in all things touching the cauſe; whervpon the kings pleaſure was, that they ſhould likewiſe ſubmit themſelues, and he would doo his indeuor, that an agreement might be had to the honor of the citizens, and profit of the citie.

John Philpot.

The duke of Lancaſter ⁊ the Lōdoners ſubmit their quarels to the kings order.

The citizens liked not of this forme of proceeding in the dukes matter, bicauſe the king was yoong, and could not giue order therein, but by ſubſtitutes: yet at length with much adoo, they were contented to ſubmit themſelues, as the duke had doone before, though not, till that the knights had vndertaken vpon their oth of fidelitie and knighthood, that their ſubmiſſion ſhould not redound to the temporall or bodilie harme of any of them, conſenting to the kings will in this point. And ſo with this caution they tooke their iournie towards Sheene, where they found the new K. with his mother, the duke of Lancaſter ⁊ his brethren, vncles to the king, and diuerſe biſhops, about the bodie of the deceaſſed king. When it was knowen that the Londoners were come, they were called before the king, by whom the matter was ſo handled, that the duke and they were made freends. After this, when the king ſhould ride through the citie towards the coronation, the ſaid duke and the lord Percie riding on great horſes before him, as by vertue of their offices appointed to make way before, vſed themſelues ſo courteouſlie, modeſtlie, and pleaſantlie, that where before they two were greatlie ſuſpected of the common people, by reaſon of their great puiſſance in the realme, and huge rout of reteiners, they ordered the matter ſo, that neither this day, nor the morrow after, being the day of the kings coronation, they offended any maner of perſon, but rather by gentle and ſweet demeanour they reclaimed the harts of manie, of whome before they were greatlie had in ſuſpicion, and thought euill of. ¶But now, ſith we are entred into the matter of this kings coronation, we haue thought good breefelie to touch ſome particular point thereof (as in Thomas Walſingham we find it) though nothing ſo largelie here, as the author himſelfe ſetteth it forth, bicauſe the purpoſe of this worke will not ſo permit.

The maner ⁊ order of the kings coronation.

The king, in riding thorough the citie towards Weſtminſter, on the 15 daie of Julie being wedneſdaie, was accompanied with ſuch a traine of the nobilitie and others, as in ſuch caſe was requiſite. Sir Simon Burlie bare the ſword before him, and ſir Nicholas Bond lead the kings horſſe by the bridle on foot. The noiſe of trumpets and other inſtruments was maruellous, ſo that this ſeemed a day of ioy and mirth, a day that had beene long looked for, bicauſe it was hoped, that now the quiet orders and good lawes of the land, which thorough the ſlouthfulneſſe of the aged king deceaſſed, and couetouſneſſe of thoſe that ruled about him, had beene long baniſhed, ſhould now be renewed and brought againe in vſe. The citie was adorned in all ſorts moſt richlie. The water conduits ran with wine for the ſpace of three houres togither. In the vpper end of Cheape, was a certeine caſtell made with foure towers, out of the which caſtell, on two ſides of it, there ran forth wine abundantlie. In the towers were placed foure beautifull virgins, of ſtature and age like to the king, apparelled in white veſtures, in euerie tower one, the which blew in the kings face, at his approching neere to them, leaues of gold; and as he approched alſo, they threw on him and his horſſe florens of gold counterfeit.

When he was come before the caſtell, they tooke cups of gold, and filling them with wine at the ſpouts of the caſtell, preſented the ſame to the king and to his nobles. On the top of the caſtell, betwixt the foure towers, ſtood a golden angell, holding a crowne in his hands, which was ſo contriued, that when the king came, he bowed downe ⁊ offered to him the crowne. But to ſpeake of all the pageants and ſhewes which the citizens had cauſed to be made, and ſet forth in honour of their new king, it were ſuperfluous; euerie one in their quarters ſtriuing to ſurmount other, and ſo with great triumphing of citizens, and ioy of the lords and noble men, he was conueied vnto his palace at Weſtminſter, where he reſted for that night. The morrow after being thurſdaie, and the 16 day of Julie, he was fetcht to the church with proceſſion of the biſhops and monks, and comming before the high altar, where the pauement was couered with rich clothes of tapiſtrie, he there kneeled downe and made his praiers, whileſt two biſhops ſong the Letanie, which being finiſhed, the king was brought to his ſeat, the queere ſinging an antheme, beginning, Firmetur manus tua.

That doone, there was a ſermon preached by a biſhop touching the dutie of a king, how he ought to behaue himſelfe towards the people, and how the people ought to be obedient vnto him. The ſermon being ended, the king receiued his oth before the archbiſhop and nobles: which doone, the archbiſhop hauing the lord Henrie Percie lord marſhall going before him, turned him to euerie quarter of the church, declaring to the people the kings oth, and demanding of them, if they would ſubmit themſelues vnto ſuch a prince ⁊ gouernor, and obeie his commandements: and when the people with a lowd voice had anſwered that they would obeie him, the archbiſhop vſing certeine praiers, bleſſed the king; which ended, the archbiſhop came vnto him, and tearing his garments from the higheſt part to the loweſt, ſtripped him to his ſhirt. Then was brought by earles, a certeine couerture of cloth of gold, vnder the which he remained, whileſt he was annointed.

The archbiſhop (as we haue ſaid) hauing ſtripped him, firſt annointed his hands, then his head, breſt, ſhoulders, and the ioints of his armes with the ſacred oile, ſaieng certeine praiers, and in the meane time did the queere ſing the antheme, beginning, Vnxerunt regem Salomonem, &c. And the archbiſhop added another praier, Deus Dei filius, &c. Which ended, he and the other biſhops ſong the hymne, Veni creator ſpiritus, the king kneeling in a long veſture, ⁊ the archbiſhop with his ſuffraganes about him. When the hymne was ended, he was lift vp by the archbiſhop, and clad firſt with the coate of ſaint Edward, and after with his mantell, a ſtoale being caſt about his necke, the archbiſhop in the meane time ſaieng certeine praiers appointed for the purpoſe. After this, the archbiſhop and biſhops deliuered to him the ſword, ſaieng, Accipe gladium, &c.

When that praier was ended, two earles girded him with the ſword, which doone, the archbiſhop gaue to him bracelets, ſaieng, Accipe armillas, &c. After this, the archbiſhop did put vpon him an vppermoſt veſture, called a pall, ſaieng, Accipe pallium, &c. In the meane time, whileſt the archbiſhop bleſſed the kings crowne, he to whoſe office it apperteined, did put ſpurs on his heeles. After the crowne was bleſſed, the archbiſhop ſet it on his head, ſaieng, Coronet te Deus, &c. Then did the archbiſhop deliuer to him a ring, with theſe words, Accipe annulum, &c. Immediatlie herewith came the lord Furniuall by vertue of his office, offering to him a red gloue, which the archbiſhop bleſſed, and putting it on his hand, gaue to him the ſcepter, with theſe words, Accipe ſceptrum, &c. Then did the archbiſhop deliuer to him in his other hand a rod, in the top whereof ſtood a doue, with theſe words, Accipe virgam virtutis, &c. After this the archbiſhop bleſſed the king, ſaieng, Benedicat de Deus, &c.

Theſe things doone, the king kiſſed the biſhops and abbats, by whome he was lead afterwards vnto his ſeat, the biſhops beginning to ſing (Te deum) which ended, the archbiſhop ſaid to him, Sta & retine amodò locum, &c. When theſe things were finiſhed, they began maſſe, the biſhop of Worceſter read the epiſtle, and the biſhop of Elie the goſpell. At the offertorie, the king roſe from his ſeat, and was brought to offer. He therfore offered firſt his ſword, and after ſo much gold as he would, but no leſſe than a marke, by reaſon of the cuſtome; for more he might offer to God and S. Peter, but leſſe he could not. After this, he offered bread and wine, with which he and the archbiſhop did after communicate. This doone, the earle, to whome it apperteined to beare the ſword before the king, redeemed the ſword which the king had offered with monie, and receiuing the ſame, bare it afore the king. When maſſe ſhould be ſoong, the king was brought againe to the altar, & there kneeling downe, and ſaieng Confiteor to the archbiſhop, did communicate, and ſo was brought backe to his ſeat. The wardens of the cinque ports by their office, as well in time of the proceſſion, as when he was annointed alſo at maſſe time, and as he returned from the church to the palace to dinner, held ouer him a large canopie of blew veluet, faſtened vnto foure ſtaues at the foure corners.

In the meane time, ſir John Dimmocke that claimed to be the kings champion, had beene at the kings armorie and ſtable, where he had choſen according to his tenure, the beſt armour ſaue one, and the beſt ſteed ſaue one: albeit, ſir Baldwine Freuill claimed the ſame office, but could not obteine it; ſo that the ſaid ſir John Dimmocke hauing armed himſelfe, and being mounted on horſſebacke, came to the abbeie gates, with two riding before him, the one carrieng his ſpeare, and the other his ſhield, ſtaieng there till maſſe ſhould be ended. But the lord Henrie Percie lord marſhall, appointed to make waie before the king with the duke of Lancaſter lord Steward, the lord Thomas of Woodſtoke lord conſtable, and the lord marſhals brother ſir Thomas Percie, being all mounted on great horſſes, came to the knight, and told him, that he ought not to come at that time, but when the king was at dinner, and therefore it ſhould be good for him to vnarme himſelfe for a while, and take his eaſe and reſt, till the appointed time were come.

The knight did as the lord marſhall willed him, and ſo after his departure, the king hauing thoſe lords riding afore him, was borne on knights ſhoulders vnto his palace, and ſo had to his chamber, where he reſted a while, being ſomewhat faint with trauell, and tooke a ſmall refection. After this, comming into the hall, he created foure new earles, before he ſat downe to meat; to wit, his vncle the lord Thomas de Woodſtoke earle of Buckingham, to whome he gaue a thouſand marks a yeare out of his treaſurie, till he prouided him of lands to the like value. The lord Guiſhard de Engoleſme, that had beene his tutor, was created earle of Huntington, to whome he gaue likewiſe a thouſand marks annuitie, till he were prouided of lands of like value. The lord Mowbraie was created earle of Nottingham, and the lord Henrie Percie earle of Northumberland. He made alſo nine knights the ſame daie.

To ſhew what roiall ſeruice was at this feaſt, it paſſeth our vnderſtanding to deſcribe: but to conclude, the fare was exceeding ſumptuous, and the furniture princelie in all things, that if the ſame ſhould be rehearſed, the reader would perhaps doubt of the truth therof. ¶In the midſt of the kings palace was a marble piller raiſed hollow vpon ſteps, on the top whereof was a great gilt eagle placed, vnder whoſe feet in the chapiter of the piller, diuers kinds of wine came guſhing forth at foure ſeuerall places all the daie long, neither was anie forbidden to receiue the ſame, were he neuer ſo poore or abiect. On the morrow after the coronation, there was a generall proceſſion of the archbiſhop, biſhop, and abbats then preſent, with the lords, and a great multitude of people, to praie for the king and the peace of the kingdome.

At the going forth of this proceſſion, the biſhop of Rocheſter preached, exhorting them, that the diſſentions and diſcords which had long continued betwixt the people and their ſuperiours, might be appeaſed and forgotten, prouing by manie arguments, that the ſame highlie diſpleaſed God. He admoniſhed the lords, not to be ſo extreme and hard towards the people. On the other part, he exhorted the people in neceſſarie cauſes, for the aid of the king and realme, cheerefullie, and without grudging, to put to their helping hands, according to their bounden duties. He further exhorted thoſe in generall that were appointed to be about the king, that they ſhould forſake vice, and ſtudie to liue in cleaneſſe of life and vertue. For if by their example the king were trained to goodneſſe, all ſhould be well; but if he declined through their ſufferance from the right waie, the people and kingdome were like to fall in danger to periſh. After the ſermon and proceſſion were ended, the lords and prelats went to their lodgings.

But now, bicauſe the Engliſhmen ſhould haue their ioies mingled with ſome ſorrowes, it chanced that the Frenchmen (which about the ſame time that the kings grandfather departed this life, were waſting on the ſeas) within ſix or ſeauen daies after his deceaſſe, burnt the towne of Rie. Wherevpon, immediatlie after the coronation, the earles of Cambridge and Buckingham were ſent with a power vnto Douer, and the earle of Saliſburie vnto Southampton: but in the meane time, to wit, the one and twentith of Auguſt, the Frenchmen entring the Ile of Wight, burnt diuerſe townes in the ſame. And though they were repelled from the caſtell, by the valiant manhood of ſir Hugh Tirrell capteine thereof, who laid no ſmall number of them on the ground; yet they conſtreined the men of the Ile to giue them a thouſand marks of ſiluer to ſaue the reſidue of their houſes and goods, and ſo they departed from thence, ſailing ſtill along the coſts, and where they ſaw aduantage, ſet on land, burning ſundrie towns neere to the ſhore, as Porteſmouth, Dartmouth, and Plimmouth.

An ouerthrow giuen by the Frẽch to the Engliſhmen.

They made countenance alſo to haue ſet on Southhampton, if ſir John Arundell, brother to the earle of Arundell had not beene readie there with a number of men of armes and archers, by whom the towne was defended, and the eninies chaſed to their ſhips. From thence the Frenchmen departed, and ſailing towards Douer, burnt Haſtings; but Winchelſie they could not win, being valiantlie defended by the abbat of Battell, and others. After this, they landed one day not far from the abbeie of Lewes, at a place called Rottington, where the prior of Lewes, and two knights, the one named ſir Thomas Cheinie, and the other ſir John Falleſlie, hauing aſſembled a number of the countrie people, incountred the Frenchmen, but were ouerthrowen; ſo that there were ſlaine about an hundred Engliſhmen; and the prior, with the two knights, and an eſquier called John Brokas, were taken priſoners, but yet the Frenchmen loſt a great number of their owne men at this conflict, and ſo with their priſoners retired to their ſhips and gallies, and after returned into France.

The duke of Lancaſter & the earle of Cambridge appointed protectors.

But now touching the dooings about the new K. You ſhall vnderſtand, that by reaſon of his yoong yeares, as yet he was not able to gouerne himſelfe, and therefore John duke of Lancaſter, and Edmund earle of Cambridge, with other péeres of the realme, were appointed to haue the adminiſtration. He was of good diſpoſition and towardneſſe, but his age being readie to incline which way ſoeuer a man ſhould bend it, thoſe that were appointed to haue the gouernement of his perſon, did what laie in them now at the firſt, to kéepe him from all maner of light demeanor. But afterwards, when euerie one began to ſtudie more for his owne priuate commoditie, than for the aduancement of the common-wealth, they ſet open the gates to other, which being readie to corrupt his good nature, by little and little grew familiar with him, and dimming the brightneſſe of true honour, with the counterfeit ſhine of the contrarie, ſo maſkered his vnderſtanding, that in the end they brought him to tract the ſteps of lewd demeanor, and ſo were cauſers both of his and their owne deſtruction. This ſéemeth to be touched by C.Okland, who ſpeaking of the death of the old king and the erection of the new, ſaith of him according to our annales, as followeth:

In Angl. prel.

Vndecimum puer hic nondum tranſegerat annum,

Berwike caſtell woone by the Scots.

Berwike caſtell recouered by the Engliſhmen.

The Frenchmen not ignorant of ſuch miſchéefes as were like to grow in England, ſuffered no time to paſſe, but tooke occaſions of aduantage when they were offered. ¶ Among other enterpriſes I find, that ſhortlie after the deceaſſe of king Edward, the duke of Burgognie wan Arde, and two or thrée other fortreſſes in thoſe marches. The Scots this yeare alſo wan the caſtell of Berwike by ſtealth one morning, but ſhortlie vpon knowledge had, the earles of Northumberland and Notingham, the lords Neuill, Lucie, Graiſtoke, & Stafford, with other lords, knights, and eſquiers, came with their powers in all haſt thither, and entring the towne, beſieged the caſtell, and finallie, aſſaulting them that kept it, wan it of them by force, and ſlue all thoſe Scotiſhmen which they found within it, except Alexander Ramſie their capteine. When the Engliſhmen had thus recouered the caſtell, they entered into Scotland, in hope to find the Scots, and to fight with them whom they knew to be aſſembled.

An ouerthrow giuen by the Scots to the Engliſhmen.

The Engliſh hoſt was thrée thouſand men of armes, & ſeuen thouſand archers, but they ſent foorth ſir Thomas Muſgraue with thrée hundred ſpeares, and thrée hundred archers, to Meuros, to trie if he might vnderſtand any thing of the Scots in thoſe parts, with whom the earle Dowglas, hauing with him ſeuen hundred ſpeares, and two thouſand of other called yomen with glaiues and other weapons, incountered by chance and diſtreſſed him & his companie. Sir Thomas Muſgraue himſelfe, and ſir ſcore other, were taken priſoners, beſides thoſe that were ſlaine, the reſidue eſcaped by flight, making the beſt ſhift they could for themſelues. The lord Neuill, ſir Thomas Triuet, ſir William Scrope, and diuerſe other valiant capteins of England, were ſent into Gaſcoigne this yeare, which firſt landed at Burdeaux, on the euen of the Natiuitie of our ladie, where after they had reſted them a while, they went and raiſed the ſiege, which the Frenchmen had held before Mortaigne in Poictou a long time before.

The ſiege of Mortaigne raiſed.

Gouernour of this ſiege at the firſt, was Yuan or Owen of Wales, but he was murthered one morning as he ſat alone viewing the caſtell, and combing his head, by one of his owne countriemen, which vnder colour to ſerue him, was become with him verie familiar. This Owen or Yuan whether ye will (for all is one) was ſonne to a noble man of Wales, whom K. Edward had put to death for ſome offenſe by him committed, where this Yuan got him into France, being as then verie yoong, and was brought vp in the French court, and prooued an expert man of warre, ſo that great lamentation was made for his death by the Frenchmen. But the Engliſhmen, although they miſliked the maner of his death, yet they were not greatlie ſorrowfull for the chance, ſith they were rid thereby of an extreame enimie.

After that the Engliſhmen had raiſed the Frenchmen from the ſiege of Mortaigne, they returned to Burdeaux, and after recouered ſundrie caſtels and fortreſſes in the marches of Burdelois, and about Baionne. Alſo they aided the king of Nauarre, againſt the king of Caſtile, and made a road into the confines of Caſtile. But ſhortlie after, a peace was concluded betwixt thoſe two kings, ſo that the lord Charles of Nauarre ſhould marrie the daughter of the king of Caſtile vpon certeine conditions: and ſo the Engliſhmen had their wages trulie paid them to their full contentation, and therevpon returned.

A parlement. Thom. Walſ.

About Michaelmaſſe began a parlement that was ſummoned at Weſtminſter, which continued till the feaſt of ſaint Andrew. In this parlement the foreſaid ſir Peter de la Mere and other the knights that had béene ſo earneſt againſt dame Alice Peres in the laſt parlement holden by king Edward the third, ſo proſecuted the ſame cauſe now in this parlement, that the ſaid dame Alice Peres was baniſhed the realme, and all hir goods moueable and vnmoueable forfeited to the king, bicauſe contrarie to that ſhe had promiſed by oth in the ſaid laſt parlement, ſhe had preſumed to come within the court, and to obteine of the king what ſoeuer was to hir liking.

Two citizens of London appointed to kéepe the ſubſidie granted by parlement.

Sir Hugh Caluerlie a valiant capteine.

There were two tenths granted by the clergie to the king in this parlement, and two fiftéenes of the temporaltie, to be paid the ſame yeare; and two citizens of London, William Walworth, and John Philpot were appointed to haue the kéeping of that monie, to the end it might be imploied to the kings neceſſarie vſes, for the defenſe of the realme. Sir Hugh Caluerlie being deputie of Calis, comming one morning to Bullongne, burnt certeine ſhips which laie there in the hauen, to the number of ſix and twentie, beſides two proper barkes, being veſſels of no ſmall accompt: and hauing ſpoiled and burnt the moſt part of the baſe towne, he returned to Calis with a great rich bootie of goods and cattell.

Alſo, where the caſtell of Marke, in abſence of the Marke caſtell recouered by ſir Hugh Caluerlie, the ſame daie it was loſt.

capteine ſir Robert de Salle, that was gone ouer into England, was loſt through negligence of them that were left in charge within it; the ſame ſir Hugh Caluerlie made ſuch ſpeed in the matter, that he recouered it againe the ſame daie it was loſt, by force of aſſault, taking the Frenchmen priſoners that were gotten into it, and hanging certeine Picards ſtipendarie ſoldiers in the ſaid caſtell, vnder the ſaid ſir Robert de Salle, for that whileſt the Engliſhmen were gone forth, to ſee the ſhooting of a match which they had made amongſt themſelues, a little off from the caſtell, thoſe Picards being left within, ſhut the gates againſt them, and receiued in the Frenchmen, with whome they had practiſed in treaſon, keeping the Engliſhmen forth, to whome the ſafe keeping of that caſtell was committed.

John Wickliffe.

This yeare was a bull ſent from the pope vnto the vniuerſitie of Oxenford, to apprehend John Wickliffe, parſon of Lutterworth in Leiceſterſhire, within the dioceſſe of Lincolne. Alſo, there were other bulles to the ſame effect, ſent vnto the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and to the biſhop of London. Likewiſe to the king were letters directed from the pope, to require his fauour againſt the ſaid Wickliffe, ſo greeuouſlie was the pope incenſed againſt him, and not without cauſe, for if his concluſions in doctrine tooke effect, he well perceiued his papiſticall authoritie would ſhortlie decaie. As for the popiſh cleargie, to them not onelie the ſect but alſo the name of Wickliffe was ſo odious, that in recording his opinions and ſectaries, they exceed the bounds of all modeſtie, aggrauating ſuch reports as they infer concerning him or his with more than hyperbolicall lies: as appeereth by that long and tedious diſcourſe which he wrote, that compiling certeine annales intituled De euentibus Angliæ, prefixeth this verſe in the front of his volume, in letters of red vermilon, as deſiring to haue his name notoriouſlie knowne to the world;

Autoris nomen capitales litteræ pandunt:

Hen. de Knighton canon. abbat. Leiceſt. in anna. lib. de Rich. ſecundo.

He (I ſay) in that copious treatiſe hauing ſpoken as maliciouſlie & viperouſlie as he might both of Wickliffes life, which he concludeth to be lewd; of his opinions, which he auoucheth to be hereticall; and of his fauourers and followers, to whom (at his pleaſure) he giueth vnreuerent epithets (all which to proſecute at length, as by him they are in ample ſort laid downe, would but detect the mans malignitie, and procure an ouerthrow of credit to be attributed vnto his declarations) he maketh vp his mouth with a triſtichon of poeticall imitation, to bring Wickliffe and his adherents into perpetuall obloquie and defamation, ſaieng as followeth in verſe and proſe;

Si totum membrana ſolum, calamus nemus omne,
Et Thetis encauſtum, ſcriptor & omnis homo,
Iſtorum facinus ſcribere non poterunt.

Maledictus conuentus eorum, quoniam pertinax, propterea Deus deſtruat eos, in finem euellat, & emigrare faciat de tabernaculis fidelium ſuorum, & radicem eorum de terra regni; & hoc videant iuſti, & lætentur; vt dicere poſſint; Ecce populus qui ſe exaltauit ſuper electos doctores Domini, & ſperauit in multitudine vanitatis ſuæ: confundantur & pereant cum doctrina eorum in æternum, &c.

But of Wickliffes life and doctrine to read at large, I remit the reader to the acts and monuments of the church, publiſhed by maiſter Iohn Fox: and now will we returne to matters of ſtate and policie.

The nauie ſetteth forth, and is beaten backe by tempeſt.

There went forth this yeare a verie great nauie of ſhips to the ſea, vnder the guiding of the earle of Buckingham, the duke of Britaine, the lord Latimer, the lord Fitz Walter, ſir Robert Knolles, and other valiant capteins, meaning to haue intercepted the Spaniſh fleet that was gone to Sluſe in Flanders, but thorough rage of tempeſt, and contrarie winds, they were driuen home, although twiſe they attempted their fortune: but ſir Hugh Caluerlie, deputie of Calis, ſlept not his buſineſſe, dooing ſtill what diſpleaſures he could to the Frenchmen.

Exploits doone by ſir Hugh Caluerlie.

Shortlie after Chriſtmaſſe, he ſpoiled the towne of Eſtaples the ſame daie the faire was kept there, to which a great number of merchants of Bullongne were come to make their markets, but the ſellers had quicke vtterance, for that that might eaſilie be caried awaie, the Engliſhmen laid hands on, and cauſed the owners to redeeme the reſidue with great ſums of monie, which they vndertooke to paie; or elſe ſir Hugh threatned to haue burnt all that was left, togither with the houſes.

The duke of Lancaſter miſliking the maners of the court, getteth himſelfe home to yᵉ caſtell of Killingworth

Yee haue heard, how at the firſt the duke of Lancaſter was one of the cheefe about the yoong king in gouernement of his perſon and realme, who prudentlie conſidering, that ſith there muſt needs be an alteration in the ſtate, & doubting leaſt if any thing chanced otherwiſe than well, the fault and blame might be cheefelie imputed to him, and thanks (howſoeuer things went) he looked for none, he gaue therefore the ſlip, obteining licence of the king to depart, and ſo got him home to his caſtell of Killingworth, permitting other to haue the whole ſwaie: for before his departure from the court, there were with his conſent ordeined ſuch as ſhould be attending on the kings perſon, and haue the rule and ordering of matters perteining to the ſtate, as William Courtnie, then biſhop of London (though ſhortlie after remooued to the archbiſhops ſee of Canturburie) Edmund Mortimer earle of March, & diuerſe other, of whome the people had conceiued a good opinion: but yet bicauſe the biſhop of Saliſburie, and the lord Latimer were admitted amongſt the reſidue, the commons murmured greatlie againſt them.

The earle of Northumberland reſigned his office of lord marſhall, in whoſe place ſucceeded ſir John Arundell, brother vnto the earle of Arundell. ¶ The duke of Lancaſter, although retired from the court, yet deſirous to haue the monie in his hands that was granted the laſt parlement, at length obteined it, vpon promiſe to defend the realme from inuaſion of all enimies for one yeares ſpace: he therefore prouided a great nauie to go to the ſea, hiring nine ſhips of Baionne, to aſſiſt his enterpriſe herein, the which in making ſaile hitherwards, incountred with the Spaniſh fleet, and tooke fouretéene veſſels laden with wines and other merchandize. But in the meane time, one Mercer a Scotiſhman, with certeine ſaile of Scots, Frenchmen, and Spaniards, came to Scarburgh, and there tooke certeine ſhips, and led them awaie to the ſea, as it were in reuenge of his fathers impriſonment, named John Mercer, who before being caught by certeine ſhips of the north parts, and deliuered to the earle of Northumberland, was committed to priſon within the caſtell of Scarburgh.

John Philpot Alderman of London ſetteth forth a fleet at his own charges, to recouer certeine Engliſh ſhips taken by the Scots.

John Philpot that worſhipfull citizen of London, lamenting the negligence of them that ſhould haue prouided againſt ſuch inconueniences, made forth a fleet at his owne charges, ſtronglie furniſhed with men of warre and munition neceſſarie: the men of warre meeting with the ſame Mercer, accompanied with his owne ſhips, and fifteene other Spaniards that were newlie ioined with him, ſet vpon them, and ſo valiantlie behaued themſelues, that they tooke the ſaid Mercer with all them that were then in his companie, ſo recouering againe the ſhips that were taken from Scarburgh, beſides great riches which were found aboord, as well in the fifteene Spaniſh ſhips, as the other that were of the old retinue, belonging to the ſame Mercer. John Philpot was afterwards blamed of the lords, for preſuming thus far, as to ſet forth a nauie of men of warre, without the aduiſe of the kings councell: but he made his anſwer in ſuch wiſe vnto the earle of Stafford, and others that laid the fault to his charge, that he was permitted to depart, without further trouble for that matter.

Chierburg deliuered to the Engliſhmen.

Additions to Adam Merimuth.

Before all ſuch prouiſion as the duke of Lancaſter prepared for his iournie to the ſea could be readie, the earles of Saliſburie and Arundell ſailed ouer into Normandie, where, by ſuch compoſition as was taken betwixt the king of England and the king of Nauarre, who of new was become enimie to the French king, the towne of Chierburg was deliuered vnto the ſaid earles, who ſending knowledge thereof backe into England, there were ſent ouer ſuch as ſhould haue in charge the kéeping of that towne; and ſo the two earles returned. ¶ We find, that the king of Nauarre, hauing béene héere in England with the king and his councell, had agréed with the king for a certeine yearelie rent, to demiſe vnto him the ſaid fortreſſe of Chierburg, whereby the Engliſhmen might haue frée entrie into Normandie, when they would, as well to aid the king of Nauarre in his neceſſitie, as to worke anie enterpriſe that ſhould be thought expedient to the aduantage of the king of England as occaſion ſerued. But the obteining of poſſeſſion of Chierburg brought not ſo much ioy to the Engliſh nation, as the miſhap that happened at the going forth of the ſaid earles did cauſe lamentation and heauineſſe.

The Engliſh name is ouermatched and ouercome by the Spaniſh fléet.

For vpon the firſt entring into the ſea, it fortuned that ſir Philip, and ſir Peter Courtenie, diſcouered a certeine number of ſhips that were enimies, and vndiſcréetlie entered amongſt them, there ſuddenlie came vpon them the Spaniſh fléet, ſo that the Engliſh ſhips that were in companie with the ſaid Philip and ſir Peter, were not able to make their partie good, in ſomuch that finallie after that ſir Philip had loſt diuerſe of his men that were there ſlaine, he got awaie by flight himſelfe, though gréeuouſlie wounded, but ſir Peter was taken priſoner with a few other knights that were with him; and the moſt part of all the valiant eſquiers of Summerſetſhire & Deuonſhire, being there abroad with him, were ſlaine and drowned, which was eſtéemed no ſmall loſſe to the whole common-wealth.

Rokeſburgh burnt by the Scots.

Thus were the Engliſhmen occupied in this firſt yeare of king Richard with troubles of warre, and not onelie againſt the Frenchmen, but alſo againſt the Scots. For euen in the beginning of the ſame yeare, the Scots burnt Rokeſburgh, in reuenge whereof the new earle of Northumberland entered Scotland with ten thouſand men, and ſore ſpoiled the lands of the earle of March for the ſpace of thrée daies togither; bicauſe the ſaid earle of March was the chéefe author and procurer of the burning of Rokeſburgh, & ſo for that time th'Engliſhmen were well reuenged of thoſe enimies. But at an other time, when the Northerne men would néeds make a road into Scotland, entring by the weſt borders, they were incountered by the Scots and put to flight, ſo that manie of them being ſlaine, the Scots tooke the more courage to inuade the borders, till at length, Edmund Mortimer earle of March came at the daie of truce, and tooke an abſtinence of warre betwixt both nations for the time, though the ſame continued not long..

Anno Reg. 2.

The duke of Lācaſter saileth into Britaine with a great power.

Additions to Adam Merimuth.

Anon after Midſummer, the duke of Lancaſter with a ſtrong power tooke the ſea, and landing in Britaine, beſieged the towne of ſaint Mallo de Liſle, a fortreſſe of great importance. There went ouer with him the earles of Buckingham, Warwike, Stafford, and diuerſe other of the Engliſh nobilitie, the which made their approches, and fiercelie aſſailed the towne, but it was ſo valiantlie defended, that in the end, the duke with his armie raiſed from thence, and returned without atchiuing his purpoſe. ¶ About the ſame time, there was a notable and hainous murther committed within ſaint Peters church at Weſtminſter, by occaſion of variance betwéene the lord Latimer and ſir Rafe Ferrers on the one partie, and two eſquiers, the one called Robert Hall and the other Iohn Shakell on the other partie, about a priſoner which was taken at the battell of Nazers in Spaine, called the earle of Deane, who (as ſome write) was taken by one ſir Franke de Hall at the ſaid battell; and bicauſe he remained in his hands at the death of the ſaid ſir Franke, he bequeathed him vnto his ſonne the ſaid Robert Hall eſquier.

But as other write, the ſaid earle was taken by the ſaid Robert Hall himſelfe & Iohn Shakell iointlie, and iudged to be their lawfull priſoner, by the ſentence of the prince of Wales, and ſir Iohn Chandois that was maſter to the ſaid eſquiers. Wherevpon afterwards the ſaid earle obteined ſo much fauor, that by leauing his ſonne and heire in gage for his ranſome, he returned into Spaine, to prouide monie to diſcharge it; but he was ſo ſlow in that matter, after he was at libertie, that he departed this life before he made any paiment, and ſo his lands fell to his ſonne that remained in gage for the monie with the two eſquiers. Wherevpon it happened afterwards, that the duke of Lancaſter, deſirous to haue the yoong earle in his hands (in hope through his meanes the better to accompliſh his enterpriſe which he meant to take in hand againſt the king of Caſtile, for the right of that kingdome) procured his nephue king Richard to require the ſaid earle of Deane, at the hands of the ſaid eſquiers.

But they refuſed to deliuer him, kéeping their priſoner forth of the waie, ſo that none wiſt were he was become: the eſquiers therefore were committed to the tower, out of the which they eſcaped vnto Weſtminſter, and there regiſtred themſelues for ſanctuarie men. The duke of Lancaſter was herewith ſore offended, and their enimies the ſaid lord Latimer and ſir Rafe Ferrers tooke counſell togither, with ſir Alane Borhull and others, how they might be reuenged of this deſpite. This ſir Alane Borhull was conſtable of the tower, and therefore it gréeued him not a little, that the eſquiers had broken from him, and kept themſelues thus at Weſtminſter, vnder protection of that priuileged place. Herevpon it was concluded, that ſir Rafe Ferrers, and the ſaid Alane Borhull, taking with them certeine men in armour, to the number of fiftie perſons, ſhould go and fetch them by force from Weſtminſter, vnto the tower againe.

The morrow therefore after ſaint Laurence daie, being the eleuenth of Auguſt, theſe two knights accompanied with certeine of the kings ſeruants and other, to the number afore mentioned, came into the church at Weſtminſter, whileſt the ſaid eſquiers were there hearing of high maſſe, which was then in celebrating; and firſt laieng hands vpon Iohn Shakell, vſed the matter ſo with him, that they drew him forth of the church, and led him ſtreight to the tower. But when they came to Robert Hall, and fell in reaſoning with him, he would not ſuffer them to come within his reach, and perceiuing they meant to take him by force, he drew out a falcheon or ſhort ſword which he had girt to him, and therewith laid ſo fréelie about him, trauerſing twiſe round about the moonks quier, that till they had beſet him on ech ſide, they could doo him no hurt.

A cruell murther in Weſtminſter church.

Howbeit, at length when they had got him at that aduantage, one of them claue his head to the verie braines, and an other thruſt him through the bodie behind with a ſword, and ſo they murthered him among them. They ſlue alſo one of the monkes that would haue had them to haue ſaued the eſquiers life. Much adoo was about this matter, for the breaking thus of the ſanctuarie, in ſomuch that the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and fiue other biſhops his ſuffragans, openlie pronounced all them that were preſent at this murder accurſſed, and likewiſe all ſuch as aided or counſelled them to it, cheeflie and namelie ſir Alane Borhull, and ſir Rafe Ferrers, capteins and leaders of them. The king, the queene, and the duke of Lancaſter were yet excepted by ſpeciall names. The biſhop of London a long time after, euerie ſundaie, wedneſdaie, and fridaie, pronounced this excommunication in the church of S. Paule at London.

The duke of Lancaſter (though excepted in the ſame) yet in behalfe of his freends was not a little offended with the biſhops dooings, in ſo much that in a councell holden at Windſore (to the which the biſhop of London was called, but would not come, nor yet ceaſſe the pronouncing of the curſſe, albeit the king had requeſted him by his letters) the duke ſaid openlie, that the biſhops froward dealings were not to be borne with, but (ſaith he) if the king would command me, I would gladlie go to London, and fetch that diſobedient prelat, in deſpite of thoſe ribaulds (for ſo he termed them) the Londoners. Theſe words procured the duke much euill will, as well of the Londoners, as of other: for it was commonlie ſaid, that whatſoeuer had beene doone at Weſtminſter, concerning the murther there committed in the church, was doone by his commandement.

A parlement at Glouceſter.

About the feaſt of S. Luke, a parlement was holden at Glouceſter, for the diſpleaſure (as was thought) which ſome of the councell had conceiued againſt the Londoners, or rather (as ſome tooke it) for feare of them, leaſt if any thing were doone contrarie to their minds, they ſhould be about to hinder it, if the parlement had beene kept neere them: for manie things (as ſome iudged) were meant to haue beene put foorth and concluded in this parlement, albeit few in effect came to paſſe of thoſe matters that were ſurmiſed, ſauing that it was inacted, that the king ſhould haue a marke of the merchants for euerie ſacke of their woolles, for this preſent yeare; and for euerie pounds worth of wares that was brought in from beyond the ſeas, and here ſold, ſix pence of the buiers. ¶ Alſo, certeine priuileges were granted in this parlement to merchant-ſtrangers, that they might buie and ſell in groſſe, or by retaile within this realme, as in the printed booke of ſtatutes it appeareth.

The pope ſendeth to the king for aid.

This yeare came meſſengers from the new elected pope Urbane, with letters to require the kings aſſiſtance and aid againſt ſuch cardinals as he named ſchiſmatikes, that had elected an other pope whome they named Clement, which cardinals ſent likewiſe their meſſengers with letters, to beſeech the king to aid them with his fauourable aſſiſtance: but through perſuaſion of the archbiſhop of Canturburie, Urbans requeſt was granted, and Clements reiected. About the ſame time, to wit, on thurſdaie before the feaſt of S. Andrew th'apoſtle, the Scots by ſtelth entred by night into the caſtell of Berwike, and ſlue ſir Robert Bointon, a right valiant knight, that was conſtable thereof, permitting his wife, children, and ſeruants to depart, with condition, that within three weekes next inſuing, they ſhould either paie them three thouſand marks, or elſe yeeld their bodies againe to priſon.

Berwike caſtell wonne by the Scots.

The morrow after, the ſame Scots fetched a great bootie of cattell out of the countries next adioining, but immediatlie after the earle of Northumberland being aduertiſed hereof, haſted thither with foure hundred armed men, and aſſaulting the caſtell on ech ſide, after two houres defenſe, wan it, ſlaieng of the defendants about eight and fortie, reſeruing onelie one of the whole number aliue, that he might informe the Engliſhmen thoroughlie of the Scotiſhmens purpoſes. At this enterpriſe was the earle of Northumberlands eldeſt ſonne, ſpreading there firſt his banner, and dooing ſo valiantlie, that he deſerued ſingular commendation; as likewiſe did ſir Alane de Heton, and ſir Thomas de Ilderton, with thoſe of the ſurname of the Herons, euerie of theſe hauing their quarters aſſigned to aſſault. Thus was the caſtell recouered the ninth daie after the Scots had entered the ſame, ſo that they enioied not long that victorious exploit.

Alexander Ramſie was onlie ſaued as Froiſſard ſaith

Berwike caſtell recouered by the earle of Northumberland.

And bicauſe this enterpriſe was taken in hand againſt the couenant of the truce, the earle of Northumberland, before he attempted to recouer the caſtell, ſent to the earle of March in Scotland, to vnderſtand if he would auow that which his countrimen had doone, touching the winning of that caſtell, who ſent him knowledge againe, that he neither vnderſtood of their enterpriſe, nor would be partaker with them therein: but if it ſo pleaſed the earle of Northumberland, he would come himſelfe, and helpe to recouer it to the K. of Englands vſe, out of thoſe Scotiſhmens hands, which without publike authoritie had made that exploit. This yeare, ſir Robert Rous, capteine of Chierburg, was called home, after he had taken ſir Oliuer de Cliſſon, and atchiued manie other worthie aduentures againſt the kings enimies. In his place was ſent ſir Iohn Herleſton, to remaine vpon the gard of that caſtell. Alſo, ſir Hugh Caluerlie, deputie of Calis, that had ſo valiantlie borne himſelfe againſt the Frenchmen, was likewiſe diſcharged; and comming home, was made admerall, being ioined in commiſſion in that office with ſir Thomas Percie.

Sir Robert Rous a valiãt capteine.

Sir William Montacute earle of Saliſburie was ſent ouer to Calis, to be the kings lieutenant there, who ſhortlie after his comming thither fetcht a great bootie of cattell out of the enimies countrie adioining, ſo that Calis was furniſhed with no ſmall number of the ſame. ¶ Sir Hugh Caluerlie, and ſir Thomas Percie, going to ſea, tooke ſeauen ſhips laden with merchandize, and one ſhip of warre. ¶ The archbiſhop of Caſſils in Ireland, returning from Rome, brought with him large authoritie of binding and looſing, granted to him by pope Urbane, in fauour of whome at his comming to London, in a ſermon which he preached, he declared to the people, how the French king, holding with the antipape Clement, was denounced accurſſed; and therefore now was the time for Engliſhmen to make warre in France, hauing ſuch occaſion, as greater could not be offered; ſpeciallie, ſith it was like that the excommunicated king ſhould haue no courage to make reſiſtance. This is I will not ſaie the diuinitie (for what heauenlineſſe can there be in ſuch damnable doctrine, to ſet people together by the eares?) of the Romaniſts; ſo farre off are they from the ſtudie of peace and concord betwixt man and man, that they ſet whole monarchies and empires vp to the mid leg in ſtreams of bloud, imitating their great grandfather ſathan, who hath beene a makebate and a murtherer from the beginning: renouncing the footſteps of Chriſt with open mouth, and forſwering to follow him either in demeanour or doctrine, and therefore;

In a parlement holden at Weſtminſter this yeare after Eaſter, it was ordeined, that the priuileges and immunities of the abbeie of Weſtminſter ſhould remaine whole and inuiolate; but yet there was a prouiſo againſt thoſe that tooke ſanctuarie, with purpoſe to defraud their creditors, that their lands & goods ſhuld be anſwerable to the diſcharging of their debts. In the ſame parlement was granted to the king a ſubſidie, to be leuied of the great men of the land. To the end the commons might be ſpared, the dukes of Lancaſter and Britaine paid twentie markes, euerie earle ſix marks, biſhops and abbats with miters as much, and euerie monke thrée ſhillings foure pence: alſo, euery iuſtice, ſhiriffe, knight, eſquier, parſon, vicar, and chapleine, were charged after a certeine rate, but not any of the commons that were of the laitie.

Anno Reg.3. A notable exploit doone by ſir John Harleſton.

Ye haue heard how ſir John Harleſton was ſent to Chierburg as capteine of that fortreſſe, who iſſuing abroad on a day, with ſuch power as he might take forth, leauing the fortreſſe furniſhed, came to a place, where within a church and in a mill, the Frenchmen had laid vp, as in ſtorehouſes, a great quantitie of vittels, for prouiſion; which church and mill the Engliſhmen aſſaulted ſo valiantlie, that notwithſtanding there were within a good number of the enimies, that did their beſt to defend themſelues, yet at length they were taken, and ſir John Harleſton with his companie, returned with the vittels towards Chierburg, but by the way they were incountred by one ſir William de Bourds, whome the French king had appointed to lie in Mountburg with a ſtrong power of men of war, to countergarriſon Chierburg.

Herevpon inſued a ſore conflict, and manie an hardie man was beaten to the ground. And although it ſéemed that the Engliſhmen were ouermatched in number, yet they ſtucke to it manfullie. Their capteine ſir John Harleſton, fighting in the formoſt preſſe, was felled, and laie on the ground at his enimies féet in great hazard of death. The Engliſhmen neuertheleſſe continued their fight, till at length ſir Geffrie Worſlie, with a wing of armed footmen with axes, came to the reſcue (for to that end he was left behind, of purpoſe to come to their aid if néed required) with whoſe comming the Frenchmen were ſo hardlie handled, that to conclude, they were broken inſunder, beaten downe and wholie vanquiſhed: there were of them ſlaine aboue ſix ſcore, and as manie taken priſoners, among which number was their chéefe capteine ſir William de Bourdes taken, and brought to Chierburg with the reſidue, and there put in ſafe kéeping. This exploit was atchiued by the Engliſhmen, on ſaint Martins day in winter, in this third yeare of king Richard his reigne.

Sir John Clearke a valiant capteine.

But leaſt any ioy ſhould come to the Engliſh people in that ſeaſon, without ſome mixture of gréefe, one ſir J. Clearke a right valiant knight, & fellow in armes with ſir Hugh Caluerlie, chanced this yeare to lie in garriſon in a caſtell in Britaine, where was an hauen, & diuerſe Engliſh ſhips lieng in the ſame, whereof the French gallies being aduertiſed, came thither, to ſet thoſe ſhips on fire, appointing one of their gallies firſt to attempt the feat, and if fortune ſo would, to traine the Engliſhmen forth, till they ſhould fall into the laps of foure other gallies which they laid as it had béene in ambuſh. Now as the enimies wiſhed ſo it came to paſſe, for the Engliſhmen perceiuing their veſſels in danger to be burnt of the enimies, ran euerie man abord to ſaue the ſhips and goods within them; and amongſt the reſt, ſir John Clearke their capteine, meaning to take ſuch part as his men did, got abord alſo, and ſtreight falling in purſute of the gallie that withdrew for the purpoſe aforeſaid, the Engliſhmen were ſhortlie incloſed with the other gallies before they were aware, not knowing what ſhift to make to auoid the preſent danger.

A policie.

Sir John Clearke, perceiuing how the caſe ſtood, laid about him like a giant, cauſing his companie ſtill to draw backe againe, whileſt he reſiſting the enimies, did ſhew ſuch proofe of his valiancie, that they were much aſtoniſhed therewith. To be ſhort, he ſo manfullie behaued himſelfe, that the moſt part of his companie had time to recouer land; but when he that had thus preſerued others ſhuld leape forth of the ſhip to ſaue himſelfe, he was ſtriken in the thigh with an ax, that downe he fell, and ſo came into the enimies hands, being not able to recouer that hurt, for his thigh was almoſt quite cut off from the bodie, ſo that he died of that and other hurts preſentlie, leauing a remembrance behind him of manie worthie acts through his valiancie atchiued, to his high praiſe and great commendation. The barke of Yorke was alſo loſt the ſame time, being a proper veſſell; and now taken ſuddenlie, ſanke with all that were abord in hir, both Engliſhmen, and the enimies alſo that were entered into hir, thinking to carrie hir awaie.

The duke of Britaine reſtored to his dukedome.

About the ſame time the duke of Britaine returning into his countrie, vnder the conduct of ſir Thomas Percie and ſir Hugh Caluerlie, landed at a hauen not far from ſaint Malo, the fourth day of Auguſt, being receiued with vnſpeakeable ioy of the Britaines, as well lords as commons, ſo that the louing harts which they bare towards him, might well appeare, although the loue which he bare to the king of England had cauſed his ſubiects, in fauor of France, to kéepe him manie yeares forth of his dukedome as a baniſhed prince, but at length, they being ouercome with irkeſomneſſe of his long abſence, with generall conſent ſent for him home, ſo that there were but few of the Britiſh nobilitie that withdrew their dutifull obedience from him, and thoſe were onlie ſuch as firmelie linked in ſeruice with the French king, were loth to forgo ſuch roomes and dignities as vnder him they inioied; namelie, the conſtable of France, ſir Berthram de Cleaquin, the lord Cliſſon, the lord de Rohen, and the lord Rochfort, and certeine others.

Sir Hugh Caluerlie.

The lord de la Vall amongſt other, came to him (as we find in Thomas Walſingham) offering him his ſeruice as well as the reſidue. At his landing, he was likelie to haue loſt all ſuch furniture, as well of vittels, apparell, hangings, bedding, armour, and other things, which either he or his traine had brought with them. For the French gallies eſpieng their time, immediatlie as he and his companie were ſet on land, before the ſhips in which the ſaid furniture was fraught, could enter the hauen, which was ſomewhat ſtreight and narrow, came vpon them, and had them at ſuch aduantage, that if ſir Hugh Caluerlie with his archers had not cauſed the maiſter of his ſhip, euen againſt his will to returne againe to the reſcue, the gallies had taken and gone awaie with the other ſhips; but through the manfull prowes of ſir Hugh, the gallies were repelled, & the ſhips ſaued: for according to his wonted valiancie he would not returne, till he ſaw all other in ſafetie, & then defending himſelfe ſo well as he might, withdrew into the hauen, and landed ſafelie with the reſidue.

An hainous murther of a merchant ſtranger.

About the ſame time was an hainous murther committed in London, of a merchant Genowes, whom certeine Engliſh merchants vpon ſpite and enuie, which they bare towards him, cauſed to be ſlaine one euening in the ſtréet before his own gates. The cauſe that mooued the merchants ſo to procure his death was, for that he vndertooke to furniſh this land, hauing the ſtaple allowed him at Southhampton, of all ſuch wares as came forth of Leuant, ſo plentifullie as was to be had in any place in all the weſt parts of chriſtendome. In the ſummer of this yeare, a greeuous mortalitie afflicted the north parts of this land, ſo that the countrie became almoſt deſolate. And to the increaſe of that miſerie, the Scots thinking the time to ſerue their turne, inuaded the borders, and moſt cruellie harried, robbed, and ſpoiled the ſame, not letting paſſe any part, of moſt cruell murthering of the people that were left aliue, and not made awaie by that ſore contagious ſickneſſe. The number of cattell was infinite which they droue out of the land with them, not ſparing heards of ſwine which they tooke at this time, where they neuer medled with that kind of cattell before that preſent.

The Engliſh nauie ſcattered by a terrible tempeſt.

Before the Scots made this iournie into England, whileſt the mortalitie was moſt in force, they calling to certeine of the Engliſh borderers, aſked of them how it came to paſſe, that ſo great a death reigned amongſt them. The Engliſhmen, as good, plaine, and ſimple meaning men, told them, that trulie they knew not the cauſe, for Gods iudgements were hid from them in ſuch behalfe. But one thing they knew, that all calamitie, death, and aduerſitie that chanced vnto them, came by the ſpeciall grace of God, to the end that being puniſhed for their ſinnes, they might learne to repent and amend their wicked liues. The Scots hearing this, when they ſhould enter this land, vnderſtanding lewdlie what the Engliſhmen had told them concerning the diſeaſe, and the grace of God, deuiſed a bleſſing forſooth to be ſaid euerie morning, of the moſt ancient perſon in euerie familie, as; Benedicite, ſaid he: Dominus, ſaid the reſidue. Then began he againe, ſaieng; God and ſaint Mango, ſaint Romane and ſaint Andro, ſhield vs this daie fra Gods grace, and the fewle death that Engliſhmen dien vpon. Thus the ſenſeleſſe men miſconſtruing this word the grace of God, praied for their owne deſtruction, which if not in this world, yet for their brutiſh crueltie vſed at that preſent, againſt the miſerable creatures, whom the hand of God had ſpared in time of that greeuous mortalitie, it is to be feared, leaſt in another world it came to them, as the verie words of their praiers imported.

About the ſame time, Iohn Schakell eſquier was ſet at libertie, the king compounded with him for his priſoner, giuing fiue hundred marks in redie monie, and lands to the value of a hundred marks by yeare. When he ſhould bring foorth his priſoner, and deliuer him to the king, this is to be noted, as a thing verie ſtrange and woonderfull. For when he ſhould appeare, it was knowne to be the verie groome that had ſerued him in all the time of his trouble, and would neuer vtter himſelfe what he was before that time, hauing ſerued him as an hired ſeruant all that while in priſon, and out of priſon, in danger of life, when his other maiſter was murthered, where, if he would haue vttered himſelfe, he might haue beene enterteined in ſuch honorable ſtate, as for a priſoner of his degree had beene requiſit, ſo that the faithfull loue and aſſured conſtancie in this noble gentleman was highlie commended and praiſed, and no leſſe maruelled at of all men.

A notable example of a faithfull priſoner.

About the feaſt of S. Nicholas, in this third yeare of king Richards reigne, there went to ſea an armie of men, that ſhould haue paſſed ouer into Britaine, to the aid of the duke there, vnder the conduct of ſir Iohn Arundell, ſir Hugh Caluerlie, ſir Thomas Percie, ſir William Elmham, ſir Thomas Morews. ſir Thomas Baneſter, & manie other knights and eſquires, too long to rehearſe, a ſufficient power vndoubtedlie to haue doone a great enterpriſe: but they were no ſooner on the ſea, but ſuddenlie there aroſe ſuch an hideous tempeſt of wind and ſtormes, that they looked preſentlie to be all caſt awaie, they were ſcattered here and there, and driuen they wiſt not whither. The ſhip wherein ſir Iohn Arundell was aboord, chanced to be caſt on the coaſt of Ireland, and there driuen to forſake his ſhip, that was readie to be broken in peeces by rage of waues, beating it there againſt the rocks: he was drowned before he could win to land, in an Ile, neere to the which they had thruſt in the ſhip.

The Engliſh nauie ſcattered by a terrible tempeſt.

To the like end came ſir Thomas Baneſter, ſir Nicholas Trumpington, and ſir Thomas Dale, impeaching each others, as they leapt foorth of the ſhip: alſo one Muſard an eſquire, a moſt ſeemelie perſonage and a bold; and an other eſquier named Denioke, being almoſt out of danger, were fetched awaie by the ſurges of the ſea, and ſo periſhed, with manie other. Robert Ruſt a cunning ſeaman, belonging to Blacknie in Northfolke, & maiſter of the ſhip wherein ſir Iohn Arundell was imbarked, was the firſt that got to land, giuing example to others how to ſhift for themſelues. But when he ſaw his cheefe capteine, the ſaid ſir Iohn Arundell got foorth to the ſands, and as one thinking himſelfe paſt all danger, to ſhake his wet garments about him; the ſaid Ruſt waieng the dangerous ſtate wherein the ſaid ſir Iohn Arundell yet ſtood, came downe, and raught to him his hand, inforſing himſelfe to plucke him to the ſhore: but whileſt he tooke care for an other mans ſafetie, and neglected his owne, he loſt his life, and ſo they both periſhed togither; for through a mightie billow of the raging ſeas, they were both ouerthrowne, and with returning of the waues backe, drawne into the deepe, ſo that they could neuer recouer foot-hold againe, but were drowned.

The ſaid Ruſt was much lamented, bicauſe he was not onelie knowne to be a ſkilfull maiſter, but alſo counſelled the ſaid ſir Iohn Arundell in no wiſe to go to ſea, at what time he would needs ſet forward, forſing the ſaid Ruſt and the marriners to hoiſt vp ſailes and make awaie. They that ſcaped to land in that Ile, found nothing there to releeue their miſeries, but bare ground, ſo that diuerſe ſtarued through cold, wanting fier and other ſuccour: the reſidue that were luſtie and wiſe withall, ran vp and downe, and ſometime wreſtling, and otherwiſe chafing themſelues, remained there in great miſerie, from the thurſdaie, till ſundaie at noone next inſuing. At what time, when the ſea was appeaſed and waxen calme, the Iriſhmen that dwelled ouer againſt this Ile on the maine, came and fetched them thence, and releeued them the beſt they could, being almoſt dead, through trauell, hunger, and cold.

The ſaid ſir Iohn Arundell loſt not onelie his life, but all his furniture and apparell for his bodie, which was verie ſumptuous, ſo that it was thought to ſurmount the apparell of any king. For he had two and fiftie new ſutes of apparell of cloth of gold or tiſſue, as was reported, all the which, togither with his horſſes & geldings, amounting to the value of ten thouſand marks, was loſt at the ſea. And beſides this, there were loſt at the ſame time fiue and twentie ſhips, with men, horſſes, and other riches, which attended him in that voiage. Yet ſir Thomas Percie, and ſir Hugh Caluerlie, with ſir William Elmham, and certeine others eſcaped, but cruellie tormented with vnmercifull tempeſt: and before ſir Thomas Percie could get to land, after the ſea was quieted, he was aſſaulted by a Spaniard, againſt whome he ſo defended himſelfe, that in the end he tooke the Spaniſh veſſell, and brought hir, with all that he found aboord in hir, vnto the next ſhore, and ſold the ſame for an hundred pounds, and without long delaie, tooke the ſea, & paſſed ouer to Breſt, of which fortreſſe he was capteine, iointlie with ſir Hugh Caluerlie, and therefore doubting leaſt ſome inconuenience might chance thereto now in both their abſence, he made the more haſt, not taking reſt till he came thither, notwithſtanding his paſſed painefull trauels. Sir Hugh Caluerlie was neuer in his life in more danger of death, than at that time: for all that were in his ſhip (as Froiſſard writeth) were drowned, except himſelfe & ſeauen mariners. We find, that there were drowned in one place & other, aboue a thouſand Engliſhmen in that moſt vnluckie voiage. ¶ Some writers impute this calamitie to light on the ſaid ſir Iohn Arundell & his companie, for the laſciuious and filthie rule which they kept before their ſetting forth, in places where they laie, till their prouiſion was readie; who not content with that which they did before they tooke ſhip, in rauiſhing mens wiues, maids and daughters, they caried them abord, that they might haue the vſe of them whileſt they were vpon the ſea, Outragious wickedneſſe iuſtlie puniſhed.

There were drowned aboue a thouſand men in one place and other, as the additions to Ad. Merimuth doo teſtifie.

(Sæua libido furens, quid non mortalia cogis Pectora? Quidne tuo non eſt violabile telo?)

and yet when the tempeſt roſe, like cruell and vnmercifull perſons they threw them into the ſea, either for that they would not be troubled with their lamentable noiſe and crieng, or for that they thought ſo long as they had ſuch women abord with them (whome they had abuſed ſo long) God would not ceaſſe the rage of the tempeſt. But it ſhould appeare that this tempeſt was generall, for where the Spaniſh and French fleets were abroad at the ſame time, being aſſembled togither to annoie the coaſts of this land, their ſhips were likewiſe toſſed and turmoiled, ſo as no ſmall number of them were loſt, in ſo much that the damage which they ſuſteined, was thought far to paſſe that which hapned to the Engliſh nauie.

Sir Iohn Deuereux made deputie of Calis.

The earle of Warwike elected protector.

In this yeare about Chriſtmaſſe, ſir William de Montacute earle of Saliſburie, after he had remained twelue moneths ſpace at Calis, the kings lieutenant there was called home, & ſir Iohn Deuereux a right valiant knight, and an old man of warre, was ſent thither in his place. ¶ Alſo, ſir Iohn Harleſton was called home from Chierburg, and ſir William Windeſhore a noble knight was ſent thither to be capteine of that fortreſſe. ¶ After the Epiphanie, was a parlement called at London, which continued till the beginning of the kalendes of March. ¶ Alſo whereas the yeare before there had beene certeine biſhops, earles, barons, and iuſtices appointed, to haue the gouernement and rule about the king; now at the requeſt of the lords and commons in this parlement aſſembled; the lord Thomas Beauchampe earle of Warwike was choſen to remaine continuallie with the king, as cheefe gouernour, both of his perſon, and to giue anſwer to all ſtrangers that ſhould come hither about any buſineſſe whatſoeuer, and further to haue the rule and order of all things, in lieu of thoſe that were choſen thereto before: it was perceiued that they had ſought to inrich themſelues, & had doone little to the aduancement of the kings honor, or ſtate of the common-wealth, but rather emptied the kings cofers.

The archbiſhop of Canturburie made lord chancellour.

The kings halfe ſiſter married the earle of ſaint Paule.

In this parlement alſo, the lord Richard Scrope gaue ouer the office of chancellor, and Simon Sudburie archbiſhop of Canturburie tooke it vpon him. ¶ In this parlement was granted a tenth by the cleargie, and a fifteenth by the laitie, with condition that from henceforth, to wit, from the kalends of March, to the feaſt of S. Michaell, which then ſhould be in the yeare 1381, there ſhould be no more parlements, but this condition was not performed, as after appeared. In the octaues of Eaſter, the lord Waleran earle of ſaint Paule married the kings halfe ſiſter, the ladie Ione de Courtnie: the ſolemnization of this marriage was holden at Windſore, with great triumphing. ¶ The princeſſe that was mother to the bride, was greatlie againſt the marriage, but the bride hir ſelfe had ſuch a liking to the earle, that the king was contented that they ſhould match togither, and ſet him free of his ranſome which he ſhould haue paid, for that he had beene taken priſoner in the marches of Calis, and further, gaue with his ſiſter by waie of endowment, the towneſhip and manour of Bieſleet.

A combat betwixt ſir Iohn Anneſlie and Thomas Katrington.

On the ſeuenth of Iune, a combat was fought afore the kings palace at Weſtminſter, on the pauement there, betwixt one ſir Iohn Anneſlie knight, and one Thomas Katrington eſquier: the occaſion of which ſtrange and notable triall roſe hereof. The knight accuſed the eſquier of treaſon, for that where the fortreſſe of ſaint Sauiour within the Ile of Conſtantine in Normandie, belonging ſometime to ſir Iohn Chandois, had beene committed to the ſaid Katrington, as capteine thereof, to keepe it againſt the enimies, he had for monie ſold and deliuered it ouer to the Frenchmen, where he was ſufficientlie prouided of men, munition and vittels, to haue defended it againſt them; and ſith the inheritance of that fortreſſe and landes belonging thereto, had apperteined to the ſaid Anneſlie in right of his wife, as neereſt couſine by affinitie vnto ſir Iohn Chandois, if by the falſe conueiance of the ſaid Katrington, it had not beene made awaie, and alienated into the enimies hands: he offered therefore to trie the quarrell by combat, againſt the ſaid Katrington, wherevpon was the ſame Katrington apprehended, and put in priſon, but ſhortlie after ſet at libertie againe.

Whileſt the duke of Lancaſter, during the time that his father king Edward laie in his laſt ſickeneſſe, did in all things what liked him, & ſo at the contemplation of the lord Latimer (as was thought) he releaſed Katrington for the time, ſo that ſir Iohn Anneſlie could not come to the effect of his ſute in all the meane time, till now. Such as feared to be charged with the like offenſes ſtaied the matter, till at length, by the opinion of true and ancient knights it was defined, that for ſuch a forren controuerſie that had not riſen within the limits of the realme, but touched poſſeſſion of things on the further ſide the ſea, it was lawfull to haue it tried by battell, if the cauſe were firſt notified to the conſtable and marſhall of the realme, and that the combat was accepted by the parties. Herevpon was the daie and place appointed, and all things prouided readie, with liſts railed and made ſo ſubſtantiallie, as if the ſame ſhould haue indured for euer. The concourſe of people that came to London to ſee this tried, was thought to exceed that of the kings coronation, ſo deſirous men were to behold a ſight ſo ſtrange and vnaccuſtomed.

Triall by combat in ſuch caſe lawfull.

The order of the combat.

The king, his nobles, and all the people being come togither in the morning of the daie appointed, to the place where the liſts were ſet vp, the knight being armed and mounted on a faire courſer ſeemelie trapped, entered firſt as appellant, ſtaieng till his aduerſarie the defendant ſhould come. And ſhortlie after was the eſquier called to defend his cauſe in this forme: Thomas Katrington defendant, come and appeare to ſaue the action, for which ſir Iohn Anneſlie knight and appellant hath publikelie and by writing appealed thee. He being thus called thriſe by an herald at armes, at the third call did come armed likewiſe; and riding on a courſer trapped with traps imbrodered with his armes, at his approching to the liſts he alighted from his horſſe, leſt according to the law of armes the conſtable ſhould haue chalenged the horſſe if he had entered within the liſts. But his ſhifting nothing auailed him, for the horſſe after his maiſter was alighted beſide him, ran vp & downe by the railes, now thruſting his head ouer, and now both head & breaſt, ſo that the earle of Buckingham, bicauſe he was high conſtable of England, claimed the horſſe afterwards, ſwearing that he would haue ſo much of him as had appeared ouer the railes, and ſo the horſſe was adiudged vnto him.

The earle of Buckingham claimeth the horſſe.

But now to the matter of the combat (for this challenge of the horſſe was made after, as ſoone as the eſquier was come within the liſts) the indenture was brought forth by the marſhall and conſtable, which had béene made and ſealed before them, with conſent of the parties, in which were conteined the articles exhibited by the knight againſt the eſquier, and there the ſame was read before all the aſſemblie. The eſquier (whoſe conſcience was thought not to be cleare, but rather guiltie, and therefore ſéemed full of troubleſome and grudging paſſions, as an offendor alreadie conuinced; thought (as full well he might) Multa miſer timeo, quia feci multa proterue) went about to make exceptions, that his cauſe by ſome means might haue ſéemed the ſounder. But the duke of Lancaſter hearing him ſo ſtate at the matter, ſware, that except according to the conditions of the combat, and the law of armes, he would admit all things in the indentures compriſed, that were not made without his owne conſent, he ſhould as guiltie of the treaſon forthwith be had forth to execution. The duke with thoſe words wonne great commendation, and auoided no ſmall ſuſpicion that had béene conceiued of him as parciall in the eſquiers cauſe. The eſquier hearing this, ſaid, that he durſt fight with the knight, not onelie in thoſe points, but in all other in the world whatſoeuer the ſame might be: for he truſted more to his ſtrength of bodie, and fauour of his fréends, than to the cauſe which he had taken vpon him to defend. He was in déed a mightie man of ſtature, where the knight among thoſe that were of a meane ſtature was one of the leaſt. Fréends to the eſquier, in whom he had great affiance to be borne out through their aſſiſtance, were the lords Latimer and Baſſet, with others.

The eſquire is ouerthrowne.

Before they entered battell, they tooke an oth, as well the knight as the eſquier, that the cauſe in which they were to fight, was true, and that they delt with no witchcraft, nor art magike, whereby they might obteine the victorie of their aduerſarie, nor had about them any herbe or ſtone, or other kind of experiment with which magicians vſe to triumph ouer their enimies. This oth receiued of either of them, and therewith hauing made their praiers deuoutlie, they began the battell, firſt with ſpeares, after with ſwords, and laſtlie with daggers. They fought long, till finallie the knight had bereft the eſquier of all his weapons, and at length the eſquier was manfullie ouerthrowne by the knight. But as the knight would haue fallen vpon the eſquier, through ſweat that ran downe by his helmet his ſight was hindered, ſo that thinking to fall vpon the eſquier, he fell downe ſideling himſelfe, not comming néere to the eſquier, who perceiuing what had happened, although he was almoſt ouercome with long fighting, made to the knight, and threw himſelfe vpon him, ſo that manie thought the knight ſhould haue béene ouercome: other doubted not but that the knight would recouer his féet againe, and get the victorie of his aduerſarie.

The king in the meane time cauſed it to be proclamed that they ſhould ſtaie, and that the knight ſhould be raiſed vp from the ground, and ſo meant to take vp the matter betwixt them. To be ſhort, ſuch were ſent as ſhould take vp the eſquier; but comming to the knight, he beſought them, that it might pleaſe the king to permit them to lie ſtill, for he thanked God he was well, and miſtruſted not to obteine the victorie, if the eſquier might be laid vpon him, in manner as he was earſt. Finallie, when it would not be ſo granted, he was contented to be raiſed vp, and was no ſooner ſet on his féet, but he chéerfullie went to the king, without anie mans helpe, where the eſquier could neither ſtand nor go without the helpe of two men to hold him vp, and therefore was ſet in his chaire to take his eaſe, to ſée if he might recouer his ſtrength.

The knight at his comming before the king, beſought him & his nobles, to grant him ſo much, that he might be eftſoones laid on the ground as before, and the eſquier to be laid aloft vpon him: for the knight perceiued that the eſquire through exceſſiue heat, and the weight of his armor, did marueloulſie faint, ſo as his ſpirits were in manner taken from him. The king and the nobles perceiuing the knight ſo couragiouſlie to demand to trie the battell forth to the vttermoſt, offring great ſummes of monie, that ſo it might be donne, decréed that they ſhould be reſtored againe to the ſame plight in which they laie when they were raiſed vp: but in the meane time the eſquire fainting, and falling downe in a ſwoone, fell out of his chaire, as one that was like to yéeld vp his laſt breath preſentlie among them. Thoſe that ſtood about him caſt wine and water vpon him, ſéeking ſo to bring him againe, but all would not ſerue, till they had plucked off his armor, & his whole apparell, which thing prooued the knight to be vanquiſher, and the eſquier to be vanquiſhed.

The eſquier fainteth.

The knight is iudged the vanquiſher.

After a little time the eſquier began to come to himſelfe, and lifting vp his eies, began to hold vp his head, and to caſt a ghoſtlie looke on euerie one about him: which when it was reported to the knight, he commeth to him armed as he was (for he had put off no péece ſince the beginning of the fight) and ſpeaking to him, called him traitor, and falſe periured man, aſking of him if he durſt trie the battell with him againe: but the eſquier hauing neither ſenſe nor ſpirit whereby to make anſwer, proclamation was made that the battell was ended, and euerie one might go to his lodging. The eſquier immediatlie after he was brought to his lodging, and laid in bed, began to wax raging wood, and ſo continuing ſtill out of his wits, about nine of the clocke the next day he yéelded vp the ghoſt. ¶ This combat was fought (as before yée haue heard) the ſeuenth of Iune to the great reioiſing of the common people, and diſcouragement of traitours.

About the ſame time, or rather ſomewhat before, the lord Oliuer de Cliſſon, with a number of ſhips and gallies of France and Spaine, tooke the ſea, and comming on the coaſt of England, landed in diuerſe places of the weſt countrie, and alſo in the ſouth parts, ſpoiling and burning ſundrie townes, taking ſuch ſhips and veſſels as they might laie hold vpon, and ſo continued to indamage the Engliſh people that inhabited néere to the ſea ſide, all that ſummer following. ¶ In the beginning of the fourth yeare of this king, Thomas of Woodſtoke earle of Buckingham, vncle to the king, with an armie of ſeauen or eight thouſand men of armes and archers, was ſent ouer to Calis, that he might inuade France, and paſſe through the ſame to come into Britaine vnto the aid of the duke there. ¶ You haue heard how the French king had ſeized into his hands the more part of the duchie of Britaine, bicauſe that the duke had ioined himſelfe in league with the king of England: but yet there were diuerſe of the good townes, and alſo manie of the barons and nobles of the countrie which kept themſelues as neuters a long ſeaſon; but at length, longing to ſée the returne of their naturall lord and duke, ſent for him into England, requiring him to repaire home, and to ſée to the quieting of the troubled ſtate of his countrie.

The French men ſpoile & burne diuerſe townes in the weſt countrie.

Anno Reg. 4.

Froiſſard.

The earle of Buckingham ſent into Britaine to aid the duke againſt the French king.

The duke being thus earneſtlie deſired to returne home, by the aduiſe of the king of England and his councell, granted to their requeſt that had ſo inſtantlie required him, both by letters and ſufficient meſſengers: whervpon he tooke the ſea, and ſailing forth, arriued in Britaine, hauing with him ſir Robert Knolles, and a certeine number of Engliſhmen both armed men and archers (as before yée haue heard.) The king alſo promiſed to ſend him a new ſupplie verie ſhortlie, which was not forgotten. But fortune was ſo contrarie, that ſir Iohn Arundell generall of thoſe that were ſent, and manie of his companie, were drowned by force of tempeſt, and the other driuen backe againe into England (as before ye haue heard.) In the meane time, though the duke of Britaine with aid of his ſubiects, did manfullie defend his townes and countrie againſt the Frenchmen, yet he was in doubt to be oppreſſed by the great puiſſance of the Frenchmen, if aid came not the ſooner. Which being ſignified ouer into England, mooued the king and his councell to appoint the earle of Buckingham to take vpon him this voiage. He landed at Calis thrée daies before the feaſt of Marie Magdalene.

There went ouer with him in that armie, the earls of Stafford and Deuonſhire, the lord Spenſer conſtable of the hoſt, the lord Fitz Walter marſhall, the lord Baſſet, the lord Bourchier, the lord Ferrers, the lord Morlie, the lord Darcie, ſir William Windſore, ſir Hugh Caluerlie, ſir Hugh Haſtings, ſir Hugh de la Sente, ſir Thomas Percie, ſir Thomas Triuet, ſir Hugh Tirell, ſir William Farrington, ſir Iohn and ſir Nicholas Daubriticourt, Thomas Camois, Rafe Neuill ſonne to the lord Neuill, ſir Henrie baſtard Ferrers, ſir Hugh Broe, ſir Geffrie Wourſlie, ſir William Clinton, ſir Iuon Fitz Warren, and diuerſe other. After they had reſted them at Calis two daies, they remooued the third day out of the towne, and came to Marqueignes, where they remained thrée daies, till all their companie, cariages, and prouiſions were come to them out of Calis: from thence they remooued and came before Arde, where the earle of Buckingham made knights theſe that follow: the earle of Deuonſhire, the lord Morlie, the ſon of the lord Fitz Walter, ſir Roger Strange, ſir Iohn Ipre, ſir Iohn Colle, ſir Iames Tirell, ſir Thomas Ramſton, ſir Iohn Neuill, and ſir Thomas Ros or Roſlie, as ſome copies haue. Theſe perſons were made knights, bicauſe they went in the vaward, which was ſent to win a ſtrong houſe called Follant, which the owner had fortified againſt them. But though he defended himſelfe manfullie for a time, yet in the end both he and all his companie were taken priſoners.

Knights made by the earle of Buckingham at his entrie into France.

After this the duke paſſed by ſaint Omers, ſhewing himſelfe (about a mile off) with his hoſt in order of battell aloft vpon a mounteine. Some of the Engliſhmen rode to the barriers, requiring that ſome of them within would come forth and breake ſtaues with them, but they could not be anſwered. The ſame day that the Engliſhmen thus came before S. Omers, the earle of Buckingham made againe new knights, as ſir Rafe Neuill, ſir Bartholomew Bourchier, ſir Thomas Camois, ſir Foulke Corbet, ſir Thomas Danglure, ſir Rafe Petipas, ſir Lewes ſaint Albine, and ſir Iohn Paulie or rather Paulet. Theſe Engliſhmen rode through the countrie, demanding iuſts and déeds of armes, but they could not be anſwered. In déed the townes of the frontiers were well repleniſhed and ſtuffed with men of war, and ſtill were the Engliſhmen coaſted, but they kept themſelues ſo cloſe togither, without breaking their order, that their enimies could find them at none aduantage.

Knights againe made.

The iournie of the Engliſh armie through France.

They paſſed by Tirwine and by Betwine, where they lodged one day. They made but eaſie iournies, and ſéemed to require nothing but battell. They paſſed by Arras, by Miramont, and ſo to Clerie on the water of Some, and taried there thrée daies, and in other places about in that countrie. The fourth day they diſlodged, and drew towards Cambraie, and ſo to S. Quintines, & after vp towards Reimes. They found little riches, and ſmall ſtore of vittels abroad in the countrie, for the French king had abandoned all to his men of warre, who either waſted or conueied all things of any value into the fortreſſes and walled townes. The Engliſhmen therefore ſent to them of Reimes, requiring to haue ſome vittels ſent to the hoſt, for the which they would ſpare the countrie from waſting: but they of Reimes would not conſent herevnto. Wher'vpon the Engliſhmen began to light them ſuch candels, as their eies within the citie aked to behold the ſame a far off.

Moreouer, the Engliſhmen approched ſo néere to the walles and diches of the citie, that they brought awaie twentie thouſand head of cattell, which the citizens had gotten within the compaſſe of their diches; and further ſent to them within, that if they would not ſend bread and wine forth to vittell the hoſt, in that behalfe they would burne all their corne: for doubt whereof, the citizens ſent forth to the hoſt ſix charets laden with as much bread and wine as they might carie. Thus was their corne ſaued from deſtruction, and the Engliſhmen by ſoft and eaſie iournies drew towards the citie of Trois, in the which was the duke of Burgognie, with the dukes of Burbon and Bar, the earle of Ewe, the lord Coucie, ſir Iohn de Vien high admerall of France, and a great number of others of the French nobilitie. They had made a baſtide without the towne able to receiue a thouſand men of armes, but vpon the Engliſhmens approch to aſſault it, they did forſake that ſtrength, and withdrew to the towne. Sir Thomas Triuet was here made a baronet. Alſo there were certeine new knights made, as ſir Peter Berton, ſir Iohn and ſir Thomas Paulie or Paulet, ſir Iohn Stingulie, ſir Thomas Dortingues, ſir Iohn Waſſecoque, ſir Thomas Braſie, ſir Iohn Brauin, ſir Henrie Vernier, ſir Iohn Coleuile, ſir William Euerat, ſir Nicholas Stingulie, and ſir Hugh Lunit.

The citizens of Reimes ſaue their corne fields from deſtroieng by ſending vittels to the Engliſh hoſt.

Sir Thomas Triuet created a baronet.

Knights created.

Verne or Vernon.

The Engliſh hoſt perceiuing the Frenchmen to withdraw into the towne, drew togither, and ſtood in order of battell for the ſpace of two houres, and then returned to their lodgings. The next day they remooued to Maillerois le vicount néere vnto Sens, and there they remained two daies, and after drew into Gaſtinois, and ſo into Beauſe. They were coaſted all the waie by a great power of men of war, as manie or more in number as they were themſelues. But the French king being a politike prince, wiſelie conſidered what loſſes the realme of France had ſuſteined afore time, by giuing battell to the Engliſhmen, and therefore was fullie reſolued, that in no wiſe he would giue licence to his people to fight with the earle of Buckingham; but thought better (as he had learned by good experience) to kéepe his townes cloſe againſt his enimies, and ſo in the end to wearie them, than by giuing battell to put things in hazard, whereas he knew they could not take from him his countries by this kind of warre, though they ſore indamaged the ſame for a time.

The policie of the French king.

There chanced manie ſmall ſkirmiſhes amongſt thoſe that rode forth to diſcouer the countrie, but no notable incounter at all. For the Engliſhmen in thoſe daies were cats not to be catched without mittens (as Iacob Meir in one place ſaith) & againe the French men were as warie how they aduentured to come néere them, peraduenture for feare, as in the reigne of king Edward the 3, as C.O. noteth, ſaieng,

Onelie they ſought how to incloſe them vp in the countrie, and to famiſh them, that they might then fight with them at ſome great aduantage; but ſtill the Engliſh hoſt paſſed forward, holding on their voiage towards Britaine by Vandoſme, Pont Volaine, and ſo ouer the riuer of Sartre. In this meane while the French king Charles the fift was taken with a ſore ſickneſſe, whereof he departed this life the ſame daie that the Engliſh armie paſſed ouer the riuer of Sartre, which was on the ſix and twentith of September, his brethren the dukes of Aniou, Berrie, Burbon, and Burgognie were at Paris with him at the houre of his death, where as a little before they had béene abroad in the countrie with their powers, to defend the cities and townes of importance againſt the Engliſhmen, and meant indéed (if they could haue eſpied their aduantage, and gotten licence thereto of the king) to haue giuen their enimies battell. But now they were otherwiſe occupied: howbeit they had left their men abroad in the countrie to coaſt the Engliſhmen as they had doone before. All the French power was aſſembled in the citie of Mans, vnder the leading of the duke of Bar, the lord Coucie, and others.

The French and Spaniſh gallies chaſed from the coaſt of England to Kingſale in Ireland and there vanquiſhed.

In this meane while that the earle of Buckingham was paſſing through the realme of France, the French and Spaniſh gallies did much miſchéefe on the coaſt of England: but about the latter end of Iune, by a fléet of Engliſhmen of the weſt countries part of them were forced to retire, and take harbour in an hauen in Ireland called Kingſale, where being aſſailed of the Engliſhmen and Iriſhmen, they were vanquiſhed; ſo that to the number of foure hundred of them were ſlaine, and their chéefe capteins taken, as Gonſalue de Verſe, and his brother Iohn Martin de Motrigo, Turgo lord of Morants; alſo the lord of Reith, Péers Martin of Vermew, Iohn Modit of Vermew, the ſeneſhall of Wargarie, the ſeneſhall of S. Andrew, Cornelis of S. Sebaſtiano, Paſchale de Biſkey, Iohn Martinis, Sopogorge of S. Sebaſtiano, and diuerſe other.

Diuerſe townes on the Engliſh coſts deſtroied and burnt.

The abbat of Battell in reſcuing Winchelſie is put to flight.

Graueſend burnt.

There were taken foure of their barges with a ballenger, and one and twentie Engliſh veſſels recouered, which they had robbed and taken awaie from their owners. There ſcaped yet foure of their notable capteins frō the hands of our men, Martin Grantz, Iohn Peris Mantago, Iohn Huſce Gitario, and one Garcias of S. Sebaſtiano, ſo that the malice of thoſe robbers ceaſed not. For they with the French gallies ſtill lieng on the ſeas, when they eſpied anie aduantage, would land their people, and doo what miſchéefe they could, in taking preies, and burning townes and villages, although now and then they came ſhort to their veſſels againe, loſing ſometimes an hundred, ſometimes fourеſcore that were ouertaken by the Engliſhmen that came foorth againſt them. But among other inuaſions which they made this ſummer on the coaſts, we find that they burnt the towne of Winchelſie, & put the abbat of Battell to flight with his people, comming to ſuccor that towne and tooke one of his monks that was there in armor with the abbat. ¶ Some write alſo, that they burnt Rie, Haſtings, and Portſmouth. Finallie, their boldneſſe ſo farre increaſed, that in Auguſt they entring with their gallies into the riuer of Thames, came vp to Graueſend, where they burnt the moſt part of the towne, and on the other ſide of the riuer, as well in Eſſex as Kent, they burnt and ſpoiled diuerſe places, and with their priſoners and booties returned without receiuing anie hurt, bringing with them to France, both rich ſpoiles and good priſoners.

The Engliſh hoſt entreth into Britaine

But to returne to the earle of Buckingham where we left. The Engliſh armie drew ſtill towards Britaine, but with ſo ſmall doubt of their aduerſaries, that they laie thrée or foure daies ſometimes ſtill in one place. At their approching to the marches of Britaine, they came to Vitrie, a towne ſituate at the firſt entring into that countrie, and from thence went to Chateau Briant, and there reſted, whither came to them certeine knights ſent from the duke of Britaine, which ſignified to the erle of Buckingham what the dukes meaning was. Indéed by the death of the French king, the dukes malice was greatlie abated towards the Frenchmen, ſo that he had not much paſſed if the Engliſhmen had béene at home againe. Moreouer, his townes were not determined to receiue the Engliſhmen, as enimies to the crowne of France: ſo that he was in a perplexitie how to order his buſineſſe. At length, to ſhew himſelfe a ſtedfaſt fréend to the Engliſhmen, and one that was no changeling, he determined by their ſupport, to force all thoſe to allow the league which he had eſtabliſhed with the Engliſhmen, who had denied to beare armour againſt the crowne of France. And firſt, bicauſe they of Naunts were the ringleaders of that rebellious demeanour, he appointed firſt to beſiege their citie. They hauing knowledge thereof, ſent into France for aid.

Naunts beſieged by the Engliſhmen.

The ſiege at Naunts broken vp.

The dukes of Aniou, Berrie, Burgognie, and Burbon, brethren to the late king, and vncle to his ſonne the yoong king, hauing the gouernance of the realme vnder him, ſent ſix hundred ſpeares with all ſpéed to ſtrengthen them of Naunts, which defended the citie in ſuch wiſe from the puiſſance of the Engliſhmen, who enuironed the ſame with a ſtrong ſiege, that in the end, bicauſe the duke came not to them (according to his promiſe) the ſiege was raiſed the morrow after New yeares daie, two moneths and foure daies after the ſame was firſt laid. The duke of Britaine would gladlie haue come to the ſiege of Naunts, in ſtrengthening of the Engliſh hoſt, but he could not perſuade his lords to aid him in anie ſuch enterpriſe. And therefore now that the earle of Buckingham had broken vp his ſiege, he cauſed him to be lodged in the citie of Vannes, & his men abroad in the countrie, ſome here, and ſome there, acquiting himſelfe as well towards them as he might.

A peace betwixt the French king and the duke of Britaine.

The articles of the peace.

But ſuerlie the hearts of the Britains were wonderfullie changed, and in no wiſe would conſent to haue anie warre with the Frenchmen, if anie reaſonable peace might be concluded. For manie that hated the father, bare good will and heartie loue towards the ſonne, whoſe yoong yeares and great towardneſſe allured the hearts of manie to wiſh him well. Hervpon was meanes made for a peace, which by the duke of Aniou his conſent (who bare the greateſt rule in France in that ſeaſon) a finall accord was made, betwixt the yoong king and the duke of Britaine, ſo that the duke ſhould come and doo his homage vnto the French king, and ſweare to be true and faithfull vnto him: alſo that he ſhould rid the Engliſhmen out of his countrie, and helpe them with ſhips and veſſels to tranſport them home into England.

The earle of Buckingham returned into England.

The earle of Buckingham, when he vnderſtood of this peace, was not a little diſpleaſed in his mind, conſidering that the duke of Britaine had delt ſo vniuſtlie with him and his nephue the king of England. But the duke ſtill excuſed him by his ſubiects, as though if he had not thus agréed, he ſhould haue béene in danger to haue loſt his heritage of that countrie. Finallie, the earle after he had ſhips prouided for his paſſage, the eleuenth of Aprill departed out of Vannes, and came to the hauen where his ſhips laie, and ſo went aboord in like maner as other of his men did from other hauens, and ſhortlie after (when the wind ſerued) tooke the ſea, and returned into England, ſore diſpleaſed with the duke of Britaine for his great vntruth and diſſimulation (as he tooke it) notwithſtanding all excuſes to cloake the matter by him alledged.

Whileſt the Engliſhmen were thus occupied in warres againſt the Frenchmen (as before ye haue heard) the Scots could not reſt in quiet, but in reuenge for a ſhip, which the townesmen of Newcaſtell and Hull had taken on the ſea, knowing them to be pirates, determined to doo what miſcheefe they could vnto the Engliſh borders: for the loſſe of that ſhip grieued them, bicauſe it was eſteemed to be verie rich, the goods that were in it being valued at ſeuen thouſand marks. Herevpon the Scots entring by the weſt borders, inuaded & ſpoiled the countries of Weſtmerland and Cumberland, and comming into the forreſt of Inglewood, they tooke awaie with them ſuch a number of beaſts and cattell, that they were reckoned at fourtie thouſand heads of one and other. Beſides this, they cruellie ſlue all ſuch as they could laie hands vpon, and burnt vp all the townes, villages, and houſes as they paſſed: and not content herewith, they ſtale vpon the towne of Penreth, when the faire was kept there, ſlaieng, taking, and chaſing awaie the people, and after gathering togither all the goods and riches there found, tooke it awaie with them, whereof there was ſuch plentie as might haue ſatiſfied the couetons deſire of a moſt greedie armie. They returned by Carleil, but hearing that there were gotten into it a great number of men out of the countries adioining, they durſt not ſtaie to make any attempt againſt that towne, but compaſſed their waie to eſcape with their booties home into their countrie, which they did, although they loſt ſome of their companie as they paſſed by an ambuſhment of certeine archers of Weſtmerland and Cumberland, that were laid for them of purpoſe. When the earle of Northumberland would haue gone forth to reuenge thoſe iniuries doone to the countrie by the Scots, he was written to from the king and his councell, to forbeare till the daie of truce, at what time it might be knowen what was further to be doone in the matter.

The Scots inuade the Engliſh borders and ſpoile whole countries carieng awaie great booties.

About Michaelmaſſe the duke of Lancaſter, the earles of Warwike, and Stafford, with other lords and men of honor, hauing with them a great power of ſouldiers and men of warre, went into the north parts, and comming to the borders, they laie there till they had conſumed no ſmall ſummes of monie, and indamaged the countrie as much as if the Scotiſh armie had inuaded the ſame. The good they did, was, that after long treatie with the Scotiſh commiſſioners, a truce was agreed vpon till Eaſter following, which being concluded, they returned home without any more adoo. For the ſpace of halfe a ſcore yeares togither now laſt paſt, the Engliſhmen euerie yeare had one or two ſuch treaties with the Scots about the incurſions and rodes which they yearelie made into the Engliſh borders, ſore indamaging the inhabitants of thoſe north parts of the realme, notwithſtanding any truce or abſtinence of warre that might be concluded.

An armie lingering in the north parts greatlie impoueriſheth the countrie.

Additions to Adam Merimuth.

Whileſt the armie (as ye haue heard) laie idle in the north parts, there were certeine letters found by a poore man about London, who deliuered them vnto the worthie citizen Iohn Philpot, who calling vnto him certeine other worſhipfull citizens, opened one of them, in which was conteined matter of high treaſon: and perceiuing by the ſeale that it belonged vnto ſir Raſe Ferrers knight, one of the kings priuie councell, deliuered that letter with foure other letters cloſed with the ſame ſeale, firſt to the lord chancellor, and after to the king, the which being read and the ſeale knowne to be the ſaid ſir Raſe Ferrers his ſeale, manie greatlie maruelled that ſo ancient a knight, and one in whom ſo great truſt was put, ſhould go about any ſuch treaſons.

Treaſon in letters written by ſir Raſe Ferrers to certeine French lords.

One of the letters was directed to ſir Bertram de Cleaquin, an other to the lord de la Riuer the chamberlaine of France, an other to the lord Cliſſon, and an other to the patrone of the gallies, and to the capteine of the armie of Frenchmen and Spaniards, which at the ſame time waſting alongſt the coaſts, did much hurt in diuerſe places of the land. Forthwith the ſaid Philpot and others were ſent in poſt from the king to the duke of Lancaſter, that forſomuch as the ſaid ſir Raſe Ferrers was then in the north parts with him, intreating with the Scots, he ſhould arreſt him and put him in ſafe keeping, which commandement the duke did accompliſh, and committed him to be ſafelie kept in the caſtell of Dureſme, but ſhortlie after in the next parlement he was ſet at libertie, foure barons being bound for his forth comming, till time that he might more euidentlie declare his innocencie.

About the feaſt of S. Martine, was a parlement holden at Northampton to the more trouble of them that came to it, bicauſe in that ſeaſon of the yeare they were conſtreined to come where there was no ſtore of fewell to make them fiers: and beſide that, lodgings were verie ſtreict for ſo great a multitude. But the cauſe that mooued the councell to appoint this parlement there, was to the end that they might the more freelie proceed to the triall of Iohn Kirkbie a citizen of London, that had murthered the Genowais (as before ye haue hard) which Kirkbie was condemned at this parlement, and drawne and hanged in the ſight of the Londoners that were come thither, which execution if it ſhould haue beene doone at London, the lords doubted leaſt ſome tumult might haue beene raiſed by the citizens, who were reckoned in thoſe daies verie raſh and preſumptuous in their doings.

A parlement at Northampton.

Iohn Kirkbie executed for murthering a merchant ſtranger.

But now to the effect of this parlement. There was a new and ſtrange ſubſidie or taſke granted to be leuied for the kings vſe, and towards the charges of this armie that went ouer into France with the earle of Buckingham; to wit, of euerie preeſt ſecular or regular ſix ſhillings eight pence, and as much of euerie nunne, and of euerie man & woman married or not married being 16 yeares of age (beggers certenlie knowne onlie excepted) foure pence for euerie one. Great grudging & manie a bitter curſſe followed about the leuieng of this monie, & much miſcheefe roſe thereof, as after it appeared. ¶ In this fourth yeare of king Richards reigne, immediatlie after Chriſtmaſſe, Thomas Brantingham biſhop of Exceter and lord treaſuror, was diſcharged of his office of treaſurorſhip, and ſir Robert Hales lord of S. Iohns was aduanced in his place, a right noble and manlie knight, but not beloued of the commons.

Thom. Wal.

About this time did Iohn Wicliffe chieflie ſet forth his opinion touching the ſacrament of the altar, denieng the doctrine of tranſubſtantiation, and that it ought not in any wiſe to be worſhipped in ſuch ſort as the church of Rome then did teach. ¶ There were ambaſſadors ſent into Germanie, to treat with the emperour for a marriage to be had, betwixt the king of England, and the emperours ſiſter. About the beginning of March they returned, bringing with them the cardinall, intituled of ſaint Praxed, and the duke of Tarſilia, and other nobles that came from the emperor, to treat with the king & his councell about the ſame marriage. This cardinall, whether he paſſed the bounds of his commiſſion and authoritie to him granted by the pope (as ſome write) or whether he was furniſhed with ſuch faculties, he was very liberall in beſtowing of them abroode on all ſuch as would come with monie. Indulgences, which the pope had vſed onelie to reſerue for himſelfe to beſtow, this man granted the ſame liberallie, both biennals and triennals. He gaue alſo letters confeſſionall, ſionall, to all thoſe that would paie for them, admitting aſwell beneficed men as other, to be the popes chapleins. He made notaries for monie, and denied not altars portatiue to anie that would pay for them.

All for monie.

He receiued fortie pounds, beſides other gifts, of the moonks of the Ciſteaux order, to grant to them a generall licence to eat fleſh indifferentlie, as well abroad, as they had béene accuſtomed to doo at home within their monaſteries. To thoſe that were excommunicate he gaue abſolution: thoſe that had vowed to go in pilgrimage to Rome, to the holie land, or to ſaint James, he would not firſt releaſe them, till he had receiued ſo much monie, according to the true valuation, as they ſhould haue ſpent in their iornies: and to be bréefe, nothing could be aſked, but for monie he was readie to grant it. And when he was requeſted to ſhew by what power he did all theſe things, with great indignation he anſwered, that he would let them vnderſtand at Rome, if they would néeds know the authoritie which he had. At length his males were ſo filled with ſiluer, that his ſeruants diſdained to make them anie anſwer, except they brought gold ſaieng; Bring vs gold, for we are full of your ſiluer. But at his departure he tooke all awaie with him, both gold and ſiluer in ſuch abundance as was maruellous. This hath béene the practiſe of the Romaniſts from time to time, wherevpon grew this common byword (taxing the polling and ſhauing ſhifts of that execrable ſée, gaping gulfe, and inſatiable ſea)

Curia Romana non quærit ouem ſine lana.

But now to returne to other matters concerning the ſtate of the realme. After the returne of the earle of Buckingham, it was ordeined by aduiſe of the councell, that the duke of Lancaſter ſhould eftſoones go as ambaſſador from king Richard into Scotland, to ſée if he might renew the truce (which ſhortlie would haue béene expired) for thrée yéeres longer. Alſo whereas there was variance and open war mainteined, betwixt John king of Caſtile, and John king of Portingale, the earle of Cambridge, the lord William de Beauchampe, the lord Botreux, and ſir Mathew Gournie, were ſent into Portingale with fiue hundred armed men, and fiue hundred archers to aid the king of Portingale againſt the king of Caſtile, who was ſonne to the baſtard Henrie: for the duke of Lancaſter reioiſed greatlie, that he might haue ſuch a fréend as the king of Portingale, to ioine with him in aid againſt the king of Caſtile; meaning (as ſoone as opportunitie would ſerue) to go ouer with an armie to chalenge his right, and purſue his claime to the crowne of Caſtile and Leon, againſt the vſurper, in right of his wife quéene Conſtance, eldeſt daughter to the late lawfull king Peter, whom Henrie the baſtard as before (yée haue heard) did ſtill perſecute, till he had bereft from him both his life and kingdome.

An armie ſent into Portingale to aid the king there againſt the K. of Caſtile.

It was meant therefore that if the duke of Lancaſter could compaſſe his purpoſe, for the which he went at that time into Scotland, to the honour of the king and realme, then ſhould he ſhortlie after follow his brother of Cambridge with a great power, to trie what chance God would ſend to him, againſt his aduerſarie the king of Caſtile. ¶ In the meane time other incidents fell within the realme in the fourth yeare of king Richard, ſore to the diſquieting of the ſame, and vtter diſappointing for that time of the duke of Lancaſters intent. The commons of the realme ſore repining, not onelie for the pole grotes that were demanded of them, by reaſon of the grant made in parlement (as yée haue heard) but alſo (as ſome write) for that they were ſore oppreſſed (as they tooke the matter) by their land-lords, that demanded of them their ancient cuſtomes and ſeruices, ſet on by ſome diueliſh inſtinct & perſuaſion of their owne beaſtlie intentions, as men not content with the ſtate wherevnto they were called, roſe in diuerſe parts of this realme, and aſſembled togither in companies, purpoſing to inforce the prince to make them frée, and to releaſe them of all ſeruitude, whereby they ſtood as bondmen to their lords and ſuperiours.

The cōmons by reaſon of the great ſubſidie and other oppreſſions riſe in diuerſe parts of the realme.

Villaines.

Where this rebellion of the commons firſt began, diuerſe haue written diuerſlie. One author writeth, that (as he learned by one that was not farre from the place at that time) the firſt beginning ſhould be at Dertford in Kent: for when thoſe pole ſhillings, or rather (as other haue) pole grotes, were to be collected, no ſmall murmuring, curſſing, and repining among the common people roſe about the ſame, and the more indéed, through the lewd demenour of ſome vndiſcréet officers, that were aſſigned to the gathering thereof, inſomuch that one of thoſe officers being appointed to gather vp that monie in Dertford aforeſaid, came to the houſe of one John Tiler, that had both ſeruants in his houſe, and a faire yong maid to his daughter. The officer therefore demanding monie for the ſaid Tiler and for his wife, his ſeruants, and daughter, the wife being at home, and hir huſband abroad at worke in the towne, made anſwer that hir daughter was not of age, and therefore ſhe denied to paie for hir.

The beginning of the rebellion at Detford in Kent.

Now here is to be noted, that this monie was in common ſpéech ſaid to be due for all thoſe that were vndergrowne, bicauſe that yoong perſons as well of the man as of the womankind, comming to the age of fouretéene or fiftéene yeares, haue commonlie haire growing foorth about thoſe priuie parts, which for honeſties ſake nature hath taught vs to couer and kéepe ſecret. The officer therefore not ſatiſfied with the mothers excuſe, ſaid he would féele whether hir daughter were of lawfull age or not, and therewith began to miſuſe the maid, and ſearch further than honeſtie would haue permitted. The mother ſtreightwaies made an outcrie, so that hir huſband being in the towne at worke, and hearing of this adoo at his houſe, came running home with his lathing ſtaffe in his hand, and began to queſtion with the officer, aſking who made him ſo bold to kéepe ſuch a rule in his houſe: the officer being ſomewhat preſumptuous, and highminded, would foorthwith haue flowne vpon this Tiler; but J. Tiler auoiding the officers blow, raught him ſuch a rap on the pate, that his braines flue out, and ſo preſentlie he died.

Great noiſe roſe about this matter in the ſtréets, and the poore folks being glad, euerie man arraied himſelfe to ſupport John Tiler, & thus the commons drew togither, and went to Maideſtone, and from thence to Blackheath, where their number ſo increaſed, that they were reckoned to be thirtie thouſand. And the ſaid John Tiler tooke vpon him to be their chéefe capteine, naming himſelfe Jacke Straw. ¶ Others write, that one Thomas Baker of Fobhings was the firſt that procured the people thus to aſſemble togither: and that one of the kings ſeruants named John Leg, with thrée of his fellowes, practiſed to féele yoong maids whether they were vndergrowne (as yée haue hard the officer did at Dertford) which diſhoneſt and vnſéemelie kind of dealing did ſet the people ſtreight in ſuch a rage and vprore, that they cared not what they did to be reuenged of ſuch iniuries.

But Thomas Walſingham affirmeth, that the firſt ſparkes of this rebellion kindled in Eſſex, where the inhabitants of two townes onelie at the firſt, that were the authors and firſt ſtirrers of all this miſchéefe, did ſend vnto euerie little towne about, that all manner of men, as well thoſe that were aged, as others that were in their luſtieſt time and youthfull yeares,ſhould come to them with ſpéed,ſetting all excuſes apart, in their beſt arraie and furniture for warre, threatening to ſuch as came not, that their goods ſhould be ſpoiled, their houſes burnt or caſt downe, and they to loſe their heads when they were taken. The terror of this threatning cauſed the ignorant people to flocke to them by heaps, leauing all their buſineſſe,letting plough and cart ſtand, forſaking wife,children, and houſes, ſo that in a ſhort time there were fiue thouſand gotten togither of thoſe commons and huſbandmen, of which number manie were weaponed onelie with ſtaues, ſome with ruſtie ſwords and billes, and other with ſmokie bowes, more ruddie than old yuorie, not hauing paſt two or thrée arrowes,and the ſame haplie with one feather a péece.

The cōmōs of Eſſex begin the commotiō as Wal. ſaith.

The armor of ẏ Eſſex rebels

Among a thouſand of thoſe kind of perſons, yée ſhould not haue ſéene one well armed: and yet by reaſon of their multitude, when they were once got togither,they thought the whole relme had not béene able to reſiſt them; and ſuppoſed that they could with facilitie(in reſpect of the aduerſe part)make the ſtates of the land ſtoope to them, and by their permiſſion to reteine or compulſion to reſigne their roomes of dignitie. But the fond conceited rowt conſidered not the euent of this inſurrection, that the worſt would be their owne; for the old ſaieng is true, namelie, Læditur a ſtimulo quicunq; fricatur ab illo.

Moreouer, to make their part the ſtronger, theſe Eſſexmen ſent ouer into Kent, aduertiſing the people there of their enterpriſe, and therefore willed them to make them readie to ioine with them for their obteining of libertie, and reforming of the euill cuſtoms of the realme. Whether the Kentiſhmen through perſuaſions of their neighbors of Eſſex, by occaſion of that which had chanced at Dertford (as before yée haue heard)or(as it may be)the ſame chancing at that ſelfe time, they being mooued as well by the one as the other, vp they got (as yée haue heard) and gathering their power out of the next quarters adioining,by the like policie which had béene practiſed by the Eſſexmen, they ſtirred vp the moſt part of the countrie to ioine with them, and forthwith ſtopping the waie that led to Canturburie, and arreſting all ſuch as paſſed by the ſame,they cauſed them to ſweare that they ſhould be true to king Richard, and to the commons, & neuer to receiue anie king that ſhould be called Iohn. And this was for the enuie which they bare to Iohn of Gant the duke of Lancaſter, who in right of his wife Conſtance, that was daughter to king Peter of Caſtile, did name himſelfe king of Caſtile.

The oth miniſtred by the rebels to all paſſengers.

Alſo they cauſed them to ſweare that they ſhould be readie to come to them whenſoeuer they ſent for them, and induce all their neighbours to take part with them. And further,that they ſhould neuer yéeld to anie tax to be leuied in the realme, except a fiftéenth onelie. Thus it came to paſſe, that after it was ſpred abroad what ſtur theſe Eſſex and Kentiſhmen kept; the commons alſo in the counties of Suſſex, Hertford,Cambridge,Suffolke, and Norffolke,and other ſhires about, buſtled vp and ran togither on heapes, ſo that the number of thoſe vnrulie people maruellouſlie increaſed,in ſuch wiſe as now they feared no reſiſtance,and therefore began to ſhew proofe of thoſe things which they had before conceiued in their minds,beheading all ſuch men of law, iuſtices, and iurors,as they might catch,and laie hands vpon, without reſpect of pitie,or remorſe of conſcience, alledging that the land could neuer enioy hir natiue and true libertie, till all thoſe ſorts of people were diſpatched out of the waie.

The commōs of other ſhires hearing of the ſtur in Kent & Eſſex, riſe in like maner.

Lawiers, iuſtices & iurors brought to blockam feaſt by the rebels.

This talke liked well the eares of the common vplandiſh people,and by the leſſe conueieng the more, they purpoſed to burne and deſtroie all records, euidences,court-rolles, and other minuments, that the remembrance of ancient matters being remooued out of mind,their landlords might not haue whereby to chalenge anie right at their hands. Their number ſtill increaſed: for all ſuch as were in debt or danger of law for their miſdemeanors and offenſes, came out of all coaſts vnto them, ſo that when the Eſſexmen, and other of the hither ſide the Thames, were paſſed ouer and ioined with the Kentiſhmen, & thoſe that were aſſembled on that ſide the riuer vpon Blackheath; they were eſtéemed to be an hundred thouſand, hauing diuerſe capteins beſides the ſaid Iacke Straw, as William Wraw, Wat Tiler, Iacke Shéepheard,Tom Milner, and Hob Carter. Whileſt they were lodged on Blackheath, the king ſent to them certeine knights,to vnderſtand of them the cauſe of their gathering thus togither, to whome anſwer was made, that they were come togither to ſpeake with the king, about certeine cauſes and buſineſſe, & therefore they bad the meſſengers returne, and declare to the king that there was no remedie but he muſt néeds come and ſpeake with them.

The next way to extinguiſh right.

Capteins of the Eſſex and Kentiſh rebels

The rebels ſend to the k. to come ſpeak with them.

When this tale was told to the king, there were ſome that thought it beſt that he ſhould go to them, and know what their meaning was: but Simon de Sudburie the archbiſhop of Canturburie, that was lord chancellor, and alſo ſir Robert Hales lord of S. Iohns,and as then lord treaſuror,ſpake earneſtlie againſt that aduiſe, and would not by anie meanes that the king ſhould go to ſuch a ſort of barelegged ribalds; but rather they wiſhed that he ſhould take ſome order to abate the pride of ſuch vile raſcals. After the commons vnderſtood that the king would not come to them, by reaſon of the contrarie aduiſe giuen to him by thoſe two perſons, the lord chancellor and the lord treaſuror, they were maruellouſlie mooued againſt them, and ſware that they would not reſt till they had got them, & chopped off their heads, calling them traitors to the king and realme.

Ill councell.

Neuertheleſſe there be that write,that the king(to cut off the branches of ſuch miſchéefe now in the firſt budding thereof)to ſatiſfie in part the deſire of thoſe rude people, went downe the riuer in his barge to Rethereth,and there néere the ſhore kéeping himſelfe ſtill on the water, talked with a great number of them that came downe to the riuer ſide. But, forſomuch as he would not come foorth of his barge to them on land, which they ſéemed moſt to deſire, they were in a great rage, and ſo for that they could not haue him amongſt them (as they wiſhed) in furious wiſe they ran to the citie, and at the firſt approach, they ſpoiled the burrough of Southwarke, brake vp the priſons of the Marſhalſea, & the Kings bench, ſet the priſoners at libertie, & admitted them into their companie.

Froiſſard.

The rebels ſpoile Southwarke, and ſet all priſoners at large.

This was on Corpus Chriſti daie, as the ſame authors write, that the king ſhould thus talke with them: but their firſt entring into Southwarke,was on Corpus Chriſti euen, as Thomas Walſingham ſaith, paſſing at their pleaſure to and fro the bridge all that night: for although the lord maior,and other of the beſt citizens would gladlie haue cloſed the gates againſt them,yet they durſt not doo it,for feare of the commons of the citie, who ſéemed to fauour the cauſe of the rebels ſo apparantlie,that they threatned to kill both the lord maior, & all other that would take vpon them to ſhut the gates againſt the commons. The Londoners liked better of the commons, for that they proteſted the cauſe of their aſſembling togither,was not but to ſéeke out the traitors of the realme, and when they had found them foorth,and puniſhed them according to that they had deſerued,they ment to be quiet. And to giue the more credit to their ſaiengs, they ſuffered none of their companie to rob or ſpoile, but cauſed them to paie for that they tooke.

On the morrow being Corpus Chriſti day, on the which day it is reported that the king ſhould talke with them at Rethereth (as before ye haue heard) after that they ſaw that they could not haue him to come and talke with them on land, as they wiſhed, and that now they had filled their heads full with the fume of ſuch wines as they dranke in euerie mans celler that was ſet open for them, enter who would: they fell in talke with the Londoners of manie lewd deuiſes, as of the apprehending of traitors, and ſpeciallie concerning ſuch miſliking as they had of the duke of Lancaſter, whom they hated aboue all other perſons. And hereupon agreeing in one mind, after diuerſe other of their outragious doings, they ran the ſame day to the ſaid dukes houſe of the Sauoie, to the which in beautie and ſtatelineſſe of building, with all maner of princelie furniture, there was not any other in the realme comparable, which in deſpite of the duke, whom they called traitor, they ſet on fire, and by all waies and means indeuoured vtterlie to deſtroie it.

The Sauoie the duke of Lancaſters houſe burnt by the rebels.

The ſhamefull ſpoile which they there made was wonderfull, and yet the zeale of iuſtice, truth, and vpright dealing which they would ſeeme to ſhew, was as nice and ſtrange on the other part, ſpeciallie in ſuch kind of miſgouerned people: for in that ſpoiling of the dukes houſe, all the iewels, plate, and other rich and ſumptuous furniture which they there found in great plentie, they would not that any man ſhould fare the better by it of a mite, but threw all into the fire, ſo to be conſumed; and ſuch things as the fire could not altogither deſtroie, as plate and iewels, they brake and craſhed in peeces, throwing the ſame into the Thames. One of them hauing thruſt a faire ſiluer peece into his boſome, meaning to conueie it awaie, was eſpied of his fellowes, who tooke him, and caſt both him and the peece into the fire; ſaieng they might not ſuffer any ſuch thing, ſith they profeſſed themſelues to be zealous of truth and iuſtice, and not theeues nor robbers.

Strange dealing of the rebels.

The iuſtice of the rebels.

There were 32 of them, that being gotten into the celler of the Sauoie, where the dukes wines laie, dranke ſo much of ſuch ſweete wine as they found there, that they were not able to come forth, but with ſtones & wood that fell downe as the houſe burned, they were cloſed in, ſo that out they could not get. They laie there ſhowting & crieng ſeuen daies togither, and were heard of manie, but none came to helpe them, and ſo finallie they periſhed. Now after that theſe wicked people had thus deſtroied the duke of Lancaſters houſe, and done what they could deuiſe to his reproch; they went to the temple, and burnt the men of lawes lodgings, with their bookes, writings, and all that they might lay hand vpon. Alſo the houſe of ſaint Iohns by Smithfield they ſet on fire, ſo that it burned for the ſpace of ſeuen daies togither. On Friday a great number of them, eſteemed to 20 thouſand, went to the manor of Heiburie that belonged vnto the lord of ſaint Iohns, and ſetting fire on it, ſought vtterlie to deſtroie the whole buildings about it.

The lawiers lodgings in the temple burnt by the rebels.

They were now diuided into three parts, one vnder the leading of Iacke Straw, tooke in hand to ruinate that houſe, and an other number of them lay on mile end greene, and the third companie kept vpon the tower hill, and would not ſuffer anie vittels to be conueied into the tower, where the king at that time was lodged, and was put in ſuch feare by thoſe rude people, that he ſuffered them to enter into the tower, where they ſought ſo narowlie for the lord chancelor, that finding him in the chappell, they drew him forth togither with the lord treaſuror, and on the tower hill without reuerence of their eſtates and degrees, with great noiſe and fell cries, they ſtroke off their heads. There were alſo beheaded at the ſame time by thoſe rude people, one of the kings ſeruants that was a ſergeant at armes called Iohn Leg, who had vſed himſelfe ſomewhat extremelie in gathering vp of the pole monie, as by one writer it appeareth. Alſo to make vp the meſſe, they beheaded a Franciſcane Frier, whom they had taken there at the ſame time, for malice of the duke of Lancaſter, bicauſe he was verie familiar with him. ¶ Some write that this frier was confeſſor, and other ſay that he was phyſician to the king; but whatſoeuer he was, the commons chopped off his head, to beare the other companie, not ſparing for anie reſpect that might be alledged in any of their behalfes.

The lord chācellor and the lord treaſuror drawne out of the tower and put to death by the rebels.

Thom. Walſ.

On the ſame day alſo they beheaded manie others, as well Engliſhmen as Flemings, for no cauſe in the world, but onelie to ſatiſfie the crueltie of the commons, that then were in their kingdome, for it was a ſport to them, when they gat any one amongſt them, that was not ſworne to them, and ſeemed to miſlike of their doings, or if they bare but neuer ſo little hatred to him, ſtreightwaies to plucke of his hood, with ſuch a yelling noiſe as they tooke vp amongſt them, and immediatlie to come thronging into the ſtreets, and ſtrike off his head. Neither had they any regard to ſacred places; for breaking into the church of the Auguſtine friers, they drew forth thirteene Flemings, and beheaded them in the open ſtreets; and out of the pariſh churches in the citie, they tooke forth ſeuenteene, and likewiſe ſtroke off their heads, without reuerence either of the church or feare of God.

The raging rebels make a paſtime to kill men.

No reſpect of place with the rebels.

But they continuing in their miſcheefous purpoſe, ſhewed their malice ſpeciallie againſt ſtrangers, ſo that entring into euerie ſtreet, lane, and place, where they might find them, they brake vp their houſes, murthered them which they found within, and ſpoiled their goods in moſt outragious manner. Likewiſe they entered into churches (as before ye haue heard) into abbeies, monaſteries, and other houſes, namelie of men of law, which in ſemblable ſort they ranſacked. They alſo brake vp the priſons of newgate, and of both the counters, deſtroied the books, and ſet priſoners at libertie, and alſo the ſanctuarie-men of ſaint Martins le grand. And ſo likewiſe did they at Weſtminſter, where they brake open the eſchequer, and deſtroied the ancient bookes and other records there, doing what they could to ſuppreſſe law, and by might to beate downe equitie and right, as it is ſaid,

Tunc ius calcatur violentia cum dominatur.

The outragious dealing of the rebels.

They that entered the tower, vſed themſelues moſt preſumptuouſlie, and no leſſe vnreuerentlie againſt the princeſſe of Wales, mother to the king: for thruſting into hir chamber, they offered to kiſſe hir, and ſwaſht downe vpon hir bed, putting hir into ſuch feare, that ſhe fell into a ſwoone, and being taken vp and recouered, was had to the water ſide, and put into a barge, & conueied to the place called the queenes wardrobe, or the tower riall, where ſhe remained all that day and the night following, as a woman halfe dead, till the king came to recomfort hir. It was ſtrange to conſider, in what feare the lords, knights & gentlemen ſtood of the cruell proceedings of thoſe rude & baſe people. For where there were ſix hundred armed men, and as manie archers in the tower at that preſent, there was not one that durſt gaineſaie their doings.

Finallie, when they had eaſed their ſtomachs, with the ſpoiling, burning, and defacing of ſundrie places, they became more quiet, and the king by the aduiſe of ſuch as were then about him, vpon good deliberation of counſell, offered to them pardon, and his peace, peace, with condition that they ſhould ceaſe from burning and ruinating of houſes, from killing and murthering of men, and depart euerie man to his home without more adoo, and there to tarrie for the kings charters confirmatorie of the ſame pardon. The Eſſexmen were content with this offer, as they that were deſirous to ſee their wiues and children, being waxen wearie of continuall trauell and paines which they were conſtreined to take. The king went forth vnto Mile end, and there declared vnto the commons that they ſhould haue charters made to them of his grant, to make them all frée. And further that euerie ſhire, towne, lordſhip and libertie ſhould haue banners of his armes deliuered vnto them, for a confirmanion of his grant. Hereupon they ſéemed well appeaſed, and the king rode to the quéenes wardrobe, otherwiſe called the tower roiall, to viſit his mother, and ſo did comfort hir ſo well as he could, and taried with hir there all night.

The king offereth the rebels pardon.

Froiſſard.

The Eſſexmen ſatiſfied with the kings promiſes, immediatlie departed homeward; howbeit they appointed certeine of their companie to remaine ſtill and tarie for the kings charters. The Kentiſhmen alſo remained, and were as buſie in maner the next day being ſaturdaie, in all kind of miſchiefous dealings, as they had béene before, to wit, in murthering of men, ouerthrowing and burning of houſes. The king therefore ſent vnto them ſuch as declared in what ſort their fellowes were gone home well ſatiſfied, & from thenceforth to liue in quiet, and the ſame forme of peace he was contented to grant to them, if it liked them to accept the ſame. Hereupon their chéefe capteine Wat Tiler, a verie craftie fellow, and indued with much wit (if he had well applied it) ſaid, that peace indéed he wiſhed, but yet ſo, as the conditions might be indited to his purpoſe.

The wicked purpoſe of the rebels.

He was determined to driue off the king and his councell (bicauſe he was of greater force than they) with cauils and ſhifts till the next daie, that in the night following he might the more eaſilie haue compaſſed his reſolution, which was, hauing all the poorer ſort of the citie on his ſide, to haue ſpoiled the citie, and to ſet fire in foure corners of it, killing firſt the king and the lords that were about him: but he that reſiſteth the proud, and giueth his grace to the humble, would not permit the vngratious deuiſes of the naughtie and lewd lozzell to take place, but ſuddenlie diſappointed his miſchéefous drift. For whereas diuerſe formes of charters had béene drawne according to the effect of the agréement with the Eſſexmen, and none of them might pleaſe this lordlie rebell, at length the king ſent to him one of his knights called ſir John Newton, to requeſt him to come to him, that they might talke of the articles which he ſtood vpon to haue inſerted in the charter, of the which one was to haue had a commiſſion to put to death all lawiers, eſcheaters, and other which by any office had any thing to doo with the law; for his meaning was that hauing made all thoſe awaie that vnderſtood the lawes, all things ſhould then be ordered according to the will and diſpoſition of the common people. It was reported in déed, that he ſhould ſaie with great pride the day before theſe things chanced, putting his hands to his lips, that within foure daies all the lawes of England ſhould come forth of his mouth. The wretches had vtterlie forgotten all law, both diuine and humane; otherwiſe they would haue béene content to liue vnder law, and to doo vnto others as they would be doone vnto, as the verie law of nature (than which there cannot be a better guide) teacheth,

The rebels would haue all law aboliſhed.

Quod tibi vis fieri mihi fac, quod non tibi, noli,
Sic potes in terris viuere iure poli.

Arrogant and prou words of a villen.

When therefore the ſaid ſir John Newton called vpon him to come awaie to the king, he anſwered as it were with indignation: If thou (ſaith he) haſt ſo much haſt to returne to the king, thou maiſt depart, I will come at my pleaſure. When the knight therefore was come from him, he followed indéed, but ſomwhat ſlowlie. And when he was come néere to the place in Smithfield where the king then was, with certeine lords and knights, & other companie about him, the ſaid ſir John Newton was ſent to him againe, to vnderſtand what he meant. And bicauſe the knight came to him on horſſebacke, & did not alight from his horſſe, Wat Tiler was offended, & ſaid in his furie, that it became him rather on foot than horſſebacke to approach into his preſence. The knight not able to abide ſuch preſumptuous demeanour in that proud and arrogant perſon, ſhaped him this anſwer: It is not amiſſe that I being on horſſebacke, ſhould come to thée ſitting on horſſebacke.

With which words Wat Tiler taking indignation, drew out his dagger, menacing to ſtrike the knight, calling him therewith traitor: the knight diſdaining to be miſuſed at the hands of ſuch a ribald, told him that he lied falſelie, and with that plucked forth his dagger. Wat Tiler being among his men, ſhewed that he would not beare that iniurie, and forthwith made towards the knight to run vpon him. The king perceiuing the knight in danger, bad him alight from his horſſe, and deliuer his dagger to Wat Tiler: but when that would not pacifie his proud and high mind, but that he would néeds flée vpon him, the maior of London William Walworth, and other knights and eſquiers that were about the king, told him that it ſhould be a ſhame for them all, if they permitted the knight in their preſence before the eies of their prince ſo to be murthered: wherfore they gaue counſell to ſuccor him forthwith, and to apprehend the vile naughtie ribald. The king though he was but a child in yeares, yet taking courage to him, commanded the maior to arreſt him. The maior being a man of incomparable boldneſſe, forthwith rode to him and arreſted him, in reaching him ſuch a blow on the head, that he ſore aſtonied him therewith: and ſtreightwaies other that were about the king, as John Standiſh an eſquier, and diuers more of the kings ſeruants drew their ſwords, and thruſt him through in diuerſe parts of his bodie, ſo that he fell preſentlie from his horſſe downe to the earth, and died there in the place.

William Walworth maior of London ſtout couragious man.

The death of Wat Tiler capteine of the rebels.

When the commons beheld this, they cried out; Our capteine is traitorouſlie ſlaine, let vs ſtand togither and die with him: let vs ſhoot and reuenge his death manfullie: and ſo bending their bowes, made them readie to ſhoot. The king ſhewing both hardineſſe and wiſedome at that inſtant, more than his age required, ſet his ſpurs to his horſſe, and rode to them, ſaieng; What is the matter my men, what meane you? Will you ſhoot at your king? Be not troubled nor offended at the death of a traitor and ribald; I will be your king, capteine and leader, follow me into the fields, and you ſhall haue all things that you can deſire. This did the king, to the end he might appeaſe them, leaſt they ſhould haue ſet fire on the houſes there in Smithfield, and haue attempted ſome further miſchéefe, in reuenge of the diſpleaſure which they tooke for the death of their chéefe leader. They moued with theſe the kings words, followed him and the knights that were with him, into the open fields, not yet reſolued whether they ſhould ſet vpon the king and ſlea him, or elſe be quiet, and returne home with the kings charter.

The king perſuadeth the rebels.

In the meane time, the lord maior of London was returned into the citie, with one man onelie attending vpon him, and cried to the citizens; Oh yée good and vertuous citizens, come forth out of hand, and helpe your king readie to be ſlaine, & helpe me your maior ſtanding in the ſame perill; or if yée will not helpe me for ſome faults committed by me againſt you, yet forſake not your king, but helpe and ſuccour him in this preſent danger. When the worſhipfull citizens and other, that in their loiall hearts loued the king, had heard theſe words, incontinentlie they put themſelues in ſtrong and ſure armor, to the number of a thouſand men, and gathering themſelues togither into the ſtréets, tarried but for ſome lord or knight that might conduct them to the king: and by chance there came vnto them ſir Robert Knolles, whome all of them requeſted that he would be their leader, leaſt comming out of arraie and order, they might the ſooner be broken, who willinglie led one part of them, and certeine other knights led other of them, clad in faire bright armour vnto the kings preſence. The king with the lords, knights and eſquires, not a little reioiſed at the comming of thoſe armed men, and ſtreightwaies compaſſed the commons about, as they had béene a flocke of ſhéepe that ſhould haue béene cloſed within ſome fold, till it pleaſed the ſhéepheard to appoint forth, which ſhould be thruſt into paſture, and which taken to go to the ſhambels.

In armie without a capteine.

The rebels quite diſcouraged threw downe their weapons at the comming of the Londoners in aid of the king.

There was to be ſéene a maruellous change of the right hand of the lord, to behold how they throwing downe ſtaues, bils, axes, ſwords, bowes and arowes, humblie began to ſue for pardon, which a little before gloried to haue the life of the king and his ſeruants wholie and altogither in their hands, power, and diſpoſition. The poore wretches ſought to hide themſelues in the corne that grew in the fields, in ditches, hedges, and dennes, and wheresoeuer they might get out of the way, ſo to ſafe gard their liues. The knights that were with the king would gladlie haue béene dooing with them, and requeſted licence of him to ſtrike off the heads of ſome one or two hundred of them, that it might be a witneſſe in time to come, that the force of the order of knighthood was able to doo ſomewhat againſt the carters and ploughmen: but the king would not ſuffer them, alledging that manie of them were come thither by compulſion, and not of their owne accord, and therfore it might come to paſſe that thoſe ſhould die for it, that had nothing offended: but he commanded that there ſhould be proclamation made in London, that the citizens ſhould haue no dealings with them, nor ſuffer anie of them to come within the citie that night, but to cauſe them to lie without doores.

Abraham Fleming out of Henrie Knighton canon of Leiceſter abbeie.

¶ In the report of this commotion chronographers doo ſomewhat varie, as by this preſent extract out of Henrie Knighton canon of Leceiſter abbeie, liuing at the time of this tumult may appeare: which Abraham Fleming hath faithfullie and trulie tranſlated out of the annales of the ſaid canon written in parchment in old Latine letters, as followeth. Upon a ſaturdaie, theſe malcontents [to wit, Thomas Baker the firſt moouer but afterwards the principall leaders, Iacke Straw, Iacke Miler, Iacke Carter, Iacke Trewman, and their trecherous traine] met togither in Smithfield, whither alſo the king repaired in the morning, who although in yeares he was but yoong, yet in wiſedome and diſcretion he was well growne. The ringleader of this tumultuous rowt, whoſe right name was Wat Tiler, which he had now changed into Iacke Straw, approched néere the king, in ſo much that he might in a maner touch him, being the mouth of all the reſidue, and hauing in his hand a drawne dagger, which he toſſed from hand to hand, boy-like plaieng with it, & watching due time therewith, if not to ſtab, yet ſuddenlie to ſmite the king, if he denied their requeſts. Wherevpon they that were next and about the king were greatlie affeard, leaſt his pretended miſchéefe ſhould come to paſſe.

Now he craued of the king that all warrens, waters, parks and woods ſhould be common, ſo that as well poore as rich might fréelie in any place whereſoeuer practiſe fiſhing in ponds, pooles, riuers, or any waters, and might hunt déere in forreſts and parkes, and the hare in the fields, with diuerſe other requeſts, which he would haue granted without contradiction or gainesaieng, and exerciſe without controlment. Now when the king in the grant hereof by deliberation vſed ſome delaie, Iacke Straw drew néerer vnto him, and ſpeaking vnto him certeine thretening words, tooke hold of the horſſes bridle whereon the king rode, vpon what preſumptuous enterpriſe I wot not. Which Iohn Walworth a burgeſſe of London beholding, and fearing preſent death to hang ouer the kings head, caught a weapon in his hand, and therwith thruſt Iacke Straw through the throte, which when another that was by being an eſquier, named Rafe Standiſh did ſée, with his weapon alſo ran him through the ſides; in ſo much that he fell flat on his backe to the ground, and beating with his hands to and fro a while, at laſt he gaue vp his vnhappie ghoſt.

Then a great clamor and lamentable outcrie was made, and heard a great while togither, ſaieng; Our guide is dead, our capteine is dead. And indéed ſo he was, being dragged by the hands and féet in a vile and contemptible ſort into ſaint Bartholomewes church hard by. Then did manie of the vnrulie multitude withdraw themſelues, and vaniſhing awaie betooke them to their héeles, being about the number (as it was thought) of ten thouſand. Then the king minding to make amends and to requite receiued courteſie, knighted the ſaid Iohn Walworth, & Rafe Standiſh, with foure burgeſſes more of the citie, namelie Iohn Philpot, Nicholas Brembre, Iohn Laund, and Nicholas Twifield, girding them about the waſt with the girdle of knighthood, which was the maner of their graduating. Then the king hauing ordeined and made the foreſaid ſix knights, commanded that the reſidue of the curſſed crue ſhould depart and get them into the field, that méeting togither in a companie, he might fall vnto a treatie of agréement with them.

The rowt being there aſſembled, behold a multitude of armed men ran ruſling out of the citie, ſir Robert Knols being their capteine, who with theſe his ſoldiers compaſſed & hedged in the poore caitiues diſtreſſed in the field like ſhéepe that haue loſt their ſhéepheard. Then the king of his accuſtomed clemencie, being pricked with pitie, would not that the wretches ſhould die, but ſpared them being a raſh and fooliſh multitude, and commanded them euerie man to get him home to his owne houſe; howbeit manie of them, at the kings going awaie ſuffered the danger of death. In this miſerable taking were reckoned to the number of twentie thouſand. Thus ſaith Knighton, not as an eie-witneſſe, but as taught by heare-ſaie, whereby he compiled the greateſt part of his annales, as he himſelfe confeſſeth, ſéeming ſorrie that he was ſo conſtreined, as by part of the octaſtichon at the foot of the firſt page, intituled Lamentum compilatoris, appeareth in maner and forme following:

Sum cæcus factus ſubita caligine tactus,
Nec opus inceptum iam corrigo forſan ineptum,
Me metuo dubium pro veris ſæpe locutum,
Plus audita loquor quàm mihi viſa ſequor, &c.

All the foreſaid villanies notwithſtanding againſt the king and the ſtate, tending wholie to the ſubuerſion of law and ciuill gouernement, albeit the wretches deſerued no ſparke of fauour, but extreame ſeueritie of iudgement to be executed vpon them; yet (as yée haue heard) beſides the great clemencie of the king, exhibited vnto them in remitting their offenſe, and acquiting them from the rigor of the law, he granted and gaue to them the charter, which they had requeſted, faire written and ſealed, to auoid a greater miſchiefe, & commanded it for a time to be deliuered them, knowing that Eſſex and Kent were not ſo pacified, but that if they were not the ſooner contented, and that partlie after their minds, they would vp againe. The tenor of the charter which was gotten thus by force of the king was as followeth.

The forme of the kings charter of Manumiſsion.

The like there was granted to them of other countries as well as to theſe of Hertfordſhire in yͤ ſame forme, the names of the counties changed.

The towneſmen of ſaint Albons not yet quieted.

The commons hauing obteined this charter departed home, but ceaſſed not from their riotous demeanour in ſundrie parts of the realme, and eſpeciallie at ſaint Albons, where after the towneſmen were returned home, they kept ſuch a coile againſt the abbat and monks, to haue certeine ancient charters deliuered them that concerned their liberties, and to haue ſuch new made and deliuered to them as might ſerue their purpoſe; that bicauſe ſuch old charters as they requeſted were not to be had, the abbat and monks looked euerie houre when their houſe ſhould be ſet on fire and burnt ouer their heads. The prior and certeine other as well monks as laie men that were ſeruants to the abbat, fled for feare of the rage of thoſe miſgouerned people, knowing that they hated them deadlie, and therefore looked for no courteſie at their hands. They had obteined the kings letters vnto the abbat, commanding him to deliuer vnto them ſuch charters as they had giuen information to be remaining in his hands, ſo that vnder colour thereof, they called for thoſe writings in moſt importunate wiſe, threatning ſore, if they were not brought to light, vtterlie to deſtroie the houſe by ſetting it on fire.

But to ſpeake of all the vnrulie parts of thoſe vnrulie people, it were too long a proceſſe: yet at length after they vnderſtood how their grand capteine and cheefe ringleader Wat Tiler was ſlaine, they began ſomewhat to aſſwage their preſumptuous attempts, the rather for that there came a knight with the kings letter of protection in behalfe of the abbat and his houſe, and yet they were not ſo calmed, but that they continued in requiring to haue charters made to them by the abbat, of the like forme and effect to that which the king had made, concerning the infranchiſing them from bondage, whereby they that obteined ſuch charters tooke themſelues to be diſcharged of all ſeruices and accuſtomed labors, ſo that they meant not to doo any further works, nor yeeld ſuch cuſtomes as before time they vſuallie had beene accuſtomed to doo and yeeld vnto their land lords.

Neither did the towneſmen of S. Albons, and the tenants of other townes and villages thereabout, that belonged to the abbeie of S. Albons, thus outragiouſlie miſdemeane themſelues, but euerie where elſe the commons kept ſuch like ſtur, ſo that it was rightlie called the hurling time, there were ſuch hurlie burlies kept in euerie place, to the great danger of ouerthrowing the whole ſtate of all good gouernment in this land. For euen the ſelfe ſame ſaturdaie after Corpus Chriſti day, in Suffolke there were got togither to the number of fiftie thouſand men, by the ſetting on of Iohn Wraw, a naughtie lewd prieſt, that had beene firſt among the Eſſexmen at London, and was ſent downe in all poſt haſt from Wat Tiler, to ſtir the commons in thoſe parts to commit the like miſcheefe as he had ſeene begun about London. Theſe fellowes therfore, after they were aſſembled togither, fell to the deſtroieng of the manors and houſes of men of law, & ſuch lawiers as they caught, they ſlue, and beheded ſir Iohn Cauendiſh lord chiefe iuſtice of England, and ſet his head vpon the pillorie in the market place in S. Edmundſburie.

The hurling time.

The outragious dealings of the Suffolke rebels.

Sir Iohn Cauendiſh lord chiefe iuſtice beheaded.

The prior of S. Edmundſburie ſlaine.

Alſo ſir Iohn of Cambridge the prior of ſaint Edmundſburie, as he would haue fled from them, was taken not far from Mildenhale, and likewiſe beheaded, his bodie being left naked in the open field, and no man preſuming to burie it, during the ſpace of fiue daies, for feare of the cruell commons. His head was ſet vpon a pole, and caried before Iohn Wraw and other of thoſe wicked people; the which comming to Burie, and entring the towne in maner of a proceſſion, when they came into the market place where the pillorie ſtood, as it were in token of the old friendſhip betwixt the lord chiefe iuſtice, and the ſaid prior, they made ſport with their heads, making them ſometime as it were to kiſſe, other whiles to ſound in either others eare. After they had taken their paſtime inough herewith, they ſet both the heads againe aloft vpon the pillorie. After this, they beheaded an other monke called Dan Iohn de Lakinghulth, whoſe hed was likewiſe ſet by the other two vpon the pillorie. Moreouer, they cauſed the monks to come foorth and bring vnto them all ſuch obligations, in which the towneſmen ſtood bound vnto the monaſterie for their good abearing; likewiſe ſuch charters of liberties of the towne of Burie, which king Cnute the founder of the ſaid monaſterie, and his ſucceſſors had granted to the ſame: which writings when they had brought foorth, and proteſted that they knew of no more, the commons would ſcarſelie beleeue them, and therefore called the towneſmen foorth, and bad them ſee if that there were all ſuch writings as they thought ſtood with their aduantage to haue brought to light. The towneſmen feigned as though they had beene ſorie to ſee ſuch rule kept againſt the monks, where in deed they had ſet the commons in hand with all theſe things. To conclude, the commons tooke this order with the monks, that if the towneſmen might not obteine their ancient liberties, by the hauing of thoſe writings, they ſhould declare what the ſame liberties were, which they were woont to inioy, and the abbat of Burie, Edmund Brumfield, being then in priſon at Notingham whom they purpoſed to deliuer (ſo that he ſhould celebrat diuine ſeruice in his monaſterie on Midſummer daie next) within fourtie daies after his comming home, ſhould confirme with his ſeale ſuch charter as was to be deuiſed and made concerning the ſame liberties of the ſaid towneſmen, and the couent ſhould likewiſe put therevnto their common ſeale.

This Edmund Brumfield was committed to priſon by the K. for his preſumptuous intruſion into the abbacie of Burie.

Moreouer, they conſtreined the monks to deliuer vnto the towneſmen, a croſſe and a chalice of fine gold, and other iewels that belonged to the abbeie, being in value aboue the worth of a thouſand pounds in monie, the which was to remaine in the hands of the townſmen, vpon this condition, that if Edmund Brumfield being deliuered out of priſon inioied the dignitie of abbat there, and with all put his ſeale togither with the couent ſeale within the time limited, vnto a writing that ſhould conteine the liberties of the towne, that then the ſame croſſe, chalice, and other iewels ſhould be reſtored vnto the monaſterie, or elſe the ſame to remaine for euer to the towneſmen as forfeited. Such were the dooings of thoſe rebels in and about the towne of Burie: and the like diſorders & breach of peace followed by the commotions of the commons in Cambridgeſhire, and in the Ile of Elie, reſembling the others in ſlaughters of men, deſtroieng of houſes, and all other ſorts of miſcheefe.

John Litteſter capteine of þ Norfolke rebels.

In like maner in Norffolke there was aſſembled an huge number of thoſe vnrulie countrie people, which vnder the guiding of a dier of cloth, commonlie called John Litteſter, that had dwelt in Norwich, attempted and did all ſuch vngratious feats, as they had heard that other did in other parts of the realme, yea and greater alſo, putting forth their hands vnto rapine and robberie. And whereas they were wholie conſpired togither, and bent to commit all kind of miſcheefe, yet eſteeming their owne authoritie to be ſmall, they purpoſed to haue brought William Vfford earle of Suffolke into their felowſhip, that if afterwards they might happilie be impeached hereafter, for ſuch their naughtie and moſt wicked dooings, they might haue had ſome ſhadow or colour, as it were through him, whie they had delt in ſuch vnrulie ſort. But the earle aduertiſed of their intention, ſuddenlie roſe from ſupper, and got him awaie by vnknowne waies, ſtill fleeing from the commons, till at length he got to S. Albons, and ſo from thence to the king.

The earle of Suffolke eſcapeth from the rebels.

The Norfolk rebels compell the noblemen & gentlemen to be ſworne to them.

Sir Robert Salle ſlaine by one of his own villains.

The commons miſſing of their purpoſe for the hauing of him, laid hold vpon all ſuch knights and other gentlemen as came in their waie, and were found at home in their houſes, compelling them to be ſworne to them, and to ride with them through the countrie, as the lord Scales, William lord Morlie, ſir John Brewes, ſir Stephan Hales, and ſir Robert Salle: which ſir Robert continued not long aliue among them, for he could not diſſemble as the reſidue, but began to reprooue openlie their naughtie dooings, for the which he had his braines daſht out by a countrie clowne, one that was his bondman, and ſo he ended his life, who if he might haue come to haue tried his manhood and ſtrength with them in plaine battell, had beene able to haue put a thouſand of thoſe villaines in feare, his valiancie and prowesſe was ſuch. The reſidue taught by his example that they muſt either diſſemble or die for it, were glad to currie fauour, praiſing or diſpraiſing all things as they ſaw the commons affected, and ſo comming into credit with their cheefteine John Litteſter, that named himſelfe king of the commons, they were preferred to ſerue him at the table, in taking the aſſaie of his meats and drinks, and dooing other ſeruices, with kneeling humblie before him as he ſat at meat, as ſir Stephan Hales who was appointed his caruer, and others had other offices aſſigned them.

The capteine of the Norfolke rebels forceth the noblemen and gentlemen to ſerue him at the table.

At length, when thoſe commons began to wax wearie of taking paines in euill dooings, they tooke counſell togither, and agreed to ſend two knights, to wit, the lord Morlie, and ſir John Brewes, and three of the commons, in whom they put great confidence, vnto the king, to obteine their charter of manumiſſion and infranchiſing, and to haue the ſame charter more large than thoſe that were granted to other countries. They deliuered great ſummes of monie vnto thoſe whome they ſent, to beſtow the ſame for the obteining of pardon, and ſuch grants as they ſued for, which monie they had got by force of the citizens of Norwich, to ſaue the citie from fire and ſacking. Theſe knights as they were on their iournie, at Ichingham not farre diſtant from Newmarket, not looking for anie ſuch thing, met with ſir Henrie Spenſer biſhop of Norwich, a man more fit for the field than the church, & better ſkilled (as may appeere) in arms than in diuinitie. This biſhop had aduertiſements at his manor of Burlie neere to Okam in the parties about Stamford, of the ſturre which the commons in Norffolke kept, and thervpon reſolued ſtreightwaies to ſee what rule there was holden. He had in his companie at that time, not paſſing eight lances, and a ſmall number of archers.

A warlike biſhop.

The biſhop meeting thus with the knights, examined them ſtreightwaies if there were anie of the traitours there with them. The knights at the firſt were doubtfull to bewraie their aſſociats: but at laſt imboldened by the biſhops words, declared that two of the cheefe dooers in the rebellion were there preſent, and the third was gone to prouide for their dinner. The biſhop ſtreightwaies commanded thoſe two to be made ſhorter by the head, and the third he himſelfe went to ſeeke, as one of his ſheepe that was loſt; not to bring him home to the fold, but to the ſlaughter-houſe, as he had well deſerued (in the biſhops opinion) ſith he had ſo miſcheefouſlie gone aſtraie, and alienated himſelfe from his dutifull allegiance. Theſe perſons being executed, and their heads pight on the end of poles, and ſo ſet vp at Newmarket, the biſhop with the knights tooke their waie with all ſpeed towards Northwalſham in Norffolke, where the commons were purpoſed to ſtaie for anſwer from the king: and as he paſſed through the countrie, his number increaſed, for the knights and gentlemen of the countrie, hearing how their biſhop had taken his ſpeare in hand, and was come into the field armed, ioined themſelues with him.

Spenſer biſh. of Norwich goeth as capteine againſt the rebels.

The fortifieng of the rebels campe.

When therefore the biſhop was come into the place where the commons were incamped, he perceiued that they had fortified their campe verie ſtronglie with ditches, and ſuch other ſtuffe as they could make ſhift with, as dores, windowes, bords, & tables, and behind them were all their cariages placed, ſo that it ſeemed they meant not to flie. Herewith the biſhop being chafed with the preſumptuous boldneſſe of ſuch a ſort of diſordered perſons, commanded his trumpets to ſound to the battell, and with his ſpeare in the reſt, he charged them with ſuch violence, that he went ouer the ditch, and laied ſo about him, that through his manfull dooings, all his companie found means to paſſe the ditch likewiſe, and ſo therewith followed a verie ſore and terrible fight, both parts dooing their beſt to vanquiſh the other. But finallie the commons were ouercome, and driuen to ſeeke their ſafegard by flight, which was ſore hindered by their cariages that ſtood behind them, ouer the which they were forced to clime and leape ſo well as they might. John Litteſter and other cheefe capteins were taken aliue. The biſhop therefore cauſed the ſaid Litteſter to be arreigned of high treaſon, and condemned, and ſo he was drawne, hanged, and headed according to the iudgement.

The biſhop is the firſt man that chargeth the rebels in their campe.

The Norfolke rebels vanquiſhed.

The biſhop heard his confeſſion, and by vertue of his office abſolued him: and to ſhew ſome parcell of ſorrowing for the mans miſchance, he went with him to the galowes. But it ſeemed that pitie wrought not with the biſhop, to quench the zeale of iuſtice: for he cauſed not Litteſter onelie to be executed, but ſought for all other that were the cheefe dooers in that rebellion, cauſing them to be put vnto death, and ſo by that meanes quieted the countrie. ¶ To recite what was doone in euerie part of the realme in time of thoſe helliſh troubles, it is not poſſible: but this is to be conſidered, that the rage of the commons was vniuerſallie ſuch, as it might ſeeme they had generallie conſpired togither, to doo what miſcheefe they could deuiſe. As among ſundrie other, what wickedneſſe was it, to compell teachers of children in grammar ſchooles to ſweare neuer to inſtruct any in their art? Againe, could they haue a more miſcheefous meaning, than to burne and deſtroie all old and ancient monuments, and to murther and diſpatch out of the waie all ſuch as were able to commit to memorie, either any new or old records? For it was dangerous among them to be knowne for one that was lerned, and more dangerous, if any men were found with a penner and inkhorne at his ſide: for ſuch ſeldome or neuer eſcaped from them with life.

Anno Reg. 5.

But to returne to ſaie ſomewhat more concerning the end of their rebellious enterpriſes, you muſt vnderſtand, how after that Wat Tiler was ſlaine at London in the preſence of the king (as before ye haue heard) the hope and confidence of the rebels greatlie decaied: and yet neuertheleſſe, the king and his councell being not well aſſured, granted to the commons (as ye haue heard) charters of manumiſſion and infranchiſement from all bondage, and ſo ſent them awaie home to their countries: and forthwith here vpon he aſſembled an armie of the Londoners, and of all others in the countries abroad that bare him good will, appointing none to come, but ſuch as were armed and had horſſes, for he would haue no footmen with him. Thus it came to paſſe, that within three daies he had about him fourtie thouſand horſſemen, as was eſteemed; ſo that in England had not beene heard of the like armie aſſembled togither at one time. And herewith was the king aduertiſed, that the Kentiſhmen began eftſoones to ſtir; wherewith the king and the whole armie were ſo grieuouſlie offended, that they meant ſtreight to haue ſet vpon that countrie, and to haue wholie deſtroied that rebellious generation. But thorough interceſſion made by the lords and gentlemen of that countrie, the king pacified his mood, and ſo reſolued to proceed againſt them by order of law and iuſtice, cauſing iudges to ſit and to make inquiſition of the malefactors, and eſpeciallie of ſuch as were authors of the miſcheefes.

The capteine once ſlaine the ſoldiers faint.

An armie of fortie thouſand horſſemen.

The Kentiſhmen eftſoones rebell.

And about the ſame time did the maior of London ſit in iudgement, as well vpon the offendors that were citizens, as of other that were of Kent, Eſſex, Southſex, Norffolke, Suffolke, and other counties, being found within the liberties of the citie; and ſuch as were found culpable, he cauſed them to loſe their heads, as Iacke Straw, Iohn Kirkbie, Alane Tredera, and Iohn Sterling, that gloried of himſelfe, for that he was the man that had ſlaine the archbiſhop. This fellow (as it is written by ſome authors) ſtreight waies after he had doone that wicked deed, fell out of his wits, and comming home into Eſſex where he dwelt, tied a naked ſword about his necke, that hong downe before on his breſt, and likewiſe a dagger naked, that hanged downe behind on his backe, and ſo went vp and downe the lanes ⁊ ſtreets about home, crieng out, and proteſting, that with thoſe weapons he had diſpatched the archbiſhop; and after he had remained a while at home, he came to London againe, for that he ſhuld receiue (as he ſaid) the reward thereof of the act which he had committed: and ſo indeed, when he came thither, and boldlie confeſſed that he was the man that had beheaded the archbiſhop, he loſt his head in ſteed of a recompenſe: and diuerſe other both of Eſſex and Kent, that had laid violent hands vpon the archbiſhop came to the like end at London, where they did the deed, being bewraied by their owne confeſſions.

Iack Straw and his adherents executed.

Here is to be remembred, that the king, after the citie of London was deliuered from the danger of the rebels (as before ye haue heard) in reſpect of the great manhood, and aſſured loialtie which had appeared in the maior, and other of the aldermen, for ſome part of recompenſe of their faithfull aſſiſtance in that dangerous ſeaſon, made the ſaid maior William Walworth knight, with fiue other aldermen his brethren, to wit, Nicholas Bramble, Iohn Philpot, Nicholas Twiford, Robert Laundre, and Robert Gaſton, alſo Iohn Standiſh, that (as ye haue heard) holpe to ſlaie Wat Tiler. Moreouer, the king granted, that there ſhould be a dagger added to the armes of the citie of London, in the right quarter of the ſhield, for an augmentation of the ſame armes, and for a remembrance of this maior his valiant act, as dooth appeare vnto this daie; for till that time, the citie bare onelie the croſſe, without the dagger.

The maior and fiue aldermen knighted.

The armes of London augmented, by additiō of the dagger.

Although the kings authoritie thus began to ſhew it ſelfe, to the terror of rebels; yet the commons of Eſſex eftſoones aſſembled themſelues togither, not far from Hatfield Peuerell, and ſent to the king to know of him if his pleaſure was, that they ſhould inioy their promiſed liberties: and further, that they might be as free as their lords, and not to come to any court, except it were to the great leet, twiſe in the yeare. When the king heard ſuch preſumptuous requeſts, he was in a great chafe, ⁊ diſpatched the meſſengers awaie, with a ſore threatning anſwer, ſaieng that bondmen they were, and bondmen they ſhould be, and that in more vile manner than before, to the terrible example of all other that ſhould attempt any the like diſorders: and forthwith, the earle of Buckingham, and the lord Thomas Percie, brother to the earle of Northumberland, were ſent with an armie to repreſſe thoſe rebels, whome they found fortified within woods, hedges and ditches verie ſtronglie, but with ſmall adoo they were put to flight, ⁊ about fiue hundred of them ſlaine; the reſidue ſaued themſelues as well as they might, by ſuccour of the woods. There were eight hundred horſſes alſo taken, which thoſe rebels had there with them, to draw and carrie their baggage.

The cōmons of Eſſex rebell afreſh.

The rebels Eſſex are ſcattered ⁊ ſlain.

Thoſe of the rebels that eſcaped, were not yet ſo tamed by that ouerthrow, but that aſſembling themſelues togither in a rowt, they made towards Colcheſter: and comming thither, would haue perſuaded the townſmen to haue ioined with them in a new rebellion. But when they could not bring their purpoſe to paſſe, they marched towards Sudburie. The lord Fitz Walter, and ſir Iohn Harleſton, vnderſtanding which waie they tooke, followed them with a companie of armed men, and ſuddenlie ſetting vpon them as they were making their proclamations, ſlue of them ſo manie as it liked them, and the other they ſaued, and ſuffered to depart, or elſe committed them to priſon. After this, the king came to Hauering at the bowre, and from thence to Chelmiſford, where he appointed ſir Robert Triſilian to ſit in iudgement of the offendors and rebels of that countrie, wherevpon an inqueſt being choſen, a great number were indited, arreigned, ⁊ found giltie, ſo that vpon ſome one gallowes there were nine or ten hanged togither.

Fabian.

The rebels executed in euerie lordſhip.

In euerie countrie were like inquiries made, and the cheefe offendors apprehended and put to death in euerie lordſhip through the realme, where anie of them were detected, by ten, twelue, twentie, thirtie, yea and in ſome places by fortie at once; ſo that the whole number grew to fifteene hundred and aboue. At the firſt, when the kings iuſtices began to ſit in Eſſex, Kent, and at London, by reaſon of the multitude that were to be executed, they onelie chopped off their heads, but afterwards when that kind of death ſeemed too cloſe and ſecret for ſo open offenſes, they proceeded according to the accuſtomed law of the realme, by condemning them to be drawne and hanged, and according ther'vnto they were executed. In the meane time, the king by the aduiſe of his councell, directed his letters reuocatorie into euerie countie there, to be proclamed in euerie citie, borrow, towne, and place, as well within the liberties as without; by the which letters he reuoked, made void and fruſtrate his former letters of infranchiſing the bondmen of his realme, and commanded that ſuch as had the ſame letters, ſhould without delaie bring them in, and reſtore them to him and his councell to be cancelled, as they would anſwer vpon their faith and allegiance which they owght to him, and vpon paine of forfeiting all that they had. The date of which letters reuocatorie was at Chelmeſford, the ſecond daie of Iulie, in the fift yeare of his reigne.

The king calleth in his letters of infranchiſing granted to the bondmen.

The king remoueth to S. Albons.

When the king had quieted the countie of Eſſex, and puniſhed ſuch as were the cheefe ſturrers of that wicked commotion in thoſe parts, he went to ſaint Albons, to ſee iuſtice doone vpon ſuch as had demeaned themſelues moſt preſumptuouſlie againſt the kings peace in that towne, namelie againſt the abbat and his houſe, who ſought to defend themſelues vnder a colour of freendſhip, that they truſted to find in ſome perſons about the king. But that truſt deceiued them, and procured the more diſpleaſure againſt them, for that they would not ſue for fauour at the abbats hands in time, by ſubmitting themſelues vnto his will and pleaſure. To be breefe, the king came thither with a great number of armed men and archers, and cauſed his iuſtice ſir Robert Triſilian to ſit in iudgement vpon the malefactors, that were brought thither from Hertford gaile.

Iohn Ball.

Thither was brought alſo to the king from Couentrie, Iohn Ball preeſt, whome the citizens of Couentrie had taken, and now here at ſaint Albons they preſented him to the kings preſence, wherevpon he was arreigned and condemned, to be drawne, hanged, and headed for ſuch notable treaſons as he was there conuicted of. He receiued iudgement vpon the ſaturdaie the firſt daie that the ſaid ſir Robert Triſilian ſat in iudgement, but he was not executed till the mondaie following. This man had beene a preacher the ſpace of twentie yeares, and bicauſe his doctrine was not according to the religion then by the biſhops mainteined, he was firſt prohibited to preach in anie church or chappell; and when he ceaſſed not for all that, but ſet foorth his doctrine in the ſtreets & fields where he might haue audience, at length he was committed to priſon, out of the which he propheſied that he ſhould be deliuered with the force of twentie thouſand men, and euen ſo it came to paſſe in time of the rebellion of the commons.

Iohn Ball his propheſie.

When all the priſons were broken vp, and the priſoners ſet at libertie, he being therefore ſo deliuered, followed them, & at Blackeheath when the greateſt multitude was there got togither (as ſome write) he made a ſermon, taking this ſaieng or common prouerbe for his theame, wherevpon to intreat, Iohn Ball his ſermon to the rebels.

When Adam delu'd, and Eue ſpan,
Who was then a gentleman?

and ſo continuing his ſermon, went about to prooue by the words of that prouerbe, that from the beginning, all men by nature were created alike, and that bondage or ſeruitude came in by iniuſt oppreſſion of naughtie men. For if God would haue had anie bondmen from the beginning, he would haue appointed who ſhould be bond & who free. And therefore he exhorted them to conſider, that now the time was come appointed to them by God, in which they might (if they would) caſt off the yoke of bondage, & recouer libertie. He counſelled them therefore to remember themſelues, and to take good hearts vnto them, that after the manner of a good huſband that tilleth his ground, and riddeth out thereof ſuch euill weeds as choke and deſtroie the good corne, they might deſtroie firſt the great lords of the realme, and after the iudges and lawiers, queſtmongers, and all other whom they vndertooke to be againſt the commons, for ſo might they procure peace and ſuertie to themſelues in time to come, if diſpatching out of the waie the great men, there ſhould be an equalitie in libertie, no difference in degrees of nobilitie, but a like dignitie and equall authoritie in all things brought in among them.

When he had preached and ſet foorth ſuch kind of doctrine, and other the like fond and fooliſh toies vnto the people, they extolled him to the ſtarres, affirming that he ought to be archbiſhop and lord chancellour, where he that then enioied that roome, meaning ſir Simon de Sudburie that then was aliue, was a traitor to the king and realme, and worthie to loſe his head, whereſoeuer he might be apprehended. Manie other things are reported by writers of this Iohn Ball, as the letter, which vnder a kind of darke riddle he wrote to the capteine of the Eſſex rebels, the copie whereof was found in one of their purſſes that was executed at London.

The tenor of the ſaid ſeditious preeſts letter.

IOhn Scheepe S. Marie preeſt of Yorke, and now of Colcheſter, greeteth well Iohn nameleſſe, and Iohn the Miller, and Iohn Carter, & biddeth them that they beware of guile in Bourrough, & ſtand togither in Gods name, & biddeth Piers ploughman go to his worke, and chaſtiſe well Hob the robber, & take with you Iohn Trewman and all his fellowes, and no mo. Iohn the Miller ẏ ground ſmall, ſmall ſmall, the kings ſonne of heauen ſhall paie for all. Beware or yee be wo, know your freend from your fo, haue inough and ſaie ho, and doo well and better, flee ſinne and ſeeke peace, and hold you therein, and ſo biddeth Iohn Trewman and all his fellowes.

This letter he confeſſed himſelfe to haue written, as Thomas Walſingham affirmeth, with manie other things which he had doone and committed, to the diſquieting of the realme, for the which he was drawne, hanged, and beheaded at ſaint Albons, the fifteenth of Iulie, being monday, in this fift yeare of king Richards reigne. On the ſame daie, the kings iuſtice ſir Robert Triſilian ſat vpon the rebels of ſaint Albons, and other of the countrie of Hertford, afore whome, by ſuch policie as he vſed, there were a great number indicted, and diuerſe being arreigned, were found guiltie, as William Grindecob, William Cadindon, Iohn Barbor, and certeine others, which were hanged and drawne, to the number of fifteene perſons in all; diuerſe cheefe men of the towne were committed to priſon, as Richard Wallingford, Iohn Garleeke, William Berewill, Thomas Putor and others of the countrie about. There were committed to priſon to the number of fourescore perſons, the which neuertheleſſe, by the kings pardon, were releaſed and diſmiſſed.

Iohn Ball executed at S. Albons.

The hatred which the towneſmen had conceiued againſt the abbat and conuent of S. Albons, was ſuerlie great,and manie deuiſes they had to haue ſaued;thoſe that were executed. And where as well the towneſmen, as other of the abbats and conuents tenants, both of Hertfordſhire, and Buckinghamſhire,had gotten of the abbat and conuent letters of diſcharge,from dooing anie bound ſeruice, the king directed his letters vnto certeine commiſſioners, as to Iohn Ludowicke, Iohn Weſtwicombe, Iohn Kenting, Richard Perers, Walter Saunford, Richard Gifford, Thomas Eidon, and William Eccleſhall, commanding them to cauſe proclamation to be made in all ſuch townes and places as were thought neceſſarie, through the whole countries of Buckingham and Hertford, that all and euerie perſon and perſons that ought and had beene accuſtomed to doo or yeeld anie manner of ſeruices, cuſtomes,or duties,whether they were bondmen or free,vnto the ſaid abbat and couent of S.Albons, ſhould doo and yeeld the ſame ſeruices,cuſtomes, and duties, in ſuch like forme & manner,as they had beene vſed to doo,before the time of the late troubles,& not to chalenge or claime any libertie or priuilege which they inioied not before the ſame troubles, vpon their faith & allegiance in which they ſtood bound to him,and vpon paine to forfeit all that they might forfeit: and in caſe anie were found to doo contrarie therevnto, the ſame commiſſioners had authoritie, and were commanded to arreſt and impriſon them,till for their further puniſhment,order might be taken and agreed vpon in that behalfe accordinglie.

The king calleth in by proclamation all ſuch letters of manumiſſion,as the abbat of ſaint Albons had granted to his bondmen.

On ſaint Margarets daie, the king being readie to take his iournie to Berkhamſteed,in the great court of the abbeie of S. Albons had all the commons of the countie of Hertford before him,that had ſummons there to appeare, all that were betwixt fifteene and threeſcore yeeres of age, where they tooke an oth togither from thenceforth, to be faithfull ſubiects vnto him, and neuer to riſe or make anie commotion,to the diſturbance of his peace; and rather to die, than to conſent vnto anie rebellious perſons, whome they ſhould to the vttermoſt of their powers doo their beſt, to apprehend and deliuer them to the kings priſon,that they might be foorth comming. After they had receiued this oth, they were licenced to depart,and the king rode to Berkhamſteed, where he remained for a time,and went to Eſthamſteed to recreate himſelfe with hunting, where he was informed, that thoſe which were hanged at S.Albons, were taken from the gallowes, and remooued a good waie from the ſame: with which preſumption he was ſo ſtirred,that he ſent foorthwith his letters to the bailiffes of the towne of S.Albons,commanding them vpon the ſight of the ſame, to cauſe cheines to be made, and to bring the ſaid bodies backe vnto the gallowes, and to hang them in thoſe chaines vpon the ſame gallowes, there to remaine, ſo long as one peece might ſticke to another, according to the forme of the iudgement giuen. The teſt of this writ thus directed to the bailiffes of ſaint Albons, was at Eſthamſteed the third of Auguſt, in the fift yeare of this kings reigne,and in the yeare of our lord a thouſand three hundred foure ſcore and one.

The commõs of Hertfordſhire ſworne to the king.

The towneſmen of S. Albons durſt not diſobeie the kings commandement,and ſo hanged vp againe in chaines the dead bodies of their neighbors,greatlie to their ſhame and reproch, when they could get none other for anie wages to come neere the ſtinking carcaſſes, but that they were conſtreined themſelues to take in hand ſo vile an office. And ſuch was the end of the tumults at S.Albons, where as well as in other places,the vnrulie commons had plaied their parts. To conclude and make an end of theſe diueliſh troubles, to the end it may appeare,in what danger as well the K. as the whole ſtate of the realme ſtood, by the miſcheefous attempts of the vnrulie people, I haue thought good to declare the confeſſion of Iacke Straw one of their cheefe capteins (and next in reputation amongſt them vnto Wat Tiler) when he came to be executed in London, according to iudiciall ſentence paſſed againſt him.

¶ At the ſame time(ſaid he)that we were aſſembled vpon Blackeheath, and had ſent to the king to come vnto vs, our purpoſe was to haue ſlaine all ſuch knights,eſquiers,and gentlemen,as ſhould haue giuen their attendance thither vpon him:and as for the king, we would haue kept him amongſt vs, to the end that the people might more boldlie haue repaired to vs,ſith they ſhould haue thought, that whatſoeuer we did, the ſame had beene doone by his authoritie. Finallie,when we had gotten power inough,that we needed not to feare anie force that might be made againſt vs,we would haue ſlaine all ſuch noble men, as might either haue giuen counſell, or made anie reſiſtance againſt vs, ſpeciallie the knights of the Rhodes; and laſtlie we would haue killed the king and all men of poſſeſſions, with biſhops,monks,chanons,and parſons of churches, onelie friers Mendicants we would haue ſpared, that might haue ſufficed for miniſtration of the ſacraments. And when we had made a riddance of all thoſe, we would haue deuiſed lawes,according to the which the ſubiects of this realme ſhould haue liued, for we would haue created kings,as Wat Tiler in Kent, and other in other countries. But bicauſe this our purpoſe was diſappointed by the archbiſhop of Canturburie, that would not permit the king to come to vs, we ſought by all meanes to diſpatch him out of the waie, as at length we did. Moreouer,the ſame euening that Wat Tiler was killed,we were determined, hauing the greateſt part of the commons of the citie bent to ioine with vs, to haue ſet fire in foure corners of the citie,and ſo to haue diuided amongſt vs the ſpoile of the cheefeſt riches that might haue beene found at our pleaſure. And this(ſaid he) was our purpoſe,as God may helpe me now at my laſt end.

The confeſſion of Iacke Straw at the time of his death.

Thus may you ſee, after what ſort they were conſpired to the deſtruction of the realme, and to haue aduanced and inriched themſelues; not conſidering or foreſeeing the euill ſucceſſe of their tumultuous broile,and that it would tend but little to their profit in the end,by a common ſpoile to amend their ſtate, and to become mightie and rich with goods euill gotten,which though for a time(if lucke had ſerued them to haue poſſeſſed)they had enioied, yet could they not long proſper nor bring good vnto the poſſeſſors: for Non habet euentus ſordida præda bonos.

And leſt this one mans confeſſion might ſeeme inſufficient, diuerſe other of them confeſſed the ſame, or much what the like in effect, when they ſaw no remedie but preſent death before their eies. To declare the occaſion whie ſuch miſcheefes happened thus in the realme,we leaue to the iudgement of thoſe that may coniecture a truth thereof, by conferring the manners of that age & behauiour of all ſtates then, ſith they that wrote in thoſe daies, may happilie in that behalfe miſſe the trueth, in conſtruing things according to their affections. But truelie it is to be thought, that the faults, as well in one degree as an other, ſpeciallie the ſinnes of the whole nation,procured ſuch vengeance to riſe, whereby they might be warned of their euill dooings, and ſeeke to reforme the ſame in time conuenient. But as it commeth ſtill to paſſe, when the danger is once ouerſhot, repentance likewiſe is put ouer,and is no more regarded, till an other ſcourge commeth eftſoones to put men in remembrance of their duetie; ſo in like manner(as ſeemeth)it chanced in this kings daies, as by

A truce with Scotland.
Tho. Walſi.
Froiſſard.

The capteine of Berwike will not ſuffer the duke of Lancaſter to enter into the towne.

In this meane time that theſe troubles were at the hotteſt in England, the duke of Lancaſter being in Scotland, ſo behaued himſelfe (in the treatie which he had in hand with the Scots) diſſembling the matter ſo, as if he had not vnderſtood of any trouble in England at all, that finallie before the Scots had knowledge thereof, a truce was concluded to indure for two yeares, or (as other haue) for three yeares. When he had made an end there, and that all things were agreed vpon and paſſed, for the confirmation of that accord, he returned to Berwike, but at his comming thither, the capteine ſir Matthew Redman would not ſuffer him to enter the towne, bicauſe of a commandement giuen to him from the earle of Northumberland, lord warden of the marches: wherefore the duke was glad to returne into Scotland againe, obteining licence of the Scots to remaine amongſt them, till the realme of England was reduced to better quiet. Hervpon, the commons in England that fauored him not, tooke occaſion to report the worſt of him that might be deuiſed, calling him now in time of their rebellious commotions, a traitor to the realme, declaring that he had ioined himſelfe to the Scots, and meant to take part with them againſt his owne natiue countrie.

The king indeed had ſent commandement, during the time of the rebellious troubles, vnto the earle of Northumberland, that he ſhould haue good regard to the ſafe keeping of all the townes & caſtels vnder his rule, & not to ſuffer any perſon to enter the ſame, hauing forgotten to except the duke of Lancaſter being then in Scotland: wherevpon the duke tooke no ſmall diſpleaſure with the earle of Northumberland, as after he well ſhewed at his comming home. But before he returned forth of Scotland, he wrote to the king to vnderſtand his pleſure, in what ſort he ſhould returne, humbling himſelfe in ſuch wiſe, as he made offer to come with one knight, one eſquier, and a groome, if it ſhould pleaſe the king ſo to appoint him; or if it ſo were that by his preſence it was thought the realme was like to fall in any trouble, he was readie to depart into exile, neuer to returne into his countrie againe, if ſo be that through his abſence the king and realme might inioy peace and quietneſſe.

The duke of Lancaſter chargeth the earle of Northumberland with ſundrie crimes.

The king hearing ſuch offers, wrote to him, that his pleaſure was to haue him to returne home, with all his whole traine; and if the ſame were not thought ſufficient to gard him, he ſhould take of euerie towne by the which he paſſed, a certeine number of men to attend him vnto the next towne for his ſafegard, and ſo it was doone, the king ſending him commiſſion to that effect, and thus comming to the court, he was of the king right honorablie receiued. Within few daies after his comming, he exhibited a grieuous complaint againſt the earle of Northumberland, for abuſing him in diuerſe ſorts, in time of the late troubles, ſo as his honour was greatlie thereby touched, for which the earle was ſent for, and commanded to come vnto Berkhamſteed, where all the lords in maner of the land were aſſembled in councell.

The duke of Lancaſter & the earle of Northumberland come to the parlement with great troops of armed men.

The Londoners, freends to the earle of Northumberland.

Here, after the duke had laid diuerſe things to the earles charge, for his diſobedience, vnfaithfulneſſe, and ingratitude; the earle after the manner of his countrie, not able to forbeare, brake out into reprochfull words againſt the duke, although he was commanded by the king to ceaſſe, where the duke kept ſilence in humble maner, at the firſt word, when the K. commanded him to hold his peace, ſo that by reaſon of the earles diſobedience in that behalfe, he was arreſted. But yet the earls of Warwike and Suffolke vndertaking for his appearance at the next parlement, he was ſuffered to depart, and ſo the councell brake vp. About the feaſt of All ſaints the parlement began, to the which the duke of Lancaſter came bringing with him an exceeding number of armed men, and likewiſe the earle of Northumberland with no leſſe companie came likewiſe to London, & was lodged within the citie, hauing great friendſhip ſhewed towards him of the citizens, who promiſed to aſſiſt him at all times, when neceſſitie required, ſo that his part ſeemed to be ouerſtrong for the duke, if they ſhould haue come to anie triall of their forces at that time.

The lords ſit in armour in the parlement houſe.

The K. maketh an agreemēt betweene the duke of Lancaſter & the earle of Northumberland.

The duke laie with his people in the ſuburbs, and euerie daie when they went to the parlement houſe at Weſtminſter, both parts went thither in armour, to the great terror of thoſe that were wiſe and graue perſonages, fearing ſome miſchiefe to fall forth of that vnaccuſtomed manner of their going armed to the parlement houſe, contrarie to the ancient vſage of the realme. At length, to quiet the parties and to auoid ſuch inconueniences, as might haue growen of their diſſention, the king tooke the matter into his hands, and ſo they were made freends, to the end that ſome good might be doone in that parlement, for reformation of things touching the ſtate of the realme, for which cauſe it was eſpeciallie called: but now after it had continued a long time, and few things at all concluded, newes came that the ladie Anne ſiſter to the emperour Wenſlaus, & affianced wife to the king of England, was come to Calis, wherevpon the parlement was proroged till after Chriſtmas, that in the meane time the marriage might be ſolemnized, which was appointed after the Epiphanie: and forthwith great preparation was made to receiue the bride, that ſhe might be conueied with all honor vnto the kings preſence.

The kings marriage with the emperors ſiſter.

Such as ſhould receiue hir at Douer repaired thither, where at hir landing, a maruellous and right ſtrange woonder happened; for ſhe was no ſooner out of hir ſhip, and got to land in ſafetie with all hir companie, but that forthwith the water was ſo troubled and ſhaken, as the like thing had not to any mans remembrance euer beene heard of: ſo that the ſhip in which the appointed queene came ouer, was terriblie rent in peeces, and the reſidue ſo beaten one againſt an other, that they were ſcattered here and there after a woonderfull manner. Before hir comming to the citie of London, ſhe was met on Blackheath by the maior and citizens of London in moſt honorable wiſe, and ſo with great triumph conueied to Weſtminſter, where (at the time appointed) all the nobilitie of the realme being aſſembled, ſhe was ioined in marriage to the king, and crowned queene by the archbiſhop of Canturburie, with all the glorie and honor that might be deuiſed. There were alſo holden for the more honour of the ſame marriage, ſolemne iuſtes for certeine daies togither, in which, as well the Engliſhmen as the new queenes countriemen ſhewed proofe of their manhood and valiancie, whereby praiſe & commendation of knightlie proweſſe was atchiued, not without damage of both the parties.

After that the ſolemnitie of the marriage was finiſhed, the parlement eftſoones began, in the which many things were inacted, for the behoofe of the commonwealth. And amongſt other things it was ordeined, that all maner manumiſſions, obligations, releaſſes, and other bonds made by compulſion, dures, and menace, in time of this laſt tumult and riot againſt the lawes of the land, and good faith, ſhould be vtterlie void and adnihilated. And further, that if the kings faithfull liege people did perceiue any gathering of the cōmons in ſuſpected wiſe, to the number of ſix or ſeauen, holding conuenticles togither, they ſhould not ſtaie for the kings writ in that behalfe for their warrant, but forthwith it ſhould be lawfull for them to apprehend ſuch people, aſſembling togither, and to laie them in priſon, till they might anſwer their doings. Theſe and manie other things were eſtabliſhed in this parlement, of the which, the moſt part are ſet forth in the printed booke of ſtatutes, where ye may read the ſame more at large.

In time of this parlement William Vfford the earle of Suffolke, being choſen by the knights of the ſhires, to pronounce in behalfe of the commonwealth, certeine matters concerning the ſame: the verie daie and houre in which he ſhould haue ſerued that turne, as he went vp the ſtaires, towards the vpper houſe, he ſuddenlie fell downe and died in the hands of his ſeruants, buſie about to take him vp, whereas he felt no gréefe of ſickeneſſe when he came into Weſtminſter, being then and before merrie and pleaſant inough, to all mens ſights. Of his ſudden death, manie were greatlie abaſhed, for that in his life time, he had ſhewed himſelfe courteous and amiable to all men. ¶ The parlement ſhortlie thervpon tooke end, after that the merchants had granted to the king for a ſubſidie certeine cuſtomes of their wools, which they bought and ſold, called a maletot, to endure for foure yeares. ¶ The lord Richard Scrope was made lord chancellor, & the lord Hugh Segraue lord treaſuror.

The ſudden death of the earle of Suffolke.

About the ſame time, the lord Edmund Mortimer earle of March, the kings lieutenant in Ireland, departed this life, after he had brought in manner all that land to peace and quiet, by his noble and prudent gouernement. In this ſeaſon, Wicliffe ſet forth diuerſe articles and concluſions of his doctrine, which the new archbiſhop of Canturburie, William Courtneie, latelie remoued from the ſée of London, vnto the higher dignitie, did what he could by all ſhifts to ſuppreſſe, and to force ſuch as were the ſetters forth and mainteiners thereof, to recant, and vtterlie to renounce. What he brought to paſſe, in the booke of acts and monuments ſet forth by maiſter I. Fox, ye may find at large. The tueſday next after the feaſt of ſaint John Port latine, an other parlement began, in which at the earneſt ſute and requeſt of the knights of the ſhires, John Wraie prieſt that was the chiefe dooer among the commons in Suffolke, at Burie, and Mildenhall, was adiudged to be drawen, and hanged, although manie beléeued, that his life ſhould haue béene redéemed for ſome great portion of monie.

A lewd fellow that tooke vpon him to be ſkilfull in phyſicke and aſtronomie, cauſed it to be publiſhed thorough the citie of London, that vpon the Aſcenſion euen, there would riſe ſuch a peſtilent planet, that all thoſe which came abroad forth of their chambers, before they had ſaid fiue times the Lords praier, then commonlie called the Pater noſter, and did not eate ſomewhat that morning, before their going forth, ſhould be taken with ſickneſſe, & ſuddenlie die thereof. Manie fooles beléeued him, and obſerued his order; but the next day, when his preſumptuous lieng could be no longer faced out, he was ſet on horſſebacke, with his face towards the taile, which he was compelled to hold in his hand in ſtéed of a bridle, and ſo was led about the citie, with two iorden pots about his necke, and a whetſtone, in token that he had well deſerued it, for the notable lie which he had made.

A coleprophet ſerued aright.

About the ſame time, certeine Engliſh ſhips of Rie, and other places, went to the ſea, and méeting pirats, fought with them, and ouercame them, taking ſeuen ſhips, with thrée hundred men in them. One of thoſe ſhips had béene taken from the Engliſhmen afore time, and was called the falcon, belonging to the lord William Latimer. They were all richlie laden with wine, wax, and other good merchandize. This yeare the maior of London John de Northampton, otherwiſe called John de Comberton, did puniſh ſuch as were taken in adulterie, verie extremelie: for firſt he put them in the priſon, called the tunne, that then ſtood in Cornehill, and after cauſed the women to haue their haire cut, as théeues in thoſe daies were ſerued that were appeachers of others, and ſo were they led about the ſtréets with trumpets & pipes going before them. Neither were the men ſpared more than the women, being put to manie open ſhames and reproches. But bicauſe the puniſhment of ſuch offenſes was thought rather to apperteine vnto the ſpirituall iuriſdiction, than to the temporall, the biſhop of London, and other of the cleargie, tooke it in verie euill part: but the maior being a ſtout man, would not forbeare, but vſed his authoritie héerein to the vttermoſt.

John de Northampton maior of London, a ſtreict puniſher of adulterie in his time.

About the ſame time alſo, when the archbiſhop of Canturburie ſate in iudgement vpon a proceſſe that was framed againſt one John Aſton, a maiſter of art, that was an earneſt follower of Wicliffes doctrine, the Londoners brake open the doores, where the archbiſhop with his diuines ſate, and cauſed them to giue ouer, ſo that they durſt procéed no further in that matter. The ſame yéere were the fiſhmongers of London ſore diſquieted by the foreſaid maior, who ſought to infringe their liberties, granting licence to forreners to come and ſell all manner of fiſh, as fréelie and more fréelie than any of the companie of fiſhmongers: for they might not buie it at the forreners hands to ſell it againe by any meanes, and ſo that companie which before had béene accompted one of the chiefeſt in the citie, was now ſo brought downe, as it ſéemed to be one of the meaneſt, being compelled to confeſſe, that their occupation was no craft, nor worthie ſo to be accompted amongſt other the crafts of the citie.

The Londoners fauourers of wicliffes doctrine.

The fiſhmongers ſore troubled by the maior.

In this yeare, the one and twentith of Maie being wedneſdaie, a great earthquake chanced about one of the clocke in the after noone; it was ſo vehement, and namelie in Kent, that the churches were ſhaken therewith in ſuch wiſe, that ſome of them were ouerthrowen to the ground. On the ſaturdaie after, being the foure and twentith day of Maie, earelie in the morning, chanced an other earthquake, or (as ſome write) a waterſhake, being of ſo vehement & violent a motion, that it made the ſhips in the hauens to beat one againſt the other, by reaſon wherof they were ſore bruſed by ſuch knocking togither, to the great woonder of the people, who being amazed at ſuch ſtrange tokens, ſtood a long time after in more awe of Gods wrath and diſpleaſure than before, for theſe ſo ſtrange and dreadfull woonders thus ſhewed amongſt them: howbeit when theſe terrors were forgotten, they followed their former diſſolutenes, from the which for a time they were withdrawne through feare of Gods heuie hand hanging ouer their heads; but afterward like ſwine they wallowed afreſh in their puddels of polluſions, & as dogs licked vp their filthie vomit of corruption and naughtineſſe, for

About this ſeaſon, the lord Richard Scroope lord chancellor was depoſed from that roome, and the king receiuing the great ſeale at his hands, kept it a certeine time, and ſealed therewith ſuch grants and writings as it pleaſed him: at length, it was deliuered to Robert Braibrooke biſhop of London, who was made lord chancellor. The cauſe why the lord Scroope was remoued from that dignitie, was this. When the king vpon certeine reſpects had granted certeine gentlemen the lands and poſſeſſions that belonged to the late earle of March, and other that were deceaſſed (which he, during the time of their heires minorities, ought to inioy by the lawes of the realme) the ſaid lord chancellor refuſed to ſeale ſuch grants, alledging that the king being greatlie in debt, which he was to diſcharge, ſtood in néed of ſuch profits himſelfe, and therefore (as he ſaid) he tooke not them for faithfull ſeruants, nor dutifull ſubiects to his grace, that reſpecting their owne priuat commoditie more than his or the realmes, did ſue for ſuch grants at his hands, aduiſing them to hold themſelues contented with ſuch other things, as it had pleaſed or might pleaſe the king to beſtow vpon them: for ſuerlie he would not conſent, that they ſhould inioy ſuch gifts as thoſe were. They that were thus reiected, made their complaint in ſuch ſort to the king, that he taking diſpleaſure with the ſaid lord Scrope, depoſed him from his office, to the great offenſe both of the nobles and commons, by whoſe conſent he was preferred vnto that dignitie.

A new rebellion intended in Norffolke is bewraied by one of the conſpiracie before it burſt out.

About Michaelmaſſe this yeare, certeine naughtie diſpoſed perſons in Norffolke, not warned by the ſucceſſe of the late rebellion, went about a new commotion, intending to murther the biſhop of Norwich, and all the nobles and gentlemen of that countrie. And to bring their wicked purpoſe the better to paſſe, they determined to haue aſſembled togither at S. Faithes faire, and to haue compelled all thoſe that ſhould haue béene preſent at the ſame faire, to haue taken part with them, or elſe to haue loſt their liues: and this being doone, they would haue taken S. Benets abbeie at Holme, which they would haue kept for a fortreſſe, to haue withdrawne into vpon anie force that had béene againſt them. But yer they could bring their purpoſe to paſſe, one of the conſpiracie bewraieng the matter, they were taken, & loſt their heads at Norwich, for their malicious deuiſes.

The cōmiſſioners of Flanders reiected for want of ſufficient authoritie.

An act againſt the fiſhmongers within the citie of London.

About the ſame time a parlement was called, to the which certeine commiſſioners from the countrie of Flanders came, to treat of certeine agréements betwixt the king and realme, and the ſtates of their countrie: but bicauſe thoſe that came ouer at this time, ſéemed not ſufficient to conclude ſuch treatiſe as then was in hand, they were ſent backe to fetch other more ſufficient, as from euerie towne in Flanders ſome ſuch as might haue full authoritie to go through, and confirme the agréements then in hand. In this parlement, the maior of London, with a great part of the commoners of the citie, vpon ſuggeſtion by them made againſt the fiſhmongers, for vſing great deceit in vttering of their fiſhes, obteined to haue it inacted, that from thenceforth, none of that companie, nor anie of the vinteners, butchers, groſſers, or other that ſold anie prouiſion of vittels, ſhould be admitted maior of the citie; and ſo by this ſhift they ſought to cut off all meanes from the fiſhmongers to recouer againe their old former degrée. And bicauſe it was knowne well inough of what authoritie ſir Iohn Philpot knight was within the citie, and that he fauoured thoſe whome the lord maior the ſaid Iohn de Northampton fauoured not, he was put off from the bench, and might not ſit with them that were of the ſecret councell in the cities affaires, whereas neuertheleſſe he had trauelled more for the preſeruation of the cities liberties than all the reſidue. Sir Henrie Spenſer biſhop of Norwich, receiued buls a little before this preſent from pope Vrbane, to ſigne all ſuch with the croſſe, that would take vpon them to go ouer the ſeas with him, to warre againſt thoſe that held with the antipape Clement, that tooke himſelfe for pope, and to ſuch as would receiue the croſſe in that quarrell; ſuch like beneficiall pardons were granted by pope Vrbane, as were accuſtomablie granted vnto ſuch as went to fight againſt the Infidels, Turkes, and Saracens, to wit frée remiſſion of ſinnes, and manie other graces. The biſhop of Norwich that had the diſpoſing of the benefits granted by thoſe buls, to all ſuch as either would go themſelues in perſon, or elſe giue anie thing toward the furtherance of that voiage, & maintenance of them that went in the ſame, ſhewed thoſe buls in open parlement, & cauſed copies to be written forth, & ſent into euerie quarter, that his authoritie & power legantine might be notified to all men, for the better bringing to paſſe of that he had in charge. And truelie it ſhould appeare, there wanted no diligence in the man to accompliſh the popes purpoſe: and on the other part yée muſt note, that the priuileges which he had from the pope, were paſſing large, ſo that as the matter was handled, there were diuerſe lords, knights, eſquires, and other men of warre in góod numbers, that offered themſelues to go in that voiage, and to follow the ſtandards of the church with the biſhop, and no ſmall ſummes of monie were leuied and gathered amongſt the people, for the furniſhing foorth of that armie, as after yée ſhall heare.

Remiſſion of ſins granted to as manie as would fight againſt Clement the antipape.

The earle of Cambridge returneth out of Portingale.

In this meane time the earle of Cambridge returned home from Portingale, whither (as yée haue heard) he was ſent the laſt yeare, and promiſe made, that the duke of Lancaſter ſhould haue followed him; but by reaſon of the late rebellion, and alſo for other conſiderations, as the warres in Flanders betwixt the erle and them of Gaunt, it was not thought conuenient that anie men of warre ſhould go foorth of the realme: and ſo the king of Portingale not able of himſelfe to go through with his enterpriſe againſt the king of Spaine, after ſome ſmall exploits atchiued by the Engliſhmen, and other of the earle of Cambridge his companie, as the winning of certeine fortreſſes belonging to the king of Caſtile, and that the two kings had laine in field, the one againſt the other by the ſpace of fiftéene daies without battell, the matter was taken vp, and a peace concluded betwixt them, ſore againſt the mind of the earle of Cambridge, who did what in him laie, to haue brought them to a ſet field: but when there was no remedie, he bare it ſo patientlie as he might, and returned home with his people, ſore offended (though he ſaid little) againſt the king of Portingale, for that he dealt otherwiſe in this matter than was looked for. He had affianced his ſonne, which he had by the daughter of Peter, ſometime king of Caſtile, vnto the king of Portingales daughter, now in the time of his being there: but although he was earneſtlie requeſted of the ſaid king, he would not leaue his ſonne behind him, but brought him backe with him againe into England (togither with his mother) doubting the ſlipperie faith of thoſe people.

The earle of Cambridge his ſon affianced to the king of Portingals daughter.

In the Lent ſeaſon of this ſixt yeare of king Richards reigne, an other parlement was called at London, in the which there was hard hold about the buls ſent to the biſhop of Norwich from pope Vrbane, concerning his iournie that he ſhould take in hand againſt the Clementines (as we may call them, for that they held with pope Clement) whome the Vrbaniſts (that is, ſuch as held with pope Vrbane) tooke for ſchiſmatikes. Diuerſe there were, that thought it not góod that ſuch ſummes of monie ſhuld be leuied of the kings ſubiects, and the ſame togither with an armie of men to be committed vnto the guiding of a prelat vnſkilfull in warlike affaires. Other there were that would néeds haue him to go, that the enimies of the church (as they tooke them) might be ſubdued.

Clementines.
Vrbaniſts.

And although the more part of the lords of the vpper houſe, and likewiſe the knights and burgeſſes of the lower houſe were earneſtlie bent againſt this iournie; yet at length thoſe that were of the contrarie mind, preuailed; & ſo it was decréed, that it ſhould forward, and that the ſaid biſhop of Norwich ſhould haue the fiftéenth granted to the king in the laſt parlement, to paie the wages of ſuch men of warre as ſhould go ouer with him: for ſoldiers without monie paſſed not much of pardons, no not in thoſe daies, except at the verie point of death, if they were not aſſured how to be anſwered of their wages, or of ſome other conſideration wherby they might gaine. ¶ The tenth that was granted afore by the biſhops at Oxford, was now in this ſame parlement appointed to remaine to the king for the kéeping of the ſeas, whileſt the biſhop ſhould be forth of the realme in following thoſe wars.

The croſſed ſouldiers.

Theſe things being thus appointed, the biſhop ſent forth his letters firmed with his ſeale into euerie prouince and countrie of this land, giuing to all parſons, vicars, and curats, through this realme, power and authoritie to heare the confeſſions of their pariſhioners, and to grant vnto thoſe that would beſtow any parcell of their góods, which God had lent them towards the aduancing of the iournie to be made by the croſſed ſouldiers againſt pope Vrbans enimies, the abſolution and remiſſion of all their ſinnes by the popes authoritie, according to the forme of the bull before mentioned. The people vnderſtanding of ſo great and gratious a benefit (as they tóoke it) thus offered to the Engliſh nation, at home in their owne houſes, were deſirous to be partakers thereof, and thoſe that were warlike men, prepared themſelues to go forth in that iournie with all ſpéed poſſible. The reſidue that were not fit to be warriors, according to that they were exhorted by their confeſſors, beſtowed liberallie of their góods to the furtherance of thoſe that went: and ſo, few there were within the whole kingdome, but that either they went, or gaue ſomewhat to the aduancing forth of the biſhop of Norwich his voiage.

The capteins that wẽt with the biſhop of Norwich againſt the antipape.

Froiſſard.

This biſhop choſe diuerſe to be aſſociat with him, as capteins that were expert in warlike enterpriſes. The firſt and principall was ſir Hugh Caluerlie an old man of warre, and one that in all places had borne himſelfe both valiantlie and politikelie; next vnto him was ſir William Farington, who ſtoutlie ſpake in the biſhops cauſe, when the matter came in queſtion in the parlement houſe, touching his going ouer with this croiſie. Beſides theſe, there went diuerſe noble men and knights of high renowme, as the lord Henrie Beaumount, ſir William Elmham, and ſir Thomas Triuet, ſir Iohn Ferrers, ſir Hugh Spenſer the biſhops nephue by his brother, ſir Mathew Redman capteine of Berwike, ſir Nicholas Tarenſon or Traiton, ſir William Farington, and manie other of the Engliſh nation: & of Gaſcogne there went le ſire de Chaſteauneuf, and his brother ſir Iohn de Chaſteauneuf, Raimund de Marſen, Guillonet de Paux, Gariot Vighier, Iohn de Cachitan, and diuerſe other. Sir Iohn Beauchampe was appointed marſhall of the field, but bicauſe he was at that preſent in the marches of the realme towards Scotland, he was not readie to paſſe ouer when the biſhop did. The duke of Lancaſter liked not well of the biſhops iournie, for that he ſaw how his voiage that he meant to make into Spaine was hereby for the time diſappointed, and he could haue béene better contented (as appeareth by writers) to haue had the monie imploied vpon the warres againſt the king of Caſtile that was a Clementine, than to haue it beſtowed vpon this voiage, which the biſhop was to take in hand againſt the French king, and other in theſe néerer parts. Here vpon there were not manie of the nobilitie that offered to go with the biſhop.

The ſtatute againſt fiſhmongers repealed, they are reſtored to their liberties.

But to ſaie ſomewhat of other things that were concluded in this laſt parlement, we find, that the fiſhmongers, which through meanes of the late lord maior Iohn of Northampton and his complices were put from their ancient cuſtomes and liberties, which they inioied aforetime within the citie, were now reſtored to the ſame againe, ſauing that they might not kéepe courts among themſelues, as in times paſt they vſed, but that after the maner of other crafts and companies, all tranſgreſſions, offenſes, and breaches of lawes and cuſtomes by them committed, ſhould be heard, tried, and reformed in the maiors court. ¶ All this winter the matter touching the gathering of monie towards the croiſie, was earneſtlie applied, ſo that there was leuied what of the diſme, and by the deuotion of the people for obteining of the pardon, ſo much as drew to the ſumme of fiue and twentie thouſand franks.

The biſhop of Norwich ſetteth forward with his armie.

When the biſhop therefore had ſet things in góod forwardneſſe for his iournie, he drew towards the ſea ſide, and was ſo deſirous to paſſe ouer, and to inuade his aduerſaries, that although the king ſent to him an expreſſe commandement by letters to returne to the court, that he might conferre with him before he tóoke the ſeas; yet excuſing himſelfe, that the time would not then permit him to ſtaie longer, he paſſed ouer to Calis, where he landed the 23 of Aprill, in this ſixt yeare of king Richards reigne. The armie to attend him in this iournie, roſe to the number of two thouſand horſſemen, and fiftéene thouſand fóotmen (as ſome write) though other ſpeake of a far leſſer number. But it ſhould ſéeme that they went not ouer all at one time, but by parts, as ſome before the biſhop, ſome with him, and ſome after him.

Now when he and the capteins before named, were come ouer to Calis, they tóoke counſell togither into what place they ſhould make their firſt inuaſion; and bicauſe their commiſſion was to make warre onelie againſt thoſe that held with pope Clement, the more part were of this mind, that it ſhould be moſt expedient for them to enter into France, and to make warre againſt the Frenchmen, whom all men knew to be chiefe mainteiners of the ſaid Clement. But the biſhop of Norwich was of this opinion, that they could not dóo better than to inuade the countrie of Flanders, bicauſe that a litle before, earle Lewes hauing intelligence that king Richard had made a confederacie with them of Gaunt, had on the other part expelled all Engliſhmen out of his dominions and countries, ſo that the merchants which had their góods at Bruges, and other places in Flanders, ſuſteined great loſſes. Howbeit there were that replied againſt the biſhops purpoſe herein, as ſir Hugh Caluerlie and others; yet at length they yéelded thereto, and ſo by his commandement they went ſtreight to Grauelin, the 21 day of Maie, and immediatlie wan it by aſſault. Wherevpon Bruckburge was yéelded vnto them, the liues and góods of them within ſaued. Then went they to Dunkirke, & without any great reſiſtance entred the towne, and wan there excéeding much by the ſpoile, for it was full of riches, which the Engliſhmen pilfered at their pleaſure. The earle of Flanders lieng at Liſle was aduertiſed how the Engliſhmen were thus entered his countrie, wherevpon he ſent ambaſſadors vnto the Engliſh hoſt, to vnderſtand why they made him warre that was a right Vrbaniſt.

Dunkirke woon & ſacked by the Engliſhmen.

The earle of Flãders ſendeth to the biſh. of Norwich to know the cauſe of his inuaſion of Flanders.

The biſhop of Norwich for anſwer, declared to them that were ſent, that he tóoke the countrie to apperteine to the French king, as he that had of late conquered it, whom all the whole world knew to be a Clementine, or at the leaſt he was aſſured that the countrie thereabouts was of the inheritance of the ladie of Bar, which likewiſe was a Clementine: and therefore, except the people of that countrie would come and ioine with him to go againſt ſuch as were knowne to be enimies to pope Vrbane, he would ſuerlie ſéeke to deſtroie them. And whereas the earls ambaſſadors required ſafe conduct to go into England land by Calis, to vnderſtand the kings pleaſure in this mater, the biſhop would grant them none at all; wherefore they went backe againe to the earle their maiſter with that anſwer.

The Engliſhmen after the taking and ſpoiling of Dunkirke, returned to Grauelin and Bruckburge, which places they fortified, and then leauing garriſons in them, they went to Mardike, and tooke it, for it was not cloſed. In the meane time, the countriemen of weſt Flanders roſe in armour, and came to Dunkirke, meaning to reſiſt the Engliſhmen: whereof when the biſhop was certified, with all ſpéed he marched thither, and comming to the place where the Flemings, to the number of more than twelue thouſand were ranged without the towne, he ſent an herald vnto them to know the truth, of whether pope they held; but the rude people, not vnderſtanding what apperteined to the law of armes, ran vpon the herald at his approching to them, and ſlue him before he could begin to tell his tale.

The herald of armes ſent to ẏ Flemings by the biſhop of Norwich is ſlaine.

The Engliſhmen herewith inflamed, determined either to reuenge the death of their herald, or to die for it, and therewith ordered their battels readie to fight, and being not aboue fiue thouſand fighting men in all, the biſhop placed himſelfe amongſt the horſſemen, and ſet the footmen in a battell marſhalled wedgewiſe, broad behind and ſharpe before, hauing with them a banner wherein the croſſe was beaten. The archers were ranged on either ſide: the ſtandard of the church went before, the field gules, and two keies ſiluer, ſignifieng that they were ſouldiors of pope Vrbane. Moreouer, the biſhop had his penon there ſiluer and azure quarterlie, a freat gold on the azure, a bend gules on the ſiluer: and bicauſe he was yongeſt of the Spenſers, he bare a border gules for a difference. At the approching of the battels togither the trumpets blew vp, and the archers began to ſhoot againſt the battell of the Flemings, the which valiantlie defended themſelues, & fought egerlie a long time, but at length they were ſo galled with arrowes which the archers ſhot at them a flanke, that they were not able to indure, but were compelled to giue backe.

The order of the biſhop of Norwich his battell againſt the Flemings

They were diuided into two battels, a vaward, and a rereward. When the vaward began to ſhrinke, the rereward alſo brake order, and fled, but the Engliſhmen purſued them ſo faſt, that they could not eſcape, but were ouertaken and ſlaine in great numbers. Some ſaie, there died of them in the battell and chaſe fiue thouſand, ſome ſix thouſand; and others write, that there were nine thouſand of them ſlaine: and Thomas Walſingham affirmeth twelue thouſand. Manie of them fled into the towne of Dunkirke for ſuccour, but the Engliſhmen purſued them ſo egerlie, that they entered the towne with them, and ſlue them downe in the ſtréets. The Flemings in diuerſe places gathered themſelues togither againe as they fled, and ſhewed countenance of defenſe, but ſtill they were driuen out of order, and brought to confuſion. The préeſts and religious men that were with the biſhop fought moſt egerlie, ſome one of them ſlaieng ſixtéene of the enimies.

There died of Engliſhmen at this battell about foure hundred. The Flemings had no horſſemen amongſt them, nor anie number of gentlemen, for they ſtood in ſuch dread of Engliſh bowes, that they durſt not come to anie battell with them, but kéeping themſelues out of danger, ſet the commons of the countrie in hand to trie what they againſt the Engliſhmen were able to doo without them. This battell was fought vpon a mondaie being the fiftéenth of Maie. The countrie was put in a wonderfull feare by this ouerthrow, ſo that the townes and fortreſſes were in great doubt, and ſome yeelded themſelues to the Engliſhmen, as Berghen and others; ſome were woone by force, as the caſtell of Drinchan, and the towne of S. Venant. To be ſhort, the Engliſhmen became maiſters of all the countrie alongſt the ſea ſide, euen from Grauelin to Sluis, and got ſuch riches by pillage and ſpoile, as they could not wiſh for greater. They preuailed ſo much, that they wan in maner all the cloſe towns within the bailiffeweekes of Caſſell, of Popering, Meſſines, and Furneis, with the townes of Newport, Blankberke, and diuerſe other.

The Engliſhmē ſubdue diuerſe towns in Flanders, and ſpoile the countrie.

Alſo entring into the woods Nepſe and Rutholt, they found a great bootie of ſheepe and beaſts, and tooke a great ſort of priſoners of the countrie people, which were fled into thoſe woods for feare of the enimies: but the Engliſhmen, plaieng the part of good bloudhounds, found them out, & ſent all their booties and preie vnto Grauelin and Bruckburge. On the eight daie of Iune they came before the towne of Ypres, and laid ſiege thereto, whereat they continued the ſpace of nine wéekes. Thither came to their aid twentie thouſand Gauntiners vnder the leading of Francis Akreman, Peter Wood, and Peter Winter: ſo that they within Ypres were ſtreictlie beſieged, but there were within it in garriſon diuerſe valiant knights & capteins, which defended the towne right manfullie: it was fenſed with a mightie rampire, and a thicke hedge, trimlie plaſhed and woond with thornes, as the manner of fortifieng townes was in ancient time amongſt them in that countrie (as Strabo witneſſeth.)

The towne of Ypres beſiged.

The maner of fortifieng townes in old time.

During the time that the ſiege laie before Ypres, the Engliſhmen ſwarmed abroad in the countrie, for when it was once knowne what good ſucceſſe the firſt companie that went ouer had found, there came dailie foorth of England great numbers to be partakers of the gaine. Sir Iohn Philpot that fauoured the biſhops iournie, prouided them of veſſels for their paſſage, till the biſhop vnderſtanding that the more part of thoſe that came thus ouer were vnarmed, and brought nothing with them from home, but onelie ſwords, bowes and arrowes, did write vnto the ſaid ſir Iohn Philpot, that he ſhould ſuffer none to paſſe the ſeas, but ſuch as were men able and likelie to doo ſeruice: where a great number of thoſe that were come to him, were fit for nothing but to conſume vittels, much like the popiſh ſhauelings and the Romiſh raſcalitie, of whome the like is ſpoken thus:

Hope of gaine incourageth the ſoldier.

Nos numerus ſumus & fruges conſumere nati.

The multitude of Engliſhmen and Gauntiners at this ſiege was great, ſo that diuerſe ſkirmiſhes chanced betwixt them, and ſuch as were appointed by the earle to lie in garriſons about in the countrie againſt them: but ſtill the victorie abode on the Engliſh ſide. Alſo there was an Engliſh préeſt, one ſir Iohn Boring that went to Gaunt with fiue hundred Engliſh archers, by whoſe aid Arnold Hans one of the capteins of Gaunt ouercame his enimies in battell, which were laid in a caſtell néere to the hauen of Alloſt, and ſtopped that no vittels might ſafelie come out of Holland or Zeland to be conueied to Gaunt. The earle of Flanders was not well contented in his mind, that the Engliſhmen were thus entred into his countrie, and therefore earneſtlie laboured to the duke of Burgognie(that had married his daughter, and ſhould be heire of all his dominions and ſeigniories after his deceaſſe) to find ſome remedie in the matter.

The duke, whome the matter touched ſo néere, did ſo much with his nephue the French king, that eftſoones he raiſed his whole puiſſance, and came downe into Flanders, ſo that the Engliſhmen perceiuing themſelues not of power to incounter with this huge and mightie armie, were conſtreined after a great aſ-

But at Newport the townesmen ſet vp the earles banner, and aſſailing thoſe that were come into the towne, ſlue diuerſe of them. The Engliſhmen being ſore offended therewith, came running thither with certeine Gauntiners, and made great ſlaughter of them that had ſo murthered their fellowes. The towne was ſacked, and all the goods aſwell church iewels as other were ſent awaie, partlie by ſea into England, and partlie by waggons vnto Berge. After this, they ſet fire in more than thirtie places of the towne, ſo that there remained nothing vnburnt. The Engliſhmen & Gauntiners that were withdrawne into Berge, got togither all the waggons in the countrie about, placing the ſame vpon the diches and rampiers, to fortifie the ſame againſt their enimies.

A couragious & warlike biſhop.

Some write, that after the breaking of the ſiege at Ypres, the biſhop of Norwich would gladlie haue perſuaded the lords and knights that were there with him, to haue entred into Picardie, and there to haue offered the French king battell, before his whole puiſſance had béene aſſembled: but ſir Thomas Triuet and ſir William Elmham with other, would in no wiſe conſent therevnto, ſo that the biſhop taking with him ſir Hugh Caluerlie, that did neuer forſake him, bad the other farewell; and firſt making a road into Picardie, he after withdrew into Grauelin, whiles the other went to Bruckburge. But by Froiſſard, and other writers it appeareth, that ſir Hugh was certeinlie at Berge, with other that were retired thither, in purpoſe to defend it againſt the French king, who ſtill followed them, and recouered diuerſe places out of their hands by force, as Mont Caſſell, the caſtell of Crincham, and other. Alſo at his comming to Berghen, the ſaid ſir Hugh Caluerlie, and other that were within it, perceiuing that they were not able to defend it againſt ſuch a puiſſance as the French king had there with him, being greater than euer ſir Hugh Caluerlie that ancient capteine wold haue thought that France had béene able to haue ſet forth, departed, and left the towne to be ſpoiled of the Britons, and other French ſouldiers, which executed there all kinds of crueltie. The more part of the Engliſhmen went to Bruckburge, but ſir Hugh Caluerlie went to Grauelin, and ſo to Calis, as one ſore diſpleaſed in his mind, for that his counſell could not be regarded in all this voiage, which if it had béene followed, would haue brought it to a better iſſue than now it was, as was ſuppoſed.

The French king with his huge armie driueth the Engliſhmen out of Flanders.

Bruckburge yeelded to the French.

The duke of Britaine a friend to the Engliſhmen.

The French king following the tract of good fortune, that guided his ſterne, marched forth to Bruckburge, ſo that the vaward of his armie came before that towne on Holie rood daie in September, vnder the leading of the earle of Flanders, the duke of Britaine, the lord Oliuer de Cliſſon high conſtable of France, and the lord Waleran earle of S. Paule, the which demeaned themſelues in ſuch ſort, that although the Engliſhmen within valiantlie defended the Frenchmens aſſault; yet the third daie after the Frenchmens comming thither, the Engliſhmen by compoſition that they might depart with bag and bagage, yéelded vp the towne, which on the nineteenth of September being ſaturdaie, as that yeare came about, was abandoned to the French ſouldiers, to rifle and ſpoile at their pleaſure, in the which feat the Britons bare the bell awaie, dooing more miſchéefe vnto the poore inhabitants, than with toong can be recited. The duke of Britaine holpe greatlie to make the compoſition, that the Engliſhmen might depart in ſafetie: for the which dooing he was in great hatred and obloquie of the ſouldiers, who affirmed that he was not onelie a friend to the Engliſhmen, but an enimie to his countrie, and a traitour to the common-wealth.

Grauelin fortified by the Frenchmen for a countergariſon to Calis.

Thom.Walſ.

The Engliſhmen comming to Grauelin, ſet it on fire, and departed ſtreight to Calis, leauing the countrie of Flanders to the Frenchmen, and ſo returned into England, where they were not greatlie commended for their ſeruice, but were put ſo farre in blame, that ſir Thomas Triuet, & ſir William Elmham were committed to priſon within the tower of London, as men ſuſpected of euill dealing in the deliuerie of Bruckburge and Grauelin to the Frenchmens hands: for immediatlie after that they had left Grauelin, the Frenchmen came thither, and fortified it for a countergariſon to Calis. ¶ There be that write how the French king offered to giue the biſhop of Norwich fiftéene thouſand marks to race the towne of Grauelin, and ſo to leaue it vnto him, the biſhop hauing libertie with all his people and goods to depart in ſafetie. The biſhop required to haue libertie for certeine daies, to make herevnto a full and deliberate anſwer; which was granted, and in the meane time he ſent into England to aduertiſe the king in what ſtate he ſtood, and how the French king laie before him with a mightie armie: and therefore if he meant euer to trie battell with the Frenchmen, now was the time.

The king & queene in progreſſe.

A great hea ſoone cooled.

In the ſame ſummer, the king with the quéene went abroad in progreſſe, viſiting in their waie the rich abbeis of the realme, as Burie, Thetford, Norwich, & other; going about a great part of the realme. And when theſe newes came to him from the biſhop of Norwich, he was at Dauentrie in Northamptonſhire, and being the ſame time at ſupper, he put the table from him, and riſing with all haſt, got him to horſbacke, and rode in poſt that night, changing horſſe diuerſe times, with ſuch ſpéed that he came to S. Albons about midnight, and making no ſtaie there longer than he had borowed the abbats gelding, haſted forth till he came to Weſtminſter: ſo that it appeared he would neuer haue reſted till he had paſſed the ſea, and giuen battell to the Frenchmen. But after his comming to Weſtminſter, wearied with that haſtie iournie, he got him to bed, and liked ſo well of eaſe, that he thought good to ſend a lieutenant in his ſtead to paſſe the ſeas, to deliuer the biſhop from danger of his enimies.

The biſhop of Norwich returned into England out of Flanders.

Herevpon was the duke of Lancaſter ſent for, that he might with ſuch power as was readie to paſſe the ſeas, go ouer with the ſame, and giue battell to the French king: but he protracted time, till the reſpit granted to the biſhop to make anſwer was expired, and ſo the biſhop when he ſaw no ſuccour come forth of England, raced the towne as the couenant was: but monie he would not or did not receiue, bicauſe he thought in ſo dooing he ſhould offend the councell. At his comming backe into England, he found the duke of Lancaſter at the ſea ſide with a great power of men readie to haue come ouer: although ſome thought that he deferred time of purpoſe, for that he miſliked of the biſhops whole enterpriſe; and now bicauſe it had thus quailed, he blamed the biſhop for his euill gouernement therein: but ſir Hugh Caluerlie he reteined with him a time, dooing him all honour, by reaſon of the old approoued valiancie, that had béene euer found in him. And this was the end of the biſhop of Norwich his iournie.

Warke caſtell burnt by the Scots.

The Scots in the meane while ſate not ſtill, but made roades into England, tooke and burnt the caſtell of Warke. Moreouer, whileſt the ſiege laie before Ypres, the Frenchmen armed certeine veſſels, and ſent them to the ſea, namelie fiue balengers, as well to intercept ſuch as ſhould paſſe betwéene England land and Flanders, as alſo to ſtop ſuch as were appointed to go ouer into Gaſcoine, that were ſoldiers alſo of the croiſie, appointed thither vnder the leading of the lord Britrigale de la Bret, and certeine others. When they of Porteſmouth vnderſtood that theſe fiue ſhips were abroad, they made forth to the ſea, and meeting with their aduerſaries, fought with them a ſore & cruell battell, and in the end ſlue all the enimies, nine excepted, and tooke all their veſſels. Another fleet of Engliſhmen tooke eight French ſhips, which had abord 1500 tuns of good wines, that comforted the Engliſhmen greatlie.

Diuerſe French ſhips taken by the Engliſhmen.

A parlement at London.

About the feaſt of All ſaints was a parlement holden at London, in which was granted to the king one moitie of a fifteenth by the laitie, and ſhortlie after a moitie of a tenth by the cleargie. Moreouer, the king tooke into his hands the temporalties that belonged to the biſhop of Norwich, bicauſe he obeied not the kings commandement when he was ſent for at the time when he tooke the ſeas to paſſe into Flanders. The knights alſo that had not ſhewed ſuch obedience to the biſhop as was requiſit in that iornie, were committed to priſon; but ſhortlie after they were ſet at libertie vpon ſuerties that vndertooke for them. ¶ It was alſo decreed in this parlement, that the erle of Buckingham the kings vncle ſhould go to the borders againſt Scotland, with a thouſand lances, and two thouſand archers, to repreſſe the preſumptuous attempts of the Scots, who aduertiſed thereof, ſent ambaſſadors to treat of peace; but they were diſpatched home againe, without obteining that which they came to ſue for.

The temporalties of the biſhoprike of Norwich ſeized into the kings hands for the biſhops diſobedience.

A treatie of peace betweene England and France.

At the motion and inſtance of the duke of Britaine, immediatlie vpon the returne of the Engliſh armie out of Flanders, there was a meeting of certeine commiſſioners in the marches of Calis, at a place called Lelleghen, for the treatie of a peace to be concluded betwixt the two realmes of England and France. There appeared for king Richard, the duke of Lancaſter, and his brother the erle of Buckingham, ſir Iohn Holland brother to the king, ſir Thomas Percie, and a biſhop. For the French king, thither came the dukes of Berrie and Burgognie, the biſhop of Laon, and the chancellor of France. There were alſo the duke of Britaine, and the earle of Flanders. Alſo there came a biſhop with other commiſſioners from the king of Spaine: for the Frenchmen would doo nothing, except the king of Spaine might be alſo compriſed in the treatie and concluſion. They were three weekes in commoning of an agreement: but when nothing elſe could be brought to paſſe, they concluded a truce to indure till the feaſt of S. Michaell, which ſhould be in the yeare 1384.

A truce taken betweene England and France.

The earle of Flanders was iudged moſt in blame, for that no peace could be accorded, bicauſe he would not that the Gauntiners ſhould be compriſed therin, but the Engliſhmen would not agree either to truce or peace, except regard might be had of the Gauntiners, as their freends and alies. The kings of Spaine and Scotland were compriſed in this truce as confederats to the Frenchmen, which ſhould haue ſignified the ſame into Scotland, but did not, till great harme followed through negligence vſed in that matter, as after yee ſhall perceiue. ¶ The ſame yeare in the night of the feaſt of the Purification of our ladie, great lightenings and thunders chanced, which put manie in no ſmall feare, ſo huge and hideous was that tempeſt. Shortlie after, there roſe no ſmall adoo in the citie of London about the election of their maior: for ſuch as fauoured the late maior Iohn de Northampton, otherwiſe called Iohn de Comberton, ſtood againſt ſir Nicholas Brambre knight that was choſen to ſucceed the ſaid Iohn de Northampton, inſomuch that a ſhoomaker who was one of the ſame Iohn de Northamptons partakers, preſumed through a number of voices that were readie to fauour him, to take vpon him as maior: but through the counſell of ſir Robert Knolles knight, he was ſuddenlie apprehended, drawne, and beheaded, as a rebell and troubler of the kings peace.

Tho. Walſin.

Great contention about the election of the maior of London.

Sir Robert Knolles.

In the Lent ſeaſon, the duke of Lancaſter with his brother the earle of Buckingham went towards the borders, hauing with him a mightie power of knights, eſquiers, and archers, and after he had remained a certeine time vpon the borders, about Eaſter he entered Scotland, and comming within three miles of Edenburgh, he ſtaied there three daies, in which meane time the Scots conueied all their goods out of the towne ouer the water of Firth: ſo that when the armie came thither, they found nothing but bare walles, which greeued the ſoldiers not a little. The Scots would not come forth to giue anie battell to the Engliſhmen, but got them into woods and mounteines, or elſe paſſed ouer the riuer of Firth, ſuffering the Engliſhmen to fight with the vehement cold wether that then ſore annoied thoſe parts, in ſo much that on Eaſter daie at night, through ſnow that fell, and ſuch extreame cold and boiſterous ſtormes as ſore afflicted the armie, being incamped within the compaſſe of a mariſh ground for their more ſuertie: there died aboue fiue hundred horſſes, to let paſſe the loſſe of men that periſhed at the ſame time, of whom we make no mention. To conclude, after the duke and his brother the earle had remained a time thus in Scotland, and burned certeine townes, they returned into England.

The duke of Lancaſter inuadeth Scotland with an armie.

Great death of horſſes and men in the Engliſh hoſt, by reaſon of extreme cold.

A parlement at Saliſburie.

About the ſame time, to wit, in the quindene of Eaſter, a parlement of the nobles was holden at Saliſburie, during the which an Iriſh frier of the order of the Carmelits, being a bacheler in diuinitie, exhibited to the king a bill againſt the duke of Lancaſter, charging him with heinous treaſons: as that he meant vpon a ſudden to deſtroie the king, and to vſurpe the crowne, ſhewing the time, the place, and circumſtances of the whole contriued matter. The king being yoong both in yeares and diſcretion, when he had heard the friers information, called two of his chapleins vnto him, one ſir Nicholas Slake, and an other, and aſked their aduiſe what they thought good to be doone in ſuch a weightie cauſe. Now as they were buſie in talke about the ſame, the duke of Lancaſter came into the kings chamber after his wonted manner, not vnderſtanding anie thing of the matter whereof they were in talke. The king with a ſterne countenance beheld the duke, not dooing him the honor that he was accuſtomed. The duke ſuſpecting that the king had ſomewhat in his head that touched his perſon, withdrew. In the meane time thoſe two that were thus in counſell with the king, fearing happilie the dukes power, or elſe vpon good will they bare towards him, perſuaded the king that in anie wiſe he ſhould call him, to ſee and heare what was laid to his charge.

An Iriſh frier appeacheth the duke of Lãcaſter of treaſon.

The duke, after he had read the bill of his accuſation, made ſuch anſwer, and ſo excuſed himſelfe in declaring his innocencie, that the king gaue credit to his words, and receiued his excuſe. Herewith the duke beſought the king, that the frier might be kept in ſafe gard, till the time came that he might purge himſelfe of that he had charged him with; and that the lord Iohn Holland the kings halfe brother might haue the cuſtodie of him, till the day appointed that the duke ſhould come to his full triall. The night before which day, the ſaid lord Holland, and ſir Henrie Greene knight, came to this frier, and putting a cord about his necke, tied the other end about his priuie members, & after hanging him vp from the ground, laid a ſtone vpon his bellie, with the weight whereof, and peiſe of his bodie withall, he was ſtrangled and tormented, ſo as his verie backe bone burſt in ſunder therewith, beſides the ſtraining of his priuie members: thus with thrée kind of tormentings he ended his wretched life. On the morow after, they cauſed his dead corps to be drawne about the towne, to the end it might appeare he had ſuffered worthilie for his great falſhood & treaſon. Which extreame puniſhment and exquiſite kind of execution, had it not béene meritoriouſlie inflicted vpon ſo impudent an offendor, had deſerued perpetuall record of vnaccuſtomed crueltie, with this vehement exclamation,

O fera barbaries æuo non nota priori,

A rode into Scotland.

But now to the parlement. At length, when the K. had obteined of the laitie a grant of an halfe fiftéenth the ſame parlement was diſſolued. In the ſummer following the borderers of England and Scotland made rodes ech into others countries, to the great diſquieting of both the realmes. Among other rodes that the Engliſhmen made, ſhortlie after Eaſter (as Froiſſard ſaith) the earles of Northumberland and Notingham, raiſing an armie of 2000 ſpeares, and ſix thouſand archers, entered Scotland by Rockeſburgh, burnt the countrie euen to Edenburgh, and ſo returned without damage. In the meane time came meſſengers from the French king, to aduertiſe the Scots of the concluſion of the truce. But the Scots prouoked with this laſt inuaſion made by the Engliſhmen into their countrie, would not heare of any truce, till they had in part reuenged their diſpleſure vpon the Engliſhmen: and ſo with certeine men of armes of France, that latelie before were come thither, not yet vnderſtanding of any truce, they roded into Northumberland, doing what miſchiefe they might: ſo that for the ſummer ſeaſon of this yeare, either part ſought to indamage other (as Walſingham ſaith) though Froiſſard writeth, that through the earneſt trauell of the meſſengers that came to intimate the abſtinence of war taken, the parties now that their ſtomachs were well eaſed with the interchange of indamaging either others confins, agréed to be quiet, and ſo the truce was proclamed in both realmes, and accordinglie obſerued.

One miſchief aſketh another.

Anno Reg. 8. The duke of Lãcaſter ſent into France to treat of a peace.

About the beginning of Auguſt in the eighth yéere of this kings reigne, the duke of Lancaſter went ouer againe into France, to treat of peace; but after he had remained there a long time, & ſpent no ſmall ſtore of treaſure, he returned with a truce, to indure onelie till the firſt daie of Maie then next inſuing. While the duke of Lancaſter was forth of the relme, Iohn de Northampton, that had borne ſuch rule in the citie of London, whileſt he was maior, and alſo after (as partlie ye haue heard) was accuſed by a chapleine (that he had in his houſe) of ſeditious ſturs, which he went about, ſo that being arreigned thereof, he was in the end condemned to perpetuall priſon, and the ſame not to be within the ſpace of one hundred miles at the leaſt of the citie of London. All his goods were confiſcated, and ſo he was ſent to the caſtell of Tintagill in Cornewall, and the kings officers ſeized vpon his goods & cattels. ¶ About the feaſt of ſaint Martine, a parlement was called at London, in which, monie was demanded of the cleargie and temporaltie, towards the maintenance of the kings wars.

Iohn de Northampton late maior of London cõdemned to perpetuall priſon and all his goods confiſcated.

A combat.

During this parlement alſo, a combat was fought within liſts betwixt an Engliſh eſquier, named Iohn Walſh, and an eſquier of Nauarre that accuſed the ſaid Walſh of treaſon, though not iuſtlie, but moued through diſpleaſure, conceiued of an iniurie doone to him by the ſame Walſh, whileſt he was vnder capteine or vicedeputie (as we may call him) of Chierburgh, in abuſing the Nauarrois wife. Wherevpon when the Nauarrois was vanquiſhed and confeſſed the truth, he was adiudged by the king to be drawne vnto the place of execution and hanged, notwithſtanding that the quéene and diuerſe other made ſute for him. ¶ Henrie Knighton maketh report hereof in ſomewhat a differing maner: but the iſſue of his tale falleth out to be like to the other. On a wedneſdaie (ſaith he) at S. Andrews tide, Iohn Walliſe of Grimſbie fought in liſts with Martilet of Nauarre eſquier, at Weſtminſter, in preſence of K. Richard & of Iohn the good duke of Lancaſter: in ſo much that the ſaid Iohn Walliſe ſlue his aduerſarie, wherevpon at the kings cõmandement being made knight, he was inriched with manie gifts, as well of the kings and the dukes beſtowing, as alſo of other great men and péeres of the realme. As for Martilet, after he was ſlaine, he was preſentlie drawne, hanged, and headed.

The appellant being vanquiſhed, is adiudged to be hanged. Abraham Fleming out of Henrie Knighton canon of Leiceſter abbeie.

Furthermore before the ſaid parlement was diſſolued, newes came forth of the north parts, that the Scots had wonne the caſtell of Berwike: for which the earle of Northumberland, that was capteine thereof, was put in high blame, for that he had not committed the kéeping thereof to more circumſpect perſons. The duke of Lancaſter, who bare no good will to the ſaid earle, was well appaid that he had ſo good matter to charge his aduerſarie withall, ſo that through his meanes the earle of Northumberland was ſore accuſed, and had much adoo to eſcape the danger of being reputed a traitor. Wherevpon great occaſion of malice and diſpleaſure grew betwixt thoſe two noble perſonages, as after it well appeared. But howſoeuer the matter was handled, the earle was licenced by the king to go into his countrie, and ſéeke to recouer poſſeſſion of the caſtell thus latelie loſt. Wherevpon raiſing an armie, & beſieging the Scots that were within the caſtell, he ſo conſtreined them, that for the ſumme of 2000 marks they ſurrendred the fortreſſe into his hands, their liues and goods ſaued: and ſo the earle of Northumberland recouered the caſtell out of the Scotiſhmens hands, being taught to commit it to more warie kéepers than the other before.

The king being incenſed againſt the duke of Lancaſter, meant that he ſhould haue béene arreſted and arreigned of certeine points of treaſon before ſir Robert Triſillian chéefe iuſtice (as Thomas Walſingham ſaith) and peraduenture there might be ſome ſuch report, that ſuch was the kings meaning: but yet how this may ſtand, conſidering he was to be tried by his péeres, in caſe that any the like matter had béene pretended, I ſée not. But how ſoeuer it was, he being warned thereof by ſome of the councell, got him to his caſtell of Pomfret, which he fortified, and banded himſelfe ſo with his fréends, that it appeared he would defend his cauſe with force of armes, rather than to come to his triall by order of law afore ſuch a iudge: and by reaſon hereof, it was greatlie doubted, leaſt ſome ciuill warre would haue broken forth. But through the earneſt labour of the kings mother, that (notwithſtanding hir indiſpoſition of bodie to trauell, by reaſon of hir corpulencie) riding to and fro betwixt them, made an agréement betwixt the king hir ſonne, and the duke, to hir great comfort and contentation of mind, and no leſſe ſuertie of quietneſſe to the whole realme.

The duke of Lancaſter getteth him to his caſtell of Pomfret, and fortifieth it.

The princeſſe of Wales maketh an atonement betwéene the king and the duke of Lancaſter.

About the ſame time the French king had a great fléet of ſhips in Flanders, ſo that it was doubted leaſt he meant ſome inuaſion into England. Wherevpon there was ſent to the ſea the lord of S. Iohns, and ſir Thomas Percie with a ſtrong nauie, but they did no good, ſuffering the French fléet diuerſe times to paſſe by them, and not once offering to ſet vpon them. But the ſhips of Porteſmouth & Dertmouth, beſtirred themſelues better: for entering into the riuer of Saine, they drowned foure of their enimies ſhips, and tooke other foure, with a barke of the lord Cliſſons, one of the faireſt that was to be found either in France or England. In theſe veſſels the Engliſhmen had a rich preie of wines, and other merchandizes. ¶The king vpon ſome occaſion tooke great diſpleaſure againſt William Courtnie archbiſhop of Canturburie, ſo ſtorming againſt him, as few durſt ſpeake anie thing in his excuſe. The lord chancellor Michaell de la Poole ſeeming to fauour his cauſe, was likelie to haue run in high diſpleaſure. Sir Thomas Triuet, and ſir John Deuereux intreating for him, were ſore rebuked at his hands. Yet at length, after that the archbiſhop was withdrawne, and had kept him cloſe for a time, he was thorough mediation of ſome freends reconciled to the kings fauour.

The ſhips of Portſmouth & Dartmouth did better ſeruice than the kings great nauie.

The French king aideth Scots againſt Engliſhmen.

The Scots inuade the frontiers of England.

Anno Reg.9.

The K. goeth with an armie againſt the Scots.

Variance betweene ſir John Hollands ſeruãts and the lord Richard Stafford.

About the ſame time the French king ſent into Scotland the admerall of France, with a thouſand men of armes, knights, and eſquiers, beſides croſſebowes and other to ioine with the Scots, and to make warres in England. The Scots incouraged with this new aid, ſent to them out of France, leuied a power, & ſo togither with the Frenchmen, entered into the Engliſh confines, and began to rob & ſpoile, and further tooke certeine caſtels and houſes of defenſe. The king of England aduertiſed hereof, aſſembled an huge power of men of warre, and firſt ſent before him the duke of Lancaſter with part of the armie, and afterward followed himſelfe, with all conuenient ſpeed that might be. At his comming into the parts about Yorke, he was informed that the Scots and Frenchmen were withdrawne vpon the duke of Lancaſters approch towards them, but the king thought to keepe on his iournie. Whileſt he was lodged in thoſe parts, a great miſchance happened, by reaſon of variance that fell betwixt certeine perſons of the retinue of ſir John Holland brother vnto the earle of Kent and halfe brother to the king, and other of the retinue of the lord Richard Stafford ſonne to the earle of Stafford.

The lord Richard Stafford ſlaine by ſir John Holland.

The cauſe of their falling out was about a knight of Boheme, called ſir Miles, that was come to ſee the queene. This knight kept companie moſt an end with the lord Richard Stafford: and chancing to be at words with two of ſir John Hollands ſeruants, there came two archers perteining to the lord Stafford, which blamed them, that were ſo about to miſuſe the ſtranger in words, as they tooke it: the ſtrife hereby grew to that point in the end, that one of the archers ſhot at one of ſir John Hollands ſeruants, and ſlue him. This miſhap being reported to ſir John Holland, ſet him in ſuch a furie (by reaſon of the loue which he had to his ſeruant) that immediatlie he ruſhed forth of his lodging, to reuenge his death, and through miſfortune meeting with the lord Stafford, ſlue him, and doubting in what ſort his deed might be taken, fled ſtreight vnto Beuerlie, and there tooke ſanctuarie. The erle of Stafford tooke this miſaduenture right heauilie, as reaſon was: yet bicauſe he would not trouble the hoſt, nor diſappoint the iournie which they had in hand, vpon the kings promiſe that he would doo vpright iuſtice in the matter, as ſhould be thought meet and conuenient, he bare his greefe ſo patientlie as he might, ſo that he wan himſelfe much praiſe for his wiſedome therein ſhewed.

Hect. Boetius.

Edenburgh burnt by king Richard.

The king aduancing forwards with his armie, came to the borders, and entring into Scotland, paſſed thorough Mers and Louthian, waſting and ſpoiling all the townes, houſes and villages in his waie. The abbeies of Melros, Driburgh, and Newbottell were burnt, and thoſe moonks and other people that were found in the ſame were ſlaine. At his comming to Edenburgh, he found all the people fled out of the towne, but the houſes and buildings he conſumed with fire, togither with the church of ſaint Giles. At the humble ſute of his vncle the duke of Lancaſter, Holie rood houſe was preſerued from hurt, for that the ſame duke in time of the rebellion of the commons here in England, was lodged in that houſe, and found much gentleneſſe and freendſhip in the abbat and conuent; ſo that he could doo no leſſe than requite them with kindneſſe, at whoſe hands he found kindneſſe; for we are bound in conſcience to tender them by whome we haue beene benefited (vnleſſe we will be counted vnciuill, according to the old adage)

Arbor honoretur cuius nos vmbra tuetur.

The French admerall perſuadeth the Scots to fight with the Engliſh hoſt.

Cumberland ſore ſpoiled by the Scots.

Thus when the king had reuenged the diſpleaſure afore receiued at the Scots and Frenchmens hands, (and remained in Edenburgh fiue daies) he returned without proffer of battell, or anie notable incounter. The admerall of France was earneſtlie in hand with the Scotiſh lords to perſuade them to haue giuen battell to the Engliſh armie, till he and diuers other knights of France were brought to the top of a mounteine, from whence they might behold all the Engliſh armie, as the ſame paſſed vnderneath them by a paſſage that laie by the foot of that mounteine: for after that they had viewed the puiſſance of the Engliſhmen, and (as neere as they could) numbered them, they had no ſuch eger minds to fight with them as before, for they eſteemed them to be ſix thouſand men of armes, and threeſcore thouſand archers, and other men of warre; where the Scots and Frenchmen were not paſt a thouſand ſpeares, and thirtie thouſand of all other ſorts, and the moſt part of thoſe but euill armed. Therefore they determined vpon an other point, which was, to inuade England in an other quarter, whileſt the Engliſhmen burnt vp their countrie, and ſo they ſet forward towards the weſt borders, and paſſing ouer the mounteins that diuide Northumberland from Scotland, they entered into Cumberland, dooing much hurt in the lands that belonged to the lord Mowbraie, to the earles of Notingham, and Stafford, to the baron of Graiſtocke, and to the Muſgraues.

Carleill aſſalted by the Scots.

Good counſell neglected.

Laſtlie, they came to Carleill, and boldlie aſſalted the citie: but ſir Lewes Clifford, and ſir Thomas Muſgraue, Dauie Holgraue, and diuerſe other worthie capteins being within it, ſo defended the walles and gates, that their enimies got ſmall aduantage: and finallie hearing that the Engliſh armie was returning homewards, the Scots and Frenchmen drew backe into Scotland, doubting to be incloſed by the Engliſhmen, as they had beene in deed, if the duke of Lancaſter and his brethren (vncles to the king) might haue beene beleeued, who counſelled the king to purſue the enimies, and ſtop the paſſages through which they muſt needs paſſe in their comming backe. But the earle of Oxenford being moſt in fauour and credit with the king in thoſe daies, as one that ruled all things at his pleaſure, did aduiſe him to the contrarie, by putting him in beleefe (as was ſaid) that his vncles went about to bring him in danger to be loſt and ſurpriſed of his enimies, whervpon he tooke the next way home, and ſo brake vp his iournie.

Polydor.

A noble reuenge.

When the Scots and Frenchmen were returned into Scotland, the Scotiſh king hauing conceiued a iuſt diſpleaſure towards the French admerall, for that by his meanes the realme of Scotland had ſuſteined ſuch damage in that ſeaſon, cauſed him and his Frenchmen to be deſpoiled of the moſt part of their goods, and ſent them ſo awaie out of his countrie, that the Scots might receiue ſome comfort by thoſe warres. In this yeare was the battell of Algeberota in Portingale, where king John of Portin-gale diſcomfited a great hoſt of Spaniards and Frenchmen by the helpe and policie of certeine Engliſhmen which he had there with him, vnder the leading of two eſquiers Norberie and Hartell. There were ſlaine diuers earls & great lords of Spaniards, but for that our writers do not rightlie note the Spaniſh names, but write them corruptlie as ſtrangers vſe to doo, we here omit them. The king of Portingale (after this victorie obteined againſt his enimies) ſent ſix gallies vnto the king of England to aid him againſt his aduerſaries, the which were well receiued and highlie made of by the Londoners and other, ſo that the Portingales had no cauſe to repent of their comming hither.

The king of Portingale ſendeth ſix gallies to K. Richards aid.

The French king this yeare beſieged and wan the towne of Dam, after he had béene at great charges about it. Whileſt his nauie returned from Scluis, where the ſame had laien at anchor a long time, the ſhips by tempeſt were ſcattered & wether-driuen, ſo that in the feaſt daie of the exaltation of the croſſe, two of their gallies, a great ſhip, a barge, and ſeauen balengers were caſt on ſhore about Calis, & the Caliſians tooke fiue hundred Frenchmen and Normans that eſcaped to land. An other day 72 French ſhips (as they were comming from Scluis, to paſſe by Calis, were met with by them of Calis, who behaued themſelues ſo manfullie, that they tooke 18 of thoſe French ſhips, and a great barke, in which thrée ſcore armed men were ſlaine before it could be taken. Within thrée daies after this, the Caliſians met 45 other French ſhips, and after ſix houres fight obteined the victorie, taking thrée of the moſt principall veſſels, whereof one being a hulke of Eaſtland was hired by the Normans, to gard the reſidue. The other two that were taken were of ſuch mold, that they could not enter into the hauen at Calis, and therefore were ſent to Sandwich, the one of them being a new ſhip, which the lord Cliſſon had bought at Scluis, paieng for hir 3000 franks. ¶Henrie Knighton ſaith it was priſed or valued at 20000 florens, it was ſo tall, big, and large a veſſell; and therefore of great capacitie.

A good victorie of them of Calis againſt the French fleet.

The Caliſians & others make a rode into France & win great booties.

On ſaint Deniſe daie the ſoldiors of Calis and other Engliſh fortreſſes thereabouts, made a ſecret iournie into France, and got a bootie of foure thouſand ſhéepe, and thrée hundred head of great cattell, which they droue towards their holds; and as the lord de Rambures gouernour of Bullongne would haue recouered the preie, he was vnhorſſed with the rencounter of an Engliſh ſpeare, and being relieued by his companie, and mounted againe, withdrew himſelfe, not attempting to trie any further maſteries, and ſo the Engliſhmen ſafelie paſſed forth with their bootie of cattell, and aboue a hundred good priſoners which they had taken at this rode. In this 9 yeare about the feaſt of S. Martine, the king called his high court of parlement at Weſtminſter, in the which amongſt other things there concluded, he created two dukes, a marques, and fiue earles. Firſt Edmund Langlie earle of Cambridge the kings vncle was created duke of Yorke, Thomas of Woodſtoke his other vncle earle of Buckingham was created duke of Gloceſter, Robert Véere earle of Oxford was made marques of Deuelin, Henrie of Bollingbrooke ſonne and heire to Iohn of Gaunt duke of Lancaſter was created earle of Derbie: Edward Plantagenet ſonne and heire to the Duke of Yorke was made earle of Rutland, Michaell lord de la Poole chancellor of England was created earle of Suffolke, & ſir Thomas Moubraie earle of Notingham was made earle marſhall.

Alſo by authoritie of this parlement, Roger lord Mortimer earle of March, ſonne and heire of Edmund Mortimer earle of March, and of the ladie Philip eldeſt daughter and heire vnto Lionell duke of Clarence, third ſonne to king Edward the third, was eſtabliſhed heire apparant to the crowne of this realme, and ſhortlie after ſo proclaimed. The which earle of March, anon after the end of the ſame parlement, ſailed into Ireland to his lordſhip of Vlſter, whereof he was owner by right of his ſaid mother; but whileſt he remained there to pacifie the rebellions of the wild Iriſh, a great number of them togither aſſembled, came vpon him and ſlue him, togither with the moſt part of his companie. This Roger earle of March had iſſue Edmund, Roger, Anne, Ales, & Eleanor, which Eleanor was made a nunne. The two ſonnes died without iſſue, and Anne the eldeſt of the daughters was married to Richard earle of Cambridge, ſonne vnto Edmund of Langlie before remembred: the which Richard had iſſue by the ſaid Anne, a ſon called Richard, that was after duke of Yorke, and father to king Edward the fourth; alſo a daughter named Iſabell, afterwards married to the lord Bourchier. Moreouer, in this yeare Henrie of Bollingbrooke earle of Derbie married the daughter and heire of Humfrie Bohun earle of Hereford, in whoſe right he was after made duke of Hereford, and by hir he had iſſue Henrie that after him was king of this relme, the ladie Blanch duches of Bar, and the ladie Philip married to the king of Denmarke: alſo Thomas duke of Clarence, Iohn duke of Bedford, and Humfrie duke of Gloceſter. ¶The Gauntiners ſtill mainteined warre againſt the earle of Flanders during his life, and after his deceaſſe againſt Philip duke of Burgogne, by ſuch aid and comfort as they had from time to time of the king of England, till finallie this yeare about the eighteenth daie of December, a peace was concluded betwixt the ſaid duke and the towne of Gaunt: and ſir Iohn Bourchier that had laine a long ſeaſon there, as capteine vnder the K. of England, and Peter de Bois one of the chéefe capteins of the Gauntiners (before the concluding of this peace) were ſafelie conducted to Calis by vertue of the duke of Burgogne his ſafe conduct, and ſo they came ouer into England, and the king gaue vnto Peter de Bois a penſion of an hundred marks ſterling, yearelie to be paid to him out of the ſtaples of the wolles in London.

This yeare king Richard holding his Chriſtmaſſe at Eltham, thither came to him Leo king of Armenia, whoſe countrie and realme being in danger to be conquered of the Turks, he was come into thoſe weſt parts of chriſtendome for aid and ſuccour at the hands of the chriſtian princes here. The king honorablie receiued him, and after he had taken counſell touching his requeſt, he gaue him great ſummes of monie and other rich gifts, with a ſtipend (as ſome write) of a thouſand pounds yearely to be paid to him during his life. After he had remained here two moneths ſpace, he tooke leaue of the king and departed. The chiefeſt point of his errand was, to haue procured a peace betwixt the two kings of England and France, but deſtinie would not permit ſo good a purpoſe to take effect: for the hatred which either nation bare to other, would not ſuffer their loftie minds to yéeld in any one point, further than ſéemed good in their owne opinions.

The duke of Lancaſter goeth into Spaine with an armie.

In this ninth yeare of king Richard (though by other writers it ſhould ſéeme to be rather in the yeare following) the duke of Lancaſter with a great power of men of warre went into Spaine, and lead with him thither his wife the ladie Conſtance, & a daughter which he had by hir named Katharine, and two other daughters which he had by his former wife. He had béene about the preparing of an armie, and all furniture neceſſarie for this iournie two or thrée yéeres before, and therefore hauing now ſeauen gallies and eightéene ſhips ſent to him out of Portingale (which arriued at Briſtow) he cauſed all ſuch veſſels as he had prouided to reſort likewiſe thither, where making his generall aſſemblie, when all his men of warre were come togither, he beſtowed them aboord, with all their horſſes and purueiances, and cauſing ſailes to be hoiſſed vp, ſet forward on his long wiſhed iournie. This was in the moneth of Maie, when the ſeas were calme, the aire ſwéet, and the winds pleaſant and agréeable to his purpoſe. He appointed for admerall of his whole fléet ſir Thomas Percie; and ſir Iohn Holland that was after created earle of Huntington and had married one of his daughters was ordeined conſtable of the hoaſt; and ſir Thomas Moreaux hauing married his baſtard daughter was one of his marſhals.

There were that attended him in this iournie manie other lords and knights of honor, as the lord Lucie, the lord Talbot, the lord Baſſet, the lord Willoughbie, the lord Fitz Walter, the lord Poinings, the lord Bradſton, the lord of Põmiers a Gaſcoigne, the lord Yonne fitz Warren, Henrie lord Beaumont, William lord Beauchampe, ſir Richard Burlie that was another of the marſhals of the armie, ſir Hugh Spenſer, ſir William Windſore, ſir Iohn Daubreticourt, ſir Hugh Haſtings, ſir William Farrington, ſir Thomas Treſham, ſir Mauburin de Liniers, ſir Thomas Worceſter, ſir Iohn Sowtrie, ſir Robert Clinton, ſir Philip Tirrell, ſir Lewes Rocheſter, Huguelin Caluerlie, Dauid Holgraue, Thomas Alerie, Hobequin Beauceſter, and diuerſe other: they were in all to the number of fiftéene hundred men of armes, whereof a thouſand at the leaſt were knights and eſquiers, beſides foure thouſand archers, and other men of warre, ſo perfectlie appointed and arraied, as could be thought méet and conuenient. Of this choſen companie attendant vpon the duke of Lancaſter, & of this his voiage into Spaine, the ſaid C. Okland ſpeaketh no leſſe trulie & according to the report of our annales, than honorablie:

¶Henrie Knighton reporteth of this voiage as followeth, in ſomewhat a differing ſort from this alreadie laid downe. On Eaſter daie (ſaith he) Iohn the duke of Lancaſter with his wife came to the king, to take their leaue; to the which duke the king gaue a crowne of gold, and the quéene likewiſe gaue an other crowne of gold to the ducheſſe. Beſides this, the king commanded his people that they ſhould call him king of Spaine, and doo him honour in all things. He had with him a power of 20000 choſen men; of which number noted in the marſhals bill or ſcroll, 2000 were men of armes, and 8000 were archers.

Thom. Walſ. The duke of Lancaſter landeth at Breſt and winneth two baſtides from the Frenchmen.

As they paſſed by Britaine, they landed at Breſt, the capteine whereof, at that time named ſir Iohn Roche, finding himſelfe greatlie annoied by the Frenchmen that were lodged in two baſtides erected before the caſtell, declared to the duke in what ſtate he ſtood. Wherevpon he cauſed the ſaid baſtides to be aſſailed, which was doone by the lord Fitz Walter, and others, who bare themſelues ſo manfullie, that the baſtides were woone, broken downe, and a great preie with priſoners obteined, although not without loſſe of diuerſe valiant perſonages. Thus were they within Breſt caſtell deliuered of their vnfréendlie neighbours by the duke of Lancaſter and his people. Who hauing doone their feat tooke the ſeas, and ſailed forth till they came on the coaſts of Gallis, where on S. Laurence euen, they arriued in the hauen of Groigne, otherwiſe called Coron, and there they vnſhipped all their prouiſions, determining to inuade the countrie on that ſide.

Anno Reg. 10. The duke of Lancaſter landeth at Groigne. Froiſſard.

Le Groigne Corone.

Abr. Fl. out of Henrie Knighton canon of Leiceſter abbeie.

¶ Héere, bicauſe it is not vnprofitable to know the abſolute truth of things doone, by the collection of writers, I haue tranſlated the beſéeging of Breſt, as the ſame is ſet downe by Henrie Knighton in his annales, in a larger and more ample ſort, with a fuller certificat of circumſtances than hath hitherto béene declared. At the ſame time (ſaith he) the duke of Britaine had laid ſiege both by ſea and land, to a certeine towne in Britaine, in old time ſubiect to the king of England, which was called Breſt, with a great multitude of Frenchmen and Britains. Now on the twelfth of the kalends of Iulie, he began to build a fort before the ſaid towne of Breſt, of a woonderfull bigneſſe, the walles thereof being ten foot thicke, and ſeauen towres about it, A thouſand workemen did worke daie by daie vpon it, and to defend the ſaid workemen (that they might not be hindered in their buſineſſe by the citizens) ten thouſand fighting men were appointed. So that this fort was begun and ended in ninetéene daies ſpace, and called the Doouehouſe, bicauſe a doouehouſe ſtood in the ſame place before. Furthermore he ſtored this fort with all neceſſaries, as vittels, armour, guns, and other engins, and he placed therin as capteine of the warriors the lord Iohn Maletret with a hundred and fiftie armed men, and as manie other ſoldiors, the whole number being thrée hundred.

The good duke of Lancaſter hauing knowledge hereof, directed his fléet or nauie towards the hauen of Breſt, where when he had arriued, they all fled from the ſiege, both by ſea and land, thoſe onlie, which were in the fort, remaining behind. Now the prior of S. Iames in Calis deſired the good duke that he might giue the firſt aſſault againſt the fort; who taking the repulſe with his retinue, he ceaſed and gaue ouer. In like ſort did manie more giue the aſſault to the ſame for the ſpace of two daies and more: inſomuch that ſome digging vnder the wals, and vndermining the foundations of one towre, the ſame fell downe vpon ſir Robert Swinarton a valiant knight of Staffordſhire, and manie more, among whome was Iohn de Bolton a couragious gentleman and an eſquire by degrée of Yorkeſhire. As for thoſe that were vpon the towre, they alſo came tumbling downe, and were preſentlie ſlaine.

In the meane time the lord Maletret gardian of the fort, ſent word to the duke of Lancaſter, that he would yéeld and ſurrender the hold into his hands vpon condition, that he and all his might fréelie depart with ſuch armour, goods, chatels and victuals as they had repoſed and laid vp in ſtore for their neceſſarie prouiſion: wherevnto the good duke (as he was alwaies good) verie gentlie agréed; vpon condition alſo, that before their departure, they ſhould ruinate the ſaid fort, and laie it euen with the ground; and ſhould likewiſe allow and paie him towards his coſts and charges defraied in the ſiege of the ſame, twentie thouſand ſcutes of gold. Then might you ſée the people flocking from all parts of the countrie, ſome with beires, ſome with cabbins, ſome with carts, and ſome with crutches to fetch awaie the dead and the wounded: in ſo much that there was not one, either ſlaine outright, or deadlie maimed, for whome his fréends did not mone and lament. Yea, the lord Maletret himſelfe was ſo mangled and hurt, that he could not go on his legs, but as he leaned on mens ſhoulders, and was borne vp on either ſide. It was reported, that manie dead bodies were hidden in heaps of ſalt, to the end that the Engliſhmen ſhould not glorie and triumph in the multitude of the ſlaine, of whome [in ſight] the number amounted to aboue

150. Thus farre goeth Henrie Knighton, whoſe report giueth no ſmall light to the matter vnder hand. After the duke had remained a moneth at Groigne, he went to Compoſtella, and there ſoiourned for a ſeaſon, during the which, his conſtable ſir Iohn Holland woone diuerſe townes and fortreſſes which the enimies kept: diuerſe yéelded to the duke with better will, for that the ducheſſe his wife was there with him, whom they knew to be right inheritour to the realme. ¶ At Mouſon a towne on the confines betwixt Spaine and Portingale, the king of Portingale and the duke of Lancaſter met, where they communed and tooke counſell togither for the more ſpéedie procéeding in their enterpriſe againſt their aduerſaries of Caſtile. Alſo there was a mariage concluded betwixt the ſaid king of Portingale, and the ladie Philip daughter to the ſaid duke, which marriage ſhortlie after was wholie conſummated, the ſaid ladie being firſt married by procuration at Compoſtella, and after ſent into Portingale right honorablie accompanied.

Philip the dude of Lancaſters daughter married to the king of Portingale.

The duke continued at Compoſtella all the winter ſeaſon, till towards March, and then (according to appointment taken betwixt him, and the king of Portingale, at their being togither at Mouſon, for their iournie to be made into Caſtile) the ſaid king aſſembled an armie of a thouſand men of armes, and ten thouſand other ſouldiers, with the which entring the confines of Caſtile, he firſt tooke the towne of Feroule, and after ioining with the duke, who had in the meane while by his marſhall taken the towns of Ruelles, Ville Lopes, Pouncenoide, Dighos, Baionne in la Maroll, Ribadan, Maures, Beſanſes, and Orens, with others in the countrie of Gallis, they marched foorth with their whole powers both togither, and paſſing ouer the riuer of Dure, entered into the countrie de Campo.

The king of Portingale & the duke of Lancaſter ioining their armes togither inuade Caſtile.

¶ Here the Engliſh writers make mention of a battell, which the conſtable of Caſtile ſhould giue to the duke, and that the victorie remained on the dukes ſide, and the Spaniards chaſed out of the field. But Froiſſard (who liued in thoſe daies, and learned that which he wrote of thoſe that were with the duke in his iournie) maketh no remembrance of any ſuch thing, but that contrarilie the king of Caſtile folowing the aduiſe of ſuch Frenchmen as were ſent into Spaine to aid him, cauſed all the riches of the countrie to be brought into the walled townes and fortreſſes, which he ſtuffed with men of warre, to defend them from the Engliſhmen and Portingales; and further to cut off their vitels, and to kéepe them from hauing forrage abroad in the countrie, vnleſſe ſuch as were ſent were garded with the greater troops for their ſuertie and defenſe.

Variance amongſt writers.

Thus beſtowing the moſt part of all ſuch men of warre, both Frenchmen and Spaniards, as he could make in places moſt conuenient for that purpoſe, he fullie determined not to giue battell till his enimies had wearied themſelues in keeping of the fields, and that a new power was come to his aid out of France, which he dailie looked for. By which means it came to paſſe, that the Engliſhmen not vſed to ſuch hot aire as they found in thoſe parts in that ſeaſon of the yeare (for it was about Midſummer) fell dailie into manie perillous diſeaſes, whereof no ſmall number died; and other became ſo faint, that they were not able to helpe themſelues, that to conſider the miſerie in which they were, it would haue rued the harts of their verie foes. Herevpon was the duke conſtreined to fall to a communication for a peace, which in the end was accorded, though not at this inſtant.

Great death in the Engliſh hoſt in Spaine by reaſon of the great heat of that countrie.

Howbeit a truce was granted, in ſuch wiſe as it might be at the Engliſhmens choiſe to returne into their countrie, either by ſea or by land, thorough France. Such as paſſed through Spaine to France, had ſafe conducts ſealed and ſigned by the king of Spaine; but ſcarſe the halfe of thoſe that came out of England with the duke, returned thither againe, they died ſo faſt, aſwell after the breaking vp of their campe, as before. Amongſt other, there died before the breaking vp of the campe, one of the greateſt barons of all the companie, named the lord Fitz Walter; and afterwards within the towne of Ville Arpent, there died (as Froiſſard ſaith) thrée great barons of England, and men of great poſſeſſions: ſir Richard Burlie a knight of the garter, who had béene as it were high marſhall of the armie, the lord Poinings, and ſir Henrie Percie couſine germane to the earle of Northumberland.

Froiſſard. The lord Fitz walter.

I thinke that none of theſe thrée were barons but onlie the lord Poinings.

In the towne of Noie deceaſſed ſir Mauburin de Liniers a Poictouin, and in the towne of Ruelles died the lord Talbot, and ſo here and there (ſaith Froiſſard) there died in all twelue great lords, foure ſcore knights, two hundred eſquiers, and of the meaner ſort of ſouldiers aboue fiue hundred. After that the armie was broken vp, the duke of Lancaſter and the ducheſſe his wife went into Portingale, and there remained a ſeaſon, and then taking the ſea, ſailed to Baionne in the marſhes of Gaſcoigne, where he reſted a long time after. ¶ In this meane while, there was communication and offers made for a marriage to be had betwixt the duke of Berrie, vncle to the French king; and the ladie Katharine daughter to the duke of Lancaſter, and of the ducheſſe his wife the ladie Conſtance.

The duke of Lancaſter returneth out of Portingale into Gaſcoigne.

When the king of Spaine vnderſtood of that treatie, he began to doubt, leaſt if that marriage tooke place, it might turne to his diſaduantage; and therefore to be at quietneſſe with the duke of Lancaſter, whoſe puiſſance he doubted, and whoſe wiſedome he perfectlie vnderſtood, by politike meanes and earneſt ſute, at length concluded a peace with him on this wiſe; That his eldeſt ſon Henrie ſhould haue in mariage the ladie Katharine daughter to the duke of Lancaſter, begot on his wife the ducheſſe Conſtance, and be intituled prince of Auſturgus. In conſideration of which marriage to be had, and all claimes to ceaſſe, which the duke in right of his wife might challenge or pretend; it was agréed, that the ſaid duke ſhould receiue yearlie the ſumme of ten thouſand marks, to be paid to him, or to his aſſignes in the citie of Baionne in Gaſcoigne, during the terme of the liues of the ſaid duke and ducheſſe; and further to haue in hand the ſumme of two hundreth thouſand nobles. ¶ Henrie Knighton in his relation of this compoſition betwéene theſe perſons of great eſtate, dooth ſay, that it was told him by one of the good duke of Lancaſters owne houſhold, and attendant vpon him in this voiage into Spaine, that the Spaniſh king did ſend ſeuen and fourtie mules loden with coffers full of gold for the ſecond paiment where vpon they were agréed. As touching the firſt paiment (ſaith Knighton) I aſked no queſtion of the partie. So that (beſides the annuitie, which mine author reporteth to be 16000 marks, during the parties liues iointlie, and 12000 marks, if it fortuned that the dukes daughter ſhould ſuruiue and outliue hir husband) it ſhould ſéeme there were other large allowances, which if they were (as it is likelie) after this rate, it was a right roiall munificence. And to this report of Knighton dooth Ch. Okland make a kind of alluſion, who ſpeking of the conditions of peace betwéene the duke of Lancaſter, and the king of Spaine, ſaith:

A marriage concluded betwéene the prince of Spaine, and the duke of Lancaſters daughter.

And firſt it is not to be forgotten, that the Frenchmen neuer ſhewed more vanitie than they did this yeare, ſince the linage of the Capetes began firſt to rule in France. All the ſhips that they could prouide from the confines of Spaine, vnto the mouth of the Rhene, all alongſt the coaſt, they aſſembled at Sluis and thereabouts, and made ſo great preparation for the warre, that the like had not beene heard of (meaning, as they boaſted, and made their vants) to paſſe ouer into England, and to deuoure the whole countrie, in dooing ſacrifice to the ſoules of their elders with the bloud of the Engliſh people. Howbeit theſe words were wind, & to them accorded the prouerbe, Parturiunt montes, naſcetur ridiculus mus.

A mightie great nauie of French ſhips at Sluis purpoſing to inuade Englãd.

There were numbred in the moneth of September about Sluis, Dam, and Blankberke 1287 ſhips, beſides thoſe which were rigged in Britaine by the conſtable, who had cauſed an incloſure of a field to be made of timber, like railes or barriers, that when they were landed in England, they might therewith incloſe their field, and ſo lodge more at ſuertie, and when they remooued, it was ſo made with ioints, that they might take it vp in peeces and eaſilie conueie it with them.

The deſcription of the incloſure.

This incloſure or wall of wood was twentie foot in heigth, and conteined in length or in compaſſe, when it was ſet vp, three thouſand paſes, and at the end of euerie twelue paſes ſtood a turret able to receiue ten men, that was higher than the reſt of the wall by ten foot at the leaſt. There were appointed to haue paſſed ouer in thoſe ſhips twentie thouſand men of armes, twentie thouſand croſbowes, and twentie thouſand other men of warre. To haue ſeene the great apparell, furniture and prouiſion, the ſhipping, truſſing, bearing, and carrieng to and fro of things needfull for this iournie, a man might haue merueled; for ſuerlie the like hath ſildome beene remembred. All that was doone there on that ſide the ſea by the Frenchmen, was notified into England, ſo that the Frenchmen were not more occupied to prepare themſelues to inuade England, than the Engliſhmen were to make themſelues readie to defend their countrie from all danger of enimies; ſo that euerie hauen towne, eſpeciallie alongſt the weſt, ſouth, and eaſt coaſts, were kept and warded with notable numbers of armed men and archers.

The prouiſion of ye Engliſhmen to reſiſt ye great power of Frenchmen.

Abr. Fl. out of Henrie Knighton canon of Leiceſter abbeie.

¶ Notwithſtanding the great confidence which the French king repoſed in the fortification which he had imbarked, thinking thereby to haue wrought great wonders, to the diſcomfiture of the Engliſh: yet (contrarie to his expectation) it ſo fortuned, that about Michaelmas, the lord William Beauchampe capteine of Calis tooke two ſhips; whereof one was loden with a peece of the ſaid incloſure or wall of wood, and in the ſame ſhip was the maiſter carpenter of the incloſure, being an Engliſhman borne, but baniſhed his countrie before that time for ſome offenſe. He alſo tooke another ſhip, wherein were engins, guns, gunpowder & other inſtruments of war. Not long after this, two more ſhips were taken likewiſe, whoſe burthen was parcels of the foreſaid frame or incloſure: ſo that three ſhips were met withall and ſeized vpon, each of them loden with one kind of ſtuffe. Whereof king Richard hearing, he cauſed the ſaid incloſure to be reared and ſet vp about Winchelſie towne. In the meane while, namelie in September, the foreſaid armie came into Flanders, and arriued at the hauen of Sluis, intending to make their progreſſe into England: but by prolonging of the time there, they were driuen to great diſtreſſe and want of vittels: for it was reported that a loafe of bread, ſold in England for a penie, was ſold there for eighteene pence; and a hens eg for a penie: ſo that in the end of Nouember they returned to France, miſſing their purpoſe as much as if they had neuer ment it.

There were readie within the realme at that ſeaſon, in one part and other 100000 archers, and ten thouſand men of armes, beſides thoſe that were gone into Spaine with the duke of Lancaſter. All this preparation laſted for the more part of the ſummer, euen till the beginning of winter: and ſtill the French king that was come downe into Flanders, ſtaied for the comming of his vncle the duke of Berrie: who at length in the moneth of Nouember came to Sluis, hauing protracted time, of purpoſe, that he might by the excuſe of winter, cauſe this iornie to be put off till another ſeaſon. Wherin he ſhewed more wit than all the councellors which the French king had about him: for if he had not politikelie ſhifted off the matter, the king had landed here in England, to the great danger of his perſon and loſſe of his people. And yet if we ſhall beleeue writers that liued in thoſe daies, by reaſon of the brute that was ſpred through the realme, of that huge preparation which the French king made to inuade this land, no ſmall feare entered into the harts of manie, namelie of the Londoners, who (as if the enimies had beene alredie landed) beſtirred them, in making what prouiſion they might for their defenſe, though it ſeemed by their manner of dooings, they ſtood in doubt leaſt the whole realme had not beene able to make ſufficient reſiſtance.

The Londoners ſpeciallie afraid of the Frẽch forces.

Diſſention among the noblemen.

In deed diuerſe were the more afraid, for that they perceiued how the barons and great lords agreed not in manie points among themſelues, and ſo being not of one mind, the wiſer ſort doubted leaſt through their diſagreeing in that troubleſome time, ſome danger might grow to the ſtate of the whole realme. Notwithſtanding, no ſmall number of others wiſhed nothing more, than that the French king in going forward with his purpoſe, might haue come ouer, not doubting but that he ſhould haue found ſuch a welcome, as would haue beene little to his eaſe. About the feaſt of ſaint Michaell, a parlement was called and holden at London, and withall great numbers of men of armes & archers were appointed to come and lie about London, that they might be readie to march forthwith againſt the enimies whenſoeuer it chanced them to land. Thus all the townes and villages twentie miles in compaſſe round about London, were full of men of armes and archers, lieng as it had beene in campe; and wanting both vittels and monie, they were driuen to ſpoile and to take by violence what they might get. At length, after they had laine thus to ſmall purpoſe a long ſeaſon, they were licenced to depart home, with commandement to be readie to returne againe vpon the firſt ſummons. Manie of them were conſtreined through neceſſitie, to ſell their horſſes, and armour, and ſome to ſpoile and to rob as they went homewards, not ſparing what they might laie their hands vpon. Although the men of warre were diſmiſſed home, the parlement yet continued, and the lords ſtill remained at London, hearkening ſtill for the French kings comming.

Froiſſard.

Tho. Walſin. A parlement at London.

Robert Weer marqueſſe of Dubline created duke of Ireland.

The lord Robert Weer earle of Oxenford, whome the king in the laſt parlement had made marqueſſe of Dubline, was now in this parlement created duke of Ireland: the other lords ſore enuieng ſo high preferment in a man that ſo little deſerued, as they tooke it. For by reaſon of the kings great affection which he bare not onelie to this noble man, but alſo to the lord Michaell de la Poole, whom he had latelie created earle of Suffolke, and after aduanced him to the office of lord chancellor (as before ye haue heard) not onelie the lords, but alſo the commons ſore grudged at ſuch their high preferrement, in ſomuch that in this preſent parlement, the knights & burgeſſes in the lower houſe, exhibited a bill againſt the lord chancellor, of diuerſe crimes which they laid to his charge, and ſo vſed the matter, with the helpe of the lords, that in the end in ſome reſpect they had their willes againſt him, contrarie to the kings mind, as after may appeare.

And where the king had demanded a reliefe of monie towards the maintenance of his eſtate, and charges of the warres, it was anſwered, that he néeded not any tallage of his ſubiects, ſith he might furniſh himſelfe with ſuch a ſumme at the hands of the ſaid earle, that was iuſtlie indebted vnto him therein, as they were able well to proue. But the king was nothing herewith contented, conceiuing no ſmall diſpleaſure, aſwell againſt them of the lower houſe, as againſt the lords in the vpper, for fauouring them in the lower, in matters that went ſo ſore againſt his mind. Herevpon (as was ſaid, whether trulie or otherwiſe, the lord knoweth) by a conſpiracie begun betwixt the king & ſuch as were moſt in fauour with him, it was deuiſed, that the duke of Gloceſter (as principall(and ſuch other lords as fauored the knights and burgeſſes in their ſute, againſt the earle of Suffolke, and were otherwiſe againſt the king in his demand of monie, ſhould be willed to a ſupper in London, there to be murthered.

But the duke comming by ſome meanes to vnderſtand of this wicked practiſe, had no deſire to take part of that ſupper, where ſuch ſharpe ſauce was prouided, and withall gaue warning to the reſidue, that they likewiſe ſhould not come there, but to content themſelues with their owne ſuppers at their lodgings. It was ſaid, that ſir Nicholas Brember, who had béene maior the yeare before, had promiſed his aſſiſtance in the execution of this horrible fact: but thorough the commendable conſtancie of Richard Exton that was maior this yeare, being mooued by the king for his furtherance therein, and denieng flatlie to conſent to the death of ſuch innocent perſons, that heinous practiſe was omitted. This matter being brought to light, the hatred and malice which men bare to ſuch councellors of the king greatlie increaſed, and the duke of Gloceſter and ſuch as withſtood the king, dailie grew more and more into the peoples fauour.

Richard Exton iuſtlie cõmended.

A ſubſidie granted and appointed to be ſpent according to yͤ diſcretion of the nobilitie.

Howbeit at length, through the earneſt ſute of ſome of the great lords, there was granted to the king halfe a tenth and halfe a fiftéenth, which ſhould not be ſpent at the pleaſure of the prince, but by the order and appointment of the ſaid lords, & ſo at length the earle of Arundell was appointed to receiue it, to furniſh him with a nauie to the ſeas. But before this paiment might be granted, there was much adoo, & hard hold: for where the ſaid earle of Suffolke then lord chancellor, at firſt had demanded of the commons in the kings name, foure fiftéens (for with leſſe (ſaid he) the king could not mainteine his eſtate and the warres which he had in hand) the whole bodie of the parlement made anſwer thereto, that without the king were preſent (for he was then at Eltham) they could make therein no anſwer at all: and herewith they tooke occaſion at length to ſay further, that except the ſaid earle of Suffolke were remooued from the office of chancellorſhip, they would meddle no further with any act in this parlement, were it neuer of ſo ſmall importance.

The king being aduertiſed hereof, ſent againe to the commons, that they ſhould ſend vnto Eltham (where he laie) fortie of the wiſeſt and beſt learned of the common houſe, the which in the name of the whole houſe ſhould declare vnto him their minds. And then the houſe was in no ſmall feare, by reaſon of a brute that was raiſed, how the king ſought meanes to intrap and deſtroie them that followed not his purpoſe. Herevpon aſwell the lords of the vpper houſe as the commons of the lower aſſembled togither, and agréed with one conſent, that the duke of Gloceſter, and Thomas Arundell biſhop of Elie, ſhould in the name of the whole parlement be ſent to the king vnto Eltham: which was doone, and the king was well contented that they ſhould come: When they came before his preſence, with humble reuerence they declared their meſſage, which conſiſted in theſe points: That the lords and commons aſſembled at that preſent in parlement, beſought him of his lawfull fauour, that they might liue in peace and tranquillitie vnder him.

Diſſention betweene the king and the parlement houſe.

The duke of Gloceſter and the biſhop of Elie ſent to yͤ K. at Eltham frõ the whole bodie of the parlement.

Their requeſts to the king.

They further declared, that one old ſtatute and laudable cuſtome was approued, which no man could denie, that the king once in the yeare might lawfullie ſummon his high court of parlement, and call the lords and commons therevnto, as to the higheſt court of his realme, in which court all right and equitie ought to ſhine as the ſunne being at the higheſt, whereof poore and rich may take refreſhing; where alſo reformation ought to be had of all oppreſſions, wrongs, extortions, & enormities within the realme; and there the king ought to take counſell with the wiſe men of his realme, for the maintenance of his eſtate, and conſeruation of the ſame. And if it might be knowen that any perſons within the realme or without, intended the contrarie; there muſt alſo be deuiſed how ſuch euill wéeds may be deſtroied. There muſt alſo be ſtudied and foreſéene, that if any charge doo come vpon the king and realme, how it may be honorablie borne and diſcharged.

And oftener if néed require.

The cauſes & conditions of a parlement.

Further, they declared that till that preſent, his ſubiects (as was thought) had louinglie demeaned themſelues towards him, in aiding him with their ſubſtance to the beſt of their powers, & that their deſire was to vnderſtand how thoſe goods were ſpent. And further they ſaid, they had one thing to declare vnto him, how that by an old ordinance it was enacted, that if the king ſhould abſent himſelfe fourtie daies, not being ſicke, and refuſe to come to the parlement, without regard to the charges of his people, and their great paines, they then may lawfullie returne home to their houſes: and therefore ſith he had béene abſent a long time, and yet refuſed to come among them, it was greatlie to their diſcomfort. To this the king (as we find) made this anſwer: Well, we doo perceiue that our people and commons go about to riſe againſt vs: wherefore we thinke we cannot doo better than to aſke aid of our couſine the French king, and rather ſubmit vs vnto him than to our owne ſubiects.

Abſence of the king from the parlement for the ſpace of 40 daies.

The kings anſwer.

The lords anſwered, that it ſhould not be good for him ſo to doo, but a waie rather to bring him into extreame danger, ſith it was plaine inough, that the French king was his ancient enimie and greateſt aduerſarie, who if he might once ſet foot in the realme of England, he would rather deſpoile and diſpoſſeſſe the king of his kingdome, than put his helping hand to relieue him. He might (they ſaid) call to remembrance, how his noble progenitour king Edward the third, his grandfather, and prince Edward his father had trauelled in heat and cold, with great anguiſh and troubles inceſſantlie, to make a conqueſt of France, that rightfullie apperteined vnto them, and now to him, in which wars he might likewiſe remember how manie lords, noble men, and good commons of both realmes had loſt their liues, and what charges both the realmes likewiſe bare in mainteining thoſe warres: and now (the more pitie) greater burthens were laid vpon the necks of the Engliſh ſubiects for the ſupportation of his charges, by reaſon whereof, they were ſo low brought (ſaid they) that they haue not to paie their rents, and ſo by ſuch meanes was his power decaied, his lords brought behind hand, and all his people ſore impoueriſhed. And as that king cannot be poore that hath rich people, ſo cannot he be rich that hath poore commons. And as he tooke hurt by ſuch inconueniences chancing through euill councellors that were about him, ſo the lords and noblemen ſuſteined no leſſe hurt each one after his eſtate and calling. And if remedie were not in time prouided through his helping hand, the realme muſt needs fall in ruine, and the default ſhould be imputed to him and to thoſe his euill councellors.

Wealth of the people is the glorie of the prince and ſuertie of his reigne.

By theſe and the like perſuaſions the king was induced to come to the parlement, and according to his appointment he came indeed. Soone after his comming was John Fortham biſhop of Durham diſcharged of his office of lord treaſuror, and in his place was appointed one John Gilbert biſhop of Hereford, that was a frier of the order of preachers, a man more eloquent than faithfull, as ſome reported of him. Alſo the earle of Suffolke was diſcharged of his office of lord chancellor, and Thomas Arundell biſhop of Elie placed in his roome, by whole conſent of parlement. The ſame earle of Suffolke was charged with manie & verie great enormious crimes, frauds, falſhoods, and treſons, which he had practiſed, to the great preiudice of the king and realme, and therevpon was committed to ward in the caſtell of Windſore. Notwithſtanding they adiudged him not to death (as ſome write) nor diſgraded him of the honor of knighthood, but condemned him to paie a fine of twentie thouſand marks, and alſo to forfeit one thouſand pounds of yeerelie rents which he had purchaſed.

Change of officers by the parlement.

The earle of Suffolke greeuouſlie charged by the parlement houſe for ſundrie offenſes.

But other write, that notwithſtanding the king was ſore offended for the accuſations brought againſt the ſaid earle of Suffolke and others, whome he loued, and was loth to heare anie euill of: yet he was conſtreined at length, after he had ſhifted off the matter by ſundrie deuiſes, to appoint certeine perſons with full power and authoritie to heare, and in iudgement to determine thoſe matters. The duke of Gloceſter therfore, and the earle of Arundell were appointed as iudges; which (whileſt the king as yet was abſent, who got him forth of the waie of purpoſe, bicauſe he would not be preſent at the condemnation of thoſe whome he moſt entierlie loued and fauoured) went earneſtlie in hand with their buſineſſe, and ſo at length (as Walſingham ſaith) the earle of Suffolke was conuicted, & found giltie of ſundrie crimes, treſpaſſes, and naughtie parts: for which it was thought that he deſerued to loſe his life & goods, but yet he was ſuffered (as the ſame Walſingham ſaith) to go abroad vnder ſuertie, certeine great men being bound for him in great ſums of monie. But what order ſoeuer was taken for the puniſhment of him, ſure it is he was diſplaced from his office of chancellorſhip, as before yee haue heard.

Furthermore, the lords, and other eſtates in this parlement, conſidering that through couetouſneſſe of the new depoſed officers, the kings treaſure had beene imbezeled, lewdlie waſted, & prodigallie ſpent, nothing to his profit: there were in this parlement thirteene lords choſen, to haue ouerſight vnder the king of the whole gouernment of the realme, as by their commiſſion in the ſtatutes of the tenth yeare of this king it doth in the booke of ſtatutes at large appeare. Of thoſe thirteene there were three of the new officers named, as the biſhop of Elie lord chancellor, the biſhop of Hereford lord treaſuror, and Nicholas abbat of Waltham lord keeper of the priuie ſeale: the other ten were theſe, William archbiſhop of Canturburie, Alexander archbiſhop of Yorke, Edmund Langlie duke of Yorke, Thomas duke of Gloceſter, William biſhop of Wincheſter, Thomas biſhop of Exceſter, Richard earle of Arundell, Richard lord Scroope, and John lord Debereux. But this participation of the gouernement fell out to be inconuenient, as by proceſſe of the ſtorie ſhall appeare, euen to thoſe vnto whome it was allotted: ſo that no ſmall a doo happened among them and their partakers: according to the old prouerbe, which ſaith;

Thirteene lords appointed by parlement to haue the gouernement of the realme vnder the king.

Væ ſibi quando canes veniunt os rodere plures.

Moreouer, at the kings inſtance and earneſt ſute it was granted, that Robert de Veer late marqueſſe of Dubline, and now newlie created duke of Ireland, ſhould haue and receiue to his owne vſe thirtie thouſand marks, that the Frenchmen were to giue for the heires of the lord Charles de Blois, that remained here in England, which Charles in times paſt chalenged as his rightfull inheritance the dutchie of Britaine, againſt the earle of Montfort. This grant was made to the duke of Ireland, with condition, that being furniſhed with this monie, he ſhould paſſe ouer into Ireland, before the next Eaſter, there to recouer ſuch lands as the king had giuen to him. For aſwell the lords as the commons were ſo deſirous to haue him gone, that they wiſhed the realme rather to ſpare ſo much treaſure, than to haue his preſence about the king, to allure him to follie. The ſame time the king of Armenia ſued for a ſafe conduct to come againe ouer into this land, to ſpeake with the king as it had been about the mouing of ſome peace betwixt the two realms of England and France; but ſith his meaning was ſuſpected to be to no good end, but to benefit himſelfe by receiuing of ſome great gifts at the kings bountifull hands, his ſute was not granted.

The king of Armenia ſueth for a ſafe conduct to come into England which is denied him.

In this meane time alſo, whileſt the French king with ſuch a companie of dukes, earls and other lords, as had not beene heard of, ſtill continued in Flanders, ſtaieng as well for a conuenient wind, as for the comming of the duke of Berrie; it chanced that certeine Engliſh ſhips, as they waſted the ſeas, met with two of the French ſhips, that were ſailing towards Sluis, and fighting with them, tooke them, and brought them both to Sandwich. There was found aboord the ſame ſhips, a maiſter gunner, that ſometime had ſerued the Engliſhmen at Calis, when ſir Hugh Caluerlie was lieutenant there; alſo diuerſe great guns and engins to beat downe wals were found and taken in the ſame ſhips, with a great quantitie of powder that was more worth than all the reſt.

Two of the Frẽch kings ſhips taken with a great prize in them.

Guns were inuented little more than ſix yeares before this time, to wit, An. 1380.

About the ſame time, or rather ſomewhat before, the Engliſhmen alſo tooke certeine hulks and ſix carikes of the Genowais, laden with great riches: but bicauſe they were merchants, they found ſuch fauor at the kings hands through means of Michaell de la Poole then lord chancellor (whome they had made their freend) that they had their veſſels and all their goods reſtored, and ſtreightwaies they paſſed with the ſame vnto Sluis, where the enimies laie, to make ſale of their wares there. Wherevpon much murmuring roſe among the kings ſubiects, taking it in euill part, that they ſhould be ſuffered ſo to go their waies to releeue the enimies of the realme, with ſuch goods as were once brought into the Engliſhmens poſſeſſion, and ſpeciallie the lord chancellor was verie euill thought of, for ſhewing ſo much fauour vnto thoſe ſtrangers.

Reſtitution of merchants goods taken.

The French fleet ſetting forward towards England is driuen backe by contrarie winds.

The French king ſtill remaining in Flanders, tarieng for the comming of the duke of Berrie, and alſo for a conuenient wind, at length on the euen of All ſaints, the wind came about very fauourablie for the Frenchmens purpoſe: wherevpon they weied anchors, and lanched from the hauen of Sluis, but they were not paſt twentie miles forward on their way, when the wind ſuddenlie turned contrarie to their courſe againe, and brought them backe with ſuch violence, that diuerſe of them as they ſhould enter the hauen, were broken and bruſed, and ſo by this occaſion, and the counſell of the duke of Berrie togither, the French king brake vp his iournie for that yeare, and returned into France. ¶ Ye haue heard what was doone by the ſtates aſſembled in parlement againſt the earle of Suffolke, whom the moſt part of the realme ſo greatlie hated, but yet neuertheleſſe, the king had ſuch an affection towards him, that immediatlie after the parlement was diſſolued, he vndid all that had béene enacted againſt him, receiuing him into more familiaritie than before, and cauſed him to continue with the duke of Ireland, and Alexander Neuill archbiſhop of Yorke, which two lords trauelled moſt earneſtlie to moue the king againſt the other lords, and to diſannull all that had béene doone in the laſt parlement.

The kings inordinate affection towards the duke of Ireland and the earle of Suffolke.

There increaſed therefore in the king an inward hatred, which he conceiued againſt the lords, theſe men putting into his eare, that he was like no king but rather reſembled the ſhadow of one; ſaieng, it would come to paſſe that he ſhould be able to doo nothing of himſelfe, if the lords might inioy the authoritie which they had taken vpon them. The king gaue credit to theſe tales, and therefore had the lords in great gelouſie, notwithſtanding they were thought to be his moſt true and faithfull ſubiects, and the other craftie, deceitfull, and vntruſtie; but ſuch an affection had the king to them, that no informations, nor accuſations, though neuer ſo manifeſtlie prooued, could bring them out of his fauour, in ſo much as at the feaſt of Chriſtmaſſe next following, he cauſed the earle of Suffolke to ſit with him at his owne table, in robes accuſtomablie appointed for kings to weare, and not for meaner eſtates, which was much noted, and no little increaſed the enuie againſt him.

The earle of Arundell goeth to the ſea with 500 men of armes and a thouſand archers as Froiſſard noteth.

About the beginning of March in this tenth yéere, Richard earle of Arundell, being appointed lord admerall, & Thomas Mowbraie earle of Notingham, the earle of Deuonſhire, and the biſhop of Norwich (as Froiſſard ſaith) went to the ſea with a warlike power of men of armes and archers, ſo well trimmed and appointed as was poſſible. For the lord admerall vnderſtanding that the duke of Gloceſter, and manie other noblemen would ſée the muſter of his men, vſed all diligence, and ſpared for no coſts, to haue the moſt choiſeſt and pikedſt fellowes that might be gotten, not following the euill example of others in times paſt, which receiued tag and rag to fill vp their numbers, whom they hired for ſmall wages, and reſerued the reſidue to their purſſes. And when to the aduancement of the realms commoditie they ſhould haue incountered the enimies, they ſhifted off all occaſions thereto, and onelie prolonged time, without atchiuing any enterpriſe auaileable, to the end they might receiue the whole wages, and kéepe themſelues from danger, which they ſhould hardlie haue auoided, when they had not about them ſuch able men as were like to match the enimies: but the earle of Arundell contrarilie got the ableſt men he might, not ſparing his owne purſſe, to the end that by their ſeruice he might atchiue ſome worthie enterpriſe, to redound vnto the commoditie of his countrie.

A great abuſe in choiſe of ſouldiers.

After the duke of Gloceſter had beheld ſo faire and choſen a power of men of warre, they were ſtreightwaies appointed to get them on ſhipbord, & ſo being imbarked, the whole nauie paſſed forth to the Thams mouth, where they ſtaied to watch for the fléet of Flanders, that was readie to come from Rochell with wines. At length, vpon a ſundaie, being the euen of the Annuntiation of our ladie, the Flemiſh fléet was diſcouered a good way off, by one that was mounted into one of the tops of a ſhip of the Engliſh fléet. The earle of Arundell greatlie reioiſing at thoſe newes, forthwith with his whole fléet made to the ſea. When the Flemings approched néere to our nauie, they made ſaile, as if they would ſet vpon the ſame; and our men of purpoſe made countenance as if they would haue retired, as miſtruſting themſelues to be able to match their aduerſaries, who coueting rather a ſafe paſſage than battell, paſſed by: but the Engliſhmen hauing once got the wind fit for their purpoſe, ſuddenlie ſet vpon the Flemiſh ſhips, and fought with them right fiercelie: at length, after a ſore conflict which indured foure houres, the victorie fell to the Engliſhmen.

There were taken fourescore ſhips, with diuerſe capteins and men of armes, namelie their chiefe admerall, named Iohn Buicke, a perfect good ſeaman, and one that had aforetime doone much hurt to the Engliſh nation. Diuerſe of their ſhips were bouged, and ſome eſcaped from the battell. But the earle of Arundell purſued them ſo egerlie for the ſpace of two daies togither, that at length he tooke them, and brought them backe to his nauie, ſo that what in the battell and in the chaſe, there were taken of great and ſmall, to the number of an hundred veſſels, all fraught with wines, ſo that there was found aboord the ſame nine thouſand tuns, or rather (as other ſaie) ninetéene thouſand, which togither with the veſſels were ſtreight ſent vnto Orwell hauen, and to other hauens abroad in the realme, beſide that which fell to the kings ſhare, as due to him by his prerogatiue. Part of the Flemiſh fléet eſcaping (as before ye haue heard) was purſued vnto the hauen of Sluis and Blankerke.

The citizens of Middleburgh came to the earle, and requeſted him that they might buie thoſe wines of him, and paie for the ſame after the rate of an hundred ſhillings the tunne, alledging how they were the kings fréends, and ſtood in néed of wines: but the earle of Arundell, thinking it more reaſon that thoſe which had borne the charges of his iournie, to wit, the commons of the realme of England ſhould haue the commoditie thereof than any other, he denied their ſute. But yet to ſhew them ſome pleaſure as his fréends, he gaue them twentie tuns to make merrie with. As for that which fell to the earles ſhare, he vſed ſuch bountifulneſſe in beſtowing it among his fréends, that he left not to himſelfe ſo much as one tunne. He wan therefore no ſmall praiſe, that forbearing his owne commoditie, which he might haue reaped in ſelling thoſe wines to ſtrangers, he had more regard to the profit of the commons, whereby they might vnderſtand, that that which they had laid forth towards the ſetting forward of his iournie, was not altogither loſt nor caſt awaie. By this meanes (beſides the commendation which he drew to himſelfe) he alſo wan the harts & good will of the people, whoſe fréendſhip is purchaſed by gifts and good déeds, ſith they make profit the metrod of amitie, & bound in beneuolence with receiued benefits, as the poet ſaith,

The liberalitie of the earle of Arundell.

Vulgus amicitias vtilitate probat.

All the countrie of Flanders néere to the ſea coaſts, was in great feare: for the Engliſhmen landed, and euerie day went abroad into the countrie, burning diuerſe townes and villages, as Mude, Oſtburge, Houckam, Monachacedam, & others. And at length, after they had taken their pleaſure in the countrie, Diuers rodes made into Flanders by the Engliſhmen, & great ſpoile doone.

for the ſpace of ten daies togither, they hoiſſed vp ſailes, and returned with all their preie and booties, which being ſold, and vttered abroad in the realme, made wine ſo plentifullie here in England, that it was ſold for thirteene ſhillings foure pence the tun, and twentie ſhillings the beſt and choiſeſt. The earle of Arundell not ſatiſfied with this happie atchiued enterpriſe, but minding to doo more ſeruice to the benefit of his countrie, gathered his ſhips together, and hiring new ſouldiers to ſupplie the roomes of them that were hurt, maimed, or ſlaine, turned his ſailes towards the caſtell of Breſt, which ſeemed to be a keie to the leſſe Britaine, and being (as yee haue heard) in the Engliſhmens poſſeſſion, the Frenchmen were about to raiſe vp and build farre greater and ſtronger baſtillions, than thoſe were that the duke of Lancaſter had taken and deſtroied, as he ſailed forward on his iournie toward Spaine.

wine ſold for thirteene ſhillings foure pence the tun.

The earle of Arundell ſaileth into Britaine with a great power.

One of theſe two new baſtiles the earle of Arundell woone by force from them that kept it: and bicauſe it ſeemed neceſſarie to be kept for a defenſe to the caſtell, if it were in the Engliſhmens hands, he committed it to the cuſtodie of certeine Engliſhmen. The other being not yet finiſhed, but begun in ſumptuous wiſe to be builded, he ſet on fire and burned. This doone, furniſhing the gariſon with ſufficient vittels and munition to ſerue them for one whole yeare, he returned home into England, with great praiſe and commendation of the commons for his doings. But the duke of Ireland, the earle of Suffolke, ſir Simon de Burlie, and ſir Richard Sturrie, that ſtill continued about the king, ſeemed rather to enuie the earle of Arundels good name, than otherwiſe to commend him and others to the king, that had beene forth in that iournie, in ſo much that when the earle of Nottingham, otherwiſe called earle Marſhall, that had beene euer the kings plaifellow, and of equall age to him, came now to the court, hoping to be right welcome, and to receiue great thankes at the kings hands, he had no good countenance ſhewed vnto him, neither of the king, nor of the duke of Ireland, who diſdaining once to talke with him, ſeemed to enuie the worthie prowesse in other, which he knew defectiue and wanting in himſelfe.

Enuie þ follower of vertue & prowesse

Shortlie after, by the counſell of thoſe lords and knights that remained about the king, the lord Henrie Percie, ſonne to the earle of Northumberland, was ſent to the ſeas, to beate backe the attempts of the enimies, but he was ſlenderlie appointed to atchiue anie great enterpriſe. This was doone of ſome enuious purpoſe, bicauſe he had got a name amongeſt the common people, to be a verie hardie and valiant gentleman, as well among Engliſhmen, as Scots. But he either ignorant, or not much waieng of that which they craftilie had imagined againſt him, boldlie and valiantlie executed the buſineſſe inioined him, and hauing remained abroad, during the whole time of his appointed ſeruice, returned ſafelie home. ¶ About the ſame time, a frier Carmelite, named Walter Diſſe, that had beene confeſſor to the duke of Lancaſter, obteined in fauour of the ſame duke, at pope Vrbans hands, certeine faculties, to be diſtributed to ſuch as would praie & paie for them. Among other of thoſe faculties, one was, to make all thoſe whome he thought good, the popes chapleines, according to forme of law, and the cuſtome vſed in the court of Rome.

The lord Percie ſent to the ſeas.

Now bicauſe ſuch as obteined this fauour, inioied great liberties, manie were glad to beſtow largelie, to be ſo preferred, the frier being redie to admit thoſe that offered moſt. Among other, one Peter Pateſhull, a frier of the Auguſtines order, was made by him the popes chapleine, a man not vnlearned, and one that fauoured Wicliffes doctrine, and therevpon forſaking his priuate profeſſion, gaue himſelfe to a publike trade of life, which might ſeeme to him more holie, commendable, and ſure. Heerevpon, he tooke vpon him to preach againſt his owne order, namelie in a ſermon which he made in ſaint Chriſtophers church in London. He inueied ſo earneſtlie againſt the abuſes and heinous crimes which the friers, ſometimes his brethren, vſed to put in practiſe, that it was an horror to heare. There were preſent an hundred at the leaſt of Wicliffes opinion at his ſermon. Now in the meane while that he ſo laid forth what he knew againſt his late brethren, ſome perſons there were that ran to the Auguſtine friers, and declared the whole matter; wherevpon a dozen of the hardieſt and luſtieſt fellowes among them came to the church, where this Pateſhull was preaching, and hearing what was ſaid, they began to be ſore mooued, inſomuch that one of them more zealous in his religion than the other, ſtepped forth, and gaineſaid thoſe things which the preacher proponed.

Frier Pateſhull forſaking his profeſſion, preacheth openlie againſt his owne order.

Wickleuiſts.

When the Wicleuiſts perceiued this, they ſet vpon him that ſo diſquieted the congregation, and laieng hands on him, threw him downe, trode him vnder their feet, and lent him manie a good buffet: and chaſing all the other friers awaie, they were fullie bent to haue killed them, and ſet their houſe on fier, crieng out with lowd voices; Let vs deſtroie theſe murtherers, let vs burne theſe Sodomits, and hang vp ſuch traitors of the king and realme. And running thus with ſuch a furious noiſe and outrage, they purpoſed verelie to haue ſet fire on the friers lodgings, but that through the humble praier of frier Thomas Aſhborne, and one that was his fellow, being reputed for two good men, and doctors of diuinitie, they were ſtaied. The comming alſo of one of the ſhiriffes of London holpe much to appeaſe them, ſo that by his perſuaſion, they returned home to their houſes. But Peter Pateſhull, being mainteined among them, was counſelled, ſith he was interrupted in his ſermon, to ſet downe in writing all ſuch matters as he was about to intreat of, & what he knew further. He therefore deuiſed a libell, in which he accuſed diuerſe of his brethren, of murthering ſundrie of their fellowes.

A libell by frier Pateſhull againſt his brethren.

And for more proofe to be giuen to his ſaiengs, he told the names of them that were made awaie, and the names alſo of the murtherers, and ſhewed where thoſe that were murthered were buried. He affirmed further, that the ſaid friers his brethren of late, were Sodomits and traitors, both to the king and realme, and manie other things he declared (too too bad) in that his writing or libell which he faſtned vpon the church doore of S. Paule in London, that the more confuſion might thereby redound vnto his late brethren, the friers aforeſaid. In the beginning of the ſame libell he proteſted, that he was got forth of the diuels dungeon, and through the grace of God eſcaped from amongſt wicked and filthie perſons; by reaſon whereof, and for that he was an auoucher of the veritie, he ſaid, he was ſure to ſuffer great aduerſities at the friers hands, if they might laie hold on him. But he thanked pope Vrbane, for that through his grant he had obteined ſuch libertie, that by help of his freends, he might lawfullie withdrawe himſelfe from the hands of his enimies.

There were diuerſe men of good worſhip that mainteined this Pateſhull, and cauſed a tranſcript of this libell to be written forth, affirming all to be true that was therein mentioned. Amongſt other that thus fauoured this cauſe, were diuerſe knights, as ſir William Neuill, Sir Lewes Clifford, ſir Iohn Clanbowe, ſir Richard Sturrie, and ſir Thomas Latimer, and the cheefeſt of all was one ſir Iohn Montacute, tacute, who cauſed all the images to be taken downe and ſet aſide in corners, which Iohn Aubreie, and his ſucceſſour ſir Alane Burhull, or any their anceſtors had ſet vp in their chappell of Cheneleie. ¶ About the ſame time, the duke of Ireland ſought to be diuorſed from his lawfull wiſe, a trim yoong ladie, daughter to the ladie Iſabell, that was one of king Edward the third his daughters; and tooke to wiſe one Lancegrone a Bohemer one of the quéenes maids; by reaſon whereof, great occaſion of ſlander and reproch grew, and diuerſe lords, ſpeciallie the duke of Gloceſter, that was vncle to the ladie that was forſaken, tooke great diſpleaſure herewith. But ſith the king allowed of all the duke of Irelands dooings, the duke of Gloceſter diſſembled ſuch iniuries doone to his néece for the time, till opportunitie might ſerue to reuenge the ſame.

The fauourers of frier Pateſhull.

The duke of Ireland vnderſtood all theſe things, and therefore was the more circumſpect for his owne ſafetie, and ſtudied how by ſome meanes he might diſpatch the duke of Gloceſter out of the waie, as the man whom he moſt feared; leaſt his life ſhould be his deſtruction, by one means or other. Eaſter was now paſt, the time (as ye haue heard) appointed before the which the duke of Ireland ſhould haue tranſported ouer into Ireland, & yet was he not ſet forward. But leaſt ſomewhat might be thought in the matter, and for feare of ſome ſtir to be raiſed by the lords of the realme, that wiſhed him gone, according to the order preſcribed at the laſt parlement, the king as it were to bring him to the water ſide, went with him into Wales, where being out of the waie, they might deuiſe how to diſpatch the duke of Gloceſter, the earles of Arundell, Warwike, Derbie, and Notingham, with others of that faction. There were with the king, beſide the duke of Ireland, Michaell de la Poole earle of Suffolke, Robert Triſilian lord chiefe iuſtice, and diuers other, which doubtfull of their owne ſafegards did what they could (as writers report) to moue the king forward to the deſtruction of thoſe noblemen. After the king had remained in thoſe parties a good while, he returned, and brought the duke of Ireland backe with him againe ſo that it ſéemed his voiage into Ireland was now quite forgotten.

Diſſention betwixt the king & the nobles.

Anno Reg. 11.

Grafton.

About the ſame time, Robert Triſilian lord chiefe iuſtice of England came to Couentrie, and indicted there two thouſand perſons. The king and the quéene came to Grobie, and thither came by his commandement the iuſtices of the realme. There were alſo with him at the ſame time, Alexander archb. of Yorke, Robert Veere duke of Ireland, Michaell de la Poole earle of Suffolke, Robert Triſilian, & his fellowes; of whom it was demanded, if by the lawes of the realme the king might reuoke the ordinances made in the laſt parlement, to the which he had giuen his conſent in manner by conſtraint; and they made anſwer that he might. Then were the iuſtices commanded to come vnto Notingham, where the king appointed to méet them, and thither he came according to his appointment, and held a ſolemne councell in the caſtell of Notingham, the morrow after S. Bartholomews day.

Certeine queſtions in law demanded of the iuſtices.

A councell holden at Notingham.

In this councell were the aforeſaid archbiſhop of Yorke, the duke of Ireland, the earle of Suffolke, Robert Triſilian iuſtice, Robert Bramble iuſtice, and ſundrie other, all which iuſtices were commanded to ſet their hands vnto the queſtion vnder written, that by meanes thereof, thoſe perſons that were about the king thought they might haue good occaſion to put the duke of Gloceſter, and other lords that were his complices vnto death, which in the laſt parlement were ordeined to haue the gouernance of the realme, and all ſuch as were conſenting to the ſame. Diuerſe of the iuſtices refuſed to ſubſcribe, but yet they were conſtreined to doo as the reſt did, among the which was Iohn Belknap, who vtterlie refuſed, till the duke of Ireland, and the earle of Suffolke compelled him thereto; for if he had perſiſted in the refuſall, he had not eſcaped their hands, and yet when he had ſet to his ſeale, he burſt out into theſe words; Now (ſaid he) here lacketh nothing but a rope, that I might receiue a reward worthie for my deſert, and I know, if I had not doone this, I might not haue eſcaped your hands, ſo that for your pleaſures and the kings I haue doone it, and deſerued thereby death at the hands of the lords. Which indéed ſhortlie followed, for in the next parlement he was condemned and executed. All this remained in record.

Iuſtice Belknap compelled to ſubſcribe.

Iuſtice Belknaps words.

An act of councell touching this matter, in manner as followeth.

Memorandum that on the fiue and twentith day of Auguſt, in the 11 yeare of the reigne of king Richard the ſecond, at the caſtell of Notingham aforeſaid, Robert Triſilian lord chiefe iuſtice of England, Robert Belknap lord chiefe iuſtice of the cōmon pléas, Iohn Holt, Roger Fulthorpe, & William Borough, knights and aſſociats of the ſaid Robert Belknap, and Iohn Lockton one of the kings ſergeants at the law, being perſonalie required in preſence of the lords and other witneſſes vnder written by our ſaid ſoueraigne lord the king, in that faith and allegiance in which to him they were bounden, that they ſhould trulie anſwer to certeine queſtions vnderwritten, and vpon the ſame by their diſcretions, to ſaie the law.

Additions to Polychron.

1 Firſt, it was aſked of them, whether the new ſtatute, ordinance, and commiſſion made in the laſt parlement held at Weſtminſter, be hurtfull to the kings prerogatiue. Whereunto all of one mind anſwered, that they were hurtfull, and ſpeciallie bicauſe they be againſt the kings will.

Queſtions in law demanded of the iuſtices.

2 Item, it was inquired of them, how they ought to be puniſhed, that procured the ſaid ſtatute, ordinance, and commiſſion to be made. Whereunto with one aſſent they anſwered, that they deſerued death, except the king of his grace would pardon them.

3 Item, it was inquired, how they ought to be puniſhed, which moued the king to conſent to the making of the ſaid ſtatute, ordinance, and commiſſion. Whereunto they anſwered, that vnleſſe the king would giue them his pardon, they ought to loſe their liues.

4 Item, it was inquired of them what puniſhment they deſerued, that compelled the king to the making of that ſtatute, ordinance and commiſſion. Whereunto they gaue anſwer, that they ought to ſuffer as traitors.

5 Item, it was demanded of them how they ought to be puniſhed that interrupted the king ſo, that he might not exerciſe thoſe things that apperteined to his regalitie and prerogatiue. Whereunto anſwer was made, that they ought to be puniſhed niſhed as traitors.

6 Item, it was inquired of them, whether that after the affaires of the realme, and the cauſe of the calling togither of the ſtates of the parlement, were once by the kings commandement declared and opened, and other articles on the kings behalfe limited, vpon which the lords and commons of the realme ought to intreat and proceed; if the lords neuertheles would proceed vpon other articles, and not meddle with thoſe articles which the king had limited, till time the king had anſwered the articles propoſed by them, notwithſtanding the king inioined them to the contrarie: whether in this caſe the king might rule the parlement, and cauſe them to proceed vpon the articles by him limited, before they proceeded any further? To which queſtion it was anſwered, that the king ſhould haue in this part the rule, for order of all ſuch articles to be proſecuted, vntill the end of the parlement. And if any preſumed to go contrarie to this rule, he was to be puniſhed as a traitor.

7 Item, it was asked, whether the king when ſoeuer it pleaſed him might not diſſolue the parlement, and command the lords and commons to depart from thence or not? Whereunto it was anſwered that he might.

8 Item, it was inquired, that for ſomuch as it was in the king to remooue ſuch iuſtices and officers as offend, and to puniſh them for their offenſes; whether the lords commons might, without the kings will, impeach the ſame officers and iuſtices, vpon their offenſes in parlement or not? To this anſwer was made, that they might not, and he that attempted contrarie, was to ſuffer as a traitor.

9 Item, it was inquired, how he is to be puniſhed, that mooued in the parlement, that the ſtatute wherin Edward, the ſonne of king Edward, great grandfather to the king that now is, was indicted in parlement, might be ſent for; by inſpection of which ſtatute, the ſaid new ſtatute or ordinance and commiſſion were conceiued, and deuiſed in the parlement?

To which queſtion, with one accord, as in all the reſidue they anſwered, that as well he that ſo ſummoned, as the other, which by force of the ſame motion, brought the ſaid ſtatute into the parlement houſe, be as publike offendors and traitors to be puniſhed.

10 Item, it was inquired of them, whether the iudgement giuen in the parlement againſt Michaell de la Poole earle of Suffolke, were erronious and reuocable, or not?

To which queſtion likewiſe with one aſſent they ſaid, that if the ſame iudgement were now to be giuen, the iuſtices and ſergeant aforeſaid would not giue the ſame: bicauſe it ſeemed to them, that the ſaid iudgement is reuocable and erronious in euerie part.

In witneſſe of the premiſſes, the iuſtices & ſergeant aforeſaid to theſe preſents haue ſet their ſeals, theſe being witneſſes; Alexander archbiſhop of Yorke, Robert archbiſhop of Dubline, Iohn biſhop of Durham, Thomas biſhop of Cheſter, Iohn biſhop of Bangor, Robert duke of Ireland, Michaell erle of Suffolke, Iohn Ripon clearke, and Iohn Blake.

Thom. Walſ.

Now beſide theſe iuſtices and ſergeant, there were called at that preſent vnto Notingham, all other iuſtices of the realme, and the ſhiriffes. Alſo, diuerſe of the citie of London, which the king knew would incline to his will, the rather; for that ſome of them, hauing aforetime confeſſed treaſon againſt the king by them imagined, and obteining pardon for the ſame, were readie at his commandement, to recompenſe ſuch fauour, in the accompliſhment of whatſoeuer they knew might ſtand with his pleaſure. Hereupon, they being impanelled to inquire of certeine treaſons that were ſuppoſed to be committed by the lords, which in the laſt parlement had ſo cauſed things to paſſe, contrarie to the kings pleaſure, indicted the ſame lords of manie crimes informed againſt them. ¶ The Londoners indeed were euill reported of in thoſe daies, by ſome writers, for their vnſtableneſſe, one while holding on the kings part, and with ſuch as were cheefe in counſell about him; and an other while on the lords ſide that were of a contrarie faction: according as the ſtreame of their affections draue them, and as they were carried awaie perforce by the floud of their variable willes, whereby they were diuided into differing paſſions, as they were aſſaulted by ſundrie and vncerteine deſires: which is the nature of the people, as the poet noteth, ſaieng:

The lords indicted of diuerſe offenſes.

Scinditur incertum ſtudia in contraria vulgus.

But now, as concerning the cauſe whie the ſhiriffes were called hither, it was cheeflie to vnderſtand what power of men they might aſſure the king of, to ſerue him againſt the lords and barons, whome he tooke to be his enimies: and further, that where he meant to call a parlement verie ſhortlie, they ſhould ſo vſe the matter, that no knight might be choſen, but ſuch as the king and his councell ſhould name. But anſwer was made hereunto by the ſhiriffes, that the lords were ſo highlie beloued of the commons, that it laie not in their powers to aſſemble any great forces againſt the lords; and as for chooſing the knights of the ſhires, they ſaid that the commons would vndoubtedlie vſe their ancient liberties, and priuileges, in chooſing ſuch as they thought meeteſt. But yet, after that the indictments were found, according to the deſire of the king and his councellors, and that thoſe which had beene called about this matter, were licenced to depart home; the king and the duke of Ireland ſent meſſengers into euerie part of the realme, to reteine men of warre to aſſiſt them in the quarell againſt the lords, if need were. Manie made anſwer, that ſith they knew the lords to be faithfull and loiall to the king, euen from the bottome of their hearts, and were readie to ſtudie, to deuiſe, and to doo all things that might tend to his honor, and wealth of the realme; they might not by anie meanes beare armour againſt them. But a great number of other, that tooke it that they were reteined for a good and neceſſarie purpoſe, promiſed to be readie, whenſoeuer it ſhould pleaſe the king to ſend for them.

Why the ſhiriffes of all ſhires were ſent for to the court.

Soldiers reteined on all ſides by the king againſt the lords.

The lords being in this meane while aduertiſed of theſe doings, were ſtriken with great heauineſſe, for that not knowing themſelues (as they tooke it) giltie of anie offenſe, the king ſhould thus ſeeke their deſtruction. Herewith the duke of Gloceſter, meaning to

The duke of Gloceſters proteſtation vpon his oth.

to mitigate the kings diſpleaſure, receiued a ſolemne oth before the biſhop of London, and diuerſe other lords, proteſting by the ſame oth, that he neuer imagined, nor went about any thing, to the kings hinderance, but to his power had alwaies doone what he might to aduance the kings honor, proſperous ſtate and good liking, except onelie that he had giuen no good countenance to the duke of Ireland, whom the king ſo much loued. And ſuerlie for that the ſaid duke had diſhonored his kinſwoman, and the kings alſo, he was firmelie determined to reuenge that iniurie vpon him; and herewith he beſought the biſhop of London to declare what his words were vnto the king.

Stout words of the biſhop of London.

The biſhop comming to the king, made report of the duke of Gloceſters proteſtation, confirmed with his oth, in ſuch wiſe, as the king began ſomewhat to be perſuaded that it was true. But when the earle of Suffolke perceiued that, fearing leaſt the reconciliation of the king and the duke his vncle ſhould turne to his vndoing, he began to ſpeake againſt the duke, till the biſhop bad him hold his peace; and told him, that it nothing became him to ſpeake at all. And when the earle aſked why ſo; Bicauſe (ſaid the biſhop) thou waſt in the laſt parlement condemned for an euill perſon, and one not worthie to liue, but onelie it pleaſeth the king to ſhew thée fauour. The king offended with the biſhops preſumptuous words, commanded him to depart & get him home to his church, who forthwith departed, and declared to the duke of Gloceſter what he had heard and ſéene. Herevpon, the great miſliking that had béene afore time betwixt the king and the lords, was now more vehementlie increaſed, the duke of Ireland, the earle of Suffolke, the archbiſhop of Yorke, the lord chiefe iuſtice Robert Triſilian, and others, ſtill procuring, ſtirring, and confirming the kings heauie diſpleaſure againſt the lords.

The lords confer how to preuẽt the perils pretended againſt them.

The earle of Northumberland ſent to apprehend the earle of Arundell.

The duke of Gloceſter conſidering to what concluſion theſe things tended, came ſecretlie to conference with the earles of Arundell, Warwike, and Derbie, who were in like danger, if they prouided not more ſpéedilie for their ſafetie, wherevpon he diſcouered to them the perill wherein they all ſtood in common, ſo that when they weied what was the moſt expedient meane to ſafe gard their liues, they gathered their power togither, determining to talke with the king with their armour vpon their backes, for their more ſuertie, as well concerning his pretenſe to bring them to their deaths, as for the fauour which he bare to thoſe whom they reputed to be traitors, both to him, and to the whole ſtate of the realme, whereby the ſame could not auoid ſpéedie ruine, if remedie were not the ſooner prouided. The king on the other part tooke aduiſe, how he might apprehend theſe lords (whom he tooke to be plaine traitors) ech one apart, before they might gather their ſtrengths about them; and firſt, he ſent the earle of Northumberland and others, vnto the caſtell of Reigate, to take the earle of Arundell, who laie there at that preſent. But howſoeuer it fortuned, the earle of Northumberland came backe, and failed to accompliſh that which he had in commandement.

The earle of Arundell ioineth with the other lords.

After this, a great number were ſent by night, to haue laid hands on him, and to haue brought him to the kings preſence; or in caſe he reſiſted, to haue ſlaine him, if by any meanes they might: but he being warned by a meſſenger, that came to him from the duke of Gloceſter, conueied himſelfe awaie, and with ſuch bands as he had got togither, rode all that night, ſo that in the morning hauing paſſed thirtie miles, not without great trauell, and all ſpéed poſſible, he was in the morning aduanced to Haringie parke, where he found the duke of Gloceſter, and the earle of Warwike, with a great power of men about them. ¶ At the ſame time the king was about to ſet forward towards Canturburie, there to performe ſome vow of pilgrimage, which he had vndertaken to make vnto the ſhrine of Thomas Becket. But a brute was raiſed, and a ſlander (belike) contriued, to bring him in further hatred of his ſubiects, that he meant to ſteale ouer into France, vnto the French king, hauing promiſed to deliuer vp into his hands the towne of Calis, with the caſtell of Guines, and all the fortreſſes which his predeceſſors had poſſeſſed in thoſe parties, either by right from their anceſtors, or by warlike conqueſt.

Councell taken how to deale againſt the lords.

Howbeit this his iournie to Canturburie was ſuddenlie ſtaied, vpon knowledge had of the gathering togither of the lords in Haringie parke, wherewith the king being ſore amazed, called togither ſuch as he truſted, to vnderſtand what their opinion was of the matter; and vnderſtanding that the purpoſed intention of the lords, for which they were ſo aſſembled, was to this end (as they pretended) to bring him vnto a better trade of life, and more profitable order of gouernement, he was ſtreight ſtriken with no ſmall feare, demanding of them their aduiſe, what was beſt for him to doo in ſuch troubleſome ſtate of things. Some were of this mind, that it ſhould be beſt to ſéeke to appeaſe the lords with faire promiſes, aſſuring them, that they ſhould haue their deſires. Other thought it better to aſſemble the kings friends, and ioining them with the Londoners, to go forth and trie the hazard of battell with the lords. Among them that were of this mind, the archbiſhop of Yorke was the chiefeſt. But other that were thought to vnderſtand more of the world than he did, iudged it not wiſedome ſo to doo, conſidering that if the king loſt the field, then ſhould great harme and diſhonor follow; and if the victorie fell to his ſide, yet could he gaine naught, but loſe a great number of his ſubiects.

The lords ſend meſſengers to the king.

This was in Nouember, at what time the king, vpon his returning from Canturburie, meant to haue holden a parlement; but through thoſe ſtirs, neither his iournie to Canturburie, nor the parlement went forward: yet he cauſed order to be giuen, that no citizen of London ſhould ſell to the duke of Gloceſter, the earle of Arundell, or any other of the lords, any armour, bowes, arrowes, or other munition, or matter that might tend to the furniture of warre, vpon a great paine. But notwithſtanding, the lords went forward with their buſineſſe; and before they approched the citie of London, they ſent to the king the archbiſhop of Canturburie, the lord Iohn Louell, the lord Cobham, and the lord Iohn Deuereux, requiring to haue deliuered vnto them ſuch as were about him, that were traitors and ſeducers both of him and the realme, that ſought nothing elſe, but to trouble both poore and rich, and to ſow diſcord and variance betwixt the king and his nobles. And further, they declared that their comming was for the honor and wealth both of the king and realme.

A raſh anſwer of the maior of London.

But the king being ruled altogither by the duke of Ireland, the earle of Suffolke, and two or thrée other, was fullie perſuaded that the lords intended to bring him vnder their gouernement, and therfore he was counſelled to make the French king his ſure friend in all vrgent neceſſities. And to be aſſured of him, it was reported, that thoſe councellors aduiſed him to render vp into the French kings hands the towne of Calis, and all that he had elſe in poſſeſſion, on the further ſide of the ſea. Howſoeuer this matter went, truth it is, that the king ſent for the maior of London, requiring to know of him how manie able men they thought the citie could make. The maior anſwered, that he thought verely the citizens might make in time of néed, fiftie thouſand men, within an houres reſpit. Well ſaid the king, then I beſéech you go and proue what will be doone. But when the maior began to attempt the matter, he was anſwered generallie, that they would neuer fight againſt the kings fréends, and defenders of the realme (as indéed they tooke the lords to be) but againſt the enimies of the king and realme they would alwaies be readie to fight, and ſhew what reſiſtance they were able. This anſwer the maior reported to the king.

The Londoners refuſe to fight againſt the lords.

The earle of Northumberlands and the lord Baſſets words to the king in the behalfe of the lords.

At the ſame time there was about the king the lord Rafe Baſſet, who ſaid thus to the king flatlie and plainelie: Sir, I haue béene, and euer will be your true liege man, and my bodie and goods ſhall euer be at your graces commandement, in all iuſtice and trueth. But neuertheleſſe, hereof I aſſure you, that if my hap be to come into the field, I will without faile alwaies follow the true part; and it is not I that will aduenture to haue my head broken for the duke of Irelands pleaſure. Likewiſe, the earle of Northumberland, being at that time in the court, ſpake theſe words to the king; Sir, there is no doubt but theſe lords, who now be in the field, alwaies haue béene your true and faithfull ſubiects, and yet are, not intending to attempt anie thing againſt your ſtate, wealth, & honor. Neuertheleſſe, they féele themſelues ſore moleſted and diſquieted, by the wicked deuiſes of certeine perſons about you, that ſéeke to oppreſſe them. And verelie without faile, all your realme is ſore gréeued therewith, both great and ſmall, as well lords as commons; and I ſée not the contrarie, but they mind to aduenture their liues with the lords that are thus in armes, ſpeciallie in this caſe, which they reckon to be yours and your realmes. And ſir, now yée be in the chéefe place of your realme, and in the place of your coronation, order your ſelfe now therefore wiſelie and like a king. Send to them to come before your preſence in ſome publike place, where they may declare vnto you the intent and purpoſe of their comming, accompanied with ſo great a number of people into theſe parts, and I beléeue it verelie, they will ſhew ſuch reaſons that you will hold them excuſed.

The archbiſhop of Canturburie, and the lord chancellor biſhop of Elie, and other of the biſhops alſo there preſent, affirmed the earles aduiſe to be good. And the king conſidering wiſelie the caſe as it ſtood, began to be appeaſed, and accorded to follow their aduiſe, deſiring the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and the biſhop of Elie, to aduertiſe them of his pleſure, which was, that he willed them to come to him to Weſtminſter, on ſundaie then next following; and ſo they repairing to the lords, made report to them of the kings mind and purpoſe. But the duke of Gloceſter, and the other lords, were ſo fullie bent in their opinion, that they ſwore all whole togither, that they would neuer giue ouer their enterpriſe, ſo long as they had a penie to ſpend, in maintenance of their cauſe: and if it chanced anie of them to depart this life, the ouerliuers ſhould perſiſt therein, vntill the time that they had brought their purpoſe to ſome good effect.

The lords take an oth togither, to proſecute their purpoſed enterpriſe.

The lords ſéeke the fauour of the Londoners.

And bicauſe they doubted leaſt the king might ſtirre the citie of London againſt them, they determined firſt to aduertiſe the maior and the citie, how their comming was onlie to reforme certeine great enormities, which they ſet downe in writing, & ſent it to the maior and citizens, beſéeching them of their fauour and counſell therin. This doone, they determined yet to kéepe their daie on the ſundaie following, to appeare before the kings preſence: but this was not got of them, till that the lord chancellor, with diuerſe other noblemen of good credit, had vndertaken vpon their oths for the kings behalfe, that no fraud nor deceipt, no perill nor euill pretenſe ſhould be put in practiſe againſt the lords, wherby they might come to loſſe either of life, limme, or goods, or otherwiſe, through the kings means; but that if he ſhould go about anie ſuch things, the ſaid lord chancellor, and other the mediators ſhould forwarne the lords therof.

Thom. Walſ.

An ambuſh at Mewes.

When therefore the lords were readie, according to couenant, to come vnto Weſtminſter, they were ſecretlie aduertiſed, that there was an ambuſh laid in a place called the Mewes, and ſo they ſtaied, and came not at the appointed houre. Where vpon, when the king demanded, how it fortuned that the lords kept not promiſe, the biſhop of Elie lord Chancellor made him this anſwer; Bicauſe ſaith he, there is an ambuſh of a thouſand armed men or more laid in ſuch a place (and named it) contrarie to couenant, and therefore they neither come nor hold you for faithfull of your word. The king hearing this, was aſtonied, and ſaid with an oth, that he knew of no ſuch thing, & withall ſent to the ſhiriffes of London, commanding them to go to the Mewes, and (vpon ſearch made) if they found anie force of men there aſſembled, to take and kill all ſuch as they could laie hands vpon. But ſir Thomas Triuet, and ſir Nicholas Brambre, knight, that had in déed aſſembled ſuch a number of men, when they vnderſtood what order the king had giuen therein, they ſent their men backe to London.

The lords, after this, receiuing a ſafe conduct from the king, and perceiuing all to be ſafe and cleare, came vnto Weſtminſter with a ſtrong power of men about them. The king, when he heard they were come, apparelled himſelfe in his kinglie robes, and with his ſcepter in hand came into the great hall at Weſtminſter. The lords as ſoone as they had ſight of him, made to him their humble obeiſance, & went forth till they came to the nether ſteps, going vp to the kings ſeat of ſtate, where they made their ſecond obeiſance; & then the king gaue them countenance to come néerer to him, & they ſo did, knéeling downe before him, & forthwith he roſe from his place, and louinglie welcomming them, tooke each of them by the hand, and that doone ſate him downe againe. Herewith the biſhop of Elie lord chancellor, as mouth to the king, declared vnto theſe lords in effect as followeth. My lords (ſaid he) our ſoueraigne lord the king, hearing that you were aſſembled in Haringie parke, in other maner than was conuenient, would not forthwith run vpon you with force to deſtroie you, as he might eaſilie haue doone, if he had not wiſhed your ſafetie; for no man doubteth, but if his pleaſure had béene to gather an armie, he might haue had more people than you could haue got to haue taken part with you againſt him, and ſo happilie much bloud might haue béene ſpilt, which thing certeinlie our ſoueraigne lord the king vtterlie abhorreth: and therefore vſing patience and mildneſſe, he hath rather choſen to talke with you in peaceable wiſe, that he may vnderſtand the cauſe whie yée haue aſſembled ſo great a number of people togither.

The lords come before the kings preſence in Weſtminſter hall.

The lord chancellor ſpeaketh for the king to the lords.

The anſwer of the lords & their gréefes.

The lords for anſwer héere vnto ſaid, that they aſſembled their forces togither, for the profit both of the king and realme, and ſpeciallie to take awaie from him ſuch traitors as remained continuallie about him; to wit, Robert de Véer duke of Ireland, Alexander Neuill archbiſhop of Yorke, Michaell de la Poole erle of Suffolke, Robert Triſilian that falſe iuſtice, and ſir Nicholas Brambre that diſloiall knight of London: for ſo they tearmed them all. And to proue their accuſations true, they threw downe their gloues, proteſting by their oths to proſecute it by battell. Naie (ſaith the king) not ſo, but in the next parlement, which we doo appoint before hand to begin the morow after the Purification of our ladie, both they and you appearing, ſhall receiue (according to law) all that which reaſon ſhall appoint. And now to you my

The king reproueth the lords doings.

my lords I ſpeake, by what meane or by what reaſon durſt you ſo preſumptuouſlie take vpon you within this my land to riſe thus againſt me? Did you thinke to feare me with ſuch your preſumptuous boldneſſe? Haue I not armed men ſufficient to haue beaten you downe, compaſſed about like a ſort of deere in a toile? If I would: trulie in this behalfe I make no more account of you, than of the vileſt ſkullions in my kitchen.

The king taketh both parties into his protection.

When he had ſaid theſe words, with much more, he lift vp the duke of Gloceſter that all this while knéeled afore him, and commanded the reſidue to riſe alſo. After this, he led them courteouſlie to his chamber, where they ſate and dranke togither. And finallie it was concluded, that they ſhould all méet togither againe at the next parlement, and ech one to receiue according to iuſtice: and in the meane time the king tooke aſwell the duke of Gloceſter, as the duke of Ireland into his protection, ſo that neither part in the meane time ſhould hurt the other, nor preſume to make any gathering of people vntill the time prefixed: and ſo this councell brake vp, and the lords departed. Theſe things yet were doone in abſence of the forenamed perſons whom the lords accuſed, for they durſt not appeare in preſence of the lords; for if they had béene eſpied, they had ſmarted for it, as was thought, without any reſpect that would haue béene had of the kings preſence. And now, for ſomuch as it ſhould be well knowne through all the citie, that theſe lords had nothing offended him with their comming, the king cauſed a proclamation to be made, the tenour whereof was as followeth.

Grafton.

A proclamation clearing the lords of treaſon.

RIchard by the grace of God, &c. We will that it be knowne to all our liege people throughout our realme of England, that whereas Thomas duke of Gloceſter, Richard earle of Arundell, & Thomas earle of Warwike, haue béene defamed of treaſon by certeine of our councellors; we as it apperteineth, diligentlie ſearching the ground & cauſe of this defamation, find no ſuch thing in them, nor any ſuſpicion thereof: wherefore we declare the ſame defamation to be falſe, and vntrue, and doo receiue the ſame duke and earles into our ſpeciall protection. And bicauſe theſe accuſers ſhall be notoriouſlie knowne, their names are Alexander archbiſhop of Yorke, ſir Robert Veere duke of Ireland, Michaell de la Poole earle of Suffolke, Robert Triſilian lord chiefe iuſtice, and ſir Nicholas Brambre of London knight, who in like caſe ſhall remaine till the next parlement, and there ſhall ſtand to their anſwers. But in the meane time we likewiſe take them into our protection, ſtreictlie charging and commanding, that no maner of perſon charge any of the forenamed, either priuilie or apertlie, in word or déed, to hurt them, or cauſe any hurt to be doone to them, but all quarels & demands againſt them to be remitted, vntill the next parlement prefixed.

Now to haue all things in more perfect readineſſe and remembrance when the eſtates ſhould be aſſembled, certeine of the lords were appointed to ſit in the meane time, to deuiſe how they might procéed orderlie in redreſſe of ſuch matters, as ſéemed to require ſome ſpéedie reformation: neither did they thinke it good to depart in ſunder, for feare to be intrapped through the malicious practiſe of their aduerſaries. Which doubt of theirs ſeemed afterwards to ſtand them in ſtéed of great wiſedome. For immediatlie after, their ſaid aduerſaries came to the king, and declared how they were dailie in danger of their liues, by reaſon of the malice which the lords had conceiued againſt them onelie for the kings ſake, and not for any matter of their owne. And whereas the king had promiſed that they ſhould appeare at the next parlement, which was at hand, they told him plainelie that they neither durſt nor would put their bodies in ſuch manifeſt danger. The king conſidering hereof, withdrew himſelfe from the companie of the lords that were aſſigned to ſit at London, to deliberate of matters that were to be talked of and ordered in the parlement; and ſo that councell was deferred and laid aſide: and the kings councellors that ſtood in danger of their liues through the malice of the lords confederated with the duke of Gloceſter, got them from the court, and withdrew ſome into this place and ſome into that.

The earle of Suffolke fléeth ouer to Calis.

Among other the earle of Suffolke fled ouer vnto Calis in ſecret wiſe, by the helpe of a knight called ſir William Hoo, who holpe to conueie him thither. He had changed his apparell, and ſhauen his beard, and ſo diſguiſed, counterfeited himſelfe to be a poulter, and to ſell certeine foule which he had gotten, by which means he was not knowne, till at length comming to the gates of the caſtell (wherof his brother ſir Edmund de la Poole was capteine) he diſcouered to him (ſcarſelie knowing who he was, by reaſon he was ſo diſguiſed) the whole occaſion of his repairing thither, requiring him to kéepe his counſell, and that he might remaine with him in priuie maner for a time, till he might heare more how things went in England, from whence he was thus fled, to auoid the bloudie hands of his enimies, that ſought his life. His brother doubting what might be laid to his charge if he ſhuld conceale this matter from the lord William Beauchampe lord deputie of the towne, ſtreightwaies aduertiſed him thereof, who tooke order that the earle ſhould forthwith be ſent backe againe into England to the king, who receiued him with ſmall thanks to them that brought him ouer, ſo that (as ſome write) his brother being one, was committed to priſon for diſcloſing him. But yet bicauſe it ſhould not ſéeme that he impriſoned him for that cauſe, he was ſhortlie after ſet at libertie, and returned againe to his charge at Calis. The earle was alſo permitted to go whither he would, although the king had vndertaken to preſent him and others at the next parlement to anſwer their offenſes, as the ſame might be laid to their charge.

Grafton.

¶ But here it may be doubted by the vncerteintie of writers, whether the earle of Suffolke thus fled ouer to Calis, before the iournie at Ratcote bridge, or after. But whether it chanced either after or before, it is certeine that ſince the time that the lords had forced the king to promiſe to exhibit him and others at the next parlement to abide their trials, he durſt not openlie remaine in the court, but taking leaue of the king departed from him. Wherevpon the king being out of quiet for the abſence of him and other his beſt beloued councellors, whom he ſo much eſtéemed, and namelie of the duke of Ireland, and the ſaid earle of Suffolke, he appointed one Thomas Molineux conſtable of the caſtell of Cheſter, a man of high valiantie, and great power in the parties of Cheſhire and Lancaſhire, to raiſe an armie of men, with the aſſiſtance of the ſhiriffe of Cheſhire, to whom his commiſſion miſſion of authoritie in that behalfe, vnder the great ſeale was directed, to the end that they might conueie the duke of Ireland in all ſafetie vnto the kings preſence.

A commiſſion to the ſhiriffe of Cheſhire to ſafe conduct the duke of Ireland to the kings preſence.

The ſhiriffe hauing receiued this commiſſion, togither with the foreſaid Thomas Molineux raiſed a power, and ſuch as refuſed to ſerue, in reſpect of ſuch góod will as they bare to the lords, he committed to priſon, commanding the gailors to kéepe them ſtreict in irons with bread and water till his returne. Moreouer, the king ſent to ſir Raſe Vernon, & ſir Richard Ratcliffe, willing them to aſſiſt the other. And ſo thus they ſet forward with the number of fiue thouſand men. When the lords vnderſtood that the duke of Ireland was marching towards London, with ſuch a power of men, meaning to ioine with the Londoners, and ſo to make as it had béene an inuincible armie, they beſtirred themſelues, and fell in hand to arme their men, and to exhort one another, that now they ſhould not be negligent in their owne defenſe, but make haſt for the diſpatching of thoſe that craftilie had gone about to conſpire their deaths. And ſo theſe lords, to wit, the duke of Gloceſter, the earles of Derbie, Arundell, Warwike, and Notingham, aſſembled their powers out of all quarters, to incounter with the duke of Ireland; and when they had got their companies togither, they forelaied all the waies by which he was thought to come.

The lords ſéeke to ſtop the paſſage of the duke of Ireland.

But the duke of Ireland hauing with him Molineux, Vernon, and Ratcliffe, rode forward in ſtatelie and glorious araie, with an armie (as ye haue heard) of fiue thouſand men, ſuppoſing that none durſt come forth to withſtand him. Neuertheleſſe when he came to Ratcote bridge, not paſt foure miles from Cheping Norton (which bridge if he could haue paſſed, he had béene out of the danger of all enimies) he ſuddenlie eſpied where the armie of the lords laie, not far diſtant from him, readie in the midſt of a vallie to abide his comming. Some of the earle of Derbies companie had broken the bridge, & ſo ſtopped his paſſage. He therefore perceiuing his enimies intention, ſtaied, and cauſed the kings banner to be ſpred, and began to ſet a góod countenance of the matter, and to exhort his people to ſhew themſelues valiant; and herewith cauſed the trumpets to ſound. But when it appeared that as ſome were readie to fight in his quarell, ſo there were other that quite forſooke him, and ſaid flatlie they would not fight againſt ſo manie noble men, in ſo vniuſt a cauſe: he being thereof aduertiſed, began to wax faint-harted, and to prepare himſelfe to eſcape by flight; and declaring no leſſe openlie vnto them, ſaid: Before we come to ioine, I will ſéeke to withdraw my ſelfe out of the waie, and ſaue my ſelfe if I can; for me they onlie ſéeke, againſt you they haue no quarell, ſo that I being ſhifted awaie, you ſhall eaſilie be preſerued. Herewith one of the knights ſaid to him; You haue brought vs out of our countrie, you haue procured vs to giue you our promiſe, you haue cauſed vs to take this iournie in hand: here therefore are we readie to fight & win the victorie with you, if our hap be ſuch; or if fortune will not ſo fauour vs, we are readie to ſpend our liues with you. No ſaid he, ye ſhall not ſo doo, and forthwith ſtriking his horſſe with ſpurs, he fled from them for feare which had ſet wings on his héeles, as one ſaith:

The duke of Ireland his ſouldiers reuolt frõ him.

The duke of Ireland flieth frõ his armie.

———pedibus timor addidit alas.

Virg. Aeneid. 9.

Herevpon manie that were with him, curſing this his demeanour, prepared to yéeld themſelues to the lords. But Thomas Molineux determined to fight it out, ſith the lords were not yet all come togither to that place, but onelie the earle of Derbie and certeine others. Neuertheleſſe, after he had fought a while, and perceiued it would not auaile him to tarie longer, as one deſpairing of the victorie, betooke him likewiſe to flight, as the duke of Ireland had led him the waie: and plunging into the riuer, which was at hand, it chanced that ſir Thomas Mortimer being preſent amongſt other at the ſame place, willed him to come out of the water vnto him; for if he would not, he threatned to ſhoot him through with arrowes in the riuer where he ſtood. If I come (ſaid Molineux) will ye ſaue my life? I will make thée no ſuch promiſe (ſaid ſir Thomas Mortimer) but notwithſtanding, either come vp, or thou ſhalt preſentlie die for it. Well then (ſaid Molineux) if there be no other remedie, ſuffer me to come vp, and let me trie with hand-blowes, either with you or ſome other, and ſo die like a man. But as he came vp, the knight caught him by the helmet, plucked it off his head, & ſtreightwaies drawing forth his dagger, ſtroke him into the braines, and ſo diſpatched him. This was the end of ſir Thomas Molineux, which through his bold and raſh aduenture, in a moſt dangerous and deſperat caſe, he pulled vpon himſelfe; and might as well haue auoided as incurred, if the ſame prouident care of ſafetie had taken him in the head that mooued the duke of Ireland to take flight for his indemnitie: wherein he ſéemed to remember that there is no ſafe attempting of any perilous enterpriſe without dread of danger: for he that can tell when a thing is to be feared, can tell in like ſort when it is to be vndertaken; as the wiſeman verie ſententiouſlie ſaith:

Animus vereri qui ſcit, ſcit tutò aggredi.

Thomas Molineux ſlaine.

In the meane time, the duke of Ireland (as ye haue heard) ſéeking to eſcape by flight, came to the riuers ſide; but finding the bridge broken, he galoped till he found an other bridge, where he found a number of archers readie to ſtop his paſſage. When he ſaw that he was thus incloſed with his enimies on the one ſide, and the riuer of Thames on the other, he thought to put all in aduenture; and caſting awaie his gantlets, and ſword (to be the more nimble) gaue his horſſe the ſpurres, and lept into the riuer; but miſſing the foord, and not able to land with his horſſe on the further ſide, he forſooke him, and ſwimming ouer ſo well as he might, got to the banke, and ſo eſcaped. It was now night, and therefore his enimies hauing no knowledge of the countrie, followed him not; but his horſſe, helmet, curaſſes, gantlets, and ſword being found, it was thought verelie that he had béene drowned. The next newes heard of him, was that he had paſſed the ſeas, and was got into Holland, where he had no great fréendlie welcome, by reaſon that Albert duke of Bauiere, who was lord of that countrie, bare ſuch góod will to his cooſins of England, the dukes of Lancaſter, Yorke, and Gloceſter, that he commanded this duke of Ireland to depart forth of his countrie, as immediatlie therevpon he did, from thence reſorting to the biſhoprike of Vtreict, and after into other countries, till finallie he ended the courſe of his life, as after in place conuenient ſhall appeare.

The duke of Ireland flieth into Holland.

But now to returne to the armies where we left them. After the duke was fled, and Thomas Molineux ſlaine (as before ye haue heard) the armie of the lords ſet vpon the people that were come with the duke of Ireland (as hath béene ſaid) forth of Cheſhire, Lancaſhire, and Wales; and taking them as enimies, ſpoiled them of their horſſe, armor, bowes and arrowes. The knights and eſquiers had their armor and horſſes againe to them reſtored, and were reteined with the lords to ſerue them: but the commons without either armor or weapon were ſent home, and had no other harme done vnto them. The duke of Irelands cariage being taken, letters were found in his trunkes or males, which the king had written to him, exhorting him with all ſpéed to repaire vnto London, with what power he might make, and there he ſhould find him readie to liue and die with him. Such was the concluſion of this battell, which happened neere vnto Burford, faſt by Bablake, to the great reioiſing of manie through the realme, for that the enimies thereof (as they tooke the matter) were thus ouerthrowne. But yet the eſcaping awaie of the duke of Ireland did ſomewhat mitigate their ioy, for what was become of him it was vncerteine. After this the duke of Gloceſter, and the other lords went to Oxford, being ſorie that their fortune was not to haue taken the duke of Ireland.

Tho. Walſ.

A brute raiſed that king Richard meant to yeeld vp Calis into the French kings hands.

At the ſame time, or rather before, the archbiſhop of Yorke, and the lord chiefe iuſtice ſir Robert Triſilian, fearing the indignation of the lords, withdrew out of the waie, and durſt not be ſeene. But now the lords, who after the iournie at Radcote bridge, were come (as ye haue heard) to Oxford; we find that the ſame time a brute was raiſed (whether of truth or not, we haue neither to affirme nor denie) how there was a meſſenger taken being ſent from the French king with letters, in which was conteined a licence of ſafe conduct, for the king of England, the duke of Ireland, and others, to come to Bullongne, with a certeine number limited, where they ſhould find the French king come downe thither readie to receiue them, to the end that for a certeine ſumme of monie, which the French king ſhould giue to the king of England, the towne of Calis, and all the fortreſſes in thoſe parts, which were in the Engliſhmens hands, ſhould be deliuered to the Frenchmen; and further that the king of England ſhould doo his homage to the French king, for the lands which he held in Gaſcoigne, and ſo to haue acknowledged himſelfe his liege man. The lords (as was reported) hauing got theſe letters, and taken counſell togither how to proceed in their buſineſſe, to bring the ſame to good end, remoued from Oxford, and on Chriſtmas euen they came to S. Albons, and there ſtaied that daie and the next.

The lords come to London with a great armie.

K. Richard keepeth his Chriſtmas in the Tower of London.

The lords ſend to the Maior and citizens of London to vnderſtand their meaning.

The Londoners in great perplexitie which part to take.

On ſaint Stephans daie they tooke their waie to London with an armie of fortie thouſand men, as ſome write; & comming into the fields beſides Clerkenwell, muſtered their men, being diuided in three ſeuerall battels verie well appointed with armor and weapon, that it was a beautifull ſight to behold them. The king kept his Chriſtmas, not at Weſtminſter, but in the Tower; not douting but there to be defended what chance ſoeuer ſhould happen. The lords miſtruſting the Londoners, lodged them with their people in the ſuburbs. They ſent yet two knights, and two eſquiers, vnto the Maior and Aldermen of the citie, to vnderſtand whether they were minded to take part with them, or with the duke of Ireland, and his adherents, traitors (as they tearmed them) both to the king and the realme. The Londoners were now in no ſmall feare and perplexitie, not knowing well what waie was beſt for them to take, weieng diuers perils; as firſt the kings diſpleaſure, if they opened their gates vnto the lords; and if they ſhut them foorth, they feared the indignation and wrath of the commons that were come thither with the lords, and were readie to breake downe their wals and gates, if they were neuer ſo little prouoked. Beſides this, they ſtood moſt in doubt, leaſt if the wealthieſt citizens ſhould not giue their conſent to receiue the lords into the citie, the meaner ſort, and ſuch as wiſhed rather to ſee ſome hurlie burlie than to continue in peace, would ſeeke by force to ſet open the gates, and make waie for the lords and their people to enter, that they might make hauocke, and ſpoile whatſoeuer might be found of value in the rich mens houſes.

The Londoners incline to the lords.

The lords enter into London.

The kings words touching the lords proceedings.

Theſe doubts with all the circumſtances being well weied and conſidered, the Maior Nicholas Exton, and certeine of the chiefe men in the citie, went foorth to the lords, and offered them to lodge in the citie at their pleaſure, with all things neceſſarie as they ſhould deuiſe. The Maior cauſed alſo wine, ale, bread, and cheeſe, to be diſtributed among the armie, ſo as ech one had part, which courteſie turned greatlie afterwards to the commoditie of the citie. The lords vpon ſearch made, perceiuing that there was no guile meant by laieng of men in ambuſhes within the citie to intrappe them, or otherwiſe, but that all was ſure inough and cleare without anie ſuch euill meaning, they entred the citie and there abode quietlie. Then went the archbiſhop of Canturburie and others betwixt the king and the lords to make peace betwixt them. But the king at the firſt ſeemed little to eſteeme the matter, ſaieng to the archbiſhop; Well let them lie here with their great multituds of people hardlie till they haue ſpent all they haue, and then I truſt they will returne poore inough and needie, and then I doubt not but I ſhall talke with them, and vſe the matter ſo as iuſtice maie require.

The lords refuſe to come into yͤ Tower but after ſearch made they come thither to the kings preſence.

The lords being informed hereof, were maruellouſlie mooued, and ſware that they would not depart till they had ſpoken with him face to face, and foorthwith they ſent part of their companies to watch the Thames, for feare the king ſhould ſcape their hands, and then laugh them to ſcorne. When the king then perceiued himſelfe to be incloſed on ech ſide, he talked eftſoones with the archbiſhop and his aſſociats that were meſſengers betwixt him and the lords, willing them to declare to the lords that he would be contented to treat with them in reaſonable order; wherevpon they required that he ſhould on the morow next inſuing come vnto Weſtminſter, where he ſhould vnderſtand their demands. When the king heard that, he refuſed to come vnto Weſtminſter, but willed that they ſhould come to him there in the Tower. The lords ſent him word againe, that the Tower was a place to be ſuſpected, for that they might there be ſurpriſed by ſome guilefull practiſe deuiſed to intrap them. The king herevnto made anſwer, that they might ſend ſome two hundred men, or ſo manie as they ſhould thinke good, to make a through ſearch, whether they needed to feare anie ſuch thing; and this accordinglie was doone: they hauing the keies of the gates and of all the ſtrong chambers, turrets, and places within the Tower ſent vnto them.

The lords open their greefes to the king.

On the fridaie, the duke of Gloceſter, the earls of Derbie, and Notingham, came to the king, where he was ſet in a pauillion richlie arraied; and after their humble ſalutations done, and ſome talke had betwixt them, they went at the kings requeſt with him into his chamber, where they recited vnto him the conſpiracie of their aduerſaries, through which they had beene indicted. They alſo ſhewed forth the letters which he had ſent to the duke of Ireland, to leauie an armie vnto their deſtruction. Likewiſe the letters, which the French king had written to him, conteining a ſafe conduct for him to come into France, there to confirme things to the diminiſhing of his honor, to the decaie of his power, & loſſe of his fame. ¶ During the time of this communication alſo, the earle of Derbie deſired the king to behold the people that were aſſembled in ſight before the Tower, for the preſeruation of him and his realme: which he did, and maruelling to ſee ſuch a goodlie armie and ſtrength, as he declared to them no leſſe, the duke of Gloceſter ſaid vnto him; Sir this is not the tenth part of your willing ſubiects that haue riſen to deſtroie thoſe falſe traitors, that haue miſled you with their wicked and naughtie counſell.

The king being brought to his wits end, aſwell with thoſe things which the lords had charged him with, as otherwiſe with the ſight of that great multitude of people, ſeemed greatlie amazed. Wherevpon the lords, vnder condition that the next daie he ſhould come to Weſtminſter to heare more of their minds, and to conclude further for the behoofe of the common-wealth of the realme, began to take leaue of him, meaning ſo to depart: but the king deſired them to tarrie all night with him and the queene. The duke thinking to make all ſure, made excuſe that he durſt not be abſent from all thoſe folks, which they had brought with them, for feare that ſome diſorder might ariſe, either in the armie, or in the citie: yet at the kings inſtance, the earles of Notingham and Derbie taried there all night. The king before his going to bed, was quite turned concerning his determination and promiſe made to go the next daie to Weſtminſter, through ſuch whiſpering tales as was put into his eares, by ſome that were about him, telling him that it ſtood neither with his ſafetie, nor honour, ſo lightlie to agree to depart from the tower, vnto ſuch place as the lords had thus appointed him, to ſerue more for their purpoſe than for ſuertie of his perſon.

The incõſtancie of the king

When the lords therefore vnderſtood that he would not keepe promiſe with them, they were greatlie offended, inſomuch as they ſent him flat word, that if he would not come (according to promiſe) they would ſuerlie choſe another king, that would and ought to obeie the faithfull counſell of his lords. The king with this meſſage being touched to the quicke, to ſatiſfie their minds, and to auoid further perill, remooued the next morning vnto Weſtminſter, where the lords comming before his preſence, after a little other talke, they declared vnto him, that aſwell in reſpect of his owne honour, as the commoditie ⁊ wealth of his kingdome, it was behouefull, that ſuch traitors, and moſt wicked ⁊ ſlanderous perſons, as were nothing profitable, but hurtfull to him, and his louing ſubiects, ſhould be remooued out of his court; and that other that both could and would ſerue him more honorablie and faithfullie were placed in their roomes. The king, although ſore againſt his mind, when he ſaw how the lords were bent, and that he wanted power to withſtand their pleaſures, condeſcended to doo what they would haue him.

The K. is cõpelled to condeſcend to the lords requeſt.

So when he had granted thereto, they iudged that Alexander Neuill archbiſhop of Yorke, John Fourdham biſhop of Durham lord treſuror, Thomas Ruſhoke a frier of the order of the preachers, biſhop of Chicheſter, and confeſſor to the king, were worthie to be auoided the court. But the archbiſhop of Yorke, and the biſhop of Chicheſter would abide no reckonings, but got them out of the waie, and fled, it was not knowne whither. The lords did expell out of the court the lord Zouch of Haringworth, the lord Burnell, the lord Beaumont, Albrey de Veer, Baldwin de Bereford, Richard Aderburie, John Worth, Thomas Clifford, and John Louell knights. Theſe were diſmiſſed out of the court, and remooued from the king, but not diſcharged, for they were conſtreined to put in ſuerties to appeare at the next parlement. There were alſo certeine ladies expelled the court, as thoſe that were thought to doo much harme about the K. to wit, the ladie Poinings, wife to John Worth of Powen, and the ladie Moulinge, with others, which alſo found ſuerties to anſwer at the next parlement, to all ſuch things as might be obiected againſt them. Moreouer there were arreſted and committed to ſeuerall priſons, ſir Simon Burlie, William Elmham, John Beauchampe of Holt ſteward of the kings houſe, ſir John Saliſburie, ſir Thomas Triuet, ſir James Barneis, ſir Nicholas Dagworth, and ſir Nicholas Brambre knights. Alſo Richard Clifford, John Lincolne, Richard Mitford the kings chapleins, and Nicholas Sclake deane of the kings chappell, whoſe word might too much in the court. There was alſo apprehended John Blake an apprentiſe of the law: all which perſons were kept in ſtreict ward till the next parlement, in which they were appointed to ſtand vnto their triall and anſwers.

Certeine perſons put out of the court.

Certeine ladies expelled the court.

Shortlie after, to wit, the morrow after the Purification of our ladie, the parlement began, the which was named the parlement that wrought wonders. The king would gladlie haue proroged the time of this parlement, if by anie meanes he might. The lords came to the ſame parlement, with a ſufficient armie for their owne ſafeties. On the firſt day of this parlement, were arreſted as they ſat in their places, all the iuſtices (except ſir William Skipworth) as ſir Roger Fulthrop, ſir Robert Belknap, ſir John Carie, ſir John Holt, ſir William Brooke, and John Alocton the kings ſergeant at law, all which were ſent to the tower, and there kept in ſeuerall places. The cauſe whie they were thus apprehended, was for that, where in the laſt parlement, diuerſe lords were made gouernours of the realme, both by the aſſent of the ſame parlement, and alſo by the aduiſe and counſell of all the iuſtices then being, and indentures tripartite thereof made, of the which one part remained with the king, an other with the lords ſo choſen to gouerne the realme, and the third part with the iuſtices: and yet notwithſtanding, the ſaid iuſtices at a councell holden at Notingham (as yee haue heard before) did go contrarie to that agreement. Wherevpon it was now determined, that they ſhould make anſwer to their doings.

The iuſtices arreſted ⁊ ſent to the tower.

Why the iuſtices were apprehended.

Moreouer, in the beginning of this parlement, were openlie called Robert Veer duke of Ireland, Alexander Neuill archbiſhop of Yorke, Michaell de la Poole earle of Suffolke, ſir Robert Triſilian lord cheefe iuſtice of England, to anſwer Thomas of Woodſtoke duke of Gloceſter, Richard earle of Arundell, Henrie earle of Derbie, and Thomas earle of Notingham, vpon certeine articles of high treaſon, which theſe lords did charge them with. And forſomuch as none of theſe appeared, it was ordeined by the whole aſſent of the parlement, that they ſhould be baniſhed for euer, and their lands and goods mooueable and vnmooueable to be forfeit and ſeized into the kings hands, their lands intailed onelie excepted. Shortlie after was the lord cheefe iuſtice, Robert Triſilian found in an apothecaries houſe at Weſtminſter, lurking there, to vnderſtand by ſpies dailie what was doone in the parlement: he was deſcried by one of his owne men, and ſo taken and brought to the duke of Gloceſter, who cauſed him forthwith the ſame daie to be had to the tower, and from thence drawne to Tiburne, and there hanged.

The duke of Ireland ⁊ his aſſociats attainted of treſon by this parlement.

Triſilian cheefe iuſtice deſcried by his owne man is executed at Tiburne.

On the morrow after, ſir Nicholas Brambre, that ſometime had beene maior of London, was brought forth to iudgement and condemned, although he had manie freends that made ſute to ſaue his life. This man had doone manie oppreſſions within the citie of London (as was reported.) In his maioraltie, he cauſed great ⁊ monſtruous ſtocks to be made to impriſon men therein, and alſo a common axe to ſtrike off the heads of them which ſhould reſiſt his will and pleaſure, for he was ſo highlie in the kings fauour, that he might doo what he would. And the report went, that he had cauſed eight thouſand or more to be indicted, which before had taken part with the lords, intending to haue put them all to death, if God had not ſhortened his daies. Manie other euill fauoured reports went abroad of him, as that he meant to haue changed the name of London, and to haue named it little Troie, of which citie baptiſed with that new name, he purpoſed to be intituled duke. But theſe were forged rumors deuiſed and ſpred abroad in thoſe daies, as manie other were, partlie by the vaine imagination of the people, and partlie of purpoſe, to bring thoſe whome the king fauoured further out of the peoples liking. But now touching ſir Nicholas Brambre: in the end being thus called to anſwer his tranſgreſſions, he was found giltie, and had iudgement, neither to be hanged, nor drawne, but to be beheaded with his owne axe which before he had deuiſed: ſeruing him heerein as Phalaris the tyrant ſometime ſerued Perillus, the inuentor of that exquiſite torment of the braſen bull, wherein the offendor being put (and the counterfet beaſt by force of fier made glowing hot) hauing his toong firſt cut out, through extreamitie of paine made a bellowing alwaies as he cried, as if it had béene the verie noiſe of a naturall bull. Of which ſtrange torment Perillus himſelfe firſt taſted, ſuffering death by an engine of his owne deuiſing, which he thought ſhould haue purchaſed him a good liuing, whereof the poet ſaith:

Vt Phalaris tauro violentus membra Perilli
Torruit, infelix imbuit autor opus.

Diuerſe that ſtood againſt the lords executed.

The duke of Gloceſter a ſeuere man.

Sir Simon Burlie.

After this, ſir Iohn Saliſburie, & ſir Iames Berneis, both knights and luſtie yoong men, were by iudgement of parlement drawne and hanged. Then folowed Iohn Beauchampe of the Holt, lord ſteward of the kings houſe, that had ſerued king Edward the third, and his ſonne Lionell duke of Clarence: who likewiſe by decrée of this parlement was drawne and hanged. Alſo Iohn Blake eſquier, who in an infortunate houre ſtood againſt the lords in the councell at Notingham, was now drawne and hanged, and ſo was one Thomas Vſke. Laſt of all (or as ſome hold, firſt of all) was ſir Simon Burlie beheaded, although the earle of Derbie did what he could to ſaue his life, by reaſon whereof, great diſſention roſe betwixt the ſaid earle, and the duke of Gloceſter: for the duke being a ſore and a right ſeuere man, might not by any meanes be remooued from his opinion and purpoſe, if he once reſolued vpon any matter. Some ſpite he bare (as was thought) towards the ſaid ſir Simon Burlie, both as well for the faithfull fréendſhip, which was growne betwixt the duke of Ireland, and the ſaid ſir Simon, as alſo for that he looked to haue had ſuch offices and roomes which ſir Simon inioied, by the kings gratious fauour and grants thereof to him made, as the Wardenſhip of the cinque ports, and conſtableſhip of the caſtell of Douer, and the office of high chamberleine.

* Abr. Fl. out of Henrie Knighton, fol. 191.

¶ But now, bicauſe of all theſe which were condemned and executed at this parlement, in our common chronicles there is leaſt written; and in Froiſſard, and diuerſe priuate pamphlets I haue read moſt of this ſir Simon, I haue thought good to ſet downe ſome part of his life, ſo largelie as this volume may well beare, although a great deale more briefe than where I found it. This ſir Simon was the ſon of ſir Iohn Burlie knight of the garter, and brought vp in his youth vnder his kinſman doctor Walter Burlie, who (as in the latter end of king Edward the third you haue heard) was one of the chiefe that had charge in the bringing vp of the Blacke prince, eldeſt ſonne to the ſaid king Edward. By this occaſion he grew into ſuch fauour with the prince, that afterwards the ſaid prince committed vnto him the gouernance of his ſonne Richard of Burdeaux, who as he was of a gentle and courteous nature, began then to conceiue ſo great loue and liking towards him, that when he came to the crowne and was king, he aduanced him highlie to great honours and promotions, in ſomuch that at one time & other he was made knight of the garter, conſtable of Douer, lord Warden of the cinque ports, lord chamberleine, * earle of Huntington, and alſo one of the priuie councell to the king.

Neither was there any thing doone concerning the affaires apperteining vnto the ſtate without his counſell, appointment, and direction, wherein he ſo much fauoured and leaned to the partie of the duke of Ireland, that he was ſore enuied, and greatlie hated of diuerſe of the reſt of the nobilitie, ſpeciallie of the kings vncle the duke of Gloceſter, who vpon malice that he bare to the man, not ſo much for his owne demeanour, as for his alies, and peraduenture for deſire of his roomes, more than of his life, cauſed him to be accuſed of diuerſe offenſes againſt the crowne, realme, and church; namelie, for that he had (as they ſurmized againſt him) ſpoiled and waſted the kings treaſure, and withholden the paie of the ſouldiers and men of warre, wherevpon he was arreſted, called to account, & hauing no clerke allowed him to make vp the ſame, was found in arrerages 250000 franks. And although for one part thereof he demanded allowance of monie, which he had defraied and laid out in Almaine, and in Boheme, about the kings mariage, and for the reſidue deſired daies of paiment, yet he could obteine neither. Further, he was accuſed that the duke of Ireland and he had gathered great ſummes of monie, conueied the ſame to Douer, and from thence ſent it in the night by ſea into Germanie.

Froiſſard.

Thom. Walſ.

Laſtlie, the archbiſhop (forſooth) and the moonks of Canturburie charged him that he ſought the means to remooue the ſhrine of the archbiſhop Thomas, otherwiſe called Thomas Becket, from Canturburie vnto Douer, vnder a colour of feare, leaſt the Frenchmen being aſſembled in Flanders to inuade England, ſhould land in Kent and take Canturburie, and ſpoile it, where indéed (as they ſurmized againſt him) he meant to ſend it ouer the ſeas vnto the king of Boheme. Herevpon he was firſt committed to the tower, and before the king or his other friends could procure his deliuerance, he was without law or iuſtice, before any of the reſidue (as ſome hold) brought forth and beheaded on the tower hill, by commandement of the duke of Gloceſter, and other of his faction, quite contrarie to the kings will or knowledge, in ſomuch that when he vnderſtood it, he ſpake manie ſore words againſt the duke, affirming that he was a wicked man, and worthie to be kept ſhorter, ſith vnder a colour of dooing iuſtice, he went about to deſtroie euerie good and honeſt man. The king was alſo offended with the duke of Yorke, for his brothers preſumptuous doings, though the ſaid duke of Yorke being verelie a man of a gentle nature, wiſhed that the ſtate of the common-wealth might haue béene redreſſed without loſſe of any mans life, or other cruell dealing: but the duke of Gloceſter, and diuerſe other of the nobilitie, the leſſe that they paſſed for the kings threatening ſpeach, ſo much more were they readie to puniſh all thoſe whom they tooke to be their enimies. Indéed the ſaid ſir Simon Burlie was thought to beare himſelfe more loftie, by reaſon of the kings fauour, than was requiſite, which procured him enuie of them, that could not abide others to be in any condition their equals in authoritie.

It ſhould appeare by Froiſſard, that he was firſt of all, in the beginning of theſe ſtirs betwixt the king and the lords, committed to the tower, and notwithſtanding all the ſhift that either the king, or the duke of Ireland, or anie other of his fréends could make for him, by the duke of Gloceſters commandement he was cruellie beheaded, ſo greatlie to the offenſe of the king, and thoſe that were his truſtie councellors, that therevpon the king cauſed the duke of Ireland the ſooner to aſſemble an armie againſt the ſaid duke and his complices, therby to reſtraine their preſumptuous procéedings. But whether he was thus at the firſt or laſt executed, to pleaſe the king the better, now at this parlement, amongſt others that were condemned in the ſame: his lands were giuen to the king, a great part whereof he afterwards diſpoſed to diuerſe men as he thought expedient. But yet in the parlement holden in the one and twentith yeare of this kings reigne, the act of atteindor of the ſaid ſir Simon was repealed: and at an other parlement holden in the ſecond yeare of king Henrie the fourth, all his lands which then remained vngranted and vnſold, were reſtored to ſir Iohn Burlie knight, ſonne and heire of ſir Roger Burlie, brother to the ſaid Simon, of whom lineallie is deſcended Thomas Eins eſquier, now ſecretarie to the queenes maieſties councell in the north parts. And thus far touching ſir Simon Burlie, of whom manie reports went of his diſloiall dealings towards the ſtate, as partlie ye haue heard, but how trulie the lord knoweth. Among other ſlanderous tales that were ſpred abroad of him, one was that he conſented to the deliuering of Douer caſtell by the kings appointment to the Frenchmen for monie. But as this was a thing not like to be true, ſo (no doubt) manie things that the perſons aforeſaid, which were executed, had béene charged with, at the leaſt by common report among the people, were nothing true at all; although happilie the ſubſtance of thoſe things, for which they died, might be true in ſome reſpect.

Grafton.

The iuſtices condemned to perpetuall exile.

Sir William Elmham that was charged alſo for withdrawing of the ſoldiers wages, diſcharged himſelfe therof, and of all other things that might be laid to his charge. As touching the iuſtices, they were all condemned to death by the parlement, but ſuch meanes was made for them vnto the quéene, that ſhe obteined pardon for their liues. But they forfeited their lands and goods, and were appointed to remaine in perpetuall exile, with a certeine portion of monie to them aſſigned for their dailie ſuſtentation: the names of which iuſtices ſo condemned to exile were theſe, Robert Belknap, Iohn Holt, Iohn Craie, Roger Fulthorpe, William Burgh, and Iohn Lokton. Finallie, in this parlement was an oth required and obteined of the king, that he ſhould ſtand vnto and abide ſuch rule and order as the lords ſhould take: and this oth was not required onelie of the king, but alſo of all the inhabitants of the realme. ¶ In theſe troubles was the realme of England in theſe daies, and the king brought into that caſe, that he ruled not, but was ruled by his vncles, and other to them aſſociat.

The king taketh an oth to performe the lords orders.

The earle of Arundell ſent to the ſea with a great nauie, in aid of the duke of Britaine.

In the latter end of this eleuenth yeare was the earle of Arundell ſent to the ſea with a great nauie of ſhips and men of warre. There went with him in this iournie, of noble men, the earles of Notingham & Deuonſhire, ſir Thomas Percie, the lord Clifford, the lord Camois, ſir William Elmham, ſir Thomas Morteur, ſir Iohn Daubreticourt, ſir William Shellie, ſir Iohn Warwike or Berwike, ſir Stephan de Liberie, ſir Robert Sere, ſir Peter Montberie, ſir Lewes Clanbow, ſir Thomas Coque or Cooke, ſir William Paulie or Paulet, & diuerſe others. There were a thouſand men of armes, and thrée thouſand archers. The purpoſe for which they were ſent, was to haue aided the duke of Britaine (if he would haue receiued them) being then eftſoones run into the French kings diſpleaſure, for the impriſoning of the lord Cliſſon conſtable of France.

Peraduenture Malnere, it may be Mongomerie.

Anno Reg. 12.

But after that (contrarie to expectation) the duke of Britaine was come to an agréement with the French king, the earle of Arundell drew with his nauie alongſt the coaſts of Poictou, and Xaintonge, till at length he arriued in the hauen that goeth vp to Rochell, and landed with his men at Marrant, foure leagues from Rochell, and began to pilfer, ſpoile, and fetch booties abroad in the countrie. The Frenchmen within Rochell iſſued foorth to ſkirmiſh with the Engliſhmen, but they were eaſilie put to flight, and folowed euen to the bariers of the gates of Rochell. ¶ Perot le Bernois a capteine of Gaſcoigne, that made warre for the king of England in Limoſin, and lay in the fortreſſe of Galuſet, came foorth the ſame time, and made a roade into Berrie with foure hundred ſpears. The earle of Arundell, after he had laine at Marrant fiftéene daies, returned to his ſhips, and finallie came backe into England, and Perot le Bernois likewiſe returned to his fortreſſe. ¶ About the ſame time was a truce taken betwixt the parties Engliſh and French on the marches of Aquitaine, to begin the firſt daie of Auguſt, and to indure till the firſt of Maie next inſuing.

The earle of Arundell returneth out of France.

¶ In this yeare 1388, in Lent, the Scots entred into the weſterne borders, & what with killing as alſo with burning they did much miſchiefe. Moreouer they ſhewed extreme crueltie againſt young children and ſucklings, againſt women bigge with child and in trauell, againſt weake and wéeriſh men and crooked with age, in the countrie of Gildiſland, within the lordſhip of the lord Dacres, gathering them togither into houſes, and ſhutting them vp, and locking the doores, they burned without mercie or pitie to the number (as it was ſaid) of two hundred and aboue.

O Scotiſh crueltie and more than barbarous bloudthirſtineſſe.

This yeare in Auguſt, the Scots inuaded the countrie of Northumberland, and at Otterburne ouerthrew a power of Engliſhmen, which the earle of Northumberland and his ſonnes had leauied againſt them. In this battell the earle Dowglas chiefe of that armie of Scots was ſlaine, and the lord Henrie Percie, and his brother ſir Ralfe, ſonnes to the ſaid earle of Northumberland, were taken priſoners, as in the Scotiſh chronicles ye may read more at large. After the feaſt of the natiuitie of our ladie, a parlement was holden at Cambridge, in the which diuerſe ſtatutes were ordeined; as For the limiting of ſeruants wages; For puniſhment of vagarant perſons; For the inhibiting of certeine perſons to weare weapons; For the debarring of vnlawfull games; For maintenance of ſhooting in the long bow; For remouing of the ſtaple of wolles from Middleburgh vnto Calis; For labourers not to be receiued, but where they are inhabiting, except with licence vnder ſeale of the hundred where they dwell. There was alſo an act made, that none ſhould go foorth of the realme, to purchaſe anie benefice with cure or without cure, except by licence obteined of the king; and if they did contrarie herevnto, they were to be excluded out of the kings protection. There was granted to the king in this parlement, a tenth to be leuied of the clergie, and a fiftéenth of the laitie. Moreouer, during the time of this parlement, as ſir Thomas Triuet was riding towards Barnewell with the king, where the king lodged, by forcing his horſſe too much with the ſpurs, the horſſe fell with him ſo rudelie to the ground, that his entrails within him were ſo burſt and periſhed, that he died the next daie after. Manie reioiſed at this mans death, as well for that men iudged him to be excéeding haultie and proud; as alſo for that he was ſuſpected not to haue dealt iuſtlie with the biſhop of Norwich, in the iournie which the biſhop had made into Flanders: but ſpeciallie men had an ill opinion of him, for that he ſtood with the king againſt the lords, counſelling him in the yeare laſt paſt to diſpatch them out of the way. ¶ Sir Iohn Holland, the kings brother on the mothers ſide, that was latelie returned out of Spaine, where he had béene with the duke of Lancaſter, was now made earle of Huntington.

¶ In Iulie, whiles the king was at Shéene, there ſwarmed togither in his court great multitudes of flies and gnats, inſomuch that in maner of ſkirmiſhing they incountered ech other; and making great ſlaughters on both ſides, were in the end ſwept awaie from the place where they lay dead, with bruſhes and béeſoms by heaps. This was déemed an vnluckie prognoſticat of ſome miſchiefe like to fall vpon the necke of the land.

Commiſſioners ſent to treat a truce betwéene England, France, and Scotland.

Alſo in this twelfth yeare, were commiſſioners appointed to méet at Balingham, betwixt Calis and Bullongne, to treat a truce to be had betwixt the realmes of England, France and Scotland. Walter Skirlow biſhop of Durham, that had béene latelie before remoued from Bath vnto Durham, from whence Iohn Fordham had béene tranſlated vnto Elie, was ſent as head commiſſioner for the king of England, and with him were ioined ſir Ihon Clanbow, and ſir Nicholas Dagworth, knights, and Richard Rowhale clearke, a doctor of law. By Froiſſard it appeareth that the earle of Saliſburie was one, ⁊ ſir Thomas Beauchampe lord deputie of Calis appointed likewiſe as an aſſiſtant with them. The biſhop of Baieux, the lord Waleran earle of S. Poule, ſir Guillam de Melin, ſir Nicholas Bracque, and ſir Iohn le Mercier came thither for the French king. And for the king of Scots there appeared the biſhop of Aberdeine, ſir Iames and ſir Dauid Lindſey, and ſir Walter Sankler, knights. After long treatie, and much a doo, at length a truce was concluded to begin at Midſummer next, and to laſt thrée years after.

Scholers of Oxford togither by the eares.

¶ In this yeare of Grace 1389, in the Lent time, there ſprang a pitifull ſtrife in Oxford, the variance in the yeare before being not fullie allaied, but both ſides alwaies prouoking ech other. For the Welſh ſcholers being euermore quarelous, and hauing the ſoutherlie ſcholers taking their parts, roſe againſt the ſcholers of the north, ſo that to and fro manie a deadlie miſchiefe happened betwéene them. In the end, this ſtrife did ſo increaſe, that there was a daie of ſkirmiſh appointed and agréed vpon by both ſides to be tried in the field. But by the meanes of Thomas of Woodſtoke duke of Glouceſter all this ſturre was appeaſed, and manie of the Welſh ſcholers baniſhed from the vniuerſitie. ¶ On the thurſdaie before Eaſter (being mawndaie thurſdaie) the lord Beaumont gardian of Carleill in the weſt marches entred Scotland fortie leagues, ⁊ ſpoiling Fowike, made waſt at his pleaſure, and brought awaie with him manie Scots priſoners ⁊ captiues. ¶ About this time a truce of thrée years was taken betwéene king Richard, the kings of France, Scotland, Spaine, Portingale, and of Nauarre. This truce began on the firſt daie of Auguſt in the néerer parts of the realme both by ſea and land; and on the fiftéenth of Auguſt in the further parts, becauſe knowledge could not be giuen thereof without ſome long time.

Truce of 3. years betwéene ſix kings.

The Scots in the time of treatie ſpoile the countrie of Northumberland.

Whileſt the commiſſioners were occupied in the marches betwixt Calis and Bullongne about this truce, the Scots entring into Northumberland, did much miſchiefe, leading awaie manie priſoners, men and women, beſides other great booties and preies which they got abroad in the countrie. The lord Thomas Mowbraie earle of Notingham was ſent with fiue hundred ſpears to reuenge thoſe attempts of the enimies: but for that his power was ſmall in compariſon to theirs, he preuailed litle or nothing againſt them. Sir Iohn Clanbow, and ſir Richard Rouale clerke, tooke the French kings oth; and the earle of ſaint Paule that had maried the ladie Maud Courtnie with other noblemen, came into England, and receiued the kings oth here for the confirming of this laſt mentioned truce. The Scots might not without much adoo be perſuaded to accept this truce, being readie the ſame time with an armie to enter into England, but yet through the diligence of ſuch Frenchmen as went thither for that purpoſe, at length they agréed.

The Scots hauing prouided an armie to inuade England are hardly perſuaded to accept the truce.

This yeare the king by counſell of ſome that were about him, called the nobles and great men of the realme togither, and as they were ſet in the councell chamber ſtaieng till he came: at length he entring into the ſame chamber, and taking his place to ſit among them, demanded of them, of what age he was now? Whereto anſwer was made, that he was full twentie years old. Then (ſaid he) I am of years ſufficient to gouerne mine owne houſe and familie, and alſo my kingdome: for it ſéemeth aginſt reaſon that the ſtate of the meaneſt perſon within my kingdome ſhould be better than mine. Euerie heire that is once come to the age of twentie years, is permitted, if his father be not liuing, to order his buſineſſe himſelfe: then that thing which is permitted to euerie other perſon of meane degrée by law, why is the ſame denied vnto me? Theſe words vttered he with the courage of a prince, not without the inſtigation and ſetting on of ſuch as were about him, whoſe drift was by diſcountenancing others to procure preferment to themſelues, abuſing the kings tender years and gréene wit, with ill counſell for their aduantage: where as it had béene more méete to haue giuen him thoſe precepts which Claudianus hath in his tract of the inſtitution of a prince; and among others this:

The kings queſtion to his lords and others in the councell chamber.

Claudian.

Non tibi quid liceat, ſed quid feciſſe decebit
Occurrat, mentémq; domet reſpectus honeſti.

When the barons had hard the words of the king, being therewith aſtonied, they made anſwer, that there ſhould be no right abridged from him, but that he might take vpon him the gouernment as of reaſon was due. Well ſaid he, yée know that I haue béene a long time ruled by tutors, ſo as it hath not béene lawfull to me to doo anie thing, were it of neuer ſo ſmall importance, without their conſents. Now therefore I will, that they meddle no further with matters perteining to my gouernment, ⁊ after the maner of an heire come to lawfull age, I will call to my councell ſuch as pleaſeth me, and I will deale in mine owne buſineſſe my ſelfe. And therfore I will firſt that the chancellor reſigne to me his ſeale. When the archbiſhop of Yorke (who in the yeare laſt paſt had béene remooued from Elie vnto Yorke, and Alexander Neuill diſplaced) had deliuered vnto him the ſeale, the king receiuing it of him, put it in his boſome, and ſuddenlie riſing, departed forth of the chamber, ⁊ after a little while returning, ſat downe againe, and deliuered the ſeale to the biſhop of Wincheſter, William Wickham, and ſo made him chancellor, although ſore againſt the ſame biſhops will. He made alſo manie other new officers, remoouing the old, and vſed in all things his owne diſcretion and authoritie. The duke of Glouceſter, the earle of Warwike, ⁊ other honorable and worthie men, were diſcharged and put from the councell, and others placed in their roomes, ſuch as pleaſed the king to appoint. At the ſame time he made fiue new iuſtices.

The king taking vpon him the gouernement of all things diſplaceth diuers officers ⁊ ſetteth others in their roomes.

Wickham biſhop of Wincheſter made L. chancellor.

Abr. Fl. out of Henrie Knighton canon of Leiceſter abbeie.

¶ Of this aſſuming the regiment to himſelfe, as diuerſe diuerſlie report: ſo Henrie Knighton a man liuing in thoſe daies, and committing to writing the occurrents of that tumultuous time, ſaith as followeth. In the moneth of Maie, the king held a councell at Weſtminſter, and in the feaſt of the Inuention of the croſſe, comming perſonallie to the councell houſe he remooued all the great officers (contrarie to expectation and thinking) from their offices, and at his pleaſure placed in their roomes whome he liſt. He remooued the archbiſhop of Yorke lord chancellor, and put in his place the biſhop of Wincheſter: he remooued the biſhop of Hereford lord treaſuror, and put another in his place: he remooued the clearke of the priuie ſeale, and all other: ſo likewiſe did he the iuſtices of either bench. But leaſt the affaires of the realme ſhould in the meane while be hindered, he commanded the iuſtices of law to follow and proſecute things requiſite as they were wont, till ſuch time as he was better aduiſed touching the prouiding of other iuſtices. The erle of Arundell likewiſe, vnto whome the gouernment of the parlement was committed, and the admeraltie of the ſea, was remoued; and the earle of Huntington put in his roome. In like ſort dealt the king with the reſidue of his officers, ſaieng that he ought not to be inferior in degree & of leſſe account than an other ordinarie heire whatſoeuer within the realme of England; ſith the law and cuſtome of the realme of England auerreth, that euerie heire being in the gardianſhip of anie lord, when he is growne to be one and twentie yeares of age, ought preſentlie to inioy the inheritance left him by his father, and is lawfullie to poſſeſſe his patrimonie, and freelie to diſpoſe and order his owne goods and chattels to his liking. But now it is come to paſſe, that I thus manie yeares haue liued vnder your counſell and gouernement; and now firſt to God, ſecondlie to you, I giue manifold thanks, that you haue gouerned and ſupported me, mine inheritance, and my realme of England, as well within as without, & ſpeciallie againſt our enimies round about vs, all renowme of honour and praiſe to vs and our kingdome alwaies ſafelie reſerued. But now God hath ſo dealt for vs, that we are of full age, ſo that we are two and twentie yeares old at this preſent: and we require that we may freelie and at libertie from this time forward rule and gouerne both our ſelues and our inheritance; and we will haue our kingdome in our owne hands, and officers and ſeruitors of our owne appointing at our pleaſure; ſecondlie, as ſhall ſeeme to vs more auaileable, by Gods grace, to elect, chooſe, and preferre vnto offices ſuch as we doo well like of, and at our pleaſure to remooue ſuch as be preſentlie reſiant, and in their roomes to ſubſtitute and ſet others whereſoeuer and whomſoeuer we liſt. The king hauing thus ſpoken, there was not one that went about to breake him of his will, but they all glorified God, who had prouided them ſuch a king, as was likelie to prooue diſcreet and wiſe.

Anno Reg.13.
wickleuiſts increaſe.

In this ſeaſon, the followers of Wickliffes doctrine maruellouſlie increaſed, ſpeciallie in the dioceſſe of Sarum, where they had manie that tooke vpon them as miniſters, both to preach the word, and to diſpenſe the ſacraments. This they did in ſecret: but they were diſcouered by one that had beene of their fellowſhip, who declared to the biſhop of Saliſburie at his manor of Sonning, all the whole circumſtances thereof, as he knew. There were of them that preached in thoſe daies earneſtlie againſt pilgrimages, calling ſuch images as the people had in moſt veneration, as that at Walſingham, and the rood of the north doore at Paules in London, rotten ſtocks, and worme eaten blocks, through which the vnſkilfull people being mocked and deceiued, were compelled moſt manifeſtlie to commit idolatrie. The biſhops (ſaith Thomas Walſingham) hearing, beholding, and knowing theſe things with much more, to be true, did little or nothing to redreſſe the ſame, ſaue onlie the biſhop of Norwich who ſtirred coles, ſwearing and ſtaring, that if anie of that ſect preſumed to preach anie peruerſe doctrine within his dioceſſe, he would cauſe them either to hop headleſſe, or to frie a fagot for it: he was therefore not a little praiſed and extolled by the monks and other religious men (as ſhould appeare) for that his zeale.

The duke of Lancaſter returneth into Englãd forth of Gaſcoigne.

A councell holden at Reding where ẏ duke of Lancaſter reconcileth the king and the lords.

In Nouember, the duke of Lancaſter came forth of Gaſcoigne into England, after he had remained firſt in Spaine, and after in Gaſcoigne, three yeares togither. Of his ſucceſſe in Spaine is ſpoken before, & likewiſe of the agreement betwixt the king of Caſtile, & the ſaid duke, which was not in all points confirmed, till a little before his returne now into England. About the ſame time the king had called a councell of his nobilitie at Reading, to the which the duke of Lancaſter made the more haſt to come, bicauſe he knew that the king would ſhew no good countenance to ſome of the noblemen; and therefore he doubted leaſt malicious offenſes might ariſe betwixt them, which to appeaſe he meant the beſt he could, and his trauell came to good effect: for he did ſo much, that as well the king as the lords departed from the councell as freends, the lords taking their leaues of him in louing maner, and he courteouſlie bidding them farewell: and ſo each of them reſorted vnto their homes well pleaſed for that preſent. ¶ The king held his Chriſtmaſſe this yeere at Woodſtoke, and the duke of Lancaſter laie at his caſtell of Hertford.

The earle of Penbroke as he was learning to iuſt is wounded to death.

At the ſame time the lord Iohn de Haſtings earle of Penbroke, as he was practiſing to learne to iuſt, through miſhap was ſtriken about the priuie parts, by a knight called ſir Iohn S. Iohn, that ran againſt him, ſo as his inner parts being periſhed, death preſentlie followed. The loſſe of this earle was greatlie bemoned by men of all degrees, for he was liberall, gentle, humble, and courteous to each one, aboue all the other yoong lords in the land of his time. Of this earles anceſtors this is reported for a thing ſtrange and maruelous, that from the daies of Aimer de Valence earle of Penbroke, that was one amongſt other that ſat in iudgement of Thomas earle of Lancaſter, there was not anie earle of Penbroke ſucceeding the ſame Aimer de Valence, vnto the daies of this yoong earle by misfortune thus ſlaine, that euer ſaw his father, nor yet anie of their fathers might reioiſe in the ſight of anie of their ſonnes, being ſtill called hence, before the time came for them ſo to doo.

Francis Thin, out of diuerſe ancient monuments belonging to the Haſtings and others.

¶ Now hére, bicauſe this Iohn Haſtings, being the laſt of that ſurname and armes of the whole blood, which of that line inioied anie title of honor, I thinke it not vnfit for this place (ſince other occaſion will not be giuen therefore) to talke of the Haſtings ſomwhat higher than this man: though not from the ſhell to perpetuate the memorie of them, the which I haue now doone, leaſt otherwiſe by ingrate obliuion it might neuer hereafter come to light. In which I will not begin from the firſt honourable Haſtings, whoſe bloud by manie deſcents continued, is thought by moſt ancient monuments, which I haue ſeene and read, to haue béene a baron before the conqueſt in this land, and to haue borne the ſame cote in the field, which this now ſlaine earle of Penbroke did: whereof hereafter in my deſcriptions and lines of the earles of Penbroke I will make more ample diſcourſe in a new booke (if God giue good ſucceſſe therein) onelie at this time making ſome ſmall repetition from that Henrie Haſtings, from whome the Haſtings (in reſpect of the mariage of Alda daughter to Dauie earle of Huntington, brother to William king of Scots) did deſcend: who (amongſt others) in the reigne of Edward the firſt, made title to the kingdome of Scotland. The originall of which name in this treatiſe I will neither flatteringlie defend, nor obſtinatlie reiect, to haue growne from Haſtings the Dane, who in the reigne of Alured (long before the conqueſt, about the yeare of our redemption 890) came with Rollo into England, and for a certeine ſpace infeſted this nation, departing aſide to France. And now to the purpoſe.

Henrie lord Haſtings (who bare for his armes gold a manche gules) married Alda (or Ada) the fourth daughter of Dauid earle of Huntington, ſhe being one of the heires to Iohn Scot earle of Cheſter, & of Huntington (which died without iſſue) ſon of the ſaid Dauid, and brother to the ſaid Ada. To this Henrie and Ada did Henrie the third king of England, in the two & twentith of his reigne (in place of the portion of hir brothers lands, which ſhould haue deſcended to hir as parcell of the earledome of Cheſter, for that the king would not haue the ſaid earledome diuided amongſt diſtaues) giue in exchange certeine lands mentioned in this deed following.

The grant of Henrie the third, to Henrie Haſtings and Ada his wife, for the exchange of lands for hir part of the earledome.

The which manours the ſaid Henrie and Ada did hold during the life of the ſaid Ada, in peaceable and quiet poſſeſſion. After hir death the ſaid Henrie goeth into Gaſcoigne, where he remained ſteward vntill the comming of Henrie the third, at what time the ſaid Henrie ſurrendered his office, but the king importunate with him ſtill to reteine the ſame, he flatlie denied it, and would no longer remaine there, ſuddenlie returning into England without licence or knowledge of the king, for which contempt the king greeuouſlie incenſed, in reuenge and for ſatiſfaction of the ſame, made the ſame lands to be extended by Thomas Paſlew and others, who by the kings proceſſe extended part thereof to a treble value, after which extent returned into the chancerie, the king ſeized the manour of Bremeſgraue, Boleſoure, Strattondale in Norton, & left in his hands the manours of Lierton, Oſwardbecke, Cundoner, Wourfeld, and Wigutton, whereof the ſaid Henrie died ſeized. Two yeares before which grant of the lands before ſaid to this Henrie, to wit, in the twentith yeare of Henrie the third, the ſaid Henrie Haſtings made his petition to ſerue in the pantree (as he was bound by tenure) at the coronation of euerie prince, the record whereof in the ancient written booke of the earls of Huntington, is in theſe words following.

The record by which Henrie Haſtings executed the office of the panteller.

VIceſimo Henr. tertij quo coronata fuit regina Elionara filia Hugonis comitis Prouinciæ apud Weſtm. factæ ſunt contentiones magnæ de ſeruitijs miniſtralibus, & de iuribus pertinentibus ad eorum miniſteria, ſed reſpectuatur, iuribus ſingulis ſaluis, vt tumultus requieſceret vſq; ad quindena Paſchæ ſequẽtis, &c. Et Henricus de Haſtinges, cuius officium ſeruiendi de mappis à veteri vendicauit officiũ illud, & habuit. Nam quamuis Thurſtanus vendicauit officium illud, aſſerens ſuum eſſe debere à veteri, tamen rex repulſat, & admiſit Henricum de Haſtinges, ea die aſſignans eiſdem diem de contentione finienda ad prædictum terminum. Extractas verò poſt prandium mappas tanquam ſuas ad officium pertinentes recepit.

This Henrie had by Ada his wife, his ſonne & heire Henrie Haſtings, from whome Buchanan dooth ſaie that Henrie Haſtings now earle of Penbroke is deſcended, whereof I will not now heere diſpute.

Henrie Haſtings knight, ſonne of Henrie, after the death of his father, finding himſelfe greeued that the inheritance, which ſhould haue deſcended vnto him from his mother, was ſo withholden from him for the offenſe of his father, contrarie to law and iuſtice, and without iudgement, but by the kings power, purſued a bill againſt the king, therby to haue remedie and reſtitution, for the ſuppoſed falſe returne of the extent which was made againſt his father; and vpon the ſame bill, this Henrie Haſtings obteined a new writ to make a freſh extent directed to maiſter Thomas of Wimundham, Robert de la Laie, Robert de Solham, Hugh Peeche, & Thomas de Braie, to vnderſtand if the remnant of the lands to him deſcended, beſide that by the king extended, would counteruaile the value of ſuch lands as he ſhould haue by deſcent from and of the earle and earledome of Cheſter, which matter neuer being ended in his time, was afterward proſecuted of the Haſtings from parlement to parlement, vntill the thirtie fourth yeare of Edward the firſt, as more plainelie ſhall after appeare. Of this Henrie, Hollingſhed intreateth much in the reigne of Henrie the third: this man (being he that in the time of Edward the firſt, made title to the crowne of Scotland) maried Ione one of the daughters of William Cantulpe lord of Aburgauenie, in the right of Eua, one of the daughters and heires of William Bewſa or Breweuſa, for I find both written, of which Ione this Henrie had iſſue Iohn Haſtings his ſonne and heire, Edmund which maried Iſabell, & had great poſſeſſions in Wales: Ada firſt maried to Robert de Champane: Lora maried to ſir Thomas the ſonne of ſir Iohn de Latimer, and Ione which was a nun at Notingham.

Iohn Haſtings knight, ſonne of the laſt Henrie, was borne at Aſleghe, in the yeere of our Lord 1262, and in the ſix & fortith yeare of the reigne of Henrie the third. This man after his fathers death did (in the yeare of our Lord 1274, and the ſecond yeare of the reigne of Edward the firſt, being the kings ward) demand the execution of his office of the pantrie, at the coronation of queene Elianor wife to Edward the firſt, but could not execute the ſame by reaſon of his nonage, and alſo for that he was in ward to the ſaid king. After, when he was growne to full yeares, there aroſe in the yeare of our Lord 1305, and in the thirtie third yeare of the reigne of Edward the firſt, great contention betweene Antonie Beake biſhop of Durham, this Iohn Haſtings, Iohn Balioll, and Robert Bruſe, for the manors of Penrith, Caſtleſoure, Salgkill regis, Lange Worthbie, Carlaton, and of Werkine Tinehale, whereof Henrie king of Scots (kinſman of the ſaid Robert Bruſe, Iohn Balioll, and Iohn Haſtings, whoſe heire they were) died ſeized in his demeſne of fee. In which ſutes after manie delaies made, and manie ſummons againſt the ſaid biſhop, the plée went without daie, bicauſe the biſhop muſt go to Rome. But after his returne the ſute being reuiued and continued, it went once more without daie, bicauſe the king ſeized the ſame into his hands, and held it all the time of his reigne. Theſe things thus doone, and Edward the firſt departed, this John Haſtings as yet not haſtie to renew his ſute of the land, but rather to execute his right of the pantrie, did in the firſt yeare of Edward the ſecond, demand the executing of that office, at the coronation of the ſaid Edward the ſecond and Jſabell his wife at Weſtminſter, which he obteined, and laid the clothes and napkins in the great hall by him and other his knights, one the tables whereat the king, the quéene, and other great ſtates ſhould dine, which (according as J haue ſéene noted) was in this ſort.

The order and number of clothes laied at the kings table, and how Iohn Haſtings had them for his fee.

Which petitions and all other petitions for his part of his land in the kings hands, by the cenſure made in the time of Henrie the 3, the ſaid John Haſtings lord of Aburgauennie did purſue from parlement to parlement, vntill the parlement holden at Yorke after Michaelmas, where ſupplication was made to the king, by him and others, that he might remaine with the king in Gaſcoigne, as his ſteward or marſhall: which if he would performe, all his forſaid petitions and all other petitions which were reaſonable, ſhould be granted vnto him. By occaſion whereof he granted vnto the kings and the nobles requeſt: ſo that the king would find him pledges due therefore, and that he might obteine iuſtice in his inheritances, and thoſe his lawfull ſutes, which had béene hitherto denied vnto him, which thing the king faithfullie promiſed in euerie reſpect to be performed towards him: whervpon he ſailed into Gaſcoigne, in the yeare of Chriſt 1302, being the 31 of Edward the firſt, the wedneſdaie after the feaſt of S. Lucie. But for this faire ſhew, it ſéemeth he ſped neuer the better: for which cauſe not being reſtored in the 34 yeare of Edward the firſt, he purſued his ſute afreſh, and had from the king at Yorke this definitiue ſentence, deliuered by the mouth of Walter Langhton, then the kings treaſuror (as J find by ſuch notes as J haue ſéene) that he ſhould ſéeke the records of the chancerie, and bring them to the next parlement, which the ſaid John did. At what time he brought forth the former grant of Henrie the third, of the ſaid lands giuen in recompenſe of his part of the earledome of Cheſter. After which yet it was agréed by the king and his councell for diuerſe conſiderations (and moſtlie (as J ſuppoſe) becauſe he had refuſed to ſerue in Gaſcoigne, and onelie went as it were inforced) notwithſtanding all that the ſaid John could alledge, that he ſhould take nothing for his petition, but further to be in the kings mercie for his falſe claime: the whole proceſſe whereof J haue ſéene in an ancient written monument of French. All which (as J gather) was done in the life of Edward the firſt (notwithſtanding that J haue a little vnorderlie before treated of the executing of his office of the pantrie at the coronation of Edward the ſecond, ſonne to Edward the firſt) as may be confirmed by Piers Longtoft in theſe verſes:

Et pour peril eſcheuer toutz apres promiſt

This John married two wiues both called Jſabell, whereof the firſt was Jſabell de Valence, one of the daughters and heirs of William Valence earle of Penbroke & lord of Aburgauennie, but how the ſaid Wil. Valence came to the honor of Aburgauennie, ſince William Cantelupe before named was once lord thereof, and much about that time, J can not yet certeinlie learne. But yet J following good authoritie haue ſet downe this Valence to be lord of Aburgauennie, & that he gaue the ſame to one John Haſtings, which muſt néeds be this man, marieng his daughter. The other wife of this John Haſtings, was Jſabell the daughter of Hugh Spenſer earle of Wincheſter. By his firſt wife he had ſix children, to wit, John Haſtings his heire, William Haſtings that maried Elianor the daughter of ſir William Martin, which died without heires; Henrie Haſtings that was a clerke, and Elizabeth Haſtings maried to Roger Greie lord of Ruthine ſonne of ſir John Greie, of whom is deſcended Henrie earle of Kent now liuing. Jone maried to Edmund Mortimer, by whom ſhe had no iſſue, being after maried to William de Huntingfield, by whom ſhe had Roger de Huntingfield: and Margaret Haſtings maried to William the ſonne of William Martin lord of Kemmies. By Jſabell Spenſer his ſecond wife, he had thrée children, to wit, Hugh Haſtings lord of Regiſtrum comitum de Huntington.

Folliot, of whom ſhall be more intreated, when we come to the laſt John Haſtings erle of Penbroke ſlaine at tilt, as before. Thomas Haſtings, and Pelagia de Huntington. His firſt wife Iſabell Valence died 1305, being the 31 of Edward the firſt, and was buried at the frier minors in Couentrie. His ſecond wife ouerliuing hir huſband, was after maried to ſir Raſe Monthermer, for which mariage the ſaid Raſe was fined by Edward the ſecond at a thouſand marks, as appeareth in the rols of the chancerie of 13 of Edward the ſecond: ſhe died the 9 of Edward the third, & was buried in the frier minors of Saliſburie. This John Haſtings departed this life 1313, the firſt yeare of the reigne of Edward the ſecond.

John Haſtings lord Haſtings and Aburgauennie, was borne in the fiftéenth yeare of Edward the firſt, in the yeare of Chriſt 1287. For at the death of his father, which happened (as before) in the firſt yeare of Edward the ſecond, he was found to be of the age of ſix & twentie years, which if it be added to the yeare of our Lord 1287, make vp the full number of 1313, in which his father died. This man in the eight yeare of Edward the ſecond at the parlement holden at London in the Carmelite friers, being about the yeare from the birth of Chriſt 1314, renewing the ſute to the king (after the death of Antonie Beke biſhop of Durham, which happened in the yeare of our Lord 1310) for the lands, whereof his father had the ſaid biſhop in ſute, and which were after ſeized into the kings hands, as before appeareth, in the life of his father. It was then found vpon ſearch, that ſir John Balioll (who was partie to the ſaid ſute before) had the realme of Scotland by award: by reaſon of certeine lands that he gaue to ſir Antonie de Beke the biſhop of Durham: for which cauſe it ſéemed king Edward the firſt ſeized the ſame lands into his hands as forfeit to him, in that they were after the maner of a bribe giuen to the ſaid biſhop, to ſupport the ſute of the ſaid John Balioll for the obteining of the crowne of Scotland. And for that cauſe this John Haſtings was counſelled by ſuch as willed him well, that he ſhould ſurceaſſe his ſute, and ſo he did. This John Haſtings maried Julian the daughter of Thomas lord Leiburne the ſonne of William lord Leiburne, and had by hir Laurence de Haſtings: after which this John Haſtings died in the eightéenth yeare of Edward the ſecond, and in the yeare of our Lord 1325. His wife Julian liued manie yéers after, and ſurrendred hir life in the fortie one yeare of Edward the third, and in the yeare of our Lord 1366.

Laurence Haſtings lord Haſtings and Aburgauennie, was alſo afterward earle of Penbroke, he was borne about the thirtéenth yeare of Edward the ſecond, being alſo about the yeare of our redemption 1320: which is proued by this, that the ſaid Laurence was fiue yeares old at the death of his father, which (as before is ſaid) happened in the yeare 1325, and in the eightéenth of Edward the ſecond, at what time he was ſeized as the kings ward, and committed to the gouernement of tutors, appointed him by the ſaid Edward the ſecond. This Laurence Haſtings for the nobilitie of his race, the actiuitie of him ſelfe, the largeneſſe of his poſſeſſions, and his familiaritie with the king, was created earle of Penbroke, about the one and thirtith yeare of the reigne of king Edward the third. He maried Anne or Agnes the third daughter of ſir Roger Mortimer the firſt earle of March, by whom he had iſſue John Haſtings.

John Haſtings earle of Penbroke lord Haſtings Aburgauennie and Weifford in Ireland, the ſonne of Laurence Haſtings the firſt earle of Penbroke of that name, did in the fortie one yeare of Edward the third, being about the yeare of our Lord 1369, infeoffe diuerſe perſons of the manor of Lidgate in Suffolke, of which towne was John Lidgate the monke of Berie and famous poet of England ſurnamed. After which in the fortie ſix yeare of Edward the third, and in the yeare of our Lord 1371, when the Frenchmen beſieged Rochell, he was ſent with an armie of men to the reſcue of the ſame. But being ſet vpon by the Spaniſh nauie in the hauen of Rochell, they ſlue and tooke manie of the Engliſh, burnt their nauie, and caried the earle with ſundrie other priſoners into Spaine; where this earle a long time remained priſoner. Which misfortune was iuſtlie ſuppoſed to haue fallen vpon him, becauſe he was a man of euill life, giuen greatlie to lecherie, an infringer of the liberties of the church, and a perſuader of the king that he ſhould (for his warres) more grieuouſlie exact manie ſubſidies and contributions vpon the clergie than vpon the laitie. After that he had béene long priſoner in Spaine (by the ſpace almoſt of thrée yeares) he was ranſomed for a grreat ſumme of monie, by Bertram Cleikine, and died (as I coniecture by ſome ſufficient proofe) betwéene Paris and Calis, as he came into England, in the fortie ninth yeare of Edward the third, in the yeare of our Lord 1374: ſo that he neuer fullie paied his ranſome. He had two wiues, Margaret the daughter of Edward the third, & Anne the daughter of ſir Walter Mannie and of Margaret Segraue made dutcheſſe of Northfolke in the time of Richard the ſecond: but when he maried theſe wiues, I can not certeinlie find. And in the earle of Kents booke (which treateth of the contention of the Haſtings and the Greies, for bearing of the armes of Haſtings) there is no mention made (as farre as my memorie ſerueth) of the ſaid Margaret; the reaſon whereof I ſuppoſe to be, for that this John Haſtings had no iſſue by hir: and that booke onelie ſerued to conueie a lineall deſcent from the Haſtings to intitle the Greies. This John Haſtings had by his ſecond wife (Anne) a ſonne called John Haſtings, which after ſuccéeded his father in all his inheritances.

But before I ſaie anie more of the Haſtings, I thinke it not amiſſe to giue ſome warning of an error in Polydor of Vrbin, writing that Anne the counteſſe of Penbroke (wife to this man, for none of the earles of Penbrokes had anie wife ſo named within the compaſſe of years wherein Polydor appointeth this time) deſcended of a noble houſe of S. Paule in France, a woman of great vertue, and a louer of learning and of learned men, founded a houſe in Cambridge, to this daie called Penbroke hall: which in truth was not builded by hir, but by Marie the wife of Odomare or Aimer de Valence earle of Penbroke, who was ſlaine at tilt in the one & twentie yeare of Edward the third, in the yeare of our Lord 1374: which was thirtie ſeauen yeares before the death of this John Haſtings earle of Penbroke: which Marie was in verie déede the daughter of Guie earle of S. Paule, the kinſwoman of Edward the third, and a French woman. This woman being in one daie (& that the daie of hir mariage) a maid, a wife, & a widow (hir huſband being that day ſlaine at tilt) did in hir widowhood (in the one & twentith yeare of Edward the 3, in the yeare of our Lord 1374) erect that houſe in Cambridge vpon hir owne ground, and appointed the ſame to be called the hall of Marie Valence, or Penbroke hall: by meanes whereof it was long after called Aula Valentiæ Mariæ.

Now to returne (where I left) to the laſt wife of this John Haſtings called Anne, ſhe (after the death of hir huſband) did at the coronation of Richard the ſecond, in the yeare of Chriſt 1382, being about the firſt yeare of the reigne of the ſaid Richard, ſue by petition to execute by hir deputie the office of the pantler, panteler by reaſon of the manor of Aſhley, which ſhe had for hir iointure, wherevnto ſhe was admitted, & by hir deputie ſir Thomas Blunt knight did performe the ſame: as this record doth teſtifie, in which is ſet both hir petitions, and the iudgement thereof in this forme.

The record whereby dame Anne Haſtings clameth the office of the pantrie.

ITem Anna quæ fuit vxor Iohannis Haſtings nuper comes Penbrochiæ porrexit in curia quandam petitionem ſuam in hæc verba. A treſhonore ſeigneur le duc de Lancaſt. & ſeneſcall d' Angliter ſupplie Anne que fuit le femme Iohn de Haſtinges nadgares countie de Penbroke, qui cõme le mannor de Aſheley in le com. de Northfolke ſoit tenens de noſtre ſeigneur le roy par le ſeruice de faire le office de napperie al coronement le roy, quel mannor ſoel tient en dower del dowement ſon dit baron. Ore pleſt luy accepter del faire ſon office perſon deputie, a ceſtie coronement noſtre ſeigneur le roye, pernant les fees du dit office ceaſtaſcauoir les nappes quant il ſont ſuſtreytz. Et quia poſt oſtenſionem veriſimilium euidentiarum & rationum ipſius Annæ, ac proclamationem in curia prædicta debitè factam, in hac parte nullus huiuſmodi clamor ipſius Annæ contradixit: conſideratum fuit quòd ipſa ad officium prædictum per ſufficientem deputatum ſuum faciendum admitteretur, & ſic officium illud per Thomam Blunt militem, quem ad hoc deputauit, dicto die coronationis in omnibus perfecit, & peracto prandio mappas de menſis ſubtractis pro feodo ſuo recepit.

Thus this much touching this Iohn Haſtings earle of Penbroke and dame Anne Mannie his wife.

Iohn haſtings (the ſonne of Iohn Haſtings laſt recited) was earle of Penbroke lord Haſtings Aburgauennie & Weiſford, who being verie yoong at the time of his fathers death, was ward firſt to Edward the third, and then to Richard the ſecond, but neuer ſaw his full age of one and twentie yeares, nor euer poſſeſſed the lands wherevnto he was borne: for not long after that he had married Philip the ſecond daughter of Edmund Mortimer (earle of March Vlſter and lord of Wigmore) he was [about the nineteenth yeare of his age, the fiftéenth yeare of king Richard the ſecond, and the yeare of our redemption 1391, being a youthfull and luſtie yoong gentleman (but tender and ſlender) in the Chriſtmaſſe time, when the K. held that feaſt at Woodſtoke in Oxfordſhire] willing to learne to iuſt, wher vpon in the parke then incountring with a knight called Iohn ſaint Iohn (a valiant and ſtout perſon) he was ſlaine when they ran togither, as the ſaid knight did caſt his ſpeare from him, and ſo the ſaid earle receiuing this manner of death, no man knew whether it happened by miſhap or of purpoſe. To which Iohn Haſtings now ſlaine, Margaret Segraue ducheſſe of Northfolke his grandmother (by his mother the daughter of ſir Walter Mannie) was executrix and diſpoſer of all his ſubſtance. After his death, his widow the ladie Philip was married to Richard earle of Arundell, & after that to Iohn lord ſaint Iohn, being the ſame man (as I ſuppoſe) which ſlue hir firſt huſband this Iohn Haſtings. But here before the death of this Iohn I muſt not forget, that though he were within age at the coronation of Richard the ſecond, as not being paſt nine or ten yeares old; he ſued to execute at the ſaid coronation, the offices which his anceſtors had afore performed. But bicauſe his mother had the mannor of Aſhley in dower (as is before expreſſed) he did not ſue to ſerue in the pantrie, but leauing that, demandeth the carieng of the ſecond ſword and the golden ſpurs before the king. The records of both which I haue here ſet downe.

The petition for the ſecond ſword which the earle of Arundell alſo claimed to beare, was in this ſort.

IOhannes de Haſtings nuper comes Penbrochiæ protulit quandam petitionẽ in hæc verba. A treſhonoree ſeigniour le duc de Lancaſtre & ſeneſchall d' Angleterre, Iohn fitz & heyre Iohn de Haſtinges counte de Penbroke, que cõme il tient le Chaſtell de la ville de Tynbye, le grange de Kingswood, le cõmote de Craytrath, le mannor de Chaſtell Martin, & le mannor de Traygaire per ſeruice de porter le ſecond eſpee deuant le roy a ſon coronement: qui pleaſt a luy, accepter a ſon dit office a faire ore a ceſte coronement. Et ſuper hoc Richardus comes Arundell & Surrey exhibuit in curia quandã aliam petitionẽ in hæc verba. A roy de Chaſtell & de Lion duc de Lancaſtre & ſeneſcall d' Angleterre, ſupplie Richard counte de Arundell & Surrey, de luy receuer a faire ſon office, a porter le ſecond eſpee deuant le roy ore a ſon coronement, que luy appertient de droit pur le countie de Surrey. Quibus petitionibus intellectis & auditis, & hinc inde dictorum comitum rationibus, pro eo quòd dictus Iohannes comes Penbrochiæ (qui infra ætatẽ in cuſtodia regis exiſtit) oſtendit curiæ meliores & veriſimiliores rationes pro ſe, quàm prædictus comes Arundell pro ipſo monſtrauit. Dominus rex declarata coram eo materia prædicta, præcepit Edmundo comiti mariſcallo, quòd ipſe gladium prædictum iſta vice in nomine iure prædicti comitis Penbrochiæ deferret, ſaluo iure alterius cuiuſcunq;. Qui quidem mariſcallus gladium illum ex hac cauſa die coronationis geſtabat calcaribus deauratis.

The other bill exhibited for the golden ſpurs, is regiſtred in this order.

IOhannes filius & hæres Iohannis de Haſtings nuper comitis Pẽbrochiæ exhibuit in curia quandam petitionem in hæc verba. A treſhonore ſeigneur le roy de Chaſtell, &c. Et ſeneſchall d' Angliterre, ſupplie Iohne fitz & heyre Iohne Haſtings nadgares counte de Penbroke, de eſtre receue a ſon office de porter les grandes eſperon, d'oores deuant le roy noſtre ſeigneur ore a ſon coronement, en mannor cõme William le mariſchall ſon anceſter les porta il coronoment de roy. Edw. audita & intellecta billa prædicta, pro eo quòd Iohannes eſt infra ætatem & in cuſtodia domini regis, quanquam ſufficientes oſtendit curiæ recorda & euidẽtias, quòd ipſe ſeruitium prædictum de iure facere deberet; conſideratum extitit, quòd eſſet ad voluntatem regis, quis dictum ſeruitium iſta vice in iure ipſius Iohannis faceret. Et ſuper hoc rex aſſignabat Edmundum comitẽ mariſcallum, ad deferẽdum dicto die coronationis prædicta calcaria in iure ipſius hæredis. Saluo iure alterius cuiuſcunque, & ſic idem comes mariſcallus illa calcaria prædicta in dicto die coronationis coram ipſo domino rege deferebat.

In this John Haſtings ended all the honorable titles of the Haſtings, bicauſe this man dieng without iſſue, his inheritances were diſperſed to diuerſe perſons; for the honour of Penbroke came to Francis at court by the kings gift, the baronies of Haſtings and Weiſford came to Reinold Greie of Ruthine, the baronie of Aburgauennie was granted to William Beauchampe of Bedford: for all which lands, and for the bearing of the armes of this ſame John Haſtings without difference, great contention grew betwéene ſir Edward Haſtings knight (deſcended of Iſabell Spenſer) and Reinold Greie lord Greie of Ruthine, ſonne of Reinold Greie, ſonne of Roger Greie, that married Elizabeth daughter of Iſabell Valence, for both the ſaid lord Greie and ſir Edward Haſtings were deſcended by two venters (as partlie before and partlie hereafter ſhalbe ſhewed) from one man John Haſtings, husband to both ſaid Iſabels. For the explanation whereof, and lineall deſcent to conueie the ſaid ſir Edward Haſtings from the ſaid John Haſtings, firſt lord of Aburgauennie of that ſurname; I muſt here repeat a little of that which I haue alreadie written: which is, that the ſaid John Haſtings firſt lord of Aburgauennie, hauing two wiues, both Iſabels, by his firſt wife Iſabell Valence had Elizabeth maried to Roger Greie, and by his ſecond wife Iſabell Spenſer, he had iſſue ſir Hugh Haſtings knight, from whome we are to deduce the ſaid ſir Edward Haſtings in this ſort. Hugh Haſtings knight lord of Folliot (in the right of his wife) being ſonne of the ſecond wombe of Iſabell Spenſer, and John Haſtings ſonne of Henrie Haſtings married Margerie the daughter and heire of ſir Richard Folliot, by whom he came to be lord of Folliot, and alwaies bare the armes of Haſtings with a difference of a ſecond brother of a ſecond venter. This marriage was procured and made by Iſabell his mother, who purchaſed the ſaid ward for him. This Hugh died in the yeare of Chriſt 1347, in the one and twentith yeare of Edward the third, and was buried in the church of Elſing, in Elſrug in Northfolke which he builded; his wife Margerie died in the yeare 1349, being the thrée and twentith yeare of Edward the third, and was buried in the chappell of Fornewell. This Hugh had iſſue by his wife Hugh Haſtings his heire, and a daughter married to ſir Robert de la Mare.

Hugh Haſtings knight, the ſonne of Hugh and Margerie Folliot did marrie the daughter of Adam de Eueringham, by whom he had Hugh Haſtings his ſonne and heire, and two daughters, the one married to Winkfield, and the other to a knight called Elmham. This Hugh died at Calkewelhell or Gwines, and was buried in the friers of Doncaſter, in the yeare of our Lord 1369, about the foure & fortith yéere of Edward the third. This man for him and his heires in difference from the other Haſtings, earles of Penbroke his kinſmen by the halfe blood, did beare the Haſtings armes with the labell, quartered with the armes of Folliot. Hugh Haſtings knight the ſonne of Hugh and Margaret Eueringham married Anne the daughter of Edward Spenſer earle of Gloceſter, by whom he had iſſue Hugh Haſtings and Edward Haſtings, which contended with Reinold Greie lord of Ruthine. This Hugh tooke his pilgrimage to Jeruſalem & died in Spaine, after whoſe death dame Anne Spenſer his wife was maried to Thomas lord Morleie. Hugh Haſtings eldeſt ſon of Hugh Haſtings and dame Anne Spenſer, married the daughter of ſir Wil. Blunt knight; this Hugh died at Calis at the mariage of Richard the ſecond, to Iſabell the daughter of the king of France, about the 19 yeare of the reigne of the ſaid Richard, being the yeare of our redemption 1395, who dieng without iſſue, all his right and title came to his brother Edward.

Edward Haſtings knight brother of the laſt Hugh began the contention with Reinold Greie lord of Ruthine, for the right of the lands, honors, and armes without difference of the laſt John Haſtings earle of Penbroke. This ſute began about the eight yeare of Henrie the fourth, and continued at leaſt vntill the fift yeare of Henrie the fift, if not longer; but in the end (notwithſtanding manie falſe pedegrées counterfeited by this Haſtings, and his vncle Henrie biſhop of Norwich, one of the houſe of the Spenſers) yet it was adiudged againſt the ſaid ſir Edward Haſtings in the marſhals court, that the lands, honors, and armes without difference, as the laſt John Haſtings earle of Penbroke did beare them, with the armes of William Valence earle of Penbroke, ſhould be onelie borne by the ſaid lord Greie of Ruthine and his heires, as being of the whole blood, and next heire to the ſaid laſt John Haſtings earle of Penbroke: and that the ſaid Edward Haſtings ſhould vtterlie be barred to beare the armes of Haſtings, but quartered with the armes of Folliot, as onelie deſcending of the halfe blood to the ſaid laſt earle of Penbroke of that name. And that all other pedegrées what ſo euer (except this) are falſe, and of purpoſe contriued, as appeareth by a notable booke and monument thereof remaining in the hands of Henrie Greie now earle of Kent (deſcended of the ſaid Reinold Greie of Ruthine) conteining all the proceſſe, examinations, witneſſes, pedegrées & iudgements thereof, more plainelie maie appeare. In which contention there was ſhewed a matter by the depoſition of ſir William Hoo knight not vnworthie to be remembred (though it touch not the Haſtings) concerning armorie and bearing of differences in armes, which was, that the ſaid ſir William ſaid on his oth in the tenth yeare of Henrie the fourth, that before the times of Edward the third, the labell of thrée points was the different appropriat and appurtenant for the cognizance of the next heire; but the ſame king made his ſons to beare the entire armes with labels of thrée points, with certeine differences in the ſaid labels, to be knowen the one from the other, except his ſonne the duke of Gloceſter, who bare a border about the armes of France and England. And thus, this much Francis Thin touching the name of Haſtings.

In this yeare Thomas earle of Lancaſter, for the opinion which had béene conceiued of him, by reaſon of miracles and other reſpects, was canonized for a ſaint. The mondaie next after the feaſt of ſaint Hilarie, a parlement was begun at Weſtminſter, in which there was a bill exhibited by the commons, that the lords and great men of the realme ſhould not giue to their men badges to weare as their cognizances; by reaſon that through the abuſe thereof, manie great oppreſſions, imbraceries, vnlawfull maintenances, and wrongs were practiſed, to the hinderance of all good orders, lawes, and iuſtice. The lords would not conſent altogither to laie downe their badges; but yet they agréed that none ſhould weare any ſuch cognizance except their ſeruants of houſhold, and ſuch as were in ordinarie wages by the yeare. ¶ In the ſame parlement, certeine perſons that had gone about ſome new rebellion in Kent, being apprehended, were condemned, and ſo were drawne and hanged. ¶ There was alſo an act made againſt ſuch as ſhould paſſe the ſeas, to purchaſe prouiſions (as they termed them) in any church or churches. And if any from thenceforth attempted ſo to doo, he ſhould be reputed and taken as a rebell. Alſo there was an act prouided againſt thoſe that committed any wilfull murder, that none ſhould preſume Moreouer, in this parlement it was granted, that the king ſhould haue of euerie ſacke of wooll fortie ſhillings, of the which ten ſhillings ſhould be applied preſentlie to the kings vſes, and thirtie ſhillings reſidus of the fourtie ſhillings ſhould remaine in the hands of the treaſurors, towards the bearing forth of the charges of wars when any chanced. ¶ Alſo there was a ſubſidie granted of ſix pence in the pound, foure pence to the vſe laſt mentioned, and two pence to be imploied at the kings pleaſure. In the ſame parlement, Iohn duke of Lancaſter was created duke of Aquitaine, receiuing at the kings hand the rod and cap, as inueſtures of that dignitie. Alſo the duke of Yorke his ſonne and heire was created earle of Rutland. In the fift of March a ſore and terrible wind roſe, with the violence whereof, much hurt was done, houſes ouerthrowne, cattell deſtroied, and trées ouerturned. After this inſued great mortalitie by peſtilence, ſo that much youth died euerie where, in cities and townes, in paſſing great numbers. Herewith followed a great dearth of corne, ſo that a buſhell of wheat in ſome places was ſold at thirtéene pence, which was thought to be at a great price. ¶ About the feaſt of S. Peter ad Vincula, Iohn duke of Lancaſter cauſed a great méeting of the nobles and péeres of the realme to hunt at Leiceſter in the foreſt and all the parkes there to him apperteining. On the ſaturdaie the king and quéene were preſent, the archbiſhop of Yorke, the duke of Yorke, Thomas Woodſtoke duke of Gloceſter, the earle of Arundell Iohn of Holland, the earle of Huntington, with other biſhops, lords and ladies a great manie, and on thurſdaie next following the king departing from thence towards Notingham ſoiourned with the lord of Beaumont beſides Loughborow.

A iournie againſt the Saracens.

Anno Reg. 14.

The Engliſh archers good ſeruice.

In this thirtéenth yeare of king Richards reigne, the chriſtians tooke in hand a iournie againſt the Saracens of Barbarie, through ſute of the Genowais, ſo that there went a great number of lords, knights, and gentlemen of France and England, the duke of Burbon being their generall. Out of England there went one Iohn de Beaufort baſtard ſon to the duke of Lancaſter (as Froiſſard hath noted) alſo ſir Iohn Ruſſell, ſir Iohn Butler and others. They ſet forward in the latter end of this thirtéenth yeare, and came to Genoa, where they remained not long, but that the gallies and other veſſels of the Genowais were readie to paſſe them ouer into Barbarie. And ſo about Midſummer in the beginning of the fourtéenth yeare of this kings reigne, the whole armie being imbarked, ſailed forth to the coaſts of Barbarie, where neare to the citie of Affrike they landed, at which inſtant the Engliſh archers (as ſome write) ſtood all the companie in good ſtead, with their long bowes, beating backe the enimies from the ſhore, which came downe to reſiſt their landing.

Thom. Walſ.

The earle of Derbie his exploits in his iournie againſt the infidels of Prutzenland.

After they had got to land, they inuironed the citie of Affrike (called by the moores Mahemedia) with a ſtrong ſiege: but at length conſtrained with the intemperancie of the ſcalding aire in that hot countrie, bréeding in the armie ſundrie diſeaſes, they fell to a compoſition vpon certeine articles to be performed in the behalfe of the Saracens, and ſo 61 daies after their firſt arriuall there, they tooke the ſeas againe, & returned home, as in the hiſtories of France and Italie is likewiſe expreſſed. Where, by Polydor Virgil it may ſéeme, that the lord Henrie of Lancaſter earle of Derbie, ſhould be capteine of the Engliſh men, that (as before ye haue heard) went into Barbarie with the Frenchmen, and Genowais. It ſhould otherwiſe appeare by other writers, who affirme that the ſaid earle made a iournie in déed the ſame time againſt the miſcreants, not into Barbarie, but into Prutzenland, where he ſhewed good proofe of his noble and valiant courage: for ioining with the maſters and knights of the Dutch order there, the armie of the Lithuanians that came againſt the ſaid order was vanquiſhed, and foure chiefe leaders of the Lithuanians were taken priſoners, thrée other being ſlaine, with thrée hundred of their chiefeſt and beſt approoued ſoldiers. Through the policie alſo and worthie manhood of the earle of Derbie, there was a certeine citie taken, where the ſaid earle and his men firſt entring vpon the walles, did ſet vp his banner: other being ſlouthfull, or at the leaſt vnſkilfull how to deale in ſuch exploits. There were taken and ſlaine foure thouſand of the common people, and amongſt them that were found dead, the king of Pologníes brother was one. The caſtell of the ſame citie was beſieged fiue wéekes ſpace: but by reaſon of ſickeneſſe and ſuch infirmities as chanced in the armie, the maſters of Prutzen, and Lifeland would not tarie any longer, but brake vp their ſiege and returned. The maſter of Lifeland led with him into his countrie thrée thouſand priſoners.

A roiall iuſts holden in Smithfield at London.

The manner of the iuſts in Smithfield.

Siluer ſaith Froiſſard.

In the meane time, whileſt the chriſtians were thus occupied, as well againſt the infidels in Barbarie, as in the eaſt parts towards Littawe, a roiall iuſts and martiall turnament was proclaimed to be holden within Smithfield in London, to begin on ſundaie next after the feaſt of ſaint Michaell. And bicauſe this triumphant paſtime was publiſhed, not onelie in England, but alſo in Scotland, in Almaine, in Flanders, in Brabant, in Heinault, & in France, manie ſtrangers came hither forth of diuerſe countries, namelie Waleran erle of ſaint Paule, that had married king Richards ſiſter the ladie Mauld de Courtnie, and William the yoong erle of Oſteruant, ſonne to Albert de Bauiere earle of Holland and Heinault. At the daie appointed, when all things were prepared, there iſſued forth of the tower about thrée of the clocke in the after noone ſixtie courſers apparelled for the iuſtes, and vpon euerie one an eſquier of honor, riding a ſoft pace. Then came forth foure and twentie ladies of honour (thrée ſcore ſaith Froiſſard) mounted on palfries, riding on the one ſide richlie apparelled, and euerie ladie led a knight with a chaine of gold. Thoſe knights being on the kings part, had their armor and apparell garniſhed with white hearts and crownes of gold about their necks, and ſo they came riding through the ſtréets of London vnto Smithfield, with a great number of trumpets and other inſtruments before them.

The king and the quéene, with manie other great ſtates were readie placed in chambers richlie adorned to ſée the iuſts: and when the ladies that led the knights, were come to the place, they were taken downe from their palfries, and went vp into chambers readie prepared for them. Then alighted the eſquires of honor from their courſers, & the knights in good order mounted vpon them. And ſo when their helmets were ſet on their heads, and that they were redie in all points, after proclamations made by the heraults, the iuſts began, and manie commendable courſes were run, to the great pleaſure, comfort, and recreation of the king, the quéene, and all other the beholders. The priſe that daie on the anſwerers part was giuen to the earle of ſaint Paule; and on the chalengers ſide, to the earle of Huntington. On the mondaie, the king himſelfe, with dukes, earls, lords, and knights, came to the iuſts, he being chéefe of the inner part. That daie the priſe was giuen to the erle of Oſteruant, for the beſt dooer of the vtter part: and of the inner part, to a knight of England called ſir Hugh Spenſer. On the tueſdaie, all manner of eſquiers iuſted, and likewiſe on the wedneſday all maner of knights and eſquires that would, on which daie was a ſore and rude iuſts, enduring till night. And ſo manie a noble courſe and other martiall feats were atchiued in thoſe foure daies, to the great contentation and pleaſure of manie a yoong batcheler deſirous to win fame, & alſo highlie to the kings honour, who by all that ſeaſon held his court in the biſhops palace by Paules church, keeping open houſhold for all honeſt perſons that thither reſorted, eſpeciallie euerie night after the iuſts were ended, a right ſumptuous and princelie ſupper was prepared for the ſtrangers and other, and after ſupper, the time was ſpent in danſing and reuelling after the moſt courtlike maner. On the thurſdaie, the king made a ſupper to all the lords, knights, and gentlemen ſtrangers, and the queene to all the ladies and gentlewomen. On the fridaie the duke of Lancaſter feaſted at dinner all the ſaid lords, knights, and gentlemen ſtrangers, in moſt ſumptuous and plentifull maner. On the ſaturdaie, the king and all the whole companie departed from London vnto Windſore, where new feaſting began, and ſpeciallie the king did all the honour that might be deuiſed vnto the earls of ſaint Paule and Oſteruant. The earle of Oſteruant, at the earneſt requeſt of the king, receiued of him the order of the Garter, for the which he was euill thought of afterwards by his freends, namelie the French king and others. Finallie, after the king had thus feaſted the ſtrangers and others at Windſore, each man tooke leaue of the king, the queene, and the kings vncles, and other lords and ladies, and ſo departed, the ſtrangers into their owne countries, and other home to their houſes, or whither they thought beſt.

The king kept opē houſhold in the biſhop of London his palace by Paules church.

¶This ſolemne iuſts or tornement being touched, or rather in ample maner deſcribed by Ch. Hauing thus deſcribed the place where the iuſts ſhould be kept, with the rewards, and other circumſtances; he toucheth the countries from whence the forren nobilitie came, that ſhould vndertake triall of chiualrie with theſe foure and twentie challengers: who at the daie appointed (ſaith he) came pranſing out of the Towre vpon their great barded horſſes through the broad ſtreets, and their ladies of honor with them gorgiouſlie decked with bracelets, owches, cheines, iewels, ſpangles, and verie ſumptuous attire: a goodlie ſight for the people to behold. At laſt, when they were come to Smithfield, and althings readie, the trumpets ſounded to the exerciſe; and both parties, as well the Engliſh as the outlandiſh cheualiers ran togither, and tried their ſtrengths till they did ſweat and were tired, their horſſes panting and braieng with the violence of their bodilie motion; their ſtaues being craſht in ſunder, flue vp into the aire, and the broken ſtocke or ſtumpe hitting the aduerſarie ouerthrew him to the ground: the beholders with ioy of heart gaue a ſhout thereat, as greatlie delighted with the ſight. Then came the night and brake off the firſt daies tornement. On the next daie when they ſhould renew and fall afreſh vnto it againe, they ſhewed themſelues in courage equall to their anceſtors, and handled their matters ſo well, that they got them great renowme. The third daie came, and the multitude of people ſtill gathered togither woondered at the right valiant deeds of the valorous horſſemen, how they did toſſe, hoiſſe vp, and wind their ſpeares, and with what force they vſed their armes, what courage appeared in their ſtatelie horſſes, and how the verie heauens rang with the ratling of their armor, and the ſtrokes giuen to and fro. Euerie daie brought with it his portion of pleaſure, both to the contenders, and to the beholders. When the time was expired of this tried chiualrie, neceſſarie occaſion moued the king of England to ſet his mind on other matters, ſo that commending the proweſſe of the outlandiſh lords, he beſtowed vpon them maſſie cheines of gold, & loding them with other gifts of great valure, diſmiſſed them into their countries. But the Engliſh challengers required nothing but renowme for their reward, being allured onelie with the loue of praiſe; and thus when theſe paſtimes of chiualrie were quite ended, euerie man got him home to his owne houſe. Ambaſſadors from the French king for a perpetuall peace.

Froiſſard.

Ambaſſadors were ſent from the French king, vnto the king of England, to make an ouerture of peace to be had, and to indure for euer betwixt the two realmes of England and France, ſith that by warre it was apparant inough, that neither realme, could greatlie benefit it ſelfe, but rather ſore indamage either other, as afore time it had come apparantlie to paſſe. Therefore the matter being well conſidered, both parts ſeemed well affected towards ſome good concluſion by treatie to be had of a full and perfect peace. About the ſame time, by the king with the aduiſe of his councell, proclamation was made and publiſhed at London, that all beneficed men abiding in the court of Rome, being Engliſhmen borne, ſhould returne home into England before the feaſt of S. Nicholas, vnder paine to forfeit all their benefices; and ſuch as were not beneficed, vnder a paine likewiſe limited. The Engliſhmen hearing ſuch a thunder clap a farre off, fearing the blow, left the popes court, and returned into their natiue ſoile.

A proclamatiō that all Engliſh beneficed men in Rome ſhould returne into England.

The pope troubled with ſuch a rumbling noiſe, ſent in all haſt an abbat as his nuncio vnto the king of England, as well to vnderſtand the cauſes of this proclamation, as of ſtatutes deuiſed and made latelie in parlement againſt thoſe that prouided themſelues of benefices in the court of Rome by the popes buls, which ſeemed not a little preiudiciall to the church of Rome: in conſideration whereof the ſaid nuncio required that the ſame ſtatutes might be repealed and aboliſhed, ſo farre as they tended to the derogation of the church liberties: but if the ſame ſtatutes were not aboliſhed; the pope might not (ſaid his nuncio) with a ſafe conſcience otherwiſe doo than proceed againſt them that made thoſe ſtatutes, in ſuch order as the canons did appoint. Moreouer the ſaid nuncio declared to the king certeine dangerous practiſes betwixt the antipape and the French king, as to make the duke of Touraine the French kings brother king of Tuſcane and Lombardie, and to eſtabliſh the duke of Aniou in the kingdome of Sicile.

The popes nuncio openeth to the king the Frẽch kings priuie practiſes.

Nuncio.

Moreouer, he gaue the king to vnderſtand, that if the French king might compaſſe by the antipapes meanes to be choſen emperour, he would ſeeke to vſurpe vpon ech mans right, and therefore it ſtood the king of England chieflie in hand to prouide againſt ſuch practiſes in time. And as for the treatie of peace which the Frenchmen ſeemed ſo much to fauour, it was to none other end, but that vpon agreement once had, they might more conuenientlie compaſſe their purpoſe in the premiſſes. Furthermore the nuncio earneſtlie beſought the king of aid in the popes behalfe againſt the French king, if (as he threatned to doo) he ſhould inuade him in Italie with open force. The king ſeemed to giue fauourable eare vnto the nuncio, and after aduiſe taken, appointed to ſtaie till after Michaelmaſſe, at what time a parlement was appointed to be aſſembled, wherein ſuch things as he had proponed ſhould be weied and conſidered, and ſome concluſion taken therein.

Abr. Fl. out of Henrie Knighton canon of Leiceſter abbeie.

A ſore bridle for the clergie.

About this time or in the yeare 1391, according to Henrie Knightons account, there was a prophane ſtatute made againſt the church & churchmen; namelie, that no eccleſiaſticall perſon or perſons ſhould poſſeſſe manors, glebeland, houſes, poſſeſſions, lands, reuenues or rents whatſoeuer, at the hands of the feoffer, without the kings licence & the chiefe lords. And this ſtatute extended it ſelfe, as well to pariſh churches, chappels, chanteries, as abbeies, priories, & other monaſteries whatſoeuer: likewiſe to citizens of cities, to farmers, & burgeſſes, hauing ſuch rents or poſſeſſions for the common profit. For men in thoſe daies, that would beſtow land or liuelod vpon church, fraternitie, or conuent, and were not able for coſt and charges to procure a mortmane, vnder the kings licence and chiefe lords; were wont to feoffe ſome ſpeciall men, in whom they had confidence and truſt; vnder whoſe name and title, churchmen, or anie other fraternitie or conuent might inioy the profit of the gift, and might haue the commoditie thereof in poſſeſſion. And it was prouided by that ſtatute, that all and euerie as well perſons eccleſiaſticall as pariſhioners, both citizens, burgeſſes, and farmers, or anie other whatſoeuer, hauing ſuch rents, poſſeſſions, manors, or anie reuenues whatſoeuer, in the hands of ſuch feoffers, without the licence of the king and chiefe lords; that either they ſhould obteine and get a licence of the king and the chiefe lords to make it a mortmaine; or elſe ſet ſuch things to ſale, & raiſe profit of them, on this ſide or before the feaſt of Michaelmaſſe next inſuing: or the ſaid feaſt being paſt and expired, that then the king and the chiefe lords, in things not ordered and diſpoſed accordinglie, may enter and ſeize vpon the ſame, and them haue and hold at his and their pleaſure.

The duke of Gloceſter his iournie into Prutzen land.

The duke of Gloceſter in great fauor with the commons.

About the ſame time, the duke of Gloceſter went into Prutzen land, to the great griefe of the people, that made account of his departure, as if the ſunne had beene taken from the earth, doubting ſome miſhap to follow to the common wealth by his abſence, whoſe preſence they thought ſufficient to ſtay all detriments that might chance, for in him the hope of the commons onelie reſted. In his returne home, he was ſore tormented with rough weather and tempeſtuous ſeas. At length he arriued in Northumberland, and came to the caſtell of Tinmouth, as to a ſanctuarie knowen to him of old, where after he had refreſhed him certeine daies, he tooke his iournie homewards to Plaſchie in Eſſex, bringing no ſmall ioy for his ſafe returne to all the kingdome. ¶ On the ninth of Iulie the ſunne ſeemed darkened with certeine groſſe and euill fauored clouds comming betwixt it and the earth, ſo as it appeared ruddie, but gaue no light from noone till the ſetting thereof. And afterwards continuallie for the ſpace of ſix weeks, about the middeſt of the daie, clouds cuſtomablie roſe, and ſometimes they continued both daie and night, not vaniſhing awaie at all. ¶ At the ſame time, ſuch a mortalitie and death of people increaſed in Northfolke, and in manie other countries of England, that it ſeemed not vnlike the ſeaſon of the great peſtilence. In the citie of Yorke there died eleuen thouſand within a ſhort ſpace. ¶ Henrie Perſie earle of Northumberland lieutenant of Calis, was called home from that charge, and created warden of the marches againſt Scotland, and Robert Mowbraie was ſent to Calis to be the kings lieutenant there.

A great death in Yorke and ſundrie other places.

A parlement at London.

On friday next after All ſoules day, the parlement began at London, in which the knights would in no wiſe agrée, that the ſtatute made againſt ſpirituall men, for the prouiding themſelues of benefices in the court of Rome ſhould be repealed: but yet they agreed thus much, that it ſhould be tollerated, ſo as with the kings licence ſuch ſpirituall men might purchaſe to themſelues ſuch benefices till the next parlement. ¶ In this parlement aforſaid, there was granted vnto our lord the king one tenth of the clergie, and one fifteenth of the people towards the expenſes of Iohn duke of Lancaſter, who in Lent next following went ouer into France to the citie of Amiens for a finall peace betweene the kingdoms of England and France: where the king of France met him with a ſhew of great pompe and honor, ſending before him firſt of all to welcome him thither the citizens of the ſame citie on horſſebacke in a verie great number. Then afterwards, he ſent earles and barons a great manie to the ſame end, then his two vncles, laſt of all went the king himſelfe to meet him, and ſaluting him called him by the name of The moſt worthie warrior of all chriſtendome, the inuincible worthineſſe of the king onelie excepted. And the duke had ſeauenteene daies (by couenant) to compaſſe this treatie of peace: at laſt he returned, hauing attendant vpon him in his traine the biſhop of Durham, and the ſonne of the duke of Yorke the earle of Rutland, with a thouſand horſſemen, ſet forth in a wonderfull ſumptuous ſort with goodlie furniture. ¶ Alſo conditionallie a whole tenth and a whole fifteenth were granted to him, if it chanced that he made anie iournie that yeare againſt the Scots. ¶ In this yeare, the duke of Gelderland ſent to the king of England letters of commendation & praiſe, wherein alſo were prouocations and ſtirrings vp to warre and warlike actiuitie, and to the exerciſe of kinglie nobleneſſe, the tenor whereof followeth:

MOſt mightie prince, your roiall proweſſe and the counſels of the ſage, ſhould altogither (as we thinke) moue you in dutie, by the moſt profound & deepe foreſight of your diſcretion in time to mainteine and defend all and ſingular your rights & inheritance vnharmed; which by birth doo magnifie and make great your roiall maieſtie, and if anie violence whatſoeuer gainſtand & aſſault the ſame, your kinglie diligence ſhould indeuor with the ſhield of a warrior valiantlie to defend your title and right. And bicauſe we are neere you, & doo as it were touch your roiall perſon in aliance, vnleſſe God himſelfe doo forbid and hinder vs, we will alwaies be readie in all your rights to aſſiſt and aid you with two thouſand pikes, when and how often ſoeuer you ſhall be diſpoſed to ruſh out to battell. Your right ought not to be loſt for words and promiſes, howſoeuer the craftineſſe of the French labor to this purpoſe. Trulie moſt excellent prince, your renowme doth flie into the world, neither is it doubted but for your wooll ſake, and other your ſingular commodities being innumerable (without the which the eaſt and the ſouth can not liue) all realmes with their coines doo greet you. Therefore ô moſt puiſſant prince, let not the hart of a lion ſleepe in cowardlineſſe againſt nature: but what force and valiantneſſe nature hath giuen you, the ſame vouchſafe to put in practiſe with feats of armes in defenſe of your common wealth, the maintenance of your right by inheritance, the increaſe of your deſert, and the peereleſſe proweſſe of ſo great a kings couragious hart right worthie to be chronicled.

The flix gotten by exceſſiue féeding on fruits.

The lord maior of London commended for his carefull prouiſion of corne from beyond the ſeas in the time of dearth.

The price of corne that had continued at an high rate, almoſt for the ſpace of two yeares, began to fall immediatlie after harueſt was got in, to the great reliefe of the poore, which before through immoderate eating of nuts and apples, fell into the diſeaſe called the flix, whereof manie died, and ſuerlie (as was thought) the death and dearth had béene greater, if the commendable diligence of the lord maior of London had not béene, in releeuing the commons by ſuch prouiſion as he made for corne to be brought to London, from the parties of beyond the ſeas, where otherwiſe neither had the countrie béene able in anie thing to haue ſufficed the citie, nor the citie the countrie. H. Knighton referreth this ſcarſitie to the yeare 1390, and maketh a large diſcourſe both of the miſeries which it brought with it, as alſo of the cauſe whereby it was procured, and of the notable meanes whereby the ſame in moſt places was remedied.

Abr.Fl. out of Henrie Knighton canon of Leceiſter abbeie.

The cauſe of the ſcarſitie was not want of bread or corne.

Wooll ſold dogcheape by the ſtone.

Prouiſion againſt ſcarſitie to relieue the people.

In this yeare (ſaith he) was a great dearth in all parts of England, and this dearth or ſcarſitie of corne began vnder the ſickle, and laſted till the feaſt of ſaint Peter ad vincula, to wit, till the time of new corne. This ſcarſitie did greatlie oppreſſe the people, and chieflie the commoners of the poorer ſort. For a man might ſée infants and children in ſtréets and houſes, through hunger, howling, crieng, and crauing bread: whoſe mothers had it not (God wot) to breake vnto them. But yet there was ſuch plentie and abundance of manie yeares before, that it was thought and ſpoken of manie houſekéepers and huſbandmen, that if the ſéed were not ſowen in the ground, which was hoorded vp and ſtored in barnes, lofts, and garners, there would be inough to find and ſuſteine all the people by the ſpace of fiue yeares following. But the cauſe of this penurie, was thought to be the want of monie in a great manie. For monie in theſe daies was verie ſcant, and the principall cauſe hereof was, for that the wooll of the land lay a ſléepe and hoong heauie in ſome mens hands by the ſpace of two yeares; and in others thrée yeares, without a chapman. For it was enacted in a certeine parlement, that the merchants of England ſhould not paſſe out of the land with wooll and other merchandize, but ſhould bring the ſame vnto twelue places within the realme appointed for the ſame purpoſe, that the merchants ſtrangers might haue recourſe thither with their commodities and ſo by exchange ſhould tranſport our merchandize for theirs. By meanes whereof the merchants of England did forbeare to buy wooll and other wares vntill the next parlement inſuing, wherein it was granted them to traffike whither they would with their commodities. In theſe daies wooll was dogcheape: for one ſtone of good wooll of the choſen and piked ſort, was ſold for thrée ſhillings, and in Leiceſter and Kent at ſome times for two ſhillings or two and twentie pence. This ſcarſitie of victuals was of greateſt force in Leiceſter ſhire, & in the middle parts of the realme. And although it was a great want, yet was not the price of corne out of reaſon. For a quarter of wheat, when it was at the higheſt, was ſold at Leiceiſter for 16 ſhillings 8 pence at one time, and at other times for a marke or fourtéene ſhillings: at London and other places of the land a quarter of wheat was ſold for ten ſhillings, or for litle more or leſſe. For there arriued eleuen ſhips laden with great plentie of victuals at diuerſe places of the land, for the reliefe of the people. Beſides this, the citizens of London laid out two thouſand marks to buy food out of the common cheſt of orphans: and the foure and twentie aldermen, euerie of them put in his twentie pound a peece for neceſſarie prouiſion, for feare of famine, likelie to fall vpon the citie. And they laid vp their ſtore in ſundrie of the fitteſt and moſt conuenient places they could chooſe, that the néedie, and ſuch as were wrong with want, might come & buy at a certeine price ſo much as might ſuffice them and their familie: and they which had not readie monie to paie downe preſentlie in hand, their word and credit was taken for a yeares ſpace next following, and their turne ſerued. Thus was prouiſion made that people ſhould be relieued, and that none might periſh for hunger.

O charitie of London!

A dolphin taken at London bridge.

On Chriſtmaſſe day, a dolphin that came forth of the ſea vp the Thames vnto London-bridge, was eſpied of the citizens as he plaied in the water, and being followed & purſued, with much ado was taken. He was ten foot long, and a monſtrous growne fiſh, ſo as the ſight of him was ſtrange to manie that beheld him. He was thought by his comming ſo farre into the landward, to foreſhew ſuch ſtormes and tempeſts as within a wéeke after did raginglie follow.

Ambaſſadors ſent to the French king to treat of peace.

Ye haue heard how the matter for a treatie of peace had béene firſt broched by the French king, by ſending ambaſſadors to the king of England, to moue the ſame. Which motion being throughlie conſidered of the eſtates aſſembled in this laſt parlement, it was decréed, that it ſhould go forward (as before ye haue heard) and ſo about Candelmaſſe, the lord Thomas Perſie, ſir Lewes Clifford, and ſir Robert Briquet, with diuerſe other in their companie, were ſent ouer to the French king, and comming to Paris, found him lodgd in his houſe of Loure, where they declared to him the good affection of the king their maiſter toward peace. And the better to bring it to paſſe, they ſhewed that king Richards deſire was to haue ſome place and time appointed for commiſſioners to méet, with authoritie to treat and conclude vpon articles, as ſhould be thought expedient. The French king greatlie honored theſe ambaſſadors, in feaſting and banketting them for the ſpace of ſix daies togither, and for anſwer, concluded with them, that he himſelfe, with his vncles and other of his councell, would be at Amiens by the middeſt of March next inſuing, there to abide the king of Englands comming, and his vncles, if it ſhould pleaſe them thither to come.

Sir Robert Briquet a Frenchman of king Richard his priuie chamber.

The Engliſh ambaſſadors ſaid there was no doubt, but that either the king himſelfe, or his vncles ſhuld be there at the day aſſigned, with full authoritie to conclude anie agréement that ſhould ſeeme reaſonable, and ſo thoſe ambaſſadors returned with great gifts preſented on the kings behalfe to ech of them, ſir Robert Briquet excepted, vnto whome it ſéemed the French king bare no great good will, for that being a Frenchman borne, he had euer ſerued the Nauarrois or Engliſhmen, and was now one of king Richards priuie chamber. The king of England (as ſome write) was once minded to haue paſſed the ſeas himſelfe, to haue met the French king at Amiens, at the time appointed, but finallie the duke of Lancaſter, the biſhop of Durham, and others, were ſent thither with a traine néere hand of a thouſand horſſes. At their comming into France, they were roiallie receiued: for the French king had made no leſſe preparation for the duke of Lancaſters comming, than if he had béene emperor. The duke of Lancaſter verelie was eſtéemed to be a verie mightie prince, and one of the wiſeſt and ſageſt princes in all chriſtendome, in thoſe daies; ſo that it ſéemed the French king reioiſed greatlie, that he might come to haue conference with him. There were with the French king héere at Amiens, his brother the duke of Thoureigne; his vncles, the dukes of Berrie, Burbon, and Burgognie, & a great number of earles, lords, and other nobles of the realme of France. Before the Engliſhmens comming, for auoiding of ſtrife and debate that might ariſe betwixt the Engliſh and French, a proclamation was ſet forth conteining certeine articles, for the demeanor which the French men ſhould obſerue towards the Engliſhmen.

The dukes of Lancaſter & Yorke, the earls of Derbie and Huntington, the lord Thomas Perſie, the biſhops of Durham and London were ſent ouer, as Froiſſard ſaith.

A roiall ambaſſage.

The duke of Lancaſter, a prince of great renowme.

Whileſt they there remained, all the Engliſhmens charges were borne by the French king, from their ſetting forth from Calis, till they came backe thither againe. As touching their treatie, manie things were proponed, diuerſe demands made, and ſome offers, though to ſmall purpoſe, for they tooke not effect, inſomuch as they departed without concluding anie thing, further than that the truce which was to end at Midſummer next, was prolonged to continue one yéere more, that in the meane time, the lords and eſtates of the realme of England might aſſemble, and with good aduiſe deliberate, whether it were more expedient to agrée vnto a determinate peace, or to purſue the doubtfull chances of warre. And ſuch was the end of that roiall ambaſſage, to the furniſhing forth whereof, the king demanded an aid as well of the abbats and priors, as of the cities and good townes through the whole realme.

The truce prolonged for a yeare. Thom. Walſ.

A councell at Stamford.

Anon after the returne of the duke of Lancaſter, and other the ambaſſadors that had béene at Amiens, a councell of the lords and chiefe ſtates of the realme was called at Stamford, the which (as if it had béene vnto a parlement) there came forth of euerie good towne certeine perſons appointed to deliberate and take aduiſe in ſo weightie a matter, as either to conclude vpon peace, or elſe vpon warre. But in the end they brought little or nothing to paſſe, ſauing that they agréed to haue the truce to indure for twelue moneths longer: both kings ſware to obſerue the ſame, afore ſuch as were appointed to ſée their othes receiued. About the ſame time came the duke of Gelderland into this realme, being the kings couſine, a right valiant and hardie gentleman: he was honorablie receiued and welcomed of the king, and of his vncles, the dukes of Lancaſter and Glouceſter. This duke of Gelderland counſelled the king not to conclude peace, either with the Frenchmen or Scots, except vpon ſuch conditions as might be knowne to be both profitable and honorable to him and his realme, promiſing that if he had occaſion to make warre againſt either of thoſe two nations, he would be readie to ſerue him with a conuenient power of men at armes of his countrie. After he had béene here a time, and highlie feaſted and banketted, aſwell by the king as other great eſtates of the realme, he returned home, not without diuerſe rich gifts.

The duke of Gelderland commeth into England.

The duke of Gelderland diſſuadeth the king from peace with the French and Scots.

The Londoners refuſe to lend the king a thouſand pounds.

The king about this ſeaſon ſent to the Londoners, requeſting to borrow of them the ſumme of one thouſand pounds, which they vncourteouſlie refuſed to lend: and moreouer they fell vpon an Italian or Lombard (as they termed him) whom they beat and néere hand ſlue: bicauſe he offered to lend the king that monie. Whereof when the king was aduertiſed, he was ſore mooued againſt them, and calling togither the moſt part of the péeres and noble men of his realme, declared vnto them the froward dealings of the Londoners, complaining ſore of ſuch their preſumption. The lords and great men, ſéeming not greatlie to fauour the Londoners, gaue counſell that the inſolent pride of thoſe preſumptuous perſons might with ſpéed be repreſſed. The citizens of London in thoſe daies (as ſhould appeare) vſing their authoritie to the vttermoſt, had deuiſed and ſet forth diuerſe orders and conſtitutions to abridge the libertie of foreners that came to the citie to vtter their commodities. Religious men that wrote the doings of that age, ſéemed alſo to find fault with them, for that they fauored Wicliffes opinions, & therefore did charge them with infidelitie, and mainteining (I know not how) of Lollards & heretikes: but howſoeuer the matter,went they fell at this preſent into the kings heauie diſpleaſure.

A great fire kindled about a litle ſparke.

Some there be that write, how the king piked the firſt quarell againſt the maior and ſhiriffes, for a riot committed by the vnrulie citizens, againſt the ſeruants of the biſhop of Saliſburie: for that where one of the ſame biſhops ſeruants had taken a horſſe-loſe frō a bakers man, as he paſſed by in Fléetſtréet with his baſket to ſerue his maſters cuſtomers, and would not deliuer it againe, but brake the bakers mans head, when he was earneſt to haue recouered the loſe, the inhabitants of the ſtréet roſe, and would haue had the biſhops man to priſon for breaking the kings peace: but he was reſcued by his fellowes, and eſcaped into Saliſburie houſe, that ſtood there within the allie, and as then belonged to his maſter the biſhop of Saliſburie, being at that time high treaſuror of England. The people being ſet in a rage for the reſcue ſo made, gathered togither in great multitudes about the biſhops palace gate, and would haue fetched out the offendor by force.

A riot by the Londoners vpon the biſhop of Saliſburies men.

To conclude, ſuch a hurling was in the ſtréet, that the maior, with the ſhiriffes, & diuers aldermen came thither with all ſpéed, to take order in the matter, and to ſée the peace kept; but after the cōming thither of the maior, the commons of the citie reſorted to the place in far greater numbers than before; and the more they were, the worſſe they were to rule, and would not be perſuaded to quiet themſelues, except the biſhops ſeruant, whoſe name was Walter Romane, might be had out of the houſe, and committed to priſon: but at length, after manie aſſaults, lifts, & other indeuours made to haue broken vp the gates of the houſe, the maior & aldermen, with other diſcréet commoners appeaſed the people ſo, as they brought them to quiet, and ſent euerie man to his houſe.

Walter Romane.

The biſhop was then at Windeſor where the court laie, who being informed of this matter, by a gréeuous report, and happilie in worſſe manner than the thing had happened indéed, tooke ſuch indignation therewith, that taking with him Thomas Arundell archbiſhop of Yorke, then lord chancellor of England, he went to the king and made an heinous complaint againſt the citizens for their miſdemeanor, ſo that his diſpleaſure was the more kindled againſt the citizens, in ſo much that, whether in reſpect of this laſt remembred complaint, or rather for their vncourteous deniall to lend him the thouſand pounds, and miſuſing the Lombard that offered to lend the ſame, I cannot ſaie; but ſure it is, that the maior and ſhiriffe, and a great ſort more of the citizens, were ſent for to come to the court, where diuerſe miſdemeanors were obiected and laid to their charge: and notwithſtanding, what excuſe they pretended, the maior and ſhiriffes with diuerſe other of the moſt ſubſtantiall citizens, were arreſted. The maior was committed to the caſtell of Windeſor, and the other, vnto other caſtels and holds, to be ſafelie kept, till the king, by the aduiſe of his councell, ſhould determine further what ſhould be doone with them.

The biſhop of Saliſburie maketh a gréeuous cōplaint of the Londoners to the king.

The maior & ſhiriffes of London ſent for to Windſore to the king, & there impriſoned.

The liberties of the citie were ſeized into the kings han[illegible] and the authoritie of the maior vtterlie ceaſſed, the king appointing a warden to gouerne the citie, named ſir Edward Darlingrug knight, that ſhould both rule the citie, and ſée that euerie man had iuſtice miniſtred, as the caſe required. This ſir Edward Darlingrug began to gouerne the citie of London by the name of lord warden, the one and twentith of Iune, on which day the king entered into the 16 yeare of his reigne: by reaſon it was thought that the ſaid ſir Edward Darlingrug was ouerfauourable to the citizens, he continued in his office but till the firſt of Iulie, and being then diſcharged, one ſir Baldwine Radington, a right circumſpect and diſcréet knight, was put in that roome, who knew how both to content the kings mind, and to comfort the citizens, and put them in hope of the kings fauour in time to be obteined, to the reliefe of their ſorow and heauineſſe.

The liberties of London ſeized.

A gardian appointed to gouerne the citie of London.

Anno Reg. 16. Sir Edward Darlingrug lord warden of London.

Darlingrug remoued, & ſir Baldwine Radington made lord warden of London.

At length, the king, through ſute and inſtant labour made by certeine noble men, ſpeciallie the duke of Gloceſter, began ſomewhat to relent and pacifie himſelfe, as touching his rigorous diſpleaſure againſt the Londoners, calling to mind the great honour he had diuerſe waies receiued at their hands, with the great gifts which they had likewiſe beſtowed vpon him, wherevpon he purpoſed to deale the more mildlie with them, and ſo ſent for diuerſe of the chiefe citizens to come vnto Windeſor, where he then kept his court, there to ſhew forth the priuileges, liberties, and lawes of their citie, as well the new as old, that with the aduiſe of his councell, he might determine which ſhould remaine in force, and which ſhould be aboliſhed. Herevpon, when the ſaid priuileges, and liberties were laid forth, to the view of ſuch perſons as had to conſider of them, ſome were ratified, ſome permitted by tolleration, and ſome vtterlie condemned and abrogated.

The liberties of London in part confirmed in part condemned.

Neither might they recouer at that preſent, either the perſon or dignitie of their maior, nor obteine the kings entire fauour, till they had ſatiſfied the king of the damages and iniuries by them doone, either to him or his people. And where he had béene at great charges, in preparing forces to chaſtiſe them, as he was determined, if they had not ſubmitted themſelues vnto him, they were ſure that their purſſes muſt anſwer all that he had laid forth about that matter. They therfore with humble ſubmiſſion, in recompenſe & ſatiſfaction of their treſpaſſes, offered to giue him ten thouſand pounds, but they were for this time ſent home, and appointed to returne againe at a certeine day, not vnderſtanding what they muſt pay, till the king with the aduiſe of his councell had taken further order for them. At length, through ſuch dailie ſute as was made for the quieting of the kings hot diſpleaſure towards the Londoners, he was contented to pardon all offenſes paſt. But firſt, the citizens were told, that the king meant to come from his manor of Shene, to the citie of London, and then vndoubtedlie, vpon knowledge had of their good meanings, hereafter to beare themſelues like louing ſubiects, they ſhould obteine his fauour.

A ſwéet ſacrifice.

The citizens aduertiſed hereof, did not onelie prepare themſelues to meet him, and to preſent him with gifts in moſt liberall manner; but alſo to adorne, decke, and trim their citie with ſumptuous pageants, rich hangings, and other gorgeous furniture, in all points like as is vſed at anie coronation. At the day appointed, there met him (beſide other) foure hundred of the citizens on horſebacke, clad in one liuerie, preſenting themſelues in that order, vpon the heath on this ſide Shene, and in moſt humble wiſe, crauing pardon for their offenſes paſt, beſought him to take his waie to his palace of Weſtminſter, thorough the citie of London. This ſute made by the recorder, in name of all the citizens, he gratiouſlie granted, and ſo held on his iournie, till he came to London bridge, where vnto him was preſented a paſſing faire ſtéed, white, ſaddled, brideled, and trapped in rich cloth of gold, parted with red and white. And likewiſe to the quéene was giuen a milke white palfrie, ſaddled, brideled, and trapped in the ſame ſort, as the other was. Theſe preſents were thankefullie accepted, and ſo both the king and the quéene paſſing forward, entered the citie, prepared and hanged with rich clothes (as before you haue heard) the citizens

At the ſtandard in Cheape, was a right ſumptuous ſtage ordeined, on which were ſet diuerſe perſonages, and an angell that put a rich crowne of gold, garniſhed with ſtone and pearle vpon the kings head, as he paſſed by, and likewiſe an other on the quéenes head. This doone, the king rode to Paules, and there offered, and ſo tooke his horſſe againe, and rode to Weſtminſter, where the maior and his companie taking their leaue, returned to London. On the morrow, the maior and his brethren went againe to Weſtminſter, and there preſented the king with two baſens gilt, & in them two thouſand nobles of gold, beſéeching him to be good and gratious lord to the citie; he receiued their preſent in courteous manner, and gaue them manie comfortable words. The third daie after, they receiued a new confirmation of all their old liberties (at the leaſt ſuch as might be an aid to the citie, and no detriment to forreners) wherefore, by counſell of their fréends, they ordeined a table for an altar of ſiluer and gilt, ingrauen with imagerie, and inameled in moſt curious wiſe, conteining the ſtorie of ſaint Edward, it was valued to be worth a thouſand marks. This was preſented to the king, the which he ſhortlie after offered to the ſhrine of ſaint Edward within the abbeie. The Londoners beléeued, that by theſe gifts they had béene quite rid of all danger; but yet they were compelled to giue the king after this, ten thouſand pounds, which was collected of the commons in the citie, not without great offenſe and grudging in their minds.

More gifts by the Lōdoners to the king.

Abr. Fl. out of Henrie Knighton canon of Leeciſter abbeie.

¶ You haue heard hitherto, what means was made by the maior, aldermen, and whole bodie of the commonaltie of London to procure the kings maieſties (in whoſe diſfauour they were déeplie drowned) gratious reconciliation. Wherein though there hath béene large matter deliuered; yet to ſet forth the dignitie thereof the fuller, take héere by the waie the report of Henrie Knighton. In the yeare (ſaith he) 1392, the king called a great councell on the morrow after Trinitie ſundaie at Stamford, about certeine affaires concerning the Frenchmen, in which councell he aſſembled togither all the old ſoldiers of his relme, that by the aduiſe of the elder ſort he might ſée what were beſt for him to doo in the premiſſes. The king alſo held a great councell at Notingham, on the feaſt of S. John the Baptiſt, whereat he cauſed the maior of London with the foure and twentie aldermen, the two ſhiriffes, and foure and twentie of the beſt commoners of the citie in the ſecond degrée to be conuented before him. Héere he charged them that they had forfeited a certeine bond of 9000 pounds to the king, beſides the loſſe of their liberties and priuileges. Which obligation or bond they had made in former time to the king, their deſerts requiring the ſame. Now the king, after rehearſall made of their new offenſes & faults, diſcharged the maior, the two ſhiriffes, and the reſt of his officers of their offices, and ſent the maior and the two ſhiriffes to certeine places of cuſtodie as his priſoners, defeating the citie of London of the honour of all their priuileges; in ſo much that a citizen or fréeman ſhould haue no more prerogatiue than a forrener or ſtranger. He appointed alſo the lord Edward Balerige to be gouernor thereof, to kéepe and ſée kept the kings lawes and his liege people within London in due order, vntill ſuch time as the king had otherwiſe prouided for them. And he ſet them a day to anſwer the king and his councell to certeine interrogatories on the feaſt of S. Marie Magdalen then next inſuing, at Windſore. In the meane while, at the mediation of certeine fréends and welwillers, the kings indignation was ſomewhat mitigated and aſſwaged towards them; inſomuch that at length he releaſed the maior and the ſhiriffes, and ſent them home to their houſes; ſetting ouer them notwithſtanding a new kéeper or gouernour of the citie, and reſeruing in his hand all the priuileges of the citie. In the meane time, on the ſundaie next after the feaſt of the Aſſumption of the bleſſed virgin Marie; all the wealthieſt and worthieſt commoners of the citie came to the king, and ſubmitted themſelues and all their goods to his grace, and then did he firſt receiue and take them into his fauour. On the wedneſdaie inſuing, the king was purpoſed to come into London, and the citizens in multitudes innumerable met him on horſſebacke; & they that had no horſſes went out on foot to welcome him thither; women alſo and infants ſhewed themſelues vnto him; likewiſe the biſhop of London, with all the clergie, no order, degrée, condition, eſtate, or ſex of eccleſiaſticall dignitie being excuſed, went out in proceſſion to méet the king and the quéene with great reioiſing. It was reported how in that proceſſion there were aboue fiue hundred boies in ſurpliſſes. Moreouer, the citizens of London trimmed the outſides of their houſes and chambers in euerie ſtréet through which the king and the quéene were to paſſe, from S. Georges to Weſtminſter. As for the houſes of the welthier ſort, they were braulie garniſhed with cloth of gold, ſiluer, tiſſue, veluet, & other ſumptuous ſtuffe whatſoeuer by any poſſible means could be gotten. In Cheapſide there was a conduit, out of the which two ſpouts ran with read wine & white, and vpon the conduit ſtood a little boie apparelled in white like an angell, hauing a golden cup in his hand, who preſented wine to the king and quéene to drinke as they paſſed by. In the meane time they offered to the king a golden crowne of great value, and another golden crowne to the quéene; and a while after paſſing forwards, they preſented to the king a golden tablet of the Trinitie, to the value of eight hundred pounds; and to the quéene another golden tablet of S. Anne, whome ſhe had in ſpeciall deuotion and reuerence, bicauſe hir owne name was Anne. Such, and ſo great, and ſo wonderfull honors did they to the king, as the like in former times was neuer doone to anie king of this realme: and ſo going forward, they brought the king and the quéene to Weſtminſter hall. The king ſitting in his ſeat roiall, & all the people ſtanding before him; one in the kings behalfe as his ſpeaker, gaue the people thanks for the great honour and princelie preſents which they had beſtowed vpon the king; and being bidden to fall euerie man to his buſineſſe and affaires, it was told them that in the next parlement they ſhould haue their finall anſwer.

At the ſame time, the duke of Gloceſter, hauing receiued monie to leauie an armie, which he ſhould haue conueied ouer into Ireland, of which countrie, a good while before that preſent, the king had made him duke, was now readie to ſet forward, when ſuddenlie through the malice of ſome priuie detractours about the king, he was contermanded, and ſo his iournie was ſtaied, to the great hinderance and preiudice of both the countries of England and Ireland: for euen vpon the fame that was bruted of his comming into Ireland, in manner all the Iriſh lords determined to ſubmit themſelues vnto him, ſo greatlie was his name both loued, reuerenced, and feared, euen among thoſe wild and ſauage people. This yeare Robert Véere, late earle of Oxenford, and duke of Ireland, departed this life at Louaine in Brabant, in great anguiſh of mind, & miſerable neceſſitie: which yoong gentleman (doubtleſſe) was apt to all commendable exerciſes and parts fit for a noble man, if in his youth he had béene well trained and brought vp in neceſſarie diſcipline.

The duke of Gloceſter made duke of Ireland.

His iournie into Ireland vnluckilie ſtaied.

A parlement at Wincheſter

The chancerie and kings bench kept at Yorke and frõ thence remoued to Londõ.

Eures.

The Ile of Man.

This yeare after Chriſtmaſſe, a parlement was called at Wincheſter, in which onelie a grant was made by the cleargie, of halfe a tenth, for the expenſes of the duke of Lancaſter & Gloceſter, that were appointed to go ouer into France, to treat of peace, betwixt the two kingdomes. The courts of the kings bench and chancerie, which had béene remoued from Weſtminſter to Yorke, either in diſfauour onelie of the Londoners, or in fauour of the citizens of Yorke, for that the archbiſhop of that citie, being lord chancellor, wiſhed to aduance (ſo farre as in him laie) the commoditie and wealth thereof, were neuertheleſſe about this ſeaſon brought backe againe to Weſtminſter, after they had remained a ſmall time at Yorke, to the diſpleaſure of manie. ¶ This yeare, the lord Auberie de Veere, vncle to the late duke of Ireland, was made earle of Oxenford. ¶ The two and twentith of Februarie, John Eures, conſtable of Douer caſtell, & lord ſteward of the kings houſe departed this life, in whoſe roome the lord Thomas Perſie that before was vicechamberlaine was created lord ſteward; and the lord Thomas Beaumont was made conſtable of Douer, and lord warden of the cinque ports: and the lord William Scroope was made vicechamberlaine, who about the ſame time, bought of the lord William Montacute the Ile of Man, with the regalitie therof, for it is a kingdome; as Thomas Walſingham affirmeth.

The dukes of Lancaſter & Gloceſter ſent to Frãce to treat of a peace.

The French commiſſioners would haue Calis raced to the ground.

The dukes of Lancaſter and Gloceſter went ouer vnto Calis, and downe to Bullongne came the dukes of Berrie and Burgognie. Theſe noblemen were ſufficientlie furniſhed with authoritie, to conclude a perfect peace, both by ſea and land, betwéene the two realmes of France and England, and all their alies. The place appointed for them to treat in, was at Balingham, where tents and pauilions were pight vp, for the eaſe of both parties. They met there twiſe or thriſe a wéeke, in a faire tent prepared for the purpoſe, about nine of the clocke in the forenoone. This was about the beginning of Maie. When they entered firſt into communication, and had ſéene each others authoritie, one of the firſt demands that the Frenchmen made, was to haue Calis raced, in ſuch wiſe, as there ſhould neuer be anie habitation there after that time. The dukes of Lancaſter and Gloceſter anſwered herevnto, how they had no authoritie to conclude ſo farre, but that England ſhould hold Calis ſtill, as in demeſne, and true inheritance; and therefore, if they purpoſed to enter any further in the treatie of peace, they ſhould ceaſſe from that demand and ſpeake no more thereof. When the dukes of Berrie and Burgognie heard their two couſins of England anſwer ſo roundlie, they ſpake no more of that matter.

The demand of the Engliſh cõmiſſioners.

Order taken, that the demands on either ſide ſhould be ſet downe in writing, the better to be conſidered of.

The Engliſh gentlemen mainteined by the French warres.

The ſubtiltie of the French men.

The commiſſioners met againe.

Then the dukes of Lancaſter and Gloceſter demanded to haue reſtitution of all ſuch lands as had béene deliuered, either to king Richard, or to king Edward the third, or to anie their deputies or commiſſioners, and alſo to haue fullie paid the ſumme of florens that was left vnpaid, at the time when the warre reuiued betwixt England and France: and this the Engliſh lawiers proued to ſtand with equitie and reaſon. But neuertheleſſe, the lords and chancellor of France argued to the contrarie, and ſo agrée they could not, inſomuch as the Frenchmen required, that if the Engliſhmen meant to haue anie concluſion of peace, they ſhould draw to ſome néerer points. At length, the foure dukes tooke order, that all their demands on either ſide ſhould be ſet downe in writing, and deliuered to either partie interchangeablie, that they might be regarded at length, and ſuch as ſhould be found vnreaſonable, to be raced or reformed. After they had communed togither diuerſe times, and remained there ſixtéene daies, they appointed to aduertiſe the two kings of their whole doings, and after nine daies ſpace to meet againe. The French dukes rode to Abbeuile, where the French king then laie: and the Engliſh dukes returning to Calis, wrote to the king of England, of all the whole matter. The duke of Gloceſter was harder to deale with in each behalfe, concerning the concluſion of peace, than was the duke of Lancaſter, for he rather deſired to haue had warre than any peace, except ſuch a one as ſhould be greatlie to the aduantage and honour of the realme of England: and therefore the commons of England vnderſtanding his diſpoſition, agréed that he ſhould be ſent, rather than anie other. For where in times paſt the Engliſhmen had greatlie gained by the warres of France, as well the commons, as the knights and eſquires, who had by the ſame mainteined their eſtate, they could not giue their willing conſents, to haue anie peace at all with the Frenchmen, in hope by reaſon of the wars, to profit themſelues, as in times paſt they had doone. The French king & nobles of France were greatlie inclined to peace, and ſo likewiſe was the king of England, & the duke of Lancaſter. But the Frenchmen were ſo ſubtill, and vſed ſo manie darke and coloured words, that the Engliſhmen had much a doo to vnderſtand them: which offended much the duke of Gloceſter. But neuertheleſſe, at the daie prefixed, theſe foure dukes met againe at Balingham, and with the French lords came the king of Armenie, newlie returned into France forth of Grecia, for into his owne countrie he durſt not come, the Turkes hauing conquered it, the ſtrong towne of Conich, which the Genowaies held, excepted.

The king of Armenie.

Obſcure and doubtfull words to be opened.

A truce for foure yeares betwéene England and France.

The king of Armenie would gladlie that peace might haue béene eſtabliſhed betwixt France and England, in hope to procure the ſooner ſome aid of the kings to recouer his kingdome. But to conclude after that the dukes, and other with them aſſociat as aſſiſtants, had diligentlie peruſed and examined the articles of their treatie, they would not paſſe nor ſeale to anie, till all darke and obſcure words were cléerelie declared, opened, and made perfect, ſo that no generall peace might be concluded. Notwithſtanding, as Froiſſard ſaith, a truce for foure yeares ſpace, vpon cerfeine articles was agréed to be kept as well by ſea as by land. It was thought, that when they were at point to haue growne to agréement concerning manie articles, if the French king had not newlie fallen into his former diſeaſe of frenſie, there had better effect followed of this treatie; but by occaſion of his ſickneſſe, each man departed, before that anie principall articles could be fullie ordered and made perfect. The ſame time, ſir Thomas Perſie the yoonger was made lord warden of Burdeaux and Aquitaine.

Anno Reg. 17. Great tempeſts.

Much hurt doone by great floods in Suffolke.

A great plage in Eſſex.

1394

In Sepermber, much hurt was doone, thorough excéeding great thunder, lightening, and tempeſts, which chanced in manie parts of England, but ſpeciallie in Cambridgeſhire, where manie houſes were burned, with no ſmall quantitie of corne. Great inundations and floods of water followed ſhortlie after in October, which did much hurt at Burie, and Newmarket in Suffolke, where it ouerthrew wals of houſes, and put men and women in great danger of drowning. In Eſſex alſo in September, great mortalitie fell by peſtilence amongſt the people, whereof manie died. ¶ The towne of Chierburg was reſtored againe to the king of Nauarre, who had ingaged it to the king of England, for two thouſand markes. ¶ A parlement was holden at Weſtminſter, which began in the octaues of ſaint Hilarie. ¶ The king purpoſing to go ouer into Ireland, required a ſubſidie, the cleargie granted to him a whole tenth, toward the furniſhing forth of that iournie, if he went himſelfe; if he went not, yet they agréed to giue to him the moitie of a tenth. In time of this parlement, there appeared great euill will to remaine betwixt the duke of Lancaſter and the earle of Arundell, for the duke impoſed to the earle, that about the Exaltation of the croſſe, he laie with a companie of armed men in the caſtell of Holt by Cheſter, the ſame time that the countrie there roſe againſt the duke, with their capteine Nicholas Clifton, and his complices, whome he ment (as the duke alledged) to haue aided againſt him: but this the earle flatlie denied, and with probable reaſons ſo excuſed himſelfe, as the quarrell at length was taken vp, and the parties for the time well quieted.

Variance betwéene the duke of Lancaſter and the earle of Arundell.

The death of quéene Anne.

The K. defaceth the houſe of Shene bicauſe the quéene died there.

This yeare on Whitſundaie being the ſeauenth of Iune, quéene Anne departed this life, to the great gréefe of hir huſband king Richard, who loued hir intirelie. She deceaſſed at Shene, and was buried at Weſtminſter, vpon the ſouth ſide of ſaint Edwards ſhrine. The king tooke ſuch a conceit with the houſe of Shene, where ſhe departed this life, that he cauſed the buildings to be throwne downe and defaced, whereas the former kings of this land, being wearie of the citie, vſed cuſtomablie thither to reſort, as to a place of pleaſure, and ſeruing highlie to their recreation. Thus the king, the duke of Lancaſter, and his ſonne the earle of Derbie, were widowers, all in one ſeaſon: for the ladie Conſtance ducheſſe of Lancaſter daughter to Peter king of Spaine, deceaſſed the laſt yeare, whileſt hir huſband the duke of Lancaſter was at the treatie in France: at the ſame time alſo deceaſſed the counteſſe of Derbie, wife to the lord Henrie earle of Derbie. ¶ Moreouer, in this yeare 1394, Iſabell ducheſſe of Yorke departed this life, that was halfe ſiſter to the ducheſſe of Lancaſter, being borne of one mother. She was buried at Langlie.

Anno Reg. 18. A proclamation that all Iriſhmen ſhuld returne into their countrie

The yearelie reuenues of Ireland in K. Edward the third his daies.

This yeare in Auguſt, was a proclamation ſet forth, that all Iriſhmen ſhould auoid this land, and returne home into their owne countrie, before the feaſt of the Natiuitie of our ladie, on paine of death. The occaſion of which proclamation was, for that ſuch multitudes of Iriſhmen were come ouer into this region, in hope of gaine, that the countries in Ireland, ſubiect to England, were in manner left void of people, ſo that the enimies ſpoiled and waſted thoſe countries at their pleaſure, finding few or none to withſtand them. And where king Edward the third had placed in Ireland his bench and iudges, with his excheker, for the good adminiſtration of iuſtice and politike gouernement to be vſed there, he receiued from thence yearelie in reuenues and profits, comming to his owne cofers, the ſumme of thirtie thouſand pounds: the king now laid forth no leſſe a ſumme to repell the enimies, which by abſence of thoſe that were come ouer hither, could not otherwiſe be reſiſted, ſith the power of the rebels was ſo increaſed, and the force of the countries ſubiect, through lacke of the former inhabitants, ſo diminiſhed. ¶ About the feaſt of the Natiuitie of our ladie, the king ſet forward to paſſe into Ireland, hauing made ſuch preparation for that iournie, as the like for Ireland had not béene heard of at anie time before. There went out with him the duke of Gloceſter, the earles of March, Notingham, and Rutland, the lord Thomas Perſie lord ſteward, and diuerſe other of the Engliſh nobilitie.

The duke of Lancaſter ſaileth into Aquitaine with an armie.

The duke of Lancaſter, that in the thirtéenth yeare of king Richards reigne had béene created by authoritie of parlement, duke of Aquitaine, was about this preſent time ſent thither, with fiue hundred men of armes, & a thouſand archers, to take poſſeſſion of that duchie, according to the kings grant, by his letters patents thereof had, made, and confirmed with his ſeale, in preſence of the moſt part of all the nobles and great lords of England, to hold all that countrie to the ſaid duke and his heires for euer in as large manner and forme, as his father king Edward the third, or anie other kings of England, or dukes of Aquitaine before time had holden, and as king Richard at that ſeaſon had & held the ſame, the homage alwaies yet reſerued to the kings of England for euer. But all this notwithſtanding, at his comming thither, ſo farre were the Gaſcoignes, and other people of thoſe marches from receiuing him with ioy and triumph, that they plainelie told him, they would not atturne to him, nor be vnder his iuriſdiction at anie hand, although he had brought ouer with him commiſſioners ſufficientlie authoriſed, both to diſcharge them of their former allegiance to the king, and to inueſt him in poſſeſſion of that duchie, in maner and forme as before is ſaid.

The Gaſcoignes flatlie refuſe to accept the duke of Lancaſter for their ſoueraigne.

K. Richard paſſeth ouer into Ireland with a mightie armie.

But now to returne to king Richard, ye ſhall vnderſtand, that when all his prouiſion and roiall armie was readie, about Michaelmas, he tooke the ſea, and landed at Waterford the ſecond of October, and ſo remained in Ireland all that winter: his people were lodged abroad in the countrie, and lay ſo warilie as they might. For although the Iriſhmen durſt not attempt anie exploit openlie againſt the Engliſhmen, after the kings arriuall with ſo puiſſant an armie, yet they would ſteale ſometimes vpon them, where they eſpied anie aduantage, and diſquiet them in their lodgings. But when the Engliſh ſtill preuailed, diuerſe of the greateſt princes among them came in, and ſubmitted themſelues. Amongſt other, foure kings are mentioned, as the great Onell king of Meth, Brine of Thomond king of Thomond, Arthur Macmur king of Lineiſter, and Conhur king of Cheueno and Darpe: theſe kings were courteouſlie interteined and much made of by king Richard, who kept his Chriſtmas this yeare at Dubline. And after that feaſt was ended, he held a parlement there, to the which all his ſubiects of Ireland, vnto whom it apperteined, reſorted, as well thoſe that had continued vnder the Engliſh gouernement aforetime, as thoſe that were latelie yéelded.

A parlement holden in Ireland.

A parlement at weſtminſter, king Richard being in Ireland.

Alſo at the ſame time, after the octaues of the Epiphanie, the duke of Yorke, lord warden of England, now in the kings abſence, cauſed a parlement to be called at Weſtminſter, to the which was ſent forth of Ireland the duke of Gloceſter, that he might declare to the commons the kings neceſſitie, to haue ſome grant of monie to ſupplie his want, hauing ſpent no ſmall quantitie of treaſure in that iournie made into Ireland. The dukes words were ſo well heard and beléeued, that a whole tenth was granted by the clergie, and a fiftéenth by the laitie; but not without proteſtation, that thoſe paiements were granted of a méere good will, for the loue they bare to the king, and to haue his buſineſſe go forwards, which becauſe it required great expenſes, both for that his owne roiall perſon was abiding in Ireland about the ſubduing of the rebels, as alſo becauſe his retinue and power could not be mainteined without exceſſiue charges; they ſéemed to be no leſſe deſirous to haue the ſame ended, than they which were dailie agents in the ſame, not without feare of miſfortune likelie to befall them, hauing to deale with a people of ſuch barbarous and rebellious behauior.

The wickleuiſts wrote againſt the clergie.

At the ſame time, thoſe that followed Wickliffes opinions, ſet vp publikelie on the church doore of Paules in London, and the church doores of Weſtminſter, certeine writings, conteining accuſations of the clergie, and concluſions, ſuch as had not commonlie béene heard, againſt eccleſiaſticall perſons, and the vſe of the ſacraments, as the church then mainteined. They were incouraged thus to doo, as it was ſaid, by ſome noble men, and knights of great worſhip, as ſir Richard Sturrie, ſir Lewes Clifford, ſir Thomas Latimer, ſir John Montacute, & others, who comforted & pricked forward thoſe kind of men, then called heretikes & Lollards, to the confounding of monks, friers, and other religious perſons, by all waies they might. Herevpon, the archbiſhop of Yorke, the biſhop of London, and certeine other as meſſengers from the whole ſtate of the clergie, paſſed ouer into Ireland, where, to the king they made a grieuous complaint, as well againſt thoſe that had framed and ſet forth ſuch writings, as againſt them that mainteined them in their dooings, and therefore beſought him with ſpéed to returne home into England, there to take ſuch order, for the reſtreining of thoſe miſordered perſons, as vnto the reliefe of the church might be thought expedient, being then in great danger of ſuſteining irrecouerable loſſe and damage, if good reformation were not the ſooner had. King Richard hearing theſe things, vpon good deliberation had in the matter, determined to returne home, but firſt on the day of the Annuntiation of our ladie, he made the foure aboue remembred kings, to wit, Onell, Brine of Thomond, Arthur of Mackmur, and Conhur, knights, in the cathedrall church of Dublin, and one likewiſe ſir Thomas Orphen, ſir Ioatas Pado, and his coſine ſir John Pado.

K. Richards dealings againſt the fauorers of the Wickleuiſts.

This doone, and now after that they were ſet in quiet in that countrie (the rebels not being ſo hardie as to ſtirre, whileſt ſuch a mightie armie was there readie at hand to aſſaile them) the king about Eaſter came backe into England without anie more adoo, ſo that the gaine was thought nothing to counteruaile the charges, which were verie great: for the king had ouer with him in that iournie, foure thouſand men of armes, and thirtie thouſand archers, as Froiſſard ſaith he was informed by an Engliſh eſquier that had béene in that iournie. The king at his comming ouer, did not forget what complaint the archbiſhop of Yorke, and the biſhop of London had exhibited to him, againſt thoſe that were called Lollards, and heretiks, wherevpon immediatlie, he called before him certeine of the noble men, that were thought and knowne to fauour ſuch kind of men; threatning terriblie, if from thence forth they ſhould in anie wiſe comfort and relieue them. He cauſed ſir Richard Sturrie to receiue an oth, that he ſhould not mainteine from that day forward anie ſuch erronious opinions, menacing him, and as it were, couenanting with him by an interchangeable oth, that if euer he might vnderſtand, that he did violate and breake that oth, he ſhould die for it a moſt ſhamefull death.

Abr. Fl. out of Henrie Knighton canon of Leiceſter abbeie.

¶ By the report of H. Knighton it ſhould ſéeme, that this ſect (as he calleth them) mightilie increaſed, to the no ſmall offenſe of the lords temporall and ſpirituall, wherevpon after ſundrie complaints, and ſerious ſolicitations for the ſupplanting of them, commiſſions were granted, and the tenure of them (as it ſhould ſéeme) though not abſolutelie, yet in part executed. Now therefore liſten what mine author ſaith, whoſe addition, though by his owne ſupputation of yeares it require to be placed elſewhere; yet for the conſonancie of the matter, and becauſe writers varie greatlie in their accounts of time, I haue here inſerted the ſame, as in a verie conuenient place of the hiſtorie. The noblemen and the commons (ſaith Henrie Knighton) ſéeing the ſhip of the church, with theſe & other innumerable errors, & verie lewd opinions as it were on all ſides from day to day with ceaſſeleſſe violence and force to be ſhaken; beſought the king in the parlement, that redreſſe might be had herof; leſt the arke of the faith of all the church by ſuch violences and inforcements giuen in thoſe daies, ſhould through want of gouernement be battered without remedie, and the glorious realme of England by corrupting of faith ſhould by little and little be drawne into a diſtreſſe of grace and loſſe of honor. Wherefore the king vſing the ſound counſell of the whole parlement, commanded the archbiſhop of Canturburie, & the reſt of the biſhops of the realme, to execute their charge and office, all and euerie of them in his and their dioceſſe, according to the canon lawes, more ſeuerelie and zealouſlie; to correct the offendors, to examine their Engliſh books more fullie and ſubſtantiallie, to root out errors with all their indeuors, to bring the people into an vnitie of the right faith, to wéed vp out of the church all netles, thiſtles, and brambles wherewith ſhe is diſgraced; and to beautifie hir with lillies and roſes; and ſhould cauſe an eſtabliſhment of his roiall power more boldlie and ſtoutlie. And the king forthwith commanded, without delaie, that his letters patents ſhould be ſent abroad into all and euerie ſhire of his kingdome; and appointed in euerie ſhire certeine ſearchers for ſuch books and their fauourers; charging them to applie a ſpéedie remedie vnto theſe diſorders, and to lay vp the rebels in the verie next gaoles, till the king ſent vnto them. But verie ſlow execution or none at all followed, becauſe the houre of correction was not yet come. [Howbeit, to prepare and make an entrance to the purpoſed reformation and correction of thoſe enormities, he gaue out a commiſſion againſt the Wickleuiſts, a copie whereof followeth both in Latine and Engliſh. Whereby the world may ſée how the ſpringing church of Chriſt was hated and abhorred of the antichriſtian rout.]

A copie of the kings commiſsion againſt the Lollards or Wickleuiſts and their followers: Engliſhed by A.F.

RIchard by the grace of God king of England and France, and lord of Ireland, to his beloued, maiſter Thomas Brightwell doctor in diuinitie, deane of the college of the new worke of Leiceſter, and to William Cheſulden prebendarie of the prebend of the ſame college; and to our beloued and truſtie ſubiects, Richard of Barow Chinall, and Robert Langham; greeting. For ſo much as we are certeinelie informed by credible report, that by the vnſound doctrine of maiſter Iohn Wickliffe, whiles he liued, of Nicholas Herford, Iohn Liſton, and their followers, many bookes, libels, ſcheduls, & pamphlets expreſſelie, euidentlie, and notoriouſlie ſwarming with manifeſt hereſies and errors to the hurt of the catholike faith, & the aboliſhment of ſound doctrine, are commonlie compiled, publiſhed, and written, as well in Engliſh as in Latine, and therevpon wicked opinions contrarie to ſound doctrine, doo ſpring, grow, and are mainteined and preached to the weakening of the right faith, the ouerthrow of holie church, and conſequentlie (which God forbid) the misbeleefe of a great many, & the manifeſt danger of their ſoules. We being moued with zeale to the catholike faith, whereof we are, and will be defenders in all things, as we are bound, vnwilling that ſuch hereſies or errors within the limits of our iuriſdiction, ſo far as we are able, ſhould grow, or by any meanes ſpring vp: doo aſsigne you iointlie and ſeuerallie, all and ſingular the books, libels, ſcheduls, & pamphlets conteining ſuch doctrine of the ſaid Iohn, Nicholas, Iohn, and their fellow-followers, or any of their corrupt opinions, whereſoeuer, & in whoſe hands, poſſeſsion, or keeping ſoeuer they ſhalbe found within the liberties or without; them to ſearch, take, arreſt, and cauſe to be brought before our councell with all poſsible ſpeed, that then and there we may take order for the ſame accordinglie, as by the aduiſe of our foreſaid councell we ſhall ſee requiſite to be doone. And alſo to proclaime, and on our behalfe firmelie to forbid all and euerie one, of whatſoeuer ſtate, degree, or condition he be, vnder paine of impriſonment and forfeitures, which to vs he ſhall forfeit, any of theſe wicked and lewd opinions to mainteine, teach, obſtinatlie to defend, priuilie or openlie, or any of theſe bookes, libels, ſcheduls & pamphlets to keepe, write, or cauſe to be written; but all and euerie ſuch booke and bookes, libels, ſcheduls, and pamphlets with them had & found, at our commandement vnto you to deliuer, or cauſe to be deliuered without delaie. And all them, whome after proclamation and inhibition you ſhall find dooing contrarie to the premiſſes, and ſuch lewd opinions mainteining, to call foorth before you the ſaid Thomas the deane, & William, and them to examine: & when they ſhalbe lawfullie conuinced therein, to commit them to the next officers & priſons, there to be kept, till they haue recanted their errors, hereſies, and wicked opinions; or till we for their deliuerance ſhall otherwiſe thinke order to be taken. And therefore we command, that you intend the ſaid premiſſes, with all diligence and effect, and the ſame doo and execute in forme aforeſaid. We doo alſo giue in ſtreict commandement and charge, to all and euerie as well churchman & churchmen, as ſhiriffes, maiors, bailiffes, officers, and other our truſtie ſubiects, as well within the liberties as without, by the tenor of theſe preſents, to aſsiſt, counſell, and helpe you and euerie of you in doing the premiſſes, as it is conuenient. In witneſſe whereof, we haue cauſed theſe our letters patents to be made. Witneſſe our ſelues at Weſtminſter the twentie third day of Maie, and the eleuenth yeare of our reigne.

¶ About this time, or (as Henrie Knighton ſaith) in the yeare 1392, maiſter William Courtenie archbiſhop of Canturburie, brother to the earle of Denſhire viſited the dioceſſe of Lincolne, and on the feaſt of ſaint Faith the virgine he viſited maiſter Iohn Bokingham biſhop of Lincolne in the cathedrall church of Lincolne, with the chapter, and an hundred of the canons, and he came to Leiceſter abbeie in viſitation, the ſundaie before the feaſt of All ſaints, where he abode all the tueſdaie, and on the eeue alſo of All ſaints being mondaie, calling togither all the canons of the ſaid monaſterie, with the chaplines of his owne chappell, euerie of them hauing in their hands burning candels. The ſame archbiſhop confirmed ſentence of excommunication againſt the Lollards or Wickleuiſts, with their fauourers, which either now mainteined or cauſed to be mainteined, or hereafter did mainteine or ſhould mainteine the errours and opinions of maſter John Wickliffe, in the dioceſſe of Lincolne. On the morrow next after All ſaints, the ſame biſhop flaſhed out his ſentence of excommunication like lightning in open ſight, with a croſſe ſet vpright, with candels burning bright, and with bels rong alowd, and namelie againſt thoſe of Leiceſter towne that had too too much defiled and infected the ſaid towne and countrie. The archbiſhop departing from thence, went to ſaint Peters church, to a certeine anchoreſſe named Matildis there kept as in a cloſet, whom he reprouing about the foreſaid errors and opinions of the Lollards, and finding hir anſwers ſcarſe aduiſedlie made, cited hir that ſhe ſhould appeare before him, on the ſundaie next inſuing, in ſaint James his abbeie at Northampton, to anſwer vnto the foreſaid erronious and prophane points. Now ſhe appeared at the day appointed, and renouncing hir errours, and hauing penance inioined hir, ſhe went awaie reformed. But till the ſecond day before the feaſt of ſaint Lucie, ſhe kept hir ſelfe out of hir cloſet, and then entred into the ſame againe. Other Lollards alſo were cited, and appeared at Oxford, and in other places, as the archbiſhop had commanded them: who renouncing their ſuperſtitious errours, and forſwearing their prophane opinions, did open penance. Alſo one William Smith was made to go about the market place at Leiceſter, clothed in linnen [or in a white ſhéet] holding in his right arme the image of the Crucifix, and in his left the image of ſaint Katharine, bicauſe the ſaid Smith had ſometimes cut in péeces and burned an image of ſaint Katharine, whereof he made a fire to boile him hearbes in his hunger.

*For the papiſts ſaie that the ſacrificing préeſt is the maker of his maker, namelie God.

Boldneſſe of women in eccleſiaſticall matters taxed.

In thoſe daies there was a certeine matrone in London, which had one onelie daughter, whome manie daies ſhe inſtructed and trained vp to celebrat the maſſe, and ſhe ſet vp an altar in hir priuie or ſecret chamber with all the ornaments thereunto belonging, and ſo ſhe made hir daughter manie daies to attire hir ſelfe like a prieſt, and to come to the altar, and after hir maner to celebrate the maſſe. Now when ſhe came to the words of the ſacrament, ſhe caſt hir ſelfe flat on hir face before the altar, & * made not the ſacrament; but riſing vp, diſpatched the reſt of the maſſe euen to the verie end, hir mother helping hir therein, and dooing hir deuotion. This errour a long time laſted, till at laſt by a certeine neighbour that was ſecretlie called to ſuch a maſſe, it was told abroad, and came to the biſhops eares, who cauſing them to appeare before him, talked with them about that errour, and compelled the yoong woman openlie to ſhew the prieſtlie ſhauing of hir haire, whoſe head was found to be all bare and bald. The biſhop ſighing and ſorrieng that ſuch an errour ſhould happen in the church in his time, made manie lamentations, and hauing inioined them penance, diſpatched and ſent them away. Thus far Henrie Knighton. [It is not to be doubted, but that in theſe daies manie of the female ſex be medling in matters impertinent to their degrée, and inconuenient for their knowledge; debating & ſcanning in their priuat conuenticles of ſuch things as wherabout if they kept ſilence, it were for their greater commendation; preſuming, though not to celebrat a maſſe, or to make a ſacrament; yet to vndertake ſome publike péece of ſeruice incident to the miniſterie: whoſe ouer-ſawcie raſhneſſe being bolſtered and borne vp with abbettors not a few, whether it be by eccleſiaſticall diſcipline corrected, I wot not; but of the vnreformed preſbiterie I am ſure it is lamented.]

A fierie ap- rition of di- uerſe like- neſſes.

A head of br wrought by necromanc ſpeaketh.

A fierie dra- gon ſéene in diuers places.

Abr. Fl. out of Thom. Walſin. in Rich. 2. pag. 341.

A coniunctio of Jupiter & Saturne.

A certeine thing appeared in the likeneſſe of fier in manie parts of the realme of England, now of one faſhion, now of another, as it were euerie night, but yet in diuerſe places all Nouember and December. This fierie apparition, oftentimes when any bodie went alone, it would go with him, and would ſtand ſtill when he ſtood ſtill. To ſome it appeared in the likeneſſe of a turning whéele burning; to otherſome round in the likeneſſe of a barrell, flaſhing out flames of fier at the head; to otherſome in the likeneſſe of a long burning lance; and ſo to diuerſe folks at diuerſe times and ſeaſons it ſhewed it ſelfe in diuerſe formes and faſhions a great part of winter, ſpeciallie in Leiceſterſhire and Northamptonſhire: and when manie went togither, it approched not néere them, but appeared to them as it were a far off. In a parlement time there was a certeine head of war made by the art of necromancie (as it was reported) which head at an houre appointed to ſpeake, vttered theſe words following at thrée times, and then ceaſſed to ſpeake any more. Theſe be the words; firſt, The head ſhall be cut off; ſecondlie, The head ſhall be lift vp aloft; thirdlie, The féet ſhall be lift vp aloft aboue the head. This happened in the time of that parlement which was called the mercileſſe parlement, not long before the parlement that was named the parlement which wrought woonders. In Aprill there was ſéene a fierie dragon in manie places of England; which dreadfull ſight as it made manie a one amazed, ſo it miniſtred occaſion of miſtruſt to the minds of the maruellors, that ſome great miſchéefe was imminent, whereof that burning apparition was a prognoſtication. In this kings daies (as ſaith Thomas Walſingham) whoſe report, bicauſe I am here dealing with certeine prodigious accidents importing ſome ſtrange euents, I am the more bold to interlace) about the troubleſome time when diſcord ſprang betwéene the king and his youthlie companions with the duke of Lancaſter, in the moneth of Maie, there happened a coniunction of the two greateſt planets, namelie Jupiter and Saturne, after the which did follow a verie great commotion of kingdoms, as in the proceſſe of this hiſtorie may appeare.

A ſchiſme betwéene two popes for the dignitie of S. Peters chaire.

The French king about this time ſummoned a conuocation of the French cleargie, to decide and ſearch out the power of the two popes, which of them had fuller right and authoritie in S. Peters chaire, for the ſchiſme and diuiſion betwéene the two popes was not yet ended. The French clergie wrote in the behalfe of Clement their pope, & cōfirmed their ſcript or writing with the vniuerſitie ſeale of Paris. Which writing Charles the French king ſent ouer to Richard king of England, that touching theſe doubts and difficulties he with (the councell of his cleargie might deliberat. Wherefore king Richard ſummoned a conuocation at Oxford of the lerneder diuines as well regents as not regents of the whole realme; who wrote for and in the behalfe of Urbane their pope of Rome, and confirmed their writing with the vniuerſitie ſeale of Oxford, & ſent it ouer ſea to Paris vnto the French king. But nothing was doone further in the premiſſes, both popes, vnder the ſhrowd or ſhelter of ſchiſme preuailing betwéene them, iuſtifieng their title & intereſt. [This is the laſt record found in Henrie Knighton, who for that which he hath doone touching chronographie, hath written (the blindneſſe of the time wherein he liued, and his order conſidered) though not ſo well as the beſt, yet not ſo ill as the worſt: and whoſe collections, if they were laid togither, would afford a large augmentation to matters of chronicle: but O ſpite that ſo abruptlie he breaketh off, and continueth his annales no further than this yeare, 1395.]

This yeere, the Danes that laie rouing on the ſeas did much hurt to the Engliſh merchants, taking and robbing manie Engliſh ſhips, and when the hauen townes alongſt the coaſts of Northfolke, made forth a number of ſhips, and ventured to fight with thoſe pirats, they were vanquiſhed by the Danes, ſo that manie were ſlaine, and manie taken priſoners, which were conſtreined to paie great ranſoms. The enimies alſo found in ranſacking the Engliſh ſhips, twentie thouſand pounds, which the Engliſh merchants had aboord with them to buy wares with, in place whither they were bound to go. ¶ In the ſame yeare, William Courtneie archbiſhop of Canturburie, hauing more regard to his owne priuat commoditie, than to the diſcommoditie of others, purchaſed a bull of the pope, whereby he was authoriſed to leauie through his whole prouince foure pence of the pound of eccleſiaſticall promotions, as well in places exempt, as not exempt, no true nor lawfull cauſe being ſhewed or pretended, why he ought ſo to doo; and to ſee the execution of this bull put in practiſe, the archbiſhop of Yorke, and the biſhop of London, were named and appointed.

The Danes rob the Engliſh merchāts on the ſeas.

Great priſes wonne by the Daniſh pirats of the Engliſhmen.

Manie that feared the cenſures of ſuch high executioners, choſe rather to paie the monie forthwith, than to go to the law, and be compelled happilie, mauger their good willes. Some there were that appealed to the ſee of Rome, meaning to defend their cauſe and to procure that ſo vnlawfull an exaction might be reuoked. Speciallie, the prebendaries of Lincolne ſtood moſt ſtiffelie againſt thoſe biſhops, but the death of the archbiſhop that chanced ſhortlie after, made an end of thoſe ſo paſſing great troubles. This yeare, John Waltham biſhop of Saliſburie, and lord treaſuror of England departed this life, and by king Richard his appointment had the honor to haue his bodie interred at Weſtminſter amongſt the kings. After this deceaſe, Roger Walden that before was ſecretarie to the king, and treaſuror of Calis, was now made lord treaſuror.

Anno Reg. 19.

Yee haue heard, that in the yeare 1392, Robert Veer duke of Ireland departed this life in Louaine in Brabant. King Richard therefore this yeare in Nouember, cauſed his corps being imbalmed, to be conueied into England, and ſo to the priorie of Colnie in Eſſex, appointing him to be laid in a coffine of cypreſſe, and to be adorned with princelie garments, hauing a chaine of gold about his necke, and rich rings on his fingers. And to ſhew what loue and affection he bare vnto him in his life time, the king cauſed the coffine to be opened, that he might behold his face bared, and touch him with his hands: he honored his funerall exequies with his preſence, accompanied with the counteſſe of Oxenford, mother to the ſaid duke, the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and manie other biſhops, abbats, and priors: but of noble men there were verie few, for they had not yet digeſted the enuie and hatred which they had conceiued againſt him.

The duke of Irelāds corps conueied from Louaine into England, and there roiallie interred.

Froiſſard.

In this meane while, the duke of Lancaſter was in Gaſcoigne, treating with the lords of the countrie, and the inhabitants of the good townes, which vtterlie refuſed to receiue him otherwiſe than as a lieutenant or ſubſtitute to the king of England, and in the end addreſſed meſſengers into England, to ſignifie to the king, that they had beene accuſtomed to be gouerned by kings, and meant not now to become ſubiects to anie other, contrarie to all reaſon, ſith the king could not (ſauing his oth) alien them from the crowne. The duke of Lancaſter vſed all waies he might deuiſe, how to win their good wils, and had ſent alſo certeine of his truſtie councellors ouer hither into England, as ſir William Perreer, ſir Peter Clifton, and two clearkes learned in the lawe, the one called maiſter John Huech, and the other maiſter John Richards a canon of Leiceſter, to plead and ſollicit his cauſe.

The Gaſcoignes ſend vnto K. Rich. ſignifieng vnto him, that they ought not to be diuided from the crowne.

But to be breefe, ſuch reaſons were ſhewed, and ſuch matter vnfolded by the Gaſcoignes, whie they ought not be ſeparated from the crowne of England, that finallie (notwithſtanding the duke of Gloceſter, and certeine other were againſt them) it was decreed, that the countrie and duchie of Aquitaine ſhould remaine ſtill in demeſne of the crowne of England, leaſt that by this tranſporting thereof, it might fortune in time, that the heritage thereof ſhould fall into the hands of ſome ſtranger, and enimie to the Engliſh nation, ſo that then the homage and ſouereigntie might perhaps be loſt for euer. Indeed, the duke of Gloceſter, being a prince of an high mind, & loth to haue the duke of Lancaſter at home, being ſo highlie in the kings fauor, could haue beene well pleaſed, that he ſhould haue enioied his gift, for that he thought thereby to haue borne all the rule about the king, for the duke of Yorke was a man rather coueting to liue in pleaſure, than to deale with much buſineſſe, and the weightie affaires of the realme.

The grant of the duchie of Aquitaine to the duke of Lancaſter reuoked.

About the ſame time, or ſomewhat before, the king ſent an ambaſſage to the French king, the archbiſhop of Dublin, the earle of Rutland, the earle Marſhall, the lord Beaumont, the lord Spenſer, the lord Clifford named Lewes, and twentie knights with fortie eſquiers. The cauſe of their going ouer, was to intreat of a marriage to be had betwixt him, and the ladie Iſabell, daughter to the French king, ſhe being as then not paſt eight yeares of age, which before had beene promiſed vnto the duke of Britaines ſonne: but in conſideration of the great benefit that was likelie to inſue by this communication and aliance with England, there was a meane found to vndoo that knot, though not preſentlie. Theſe Engliſh lords, at their comming to Paris, were ioifullie receiued, and ſo courteouſlie interteined, banketted, feaſted, and cheriſhed, and that in moſt honorable ſort, as nothing could be more: all their charges and expenſes were borne by the French king, and when they ſhould depart, they receiued for anſwer of their meſſage, verie comfortable words, and ſo with hope to haue their matter ſped, they returned.

Ambaſſadors ſent into France to treat a marriage betweene king Richard & the French K. daughter.

Thom. Walſ.

But now when the duke of Lancaſter had, by laieng forth an ineſtimable maſſe of treaſure purchaſed in a manner the good wils of them of Aquitaine, and compaſſed his whole deſire, he was ſuddenlie countermanded home by the king, and ſo to ſatiſfie the kings pleaſure, he returned into England, and comming to the king at Langleie, where he held his Chriſtmaſſe, was receiued with more honor than loue, as was thought; wherevpon he rode in all haſt that might be to Lincolne, where Katharine Swinford as then laie, whom ſhortlie after the Epiphanie, he tooke to wife. This woman was borne in Heinault, daughter to a knight of that countrie, called ſir Paou de Ruet: ſhe was brought vp in hir youth, in the duke of Lancaſters houſe, and attended on his firſt wife the ducheſſe Blanch of Lancaſter, and in the daies of his ſecond wife the ducheſſe Conſtance, he kept the foreſaid Katharine as his concubine, who afterwards was married to a knight of England, named Swinford, that was now deceaſſed. Before ſhe was married, the duke had by hir three children, two ſonnes and a daughter; one of the ſons was named Thomas de Beaufort, & the other Henrie, who was brought vp at Aken in Almaine,

The duke of Lancaſter marieth a ladie of a meane eſtate, whome he had kept as his concubine proued a good lawyer, and was after biſhop of Wincheſter.

For the loue that the duke had to theſe his children, he married their mother the ſaid Katharine Swinford, being now a widow, whereof men marueled much, conſidering hir meane eſtate was farre vnmeet to match with his highneſſe, and nothing comparable in honor to his other two former wiues. And indeed, the great ladies of England, as the ducheſſes of Gloceſter, the counteſſes of Derbie, Arundell and others, deſcended of the blood roiall, greatlie diſdeined, that ſhe ſhould be matched with the duke of Lancaſter, and by that means be accompted ſecond perſon in the realme, and preferred in roome before them, and therefore they ſaid, that they would not come in anie place where ſhe ſhould be preſent, for it ſhould be a ſhame to them that a woman of ſo baſe birth, and concubine to the duke in his other wiues daies, ſhould go and haue place before them. The duke of Gloceſter alſo, being a man of an high mind and ſtout ſtomach, miſliked his brothers matching ſo meanlie, but the duke of Yorke bare it well inough, and verelie, the ladie hir ſelfe was a woman of ſuch bringing vp, and honorable demeanor, that enuie could not in the end but giue place to well deſeruing. About this ſeaſon, the doctrine of Iohn Wickliffe ſtill mightilie ſpred abroad héere in England. ¶ The ſchiſme alſo ſtill continued in the church, betwixt the two factions of cardinals French and Romane; for one of their popes could no ſooner be dead, but that they ordeined an other in his place.

Anno Reg.20.

A truce for 30 yeares betwéene England and France.

Tho.Walſin.

In this eighteenth yeare alſo was a wonderfull tempeſt of wind in the months of Iulie and Auguſt, and alſo moſt ſpeciallie in September, by violence whereof, in ſundrie places of this realme, great and wonderfull hurt was doone, both in churches and houſes. ¶ The ambaſſadors that had béene latelie in France, about the treatie of the marriage (as before yée haue heard) went thither againe, and ſo after that the two kings by ſending to and fro were growne to certeine points and couenants of agreement, the earle marſhall, by letters of procuration, married the ladie Iſabell, in name of king Richard, ſo that from thenceforth ſhe was called quéene of England. Amongſt other couenants and articles of this marriage, there was a truce accorded, to indure betwixt the two realms of England and France, for tearme of thirtie yeares. The pope wrote to king Richard, beſeeching him to aſſiſt the prelats againſt the Lollards (as they tearmed them) whom he pronounced to be traitors, both to the church and kingdome, and therefore he beſought him to take order for the puniſhment of them, whom the prelats ſhould denounce to be heretikes.

The popes letters to K. Rich. againſt yͤ wickleuiſts

K. Richard goeth ouer to Calis.

At the ſame time, he ſent a bull reuocatorie concerning religious men, that had either at his hands or at the hands of his legats or nuncios purchaſed to be his chapleins, and accompting themſelues thereby exempt from their order; ſo that now they were by this reuocatorie bull, appointed to returne to their order, and to obſerue all rules thereto belonging. This liked the friers well, namelie the minors, that ſought by all means they might deuiſe, how to bring their brethren home againe, which by ſuch exemptions in being the popes chapleins, were ſegregated & diuided from the reſidue of their fraternitie or brotherhood. The king in this twentith yeare of his reigne, went ouer to Calis with his vncles the dukes of Yorke and Gloceſter, and a great manie of other lords and ladies of honour, and thither came to him the duke of Burgognie, and ſo they communed of the peace.. There was no enimie to the concluſion thereof but the duke of Gloceſter, who ſhewed well by his words that he wiſhed rather war than peace, in ſomuch as the king ſtood in doubt of him, leaſt he would procure ſome rebellion againſt him by his ſubiects, whome he knew not to fauour greatlie this new aliance with France.

The maner of the interview betwéene king Richard and the French king.

Fabian.

The king after the duke of Burgognie had talked with him throughlie of all things, and was departed from him, returned into England (leauing the ladies ſtill at Calis) to open the couenants of the marriage and peace vnto his ſubiects, and after he had finiſhed with that buſineſſe, and vnderſtood their minds, he went againe to Calis, and with him his two vncles, of Lancaſter and Gloceſter, and diuerſe prelats and lords of the realme; and ſhortlie after came the French king to the baſtide of Arde, accompanied with the dukes of Burgognie, Berrie, Britaine and Burbon. There was ſet vp for the king of England a right faire and rich pauilion a little beyond Guiſnes within the Engliſh pale; and another the like pauilion was pight vp alſo for the French king on this ſide Arde, within the French dominion; ſo that betwéene the ſaid pauilions was the diſtance of thréeſcore & ten paſes, and in the midwaie betwixt them both, was ordeined the third pauilion, at the which both kings comming from either of their tents ſundrie times ſhould méet and haue communication togither.

The oth of the two kings.

The diſtance betwixt the two tents was beſet on either ſide in time of the interview with knights armed with their ſwords in their hands; that is to ſay, on the one ſide ſtood foure hundred French knights in armor with ſwords in their hands, and on the other ſide foure hundred Engliſh knights armed with ſwords in their hands, making as it were a lane betwixt them through the which the two kings came and met, with ſuch noble men as were appointed to attend them. And a certeine diſtance from the two firſt pauilions, were appointed to ſtand ſuch companies of men as either of them by appointment had couenanted to bring with them. The two kings before their méeting, receiued a ſolemne oth for aſſurance of their faithfull and true meaning, to obſerue the ſacred lawes of amitie one toward an other in that their interview, ſo as no damage, violence, moleſtation, arreſt, diſturbance, or other inconuenience ſhould be practiſed by them, or their friends and ſubiects: and that if anie diſorder roſe through anie miſhappe, arrogancie, or ſtrife mooued by anie perſon, the ſame ſhould be reformed, promiſing in the words of princes to aſſiſt one an other in ſuppreſſing, the malice of ſuch as ſhould preſume to doo or attempt anie thing that might ſound to the breach of friendlie amitie, during the time of that aſſemblie eight daies before, and ſeuen daies after.

The chapell of our ladie of peace.

On the ſix and twentith of October, the king of England remooued from Calis toward the caſtell of Guiſnes, and with him the duke of Berrie, who was ſent to take his oth. The morow after, being the euen of Simon and Iude, the kings met, and the lords of France, to wit, the duke of Berrie, Burgogne, Orleans, and Burbon, the earle of Sauoie, the vicount of Meaux, and others conueied the king of England; and from him were ſent to conduct the French king diuerſe of the Engliſh lords, as the two dukes of Lancaſter and Gloceſter, foure earles; to wit, of Derbie, Rutland, Notingham, and Northumberland. After the two kings were come togither into the tent for that purpoſe prepared, it was firſt accorded betwixt them, that in the ſame place where they thus met, ſhould be builded of both their coſts a chapell for a perpetuall memorie, which ſhould be called The chapell of our ladie of peace. On ſaturdaie being the feaſt daie of the apoſtles Simon and Iude, the kings talked togither of certeine articles touching the treatie of peace, and hauing concluded vpon the ſame, they receiued either of them an oth vpon the holie Euangeliſts, to obſerue and kéepe all the couenants accorded vpon.

The French K. giueth his daughter to king Richard in marriage.

The order of the French kings ſeruice at table.

On the mondaie the French king came to the king of England his pauillion, and the ſame time was brought thither the yoong quéene Iſabell daughter to the French king, who there deliuered hir vnto king Richard, who taking hir by the hand kiſſed hir, & gaue to hir father great thanks for that ſo honorable and gratious a gift, openlie proteſting, that vpon the conditions concluded betwixt them, he did receiue hir, that by ſuch affinitie both the realmes might continue in quietneſſe, and come to a good end and perfect concluſion of a perpetuall peace. The quéene was committed to the ducheſſes of Lancaſter & Gloceſter, to the counteſſes of Huntington and Stafford, to the marchioneſſe of Dublin daughter to the lord Courcie, to the ladies of Namure, Poinings, and others; which with a noble traine of men and horſſes, conueied hir to Calis: for there were twelue charrets full of ladies & gentlewomen. This doone, the kings came togither into the king of Englands pauillion to dinner. The French king ſate on the right ſide of the hall, and was roiallie ſerued after the maner of his countrie, that is to ſaie, of all maner of meats appointed to be ſerued at the firſt courſe in one mightie large diſh or platter, and likewiſe after the ſame ſort at the ſecond courſe. But the king of England was ſerued after the Engliſh manner. When the tables were taken vp, and that they had made an end of dinner, the kings kiſſed ech other, and tooke their horſſes. The K. of England brought the French king on his waie, and at length they tooke leaue either of other, in ſhaking hands and imbracing on horſſebacke. The French king rode to Arde, and the king of England returned to Calis.

The mariage ſolemnized at Calis.

¶ We haue omitted (as things ſuperfluous to ſpeake of) all the honorable demenor and courteous interteinement vſed and ſhewed betwixt theſe princes and noble men on both parts, their ſundrie feaſtings and banketings, what rich apparell, plate, and other furniture of cupbords and tables, the princelie gifts and rich iewels which were preſented from one to an other, ſtriuing (as it might ſéeme) who ſhould ſhew himſelfe moſt bounteous and liberall: beſide the gifts which the king of England gaue vnto the French king, and to the nobles of his realme (which amounted aboue the ſumme of ten thouſand marks) the K. of England ſpending at this time (as the fame went) aboue thrée hundred thouſand marks. After the kings returne to Calis on wedneſdaie next inſuing, being All hallowes daie, in ſolemne wiſe he married the ſaid ladie Iſabell in the church of ſaint Nicholas, the archbiſhop of Canturburie dooing the office of the miniſter.

The maior of London and the citizens meete the K. & the quéene on Blackeheath.

The thurſdaie after, the dukes of Orleance and Burbon came to Calis to ſée the king & the quéene: and on the fridaie they tooke their leaue and departed, and rode to ſaint Omers to the French king. On the ſame daie in the morning the king and the quéene tooke their ſhip, and had faire paſſage: for within thrée houres they arriued at Douer, from whence they ſped them towards London, whereof the citizens being warned, made out certeine horſſemen well appointed in one liuerie of colour, with a deuiſe imbrodered on their ſléeues, that euerie companie might be knowne from other, the which with the maior and his brethren, clothed in ſkarlet, met the king and quéene on Blackeheath, and there dooing their duties with humble reuerence attended vpon their maieſties till they came to Newington: where the king comanded the maior with his companie to returne, for that he was appointed to lodge that night at Kennington.

The duke of Lancaſter his baſtards made legitimate by parlement.

The iuſtices reuoked out of exile.

Shortlie after, to wit, the thirtéenth of Nouember, the yoong quéene was conueied from thence with great pompe vnto the Tower, at which time there was ſuch preaſe on London bridge, that by reaſon thereof, certeine perſons were thruſt to death: among the which the prior of Tiptrie, a place in Eſſex was one, and a worſhipfull matrone in Cornehill an other. The morow after ſhe was conueied to Weſtminſter with all the honor that might be deuiſed, and finallie there crowned quéene vpon ſundaie being then the ſeauenth of Ianuarie. On the two and twentith of Ianuarie was a parlement begun at Weſtminſter, in which the duke of Lancaſter cauſed to be legitimated the iſſue which he had begot of Katharine Swinford, before ſhe was his wife. ¶ At the ſame time Thomas Beauford ſonne to the ſaid duke, by the ſaid Katharine, was created earle of Summerſet. ¶ There was an ordinance made in the ſame parlement, that iuſtices ſhould not haue anie to ſit with them as aſſiſtants. ¶ Moreouer, there was a tenth granted by the clergie to be paied to the kings vſe at two ſeuerall termes in that preſent yeare. In this yeare the king contrarie to his oth reuoked the iuſtices forth of Ireland, whom by conſtraint (as before ye haue heard) he was inforced to baniſh, thereby to ſatiſfie the noble men that would haue it ſo.

Breſt yéelded vp to the duke of Britaine.

Priuie grudge betwixt the king and the duke of Gloceſter.

The talke betwixt the king and the duke of Gloceſter.

Out of a French pamphlet.

In this twentith yeare of his reigne king Richard receiuing the ſummes of monie (for the which the ſtrong towne of Breſt was ingaged to him) by euill counſell (as manie thought) deliuered it vnto the duke of Britaine, by reaſon whereof no ſmall ſparke of diſpleaſure aroſe betwixt the king and the duke of Gloceſter, which kindled vp ſuch a flame (as it was eaſie to doo) finding matter inough to féed vpon in both their breſts, that finallie it could no longer be kept downe, nor by anie meanes quenched. In the moneth of Februarie, the king holding a ſumptuous feaſt at Weſtminſter, many of the ſoldiors that were newlie come from Breſt preaſed into the hall, and kept a roome togither. Whom as the duke of Gloceſter beheld, and vnderſtood what they were, to remember how that towne was giuen vp contrarie to his mind and pleaſure, it grieued him not a little: and therefore as the king was entred into his chamber, and few about him, he could not forbeare, but brake forth, and ſaid to the king: Sir, ſaw ye not thoſe felowes that ſate in ſuch number this daie in the hall, at ſuch a table? The king anſwered that he ſaw them, and aſked the duke what they were? To whom the duke made this anſwer: Sir, theſe be the ſoldiors that came from Breſt, and haue nothing now to take to, nor yet know how to ſhift for their liuings, and the worſe, for that (as I am informed) they haue béene euill paied. Then ſaid the king; That is againſt my will, for I would that they ſhould haue their due wages; and if anie haue cauſe to complaine, let them ſhew the matter to the treaſuror, and they ſhall be reaſonablie anſwered: and herewith he commanded that they ſhould be appointed to foure certeine villages about London, there to remaine, and to haue meate, drinke, and lodging vpon his charges till they were paied.

Thus as they fell into reaſoning of this matter, the duke ſaid to the king: Sir, your grace ought to put your bodie in paine to win a ſtrong hold or towne by feats of war, yer you take vpon you to ſell or deliuer anie towne or ſtrong hold gotten with great aduenture by the manhood and policie of your noble progenitours. To this the king with changed countenance anſwered and ſaid: Vncle, how ſay you that? And the duke boldlie without feare recited the ſame againe, not changing one word in anie better ſort. Wherevpon the king being more chafed, replied; Sir, “ thinke you that I am a merchant, or a verie foole, to ſell my land? By ſaint Iohn Baptiſt no: but truth it “ is, that our coſine the duke of Britaine hath ſatiſfied vs in all ſuch ſummes of monie as our progenitors “ lent vnto him, and to his anceſtors, vpon gage of “ the ſaid towne of Breſt, for the which reaſon and conſcience will no leſſe but that the towne ſhould there- “ vpon be to him reſtored. Upon this multiplieng of words in ſuch preſumptuous maner by the duke againſt the king, there kindeled ſuch diſpleaſure betwixt them, that it neuer ceaſſed to increaſe into flames, till the duke was brought to his end.

The earle of ſaint Paule his counſell to K. Richard.

The earle of ſaint Paule at his laſt comming into England to receiue king Richards oth for obſeruing the truce, had conference with the king of diuerſe matters. The king by waie of complaint, ſhewed vnto him how ſtiffe the duke of Gloceſter was in hindering all ſuch matters as he would haue go forward, not onlie ſéeking to haue the peace broken betwixt the realmes of England & France, but alſo procuring trouble at home, by ſtirring the people to rebellion. The earle of ſaint Paule hearing of this ſtout demeanor of the duke, told the king that it ſhould be beſt to prouide in time againſt ſuch miſchéefs as might inſue thereof, and that it was not to be ſuffered, that a ſubiect ſhould behaue himſelfe in ſuch ſort toward his prince. The king marking his words, thought that he gaue him good and faithfull counſell, and therevpon determined to ſuppreſſe both the duke and other of his complices, and tooke more diligent regard to the ſaiengs & doings of the duke than before he had doone. And as it commeth to paſſe that thoſe which ſuſpect anie euill, do euer déeme the worſt; ſo he tooke euerie thing in euill part, inſomuch that he complained of the duke vnto his brethren the dukes of Lancaſter and Yorke, in that he ſhould ſtand againſt him in all things and ſeeke his deſtruction, the death of his counſellors, and ouerthrow of his realme.

The dukes of Lancaſter & yorke excuſe the duke of Gloceſter to the king.

The two dukes of Lancaſter and Yorke to deliuer the kings mind of ſuſpicion, made anſwer, that they were not ignorant, how their brother of Gloceſter, as a man ſometime raſh in words, would ſpeake oftentimes more than he could or would bring to effect, and the ſame procéeded of a faithfull hart, which he bare towards the king, for that it grieued him to vnderſtand, that the confines of the Engliſh dominions ſhould in anie wiſe be diminiſhed: therefore his grace ought not to regard his words, ſith he ſhould take no hurt thereby. Theſe perſuaſions quieted the king for a time, till he was informed of the practiſe which the duke of Gloceſter had contriued (as the ſame went amongſt diuerſe perſons) to impriſon the king. For then the duke of Lancaſter and Yorke, firſt reproouing the duke of Gloceſter for his too liberall talking, vttering vnaduiſedlie words that became not his perſon, and which to haue concealed had tended more to the opinion of vertue, than to laſh out whatſoeuer his vnſtaied mind afforded, which is a great fault (as in effect the poet noteth:

Eximia eſt virtus præſtare ſilentia rebus,
At contra grauis eſt culpa tacenda loqui) and perceiuing that he ſet nothing by their words, were in doubt leaſt if they ſhould remaine in the court ſtill, he would vpon a preſumptuous mind, in truſt to be borne out by them, attempt ſome outragious enterpriſe. Wherefore they thought beſt to depart for a time into their countries, that by their abſence he might the ſooner learne to ſtaie himſelfe for doubt of further diſpleaſure. But it came to paſſe, that their departing from the court was the caſting awaie of the duke of Gloceſter. For after that they were gone, there ceaſſed not ſuch as bare him euill will, to procure the K. to diſpatch him out of the way.

A conſpiracie betwéene the duke of Gloceſter, and the abbat of ſaint Albons.

Out of an old French pamphlet belonging to Iohn Stow.

The duke in déed ſore ſtomached the matter, that his counſell might not be followed in all things, and ſpeciallie for that he ſaw (as he tooke it) that the king was miſled by ſome perſons that were about him, otherwiſe than ſtood with his honor: for reformation whereof, he conferred with the abbat of ſaint Albons, and the prior of Weſtminſter. The abbat was both his coſine and godfather: and hauing on a daie both the duke and the prior at his houſe in ſaint Albons, after dinner he fell in talke with the duke and prior, and amongſt other communication required of the prior to tell truth, whether he had anie viſion the night before or not. The prior ſéemed loth to make a direct anſwer; but at length being earneſtlie requeſted as well by the abbat as the duke, he declared that he had a viſion in déed, which was, that the realme of England ſhould be deſtroied through the miſgouernement of king Richard. ” By the virgine Marie, ſaid the abbat, I had the verie ſame viſion. ” The duke herevpon diſcloſed vnto them all the ſecrets of his mind, and by their deuiſes preſentlie contriued an aſſemblie of diuerſe great lords of the realme at Arundell caſtell that daie fortnight, at what time he himſelfe appointed to be there, with the earles of Derbie, Arundell, Marſhall, and Warwike: alſo the archbiſhop of Canturburie, the abbat of ſaint Albons, the prior of Weſtminſter, with diuerſe others.

Anno Reg. 21.

These eſtates being come to Arundell caſtell at the daie appointed, about the verie beginning of the one and twentith yeare of king Richards reigne, they ſware ech to other to be aſſiſtant in all ſuch matters as they ſhould determine, and therewith receiued the ſacrament at the hands of the archbiſhop of Canturburie, who celebrated maſſe before them the morow after. Which doone, they withdrew into a chamber, and fell in counſell togither, where in the end they light vpon this point; to take king Richard, the dukes of Lancaſter & Yorke, and commit them to priſon, and all the other lords of the kings councell they determined ſhuld be drawne and hanged. Such was their purpoſe which they ment to haue accompliſhed in Auguſt following. But the earle marſhall that was lord deputie of Calis, and had married the earle of Arundels daughter, diſcouered all their counſell to the king, and the verie daie in which they ſhould begin their enterpriſe. The king bad the earle marſhall take héed what he had ſaid, for if it proued not true, he ſhould repent it: but the earle conſtantlie herevnto anſwered, that if the matter might be proued otherwiſe, he was contented to be drawne and quartered.

The purpoſe of the conſpirators.

The earle marſhall diſcloſeth the conſpiracie.

The king herevpon went to London, where he dined at the houſe of his brother the earle of Huntington in the ſtréet behind All hallowes church vpon the banke of the riuer of Thames, which was a right faire and ſtatelie houſe. After dinner, he gaue his councell to vnderſtand all the matter; by whoſe aduiſe it was agreed, that the king ſhould aſſemble forthwith what power he might conuenientlie make of men of armes & archers, and ſtreightwaies take horſſe, accompanied with his brother the earle of Huntington, & the earle marſhall. Herevpon at ſix of the clocke in the afternoone, the iuſt houre when they vſed to go to ſupper, the king mounted on horſſebacke, and rode his waie; whereof the Londoners had great maruell. After that the king began to approch the dukes houſe at Plaſhie in Eſſex, where he then laie, he commanded his brother the earle of Huntington to ride afore, to know if the duke were at home, and if he were, then to tell him that the king was comming at hand to ſpeake with him.

The earle of Rutland ſaith R. Grafton.

The earle with ten perſons in his companie amending his paſe (for the king had made no great haſt all the night before, as ſhould appeare by his iournie) came to the houſe, and entering into the court, aſked if the duke were at home, and vnderſtanding by a gentlewoman that made him anſwer, that both the duke and ducheſſe were yet in bed, he beſought hir to go to the duke, and to ſhew him that the king was comming at hand to ſpeake with him, and forthwith came the king with a competent number of men of armes, and a great companie of archers, riding into the baſe court, his trumpets ſounding before him. The duke herewith came downe into the baſe court, where the king was, hauing none other apparell vpon him, but his ſhirt, and a cloke or a mantell caſt about his ſhoulders, and with humble reuerence ſaid that his grace was welcome, aſking of the lords how it chanced they came ſo earlie, and ſent him no word of their comming? The king herewith courteouſlie requeſted him to go and make him readie, and appoint his horſſe to be ſadled, for that he muſt needs ride with him a little waie, and conferre with him of buſineſſe. The duke went vp againe into his chamber to put vpon him his clothes, and the king alighting from his horſſe, fell in talke with the ducheſſe and hir ladies. The earle of Huntington and diuerſe other followed the duke into the hall, and there ſtaied for him, till he had put on his raiment. And within a while they came forth againe all togither into the baſe court, where the king was deliting with the ducheſſe in pleaſant talke, whom he willed now to returne to hir lodging againe, for he might ſtaie no longer, and ſo tooke his horſſe againe, and the duke likewiſe. But ſhortlie after that the king and all his companie were gone forth of the gate of the baſe court, he commanded the earle marſhall to apprehend the duke, which incontinentlie was doone according to the kings appointment.

The duke of Gloceſter arreſted.

¶ Here we find ſome variance in writers. For as by an old French pamphlet (which I haue ſéene) it ſhould appeare, the king commanded firſt, that this duke ſhould be conueied vnto the tower, where he ment to commen with him, & not in any other place: but neuertheleſſe, the king ſhortlie after appointed, that he ſhould be ſent to Calis, as in the ſame pamphlet is alſo conteined. Other write, that immediatlie vpon his apprehenſion, the earle marſhall conueied him vnto the Thames, and there being ſet abord in a ſhip prepared of purpoſe, he was brought to Calis, where he was at length diſpatched out of life, either ſtrangled or ſmoothered with pillowes (as ſome doo write.) For the king thinking it not good, that the duke of Gloceſter ſhould ſtand to his anſwer openlie, becauſe the people bare him ſo much good will, ſent one of his iuſtices called Willam Rikill, an Iriſhman borne, ouer vnto Calis, there to inquire of the duke of Gloceſter, whether he had committed any ſuch treaſons as were alledged againſt him, and the earles of Arundell and Warwike, as after ſhall be ſpecified. Iuſtice Rikill hearing what he confeſſed vpon his examination, wrote the ſame as he was commanded to doo, and therewith ſpéedilie returned to the king, and as it hath béene reported, he informed the king (whether trulie or not, I haue not to ſay) that the duke franklie confeſſed euerie thing, wherewith he was charged. Whereupon the king ſent vnto Thomas Mowbraie earle marſhall and of Notingham, to make the duke ſecretlie awaie.

Out of an old French pamphlet.

The earle prolonged time for the executing of the kings commandement, though the king would haue had it doone with all expedition, wherby the king conceiued no ſmall diſpleaſure, and ſware that it ſhould coſt the earle his life if he quickly obeied not his commandement. The earle thus as it ſéemed in maner inforced, called out the duke at midnight, as if he ſhould haue taken ſhip to paſſe ouer into England, and there in the lodging called the princes In, he cauſed his ſeruants to caſt featherbeds vpon him, and ſo ſmoother him to death, or otherwiſe to ſtrangle him with towels (as ſome write.) This was the end of that * noble man, fierce of nature, haſtie, wilfull, and giuen more to war than to peace: and in this greatlie to be diſcommended, that he was euer repining againſt the king in all things, whatſoeuer he wiſhed to haue forward. He was thus made awaie not ſo ſoone as the brute ran of his death. But (as it ſhould appeare by ſome authors) he remained aliue till the parlement that next inſued, and then about the ſame time that the earle of Arundell ſuffered, he was diſpatched (as before ye haue heard.) His bodie was afterwards with all funerall pompe conueied into England, and buried at his owne manor of Plaſhie within the church there, in a ſepulchre which he in his life time had cauſed to be made, and there erected.

* For he was ſon to a king, and vncle to a king.

The ſame euening that the king departed from London towards Plaſhie, to apprehend the duke of Gloceſter, the earle of Rutland and the earle of Kent were ſent with a great number of men of armes and archers to arreſt the erle of Arundell; which was doone eaſilie inough, by reaſon that the ſaid earle was trained with faire words at the kings hands, till he was within his danger: where otherwiſe he might haue béene able to haue ſaued himſelfe, and deliuered his fréends. The earle of Warwike was taken, and committed to the tower the ſame day that the king had willed him to dinner, and ſhewed him verie good countenance. There were alſo apprehended and committed to the tower the ſame time, the lord Iohn Cobham, and ſir Iohn Cheinie knights. The earle of Arundell was ſent to the Ile of Wight, there to remaine as priſoner, till the next parlement, in the which he determined ſo to prouide, that they ſhould be all condemned, and put to death. And for doubt of ſome commotion that might ariſe amongſt the commons, he cauſed it by open proclamation to be ſignified, that theſe noblemen were not apprehended for any offenſe committed long agone, but for new treſpaſſes againſt the king, as in the next parlement ſhould be manifeſtlie declared and prooued.

The earle of Arundell apprehended.

Shortlie after, he procured them to be indicted at Notingham, ſuborning ſuch as ſhould appeale them in parlement, to wit, Edward earle of Rutland, Thomas Mowbraie earle marſhall, Thomas Holland earle of Kent, Iohn Holland earle of Huntington, Thomas Beaufort erle of Summerſet, Iohn Montacute earle of Saliſburie, Thomas lord Spenſer, and the lord William Scroope lord chamberleine. In the meane time, the king fearing what might be attempted againſt him by thoſe that fauoured theſe noblemen that were in durance, ſent for a power of Cheſhire men, that might day and night kéepe watch and ward about his perſon. They were about two thouſand archers, paid wéekelie, as by the annales of Britaine it appeareth. The king had little truſt in any of the nobilitie, except in his brother the earle of Huntington, and the earle of Rutland ſonne to the duke of Yorke, and in the earle of Saliſburie: in theſe onelie he repoſed a confidence, and not in any other, except in certeine knights and gentlemen of his priuie chamber.

The names of the appellants.

A gard of Cheſhire men about the king.

The lords appointed to come in warlike manner to the parlemẽt.

In the meane time, whiles things were thus in broile, before the beginning of the parlement, diuers other, beſide them of whom we haue ſpoken, were apprehended and put in ſundrie priſons. The parlement was ſummoned to begin at Weſtminſter the 17 of September, and writs thereupon directed to euerie of the lords to appeare, and to bring with them a ſufficient number of armed men and archers in their beſt arraie: for it was not knowen how the dukes of Lancaſter and Yorke would take the death of their brother, nor how other péeres of the realme would take the apprehenſion and impriſonment of their kinſemen, the earles of Arundell and Warwike, and of the other priſoners. Suerlie the two dukes when they heard that their brother was ſo ſuddenlie made awaie, they wiſt not what to ſaie to the matter, and began both to be ſorowfull for his death, and doubtfull cf their owne ſtates: for ſith they ſaw how the king (abuſed by the counſell of euill men) abſteined not from ſuch an heinous act, they thought he would afterwards attempt greater miſorders from time to time. Therefore they aſſembled in all haſt, great numbers of their ſeruants, fréends, and tenants, and comming to London, were receiued into the citie. For the Londoners were right ſorie for the death of the duke of Gloceſter, who had euer ſought their fauour, in ſomuch that now they would haue béene contented to haue ioined with the dukes in ſéeking reuenge of ſo noble a mans death, procured and brought to paſſe without law or reaſon, as the common brute then walked; although peraduenture he was not as yet made awaie.

The dukes of Lancaſter & Yorke aſſemble their powers to reſiſt the kings dealings.

Here the dukes and other fell in counſell, and manie things were proponed. Some would that they ſhuld by force reuenge the duke of Gloceſters death, other thought it méet that the earles Marſhall and Huntington, and certeine others, as chéefe authours of all the miſchéefe ſhould be purſued and puniſhed for their demerites, hauing trained vp the king in vice and euill cuſtomes, euen from his youth. But the dukes (after their diſpleaſure was ſomewhat aſſwaged) determined to couer the ſtings of their griefes for a time, and if the king would amend his maners, to forget alſo the iniuries paſt. In the meane time the king laie at Eltham, and had got about him a great power (namelie of thoſe archers, which he had ſent for out of Cheſhire, in whome he put a ſingular truſt more than in any other.)

There went meſſengers betwixt him and the dukes, which being men of honour did their indeuour to appeaſe both parties. The king diſcharged himſelfe of blame for the duke of Gloceſters death, conſidering that he had gone about to breake the truce, which he had taken with France, and alſo ſtirred the people of the realme to rebellion, and further had ſought the deſtruction and loſſe of his life, that was his ſouereigne lord and lawfull king. Contrarilie, the dukes affirmed, that their brother was wrongfullie put to death, hauing doone nothing worthie of death. At length, by the interceſſion and meanes of thoſe noble men that went to and fro betwixt them, they were accorded, & the king promiſed from thenceforth to doo nothing but by the aſſent of the dukes: but he kept ſmall promiſe in this behalfe, as after well appeared.

The king and the dukes reconciled.

Caxton.

When the time came, that the parlement ſhould be holden at Weſtminſter, according to the tenour of the ſummons, the lords repaired thither, furniſhed with great retinues both of armed men and archers, as the earle of Derbie, the earle Marſhall, the earle of Rutland, the lord Spenſer, the earle of Northumberland, with his ſonne the lord Henrie Perſie, and the lord Thomas Perſie the ſaid earles brother, alſo the lord Scroope treaſuror of England, & diuerſe other. All the which earles and lords brought with them a great & ſtrong power, euerie of them in their beſt araie, as it were to ſtrengthen the king againſt his enimies. The dukes of Lancaſter and Yorke were likewiſe there, giuing their attendance on the king with like furniture of men of armes & archers. There was not halfe lodging ſufficient within the citie & ſuburbes of London for ſuch cōpanies of men as the lords brought with them to this parlement, called the great parlement: in ſomuch that they were conſtreined to lie in villages abroad ten or twelue miles on ech ſide the citie.

The great parlement.

In the beginning of this parlement, the king greatlie complained of the miſdemeanour of the péeres and lords of his realme, as well for the things doone againſt his will and pleaſure, whiles he was yoong, as for the ſtreit dealing, which they had ſhewed towards the quéene, who was thrée houres at one time on hir knées before the earle of Arundell, for one of hir eſquiers, named Iohn Caluerlie, who neuertheleſſe had his head ſmit frō his ſhoulders, & all the anſwer that ſhe could get, was this: Madame, praie for your ſelfe, and your huſband, for that is beſt, and let this ſute alone. Thoſe that ſet foorth the kings gréeuances, as prolocutors in this parlement were theſe: Iohn Buſhie, William Bagot, and Thomas Gréene. The king had cauſed a large houſe of timber to be made within the palace at Weſtminſter, which he was called an hall, couered aboue head with tiles, and was open at the ends, that all men might ſée through it. This houſe was of ſo great a compaſſe, that ſcarſe it might ſtand within the roome of the palace. In this houſe was made an high throne for the king, and a large place for all eſtates beſides to ſit in. There were places alſo made for the appellants to ſtand on the one ſide, and the defendants on the other, and a like roome was made behind for the knights and burgeſſes of the parlement. There was a place deuiſed for the ſpeaker, named ſir Iohn Buſhie, a knight of Lincolneſhire, accompted to be an excéeding cruell man, ambitious, and couetous beyond meaſure.

The kings gréeuances opened in this parlement.

Additions to Polychron.

Sir Iohn Buſhie ſpeaker.

Immediatlie after, ech man being placed in his roome, the cauſe of aſſembling that parlement was ſhewed, as that the king had called it for reformation of diuerſe tranſgreſſions and oppreſſions committed againſt the peace of his land by the duke of Gloceſter, the earles of Arundell, Warwike, and others. Then ſir Iohn Buſhie ſtept foorth, and made requeſt on the behalfe of the communaltie, that it might pleaſe the kings highneſſe for their heinous acts attempted againſt his lawes and roiall maieſtie, to appoint them puniſhment according to their deſeruings, and ſpeciallie to the archbiſhop of Canturburie (who then ſat next the king) whome he accuſed of high treaſon, for that he had euill counſelled his maieſtie, inducing him to grant his letters of pardon to his brother the earle of Arundell, being a ranke traitor.

The archbiſhop of Canturburie ſitting in parlement is accuſed of treaſon by the ſpeaker.

When the archbiſhop began to anſwer in his owne defenſe, the king willed him to ſit downe againe and to hold his peace, for all ſhould be well. Herewith ſir Iohn Buſhie beſought the king, that the archbiſhop ſhould not be admitted to make his anſwer, which if he did, by reaſon of his great wit and good vtterance, he feared leaſt he ſhould lead men awaie to beléeue him: ſo the archbiſhop might be heard no further. Sir Iohn Buſhie in all his talke, when he proponed any matter vnto the king, did not attribute to him titles of honour, due and accuſtomed, but inuented vnuſed termes and ſuch ſtrange names, as were rather agréeable to the diuine maieſtie of God, than to any earthlie potentate. The prince being deſirous inough of all honour, and more ambitious than was requiſite, ſéemed to like well of his ſpéech, and gaue good eare to his talke.

Impudent flatterie.

Thus when the archbiſhop was conſtreined to kéepe ſilence, ſir Iohn Buſhie procéeded in his purpoſe, requiring on the behalfe of the commons, that the charters of pardons granted vnto the traitors, to wit, the duke of Gloceſter, and the earles of Arundell and Warwike, ſhould be reuoked by conſent of all the eſtates now in parlement aſſembled. The king alſo for his part proteſted, that thoſe pardons were not voluntarilie granted by him, but rather extorted by compulſion, and therefore he beſought them that euerie man would ſhew forth their opinions what they thought thereof. There were two other perſons of great credit with the king, beſides ſir John Buſhie, that were, as before yee haue heard, verie earneſt to haue thoſe charters of pardon reuoked and made void, to wit, ſir William Bagot, and ſir Thomas Greene.

Tho.Walſi.

But bicauſe this matter ſeemed to require good deliberation, it was firſt put to the biſhops, who with ſmall adoo gaue ſentence, that the ſaid charters were reuocable, and might well inough be called in: yet the archbiſhop of Canturburie in his anſwer herevnto ſaid, that the king from whome thoſe pardons came, was ſo high an eſtate, that he durſt not ſaie, that anie ſuch charters by him granted, might be reuoked: notwithſtanding, his brethren the biſhops thought otherwiſe: not conſidering (ſaith Thomas Walſingham) that ſuch reuoking of the kings charters of pardon ſhould ſound highlie to the kings diſhonor: forſomuch as mercie and pardoning tranſgreſſions is accompted to be the confirmation and eſtabliſhing of the kings ſeat and roiall eſtate.

The temporall lords perceiuing what the biſhops had doone, did likewiſe giue their conſents, to reuoke the ſame pardons: but the iudges with thoſe that were toward the law, were not of this opinion, but finallie the biſhops pretending a ſcrupuloſitie, as if they might not with ſafe conſciences be preſent where iudgement of bloud ſhould paſſe, they appointed a laie man to be their prolocutor to ſerue that turne. To conclude, at length all maner of charters of pardon were made void, for that the ſame ſeemed to impeach the ſuertie of the kings perſon. When ſir John Buſhie and his aſſociats had obteined that reuocation, it was further by them declared, that the earle of Arundell had yet an other ſpeciall charter of pardon for his owne perſon, which he had obteined after the firſt. And therefore ſir John Buſhie earneſtlie requeſted in name of the communaltie that the ſame might likewiſe be reuoked.

The charters of pardō granted to ẏ lords made void by parlement.

The queſtion then was aſked of the biſhops, who declared themſelues to be of the like opinion, touching that charter, as they were of the other. At that ſelfe time the archbiſhop of Canturburie abſented himſelfe from the parlement, in hope that the king would he his freend, and ſtand his verie good lord, for that he had promiſed nothing ſhould be doone againſt him in the parlement whileſt he was abſent. But neuertheleſſe, at the importunate ſute of the ſaid ſir John Buſhie and others, the archbiſhop was condemned vnto perpetuall exile, and appointed to auoid the realme within ſix weekes. And therewith the king ſent ſecretlie to the pope for order that the archbiſhop might be remooued from his ſee to ſome other, which ſute was obteined, and Roger Walden lord treaſuror was ordeined archbiſhop in his place, as after ſhall appeare.

The archb. of Canturburie condemned to perpetuall baniſhment. Six daies ſaith Grafton.

The earle of Arundell areigned.

On the feaſt daie of ſaint Matthew, Richard fitz Aleine, earle of Arundell, was brought forth to ſweare before the king and whole parlement to ſuch articles as he was to be charged with. And as he ſtood at the bar, the lord Neuill was commanded by the duke of Lancaſter, which ſat that daie as high ſteward of England, to take the hood from his necke, and the girdle from his waſte. Then the duke of Lancaſter declared vnto him, that for his manifold rebellions and treaſons againſt the kings maieſtie he had beene arreſted, and hitherto kept in ward, and now at the petition of the lords and commons, he was called to anſwer ſuch crimes as were there to be obiected againſt him, and ſo to purge himſelfe, or elſe to ſuffer for his offenſes, ſuch puniſhment as law appointed.

The duke of Lācaſter high Steward of England at this areignement.

Firſt, he charged him, for that he had traitorouſlie rid in armour againſt the king in companie of the duke of Gloceſter, and of the earle of Warwike, to the breach of peace, and diſquieting of the realme. His anſwer herevnto was, that he did not this vpon anie euill meaning towards the kings perſon, but rather for the benefit of the king and relme, if it were interpreted aright, and taken as it ought to be. It was further demanded of him, whie he procured letters of pardon from the K. if he knew himſelfe giltleſſe? He anſwered, that he did not purchaſe them for anie feare he had of faults committed by him, but to ſtaie the malicious ſpeach of them that neither loued the king nor him. He was againe aſked, whether he would denie that he had made anie ſuch rode with the perſons before named, and that in companie of them he entred not armed vnto the kings preſence againſt the kings will and pleaſure? To this he anſwered, that he could not denie it, but that he ſo did.

The earle of Arundell his anſwers to the points of his indiatmēt.

Then the ſpeaker ſir John Buſhie, with open mouth, beſought that iudgement might be had againſt ſuch a traitour: and your faithfull commons (ſaid he to the king) aſke and require that ſo it may be doone. The earle turning his head aſide, quietlie ſaid to him; Not the kings faithfull cōmons require this, but thou, and what thou art I know. Then the eight appellants ſtanding on the other ſide, caſt their gloues to him, and in proſecuting their appeale (which alreadie had beene read) offered to fight with him man to man to iuſtifie the ſame. Then ſaid the earle, If I were at libertie, and that it might ſo ſtand with the pleaſure of my ſouereigne, I would not refuſe to prooue you all liers in this behalfe. Then ſpake the duke of Lancaſter, ſaieng to him; What haue you further to ſaie to the points before laid againſt you? He anſwered, that of the kings grace he had his letters of generall pardon, which he required to haue allowed. Then the duke told him, that the pardon was reuoked by the prelates and noble men in the parlement, and therefore willed him to make ſome other anſwer. The earle told him againe that he had an other pardon vnder the kings great ſeale, granted him long after of the kings owne motion, which alſo he required to haue allowed. The duke told him, that the ſame was likewiſe reuoked. After this, when the earle had nothing more to ſaie for himſelfe, the duke pronounced iudgement againſt him, as in caſes of treaſon is vſed.

The earle of Arundell condemned.

But after he had made an end, and pauſed a little, he ſaid: The king our ſouereigne lord of his mercie and grace, bicauſe thou art of his bloud, and one of the peeres of the realme, hath remitted all the other paines, ſauing the laſt, that is to ſaie, the beheading, and ſo thou ſhalt onelie loſe thy head; and forthwith he was had awaie, & led through London vnto the Tower hill. There went with him to ſee the execution doone ſix great lords, of whome there were three earles, Notingham (that had married his daughter) Kent (that was his daughters ſon) and Huntington, being mounted on great horſſes, with a great companie of armed men, and the fierce bands of the Cheſhire-men, furniſhed with axes, ſwords, bowes and arrowes, marching before and behind him, who onelie in this parlement had licence to beare weapon, as ſome haue written. When he ſhould depart the palace, he deſired that his hands might be loſed to diſpoſe ſuch monie as he had in his purſſe, betwixt that place and Charingcroſſe. This was permitted, and ſo he gaue ſuch monie as he had in almes with his owne hands, but his armes were ſtill bound behind him.

When he came to the Tower hill, the noble men that were about him, mooued him right earneſtlie to acknowledge his treaſon againſt the king. But he in no wiſe would ſo doo, but mainteined that he was neuer traitour in word or déed: and herewith perceiuing the earles of Notingham and Kent, that ſtood by with other noble men buſie to further the execution (being as yée haue heard) of kin and alied to him, he ſpake to them, and ſaid: Trulie it would haue beſéemed you rather to haue béene abſent than here at this buſineſſe. But the time will come yer it be long, when as manie ſhall merueil at your miſfortune as doo now at mine. After this, forgiuing the executioner, he beſought him not to torment him long, but to ſtrike off his head at one blowe, and féeling the edge of the ſword, whether it was ſharpe inough or not, he ſaid; It is verie well, doo that thou haſt to doo quicklie, and ſo knéeling downe, the executioner with one ſtroke, ſtrake off his head: his bodie was buried togither with his head in the church of the Auguſtine friers in Breadſtréet within the citie of London.

The executiõ of the earle of Arundell.

The death of this earle was much lamented among the people, conſidering his ſudden fall and miſerable end, where as not long before among all the noblemen of this land (within the which was ſuch a number, as no countrie in the world had greater ſtore at that preſent) there was none more eſtéemed: ſo noble and valiant he was, that all men ſpake honour of him. After his death, as the fame went, the king was ſore vexed in his ſléepe with horrible dreames, imagining that he ſaw this earle appeare vnto him threatning him, & putting him in horrible feare, as if he had ſaid with the poet to king Richard;

Ouid.

Nunc quoq; factorum venio memor vmbra tuorum,
Inſequor & vultus oſſea forma tuos.

With which viſions being ſore troubled in ſléepe, he curſſed the daie that euer he knew the earle. And he was the more vnquiet, bicauſe he heard it reported, that the common people tooke the erle for a martyr, inſomuch that ſome came to viſit the place of his ſepulture, for the opinion they had conceiued of his holineſſe. And where it was bruted abroad as for a miracle, that his head ſhould be growne to his bodie againe, the tenth daie after his buriall, the king ſent about ten of the clocke in the night, certeine of the nobilitie to ſée his bodie taken vp, that he might be certified of the truth. Which doone, and perceiuing it was a fable, he commanded the friers to take downe his armes that were ſet vp about the place of his buriall, and to couer the graue, ſo as it ſhould not be perceiued where he was buried.

The earle of Warwike arreigned of treaſon.

But now to returne to the parlement. After the death of this earle, the lord Thomas Beauchampe earle of Warwike was brought foorth to abide his triall by parlement, and when his accuſers charged him in like points of treaſon, ſuch as before were impoſed to the earle of Arundell; he anſwered that he neuer meant euill to the kings perſon, nor thought that thoſe rodes and aſſemblies that were made in companie of the duke of Gloceſter, the earle of Arundell, and others, might not be accompted treaſon. But when the iudges had ſhewed him, that they could not be otherwiſe taken than for treaſon, he humblie beſought the king of mercie and grace. The king then aſked of him whether he had rid with the duke of Gloceſter, and the earle of Arundell, as had béene alledged? He anſwered that he could not denie it, and wiſhed that he had neuer ſéene them. Then ſaid the king, Doo yee not know that you are guiltie of treaſon? He anſwered againe, I acknowledge it; and with ſobbing teares beſought all them that were preſent, to make interceſſion to the kings maieſtie for him.

Then the king and the duke of Lancaſter communed, and after the king had a while with ſilence conſidered of the matter, he ſaid to the earle; By ſaint Iohn Baptiſt, Thomas of Warwike, this confeſſion that thou haſt made, is vnto me more auailable than all the duke of Gloceſters and the earle of Warwikes lands. Herewith the earle making ſtill interceſſion for pardon, the lords humblie beſought the king to grant it. Finallie the king pardoned him of life, but baniſhed him into the Ile of Man, which then was the lord Scropes, promiſing that both he, and his wife, and children, ſhould haue good interteinment. Which promiſe notwithſtanding was but ſlenderlie kept, for both the earle and the counteſſe liued in great penurie (as ſome write) and yet the lord Scrope, that was lord chamberleine, had allowed for the earles diet foure thouſand nobles yéerelie paid out of the kings coffers.

On the mondaie next after the arreignement of the earle of Warwike, to wit, the foure and twentie of September, was the lord Iohn Cobham, and ſir Iohn Cheinie arreigned, and found guiltie of like treaſons for which the other had béene condemned before: but at the earneſt inſtance and ſute of the nobles, they were pardoned of life, and baniſhed, or (as Fabian ſaith) condemned to perpetuall priſon. ¶ The king deſirous to ſée the force of the Londoners, cauſed them (during the time of this parlement) to muſter before him on Blacke heath, where a man might haue ſéene a great number of able perſonages. And now after that the parlement had continued almoſt till Chriſtmaſſe, it was adiourned vntill the quinden of S. Hilarie, then to begin againe at Shrewſburie.

The parlemẽt adiourned to Shrewſburie.

The king then came downe to Lichfield, and there held a roiall Chriſtmaſſe, which being ended, he tooke his iournie towards Shrewſburie, where the parlement was appointed to begin in the quinden of ſaint Hilarie, as before yée haue heard. In which parlement there holden vpon prorogation, for the loue that the king bare to the gentlemen and commons of the ſhire of Cheſter, he cauſed it to be ordeined, that from thenceforth it ſhould be called and knowne by the name of the principalitie of Cheſter: and herewith he intituled himſelfe prince of Cheſter. He held alſo a roiall feaſt, kéeping open houſhold for all honeſt commers, during the which feaſt, he created fiue dukes and a ducheſſe, a marqueſſe, and foure earles. The earle of Derbie was created duke of Hereford, the earle of Notingham that was alſo earle marſhall duke of Norfolke, the earle of Rutland duke of Aumerle, the earle of Kent duke of Surrie, and the earle of Huntington duke of Exceſter; the ladie Margaret marſhall counteſſe of Norfolke, was created ducheſſe of Norfolke; the earle of Summerſet marques Dorſet, the lord Spenſer earle of Gloceſter, the lord Neuill ſurnamed Daurabie earle of Weſtmerland, the lord William Scroope lord chamberleine earle of Wiltſhire, and the lord Thomas Perſie lord ſteward of the kings houſe earle of Worceſter.

Creation of dukes and earles.

And for the better maintenance of the eſtate of theſe noble men, whome he had thus aduanced to higher degrees of honour, he gaue vnto them a great part of thoſe lands that belonged to the duke of Gloceſter, the earles of Warwike, and Arundell. And now he was in good hope, that he had rooted vp all plants of treaſon, and therefore cared leſſe who might be his fréend or his fo, than before he had doone, eſtéeming himſelfe higher in degrée than anie prince liuing, and ſo preſumed further than euer his grandfather did, and tooke vpon him to beare the armes of ſaint Edward, ioining them vnto his owne armes. To conclude, whatſoeuer he then did, none durſt ſpeake a word contrarie thereunto. And yet ſuch as were chéefe of his counced, were eſtéemed of the commons to be the worſt creatures that might be, as the dukes of Aumarle, Norfolke and Exceſter, the earle of Wiltſhire, ſir John Buſhie, ſir William Bagot, and ſir Thomas Greene: which three laſt remembred were knights of the Bath, againſt whom the commons vndoubtedlie bare great and priuie hatred.

The L. Reginald Cobham condemned.

The authoritie of both houſes in parlement granted to certeine perſons.

Thom. Walſ.

But now to proceed. In this parlement holden at Shrewſburie, the lord Reginald Cobham, being a verie aged man, ſimple and vpright in all his dealings, was condemned for none other cauſe, but for that in the eleuenth yeere of the kings reigne he was appointed with other to be attendant about the king as one of his gouernours. The acts and ordinances alſo deuiſed and eſtabliſhed in the parlement holden in the eleuenth yeare were likewiſe repealed. Moreouer, in this parlement at Shrewesburie, it was decreed, that the lord John Cobham ſhould be ſent into the Ile of Gerneſie, there to remaine in exile, hauing a ſmall portion aſſigned him to liue vpon. The king ſo wrought & brought things about, that he obteined the whole power of both houſes to be granted to certeine perſons, as to John duke of Lancaſter, Edmund duke of Yorke, Edmund duke of Aumarle, Thomas duke of Surrie, John duke of Exceſter, John marqueſſe Dorſet, Roger earle of March, John earle of Saliſburie, and Henrie earle of Northumberland, Thomas earle of Glouceſter, and William earle of Wiltſhire, John Huſſie, Henrie Cheimeſwike, Robert Teie, and John Gouloſer knights, or to ſeauen or eight of them. Theſe were appointed to heare and determine certeine petitions and matters yet depending and not ended: but by vertue of this grant, they proceeded to conclude vpon other things, which generallie touched the knowledge of the whole parlement, in derogation of the ſtates thereof, to the diſaduantage of the king, and perillous example in time to come.

The K. procureth the popes buls againſt the breakers of his ſtatuts.

When the king had ſpent much monie in time of this parlement, he demanded a diſme and a halfe of the clergie, and a fifteenth of the temporaltie. Finallie, a generall pardon was granted for all offenſes to all the kings ſubiects (fiftie onelie excepted) whoſe names he would not by anie meanes expreſſe, but reſerued them to his owne knowledge, that when anie of the nobilitie offended him, he might at his pleſure name him to be one of the number excepted, and ſo keepe them ſtill within his danger. To the end that the ordinances, iudgements, and acts made, pronounced and eſtabliſhed in this parlement, might be and abide in perpetuall ſtrength and force, the king purchaſed the popes buls, in which were conteined greeuous cenſures and curſſes, pronounced againſt all ſuch as did by anie means go about to breake and violate the ſtatutes in the ſame parlement ordeined. Theſe buls were openlie publiſhed & read at Paules croſſe in London, and in other the moſt publike places of the realme.

Rightfull heires diſherited.

Polydor. K. Richard his euill gouernment.

Manie other things were doone in this parlement, to the diſpleaſure of no ſmall number of people; namelie, for that diuerſe rightfull heires were diſherited of their lands and liuings, by authoritie of the ſame parlement: with which wrongfull doings the people were much offended, ſo that the king and thoſe that were about him, and cheefe in councell, came into great infamie and ſlander. In deed the king after he had diſpatched the duke of Glouceſter, and the other noblemen, was not a little glad, for that he knew them ſtill readie to diſappoint him in all his purpoſes; and therefore being now as it were careleſſe, did not behaue himſelfe (as ſome haue written) in ſuch diſcreet order, as manie wiſhed: but rather (as in time of proſperitie it often happeneth) he forgot himſelfe, and began to rule by will more than by reaſon, threatning death to each one that obeied not his inordinate deſires. By means whereof, the lords of the realme began to feare their owne eſtates, being in danger of his furious outrage, whome they tooke for a man deſtitute of ſobrietie and wiſedome, and therfore could not like of him, that ſo abuſed his authoritie.

The duke of Hereford appealeth the duke of Norfolk of treſon.

Thom. Walſ.

Hereupon there were ſundrie of the nobles, that lamented theſe miſcheefes, and ſpeciallie ſhewed their greefes vnto ſuch, by whoſe naughtie counſell they vnderſtood the king to be miſled; and this they did, to the end that they being about him, might either turne their copies, and giue him better counſell; or elſe he hauing knowledge what euill report went of him, might mend his maners miſliked of his nobles. But all was in vaine, for ſo it fell out, that in this parlement holden at Shrewſburie, Henrie duke of Hereford accuſed Thomas Mowbraie duke of Norfolke, of certeine words which he ſhould vtter in talke had betwixt them, as they rode togither latelie before betwixt London and Brainford, ſounding highlie to the kings diſhonor. And for further proofe thereof, he preſented a ſupplication to the king, wherein he appealed the duke of Norfolke in field of battell, for a traitor, falſe and diſloiall to the king, and enimie vnto the realme. This ſupplication was red before both the dukes, in preſence of the king: which doone, the duke of Norfolke tooke vpon him to anſwer it, declaring that whatſoeuer the duke of Hereford had ſaid againſt him other than well, he lied falſelie like an vntrue knight as he was. And when the king aſked of the duke of Hereford what he ſaid to it: he taking his hood off his head, ſaid; My ſouereigne lord, euen as the ſupplication which I tooke you importeth, right ſo I ſaie for truth, that Thomas Mowbraie duke of Norfolke is a traitour, falſe and diſloiall to your roiall maieſtie, your crowne, and to all the ſtates of your realme.

The duke of Surrie marſhall and the duke of Aumarle conſtable of England.

Then the duke of Norfolke being aſked what he ſaid to this, he anſwered: Right deere lord, with your fauour that I make anſwer vnto your coſine here, I ſaie (your reuerence ſaued) that Henrie of Lancaſter duke of Hereford, like a falſe and diſloiall traitor as he is, dooth lie, in that he hath or ſhall ſay of me otherwiſe than well. No more ſaid the king, we haue heard inough: and herewith commanded the duke of Surrie for that turne marſhall of England, to arreſt in his name the two dukes: the duke of Lancaſter father to the duke of Hereford, the duke of Yorke the duke of Aumarle conſtable of England: and the duke of Surrie marſhall of the realme vndertooke as pledges bodie for bodie for the duke of Hereford: but the duke of Northfolke was not ſuffered to put in pledges, and ſo vnder arreſt was led vnto Windſor caſtell, and there garded with keepers that were appointed to ſee him ſafelie kept.

The order of the proceeding in this appeale.

Now after the diſſoluing of the parlement at Shrewſburie, there was a daie appointed about ſix weekes after, for the king to come vnto Windſor, to heare and to take ſome order betwixt the two dukes, which had thus appealed ech other. There was a great ſcaffold erected within the caſtell of Windſor for the king to ſit with the lords and prelats of his realme: and ſo at the daie appointed, he with the ſaid lords & prelats being come thither and ſet in their places, the duke of Hereford appellant, and the duke of Norfolke defendant, were ſent for to come & appeare before the king, ſitting there in his ſeat of iuſtice. And then began ſir John Buſhie to ſpeake for the king, declaring to the lords how they ſhould vnderſtand, that where the duke of Hereford had preſented a ſupplication to the king, who was there ſet to miniſter iuſtice to all men that would demand the ſame, as apperteined to his roiall maieſtie, he therefore would now heare what the parties could ſay one againſt an other, and withall the king commanded the dukes of Aumarle and Surrie, the one being conſtable, and the other marſhall, to go vnto the two dukes, appellant and defendant, requiring them on his behalfe, to grow to ſome agréement: and for his part, he would be readie to pardon all that had béene ſaid or doone amiſſe betwixt them, touching anie harme or diſhonor to him or his realme: but they anſwered both aſſuredlie, that it was not poſſible to haue anie peace or agréement made betwixt them.

When he heard what they had anſwered, he commanded that they ſhould be brought forthwith before his preſence, to heare what they would ſay. Herewith an herald in the kings name with lowd voice commanded the dukes to come before the king, either of them to ſhew his reaſon, or elſe to make peace togither without more delaie. When they were come before the king and lords, the king ſpake himſelfe to them, willing them to agrée, and make peace togither: for it is (ſaid he) the beſt waie ye can take. The duke of Norfolke with due reuerence herevnto anſwered it could not be ſo brought to paſſe, his honor ſaued. Then the king aſked of the duke of Hereford, what it was that he demanded of the duke of Norfolke, and what is the matter that ye can not make peace togither, and become friends?

Then ſtood forth a knight; who aſking and obteining licence to ſpeake for the duke of Hereford, ſaid; Right deare and ſouereigne lord, here is Henrie of Lancaſter duke of Hereford and earle of Derbie, who ſaith, and I for him likewiſe ſay, that Thomas Mowbraie duke of Norfolke is a falſe and diſloiall traitor to you and your roiall maieſtie, and to your whole realme: and likewiſe the duke of Hereford ſaith and I for him, that Thomas Mowbraie duke of Norfolke hath receiued eight thouſand nobles to pay the ſouldiers that kéepe your towne of Calis, which he hath not doone as he ought: and furthermore the ſaid duke of Norfolke hath béene the occaſion of all the treaſon that hath béene contriued in your realme for the ſpace of theſe eightéene yeares, & by his falſe ſuggeſtions and malicious counſell, he hath cauſed to die and to be murdered your right déere vncle, the duke of Gloceſter, ſonne to king Edward. Moreouer, the duke of Hereford ſaith, and I for him, that he will proue this with his bodie againſt the bodie of the ſaid duke of Norfolke within liſts. The king herewith waxed angrie, and aſked the duke of Hereford, if theſe were his words, who anſwered: Right déere lord, they are my words; and hereof I require right, and the battell againſt him.

The obiection againſt the duke of Norfolke.

There was a knight alſo that aſked licence to ſpeake for the duke of Norfolke, and obteining, it began to anſwer thus: Right déere ſouereigne lord, here is Thomas Mowbraie duke of Norfolke, who anſwereth and ſaith, and I for him, that all which Henrie of Lancaſter hath ſaid and declared (ſauing the reuerence due to the king and his councell) is a lie; and the ſaid Henrie of Lancaſter hath falſelie and wickedlie lied as a falſe and diſloiall knight, and both hath béene, and is a traitor againſt you, your crowne, roiall maieſtie, & realme. This will I proue and defend as becommeth a loiall knight to doo with my bodie againſt his: right déere lord, I beſéech you therefore, and your councell, that it maie pleaſe you in your roiall diſcretion, to conſider and marke, what Henrie of Lancaſter duke of Hereford, ſuch a one as he is, hath ſaid.

The king then demanded of the duke of Norfolke, if theſe were his words, and whether he had anie more to ſaie. The duke of Norfolke then anſwered for himſelfe: Right déere ſir, true it is, that I haue receiued ſo much gold to paie your people of the towne of Calis; which I haue doone, and I doo auouch that your towne of Calis is as well kept at your commandement as euer it was at anie time before, and that there neuer hath béene by anie of Calis anie complaint made vnto you of me. Right déere and my ſouereigne lord, for the voiage that I made into France, about your marriage, I neuer receiued either gold or ſiluer of you, nor yet for the voiage that the duke of Aumarle & I made into Almane, where we ſpent great treaſure: Marie true it is, that once I laid an ambuſh to haue ſlaine the duke of Lancaſter, that there ſitteth: but neuertheleſſe he hath pardoned me thereof, and there was good peace made betwixt vs, for the which I yéeld him hartie thankes. This is that which I haue to anſwer, and I am readie to defend my ſelfe againſt mine aduerſarie; I beſéech you therefore of right, and to haue the battell againſt him in vpright iudgement.

The duke of Norfolke his anſwer for himſelfe.

After this, when the king had communed with his councell a little, he commanded the two dukes to ſtand forth, that their anſwers might be heard. The K. then cauſed them once againe to be aſked, if they would agrée and make peace togither, but they both flatlie anſwered that they would not: and withall the duke of Hereford caſt downe his gage, and the duke of Norfolke tooke it vp. The king perceiuing this demeanor betwixt them, ſware by ſaint Iohn Baptiſt, that he would neuer ſéeke to make peace betwixt them againe. And therefore ſir Iohn Buſhie in name of the king & his councell declared, that the king and his councell had commanded and ordeined, that they ſhould haue a daie of battell appointed them at Couentrie. ¶ Here writers diſagrée about the daie that was appointed: for ſome ſaie, it was vpon a mondaie in Auguſt; other vpon ſaint Lamberts daie, being the ſeuenteenth of September, other on the eleuenth of September: but true it is, that the king aſſigned them not onlie the daie, but alſo appointed them liſtes and place for the combat, and therevpon great preparation was made, as to ſuch a matter apperteined.

The combat appointed to be doone at Couentrie. The French pamphlet. Iohn Stow. Fabian.

At the time appointed the king came to Couentrie, where the two dukes were readie, according to the order preſcribed therein, comming thither in great arraie, accompanied with the lords and gentlemen of their linages. The king cauſed a ſumptuous ſcaffold or theater, and roiall liſtes there to be erected and prepared. The ſundaie before they ſhould fight, after dinner the duke of Hereford came to the king (being lodged about a quarter of a mile without the towne in a tower that belonged to ſir William Bagot) to take his leaue of him. The morow after, being the daie appointed for the combat, about the ſpring of the daie, came the duke of Norfolke to the court to take leaue likewiſe of the king. The duke of Hereford armed him in his tent, that was ſet vp néere to the liſts, and the duke of Norfolke put on his armor, betwixt the gate & the barrier of the towne, in a beautifull houſe, hauing a faire perclois of wood towards the gate, that none might ſée what was doone within the houſe.

Anno Reg.22.

The duke of Aumarle that daie, being high conſtable of England, and the duke of Surrie marſhall, placed themſelues betwixt them, well armed and appointed; and when they ſaw their time, they firſt entered into the liſtes with a great companie of men apparelled in ſilke ſendall, imbrodered with ſiluer, both richlie and curiouſlie, euerie man hauing a tipped ſtaffe to kéepe the field in order. About the houre of prime came to the barriers of the liſtes, the duke of Hereford, mounted on a white courſer, barded with gréene & blew veluet imbrodered ſumptuouſlie with ſwans and antelops of goldſmiths worke, armed at all points. The conſtable and marſhall came to the barriers, demanding of him what he was, he

The order of the combat.

“ anſwered; I am Henrie of Lancaſter duke of Hereford, “ which am come hither to doo mine indeuor againſt Thomas Mowbraie duke of Norfolke, as a “ traitor vntrue to God, the king, his realme, and me. Then incontinentlie he ſware vpon the holie euangeliſts, that his quarrell was true and iuſt, and vpon that point he required to enter the liſts. Then he put vp his ſword, which before he held naked in his hand, and putting downe his viſor, made a croſſe on his horſſe, and with ſpeare in hand, entered into the liſts, and deſcended from his horſſe, and ſet him downe in a chaire of greene veluet, at the one end of the liſts, and there repoſed himſelfe, abiding the comming of his aduerſarie.

Soone after him, entred into the field with great triumph, king Richard accompanied with all the peeres of the realme, and in his companie was the earle of ſaint Paule, which was come out of France in poſt to ſee this challenge performed. The king had there aboue ten thouſand men in armour, leaſt ſome fraie or tumult might riſe amongſt his nobles, by quarelling or partaking. When the king was ſet in his ſeat, which was richlie hanged and adorned; a king at armes made open proclamation, prohibiting all men in the name of the king, and of the high conſtable and marſhall, to enterpriſe or attempt to approch or touch any part of the liſts vpon paine of death, except ſuch as were appointed to order or marſhall the field. The proclamation ended, an other herald “ cried; Behold here Henrie of Lancaſter duke of Hereford appellant, which is entred into the liſts “ roiall to doo his deuoir againſt Thomas Mowbraie “ duke of Norfolke defendant, vpon paine to be found “ falſe and recreant.

The duke of Norfolke houered on horſſebacke at the entrie of the liſts, his horſſe being barded with crimoſen veluet, imbrodered richlie with lions of ſiluer and mulberie trees; and when he had made his oth before the conſtable and marſhall that his quarrell was iuſt and true, he entred the field manfullie, “ ſaieng alowd: God aid him that hath the right, and then he departed from his horſſe, & ſate him downe in his chaire which was of crimoſen veluet, courtined about with white and red damaſke. The lord marſhall viewed their ſpeares, to ſee that they were of equall length, and deliuered the one ſpeare himſelfe to the duke of Hereford, and ſent the other vnto the duke of Norfolke by a knight. Then the herald proclamed that the trauerſes & chaires of the champions ſhould be remoued, commanding them on the kings behalfe to mount on horſſebacke, & addreſſe themſelues to the battell and combat.

The duke of Hereford was quicklie horſſed, and cloſed his bauier, and caſt his ſpeare into the reſt, and when the trumpet ſounded ſet forward couragiouſlie towards his enimie ſix or ſeuen paſes. The duke of Norfolke was not fullie ſet forward, when the king caſt downe his warder, and the heralds cried, Ho, ho. Then the king cauſed their ſpeares to be taken from them, and commanded them to repaire againe to their chaires, where they remained two long houres, while the king and his councell deliberatlie conſulted what order was beſt to be had in ſo weightie a cauſe. Finallie, after they had deuiſed, and fullie determined what ſhould be doone therein, the heralds cried ſilence; and ſir Iohn Buſhie the kings ſecretarie read the ſentence and determination of the king and his councell, in a long roll, the effect wherof was, that Henrie duke of Hereford ſhould within fifteene daies depart out of the realme, and not to returne before the terme of ten yeares were expired, except by the king he ſhould be repealed againe, and this vpon paine of death; and that Thomas Mowbraie duke of Norfolke, bicauſe he had ſowen ſedition in the relme by his words, ſhould likewiſe auoid the realme, and neuer to returne againe into England, nor approch the borders or confines thereof vpon paine of death; and that the king would ſtaie the profits of his lands, till he had leuied thereof ſuch ſummes of monie as the duke had taken vp of the kings treaſuror for the wages of the garriſon of Calis, which were ſtill vnpaid.

The combat ſtaied by the king.

The king his doome betwixt the two dukes

When theſe iudgements were once read, the king called before him both the parties, and made them to ſweare that the one ſhould neuer come in place where the other was, willinglie; nor keepe any companie to gither in any forren region; which oth they both receiued humblie, and ſo went their waies. The duke of Norfolke departed ſorowfullie out of the relme into Almanie, and at the laſt came to Venice, where he for thought and melancholie deceaſſed: for he was in hope (as writers record) that he ſhould haue beene borne out in the matter by the king, which when it fell out otherwiſe, it greeued him not a little. The duke of Hereford tooke his leaue of the king at Eltham, who there releaſed foure yeares of his baniſhment: ſo he tooke his iornie ouer into Calis, and from thence went into France, where he remained. ¶ A woonder it was to ſee what number of people ran after him in euerie towne and ſtreet where he came, before he tooke the ſea, lamenting and bewailing his departure, as who would ſaie, that when he departed, the onelie ſhield, defenſe and comfort of the common wealth was vaded and gone.

The duke of Hereford beloued of the people.

At his comming into France, king Charles hearing the cauſe of his baniſhment (which he eſteemed to be verie light) receiued him gentlie, and him honorablie interteined, in ſo much that he had by fauour obteined in mariage the onelie daughter of the duke of Berrie, vncle to the French king, if king Richard had not beene a let in that matter, who being thereof certified, ſent the earle of Saliſburie with all ſpeed into France, both to ſurmize by vntrue ſuggeſtion, heinous offenſes againſt him, and alſo to require the French king that in no wiſe he would ſuffer his couſine to be matched in mariage with him that was ſo manifeſt an offendor. This was a peſtilent kind of proceeding againſt that nobleman then being in a forren countrie, hauing beene ſo honorablie receiued as he was at his entrance into France, and vpon view and good liking of his behauiour there, ſo forward in mariage with a ladie of noble linage. So ſharpe, ſo ſeuere, & ſo heinous an accuſation, brought to a ſtrange king from a naturall prince, againſt his ſubiect, after puniſhment inflicted (for he was baniſhed) was inough to haue made the French king his fatall fo, & vpon ſuſpicion of aſſaieng the like trecherie againſt him, to haue throwne him out of the limits of his land. But what will enuie leaue vnattempted, where it is once ſetled? And how are the malicious tormented with egernes of reuenge againſt them whom they maligne, wringing themſelues in the meane time with inward pangs gnawing them at the hart? wherevnto ſerueth the poets alluſion,

The duke of Hereford is honorablie interteined with the French king.

On Newyeares day this yeare, the riuer that paſſeth betwixt Suelleſton or Snelſton, and Harewood, two villages not far from Bedford, ſudenlie ceaſſed his courſe, ſo as the chanell remained drie by the ſpace of three miles, that any man might enter into, and paſſe the ſame drie foot at his pleaſure. This diuiſion, which the water made in that place, the one part ſeeming as it were not to come neere to the other, was iudged to ſignifie the reuolting of the ſubiects of this land from their naturall prince. It may be, that the water of that riuer ſanke into the ground, and by ſome ſecret paſſage or chanell tooke courſe till it came to the place where it might riſe againe as in other places is likewiſe ſéene.

Blanke charters.

Ye haue heard before, how the archbiſhop of Canturburie Thomas Arundell, was baniſht the relme, and Roger Walden was made archbiſhop of that ſée, who was a great fauourer of the citie of London, the which was eftſoones about this ſeaſon fallen into the kings diſpleaſure: but by the diligent labour of this archbiſhop, and of Robert Braibrooke then biſhop of London, vpon the humble ſupplication of the citizens, the kings wrath was pacified. But yet to content the kings mind, manie blanke charters were deuiſed, and brought into the citie, which manie of the ſubſtantiall and wealthie citizens were faine to ſeale, to their great charge, as in the end appeared. And the like charters were ſent abroad into all ſhires within the realme, whereby great grudge and murmuring aroſe among the people: for when they were ſo ſealed, the kings officers wrote in the ſame what liked them, as well for charging the parties with paiment of monie, as otherwiſe.

The death of the duke of Lancaſter.

Tho.Walſ.

In this meane time, the duke of Lancaſter departed ont of this life at the biſhop of Elies place in Holborne, and lieth buried in the cathedrall church of ſaint Paule in London, on the northſide of the high altar, by the ladie Blanch his firſt wife. The death of this duke gaue occaſion of increaſing more hatred in the people of this realme toward the king, for he ſeized into his hands all the goods that belonged to him, and alſo receiued all the rents and reuenues of his lands which ought to haue deſcended vnto the duke of Hereford by lawfull inheritance, in reuoking his letters patents, which he had granted to him before, by vertue wherof he might make his attorneis generall to ſue liuerie for him, of any maner of inheritances or poſſeſſions that might from thenceforth fall vnto him, and that his homage might be reſpited, with making reaſonable fine: whereby it was euident, that the king meant his vtter vndoing.

This hard dealing was much miſliked of all the nobilitie, and cried out againſt of the meaner ſort: but namelie the duke of Yorke was therewith ſore moued, who before this time, had borne things with ſo patient a mind as he could, though the ſame touched him verie néere, as the death of his brother the duke of Gloceſter, the baniſhment of his nephue the ſaid duke of Hereford, and other mo iniuries in great number, which for the ſlipperie youth of the king, he paſſed ouer for the time, and did forget aſwell as he might. But now perceiuing that neither law, iuſtice nor equitie could take place, where the kings wilfull will was bent vpon any wrongfull purpoſe, he conſidered that the glorie of the publike wealth of his countrie muſt néeds decaie, by reaſon of the king his lacke of wit, and want of ſuch as would (without flatterie) admoniſh him of his dutie: and therefore he thought it the part of a wiſe man to get him in time to a reſting place, and to leaue the following of ſuch an vnaduiſed capteine, as with a leden ſword would cut his owne throat.

The duke of Yorke miſliketh the court & goeth home.

The realme let to farme by the king.

Herevpon he with the duke of Aumarle his ſonne went to his houſe at Langlie, reioiſing that nothing had miſhappened in the common-wealth through his deuiſe or conſent. The common brute ran, that the king had ſet to farme the realme of England, vnto ſir William Scroope earle of Wiltſhire, and then treaſuror of England, to ſir John Buſhie, ſir John Bagot, and ſir Henrie Gréene knights. ¶ About the ſame time, the earle of Arundels ſonne, named Thomas, which was kept in the duke of Exeters houſe, eſcaped out of the realme, by meanes of one William Scot mercer, and went to his vncle Thomas Arundell late archbiſhop of Canturburie, as then ſoiourning at Cullen.

Tho.Walſ.

¶ King Richard being deſtitute of treaſure to furniſh ſuch a princelie port as he mainteined, borrowed great ſummes of monie of manie of the great lords and péeres of his realme, both ſpirituall and temporall, and likewiſe of other meane perſons, promiſing them in good earneſt, by deliuering to them his letters patents for aſſurance, that he would repaie the monie ſo borrowed at a daie appointed: which notwithſtanding he neuer paid.

New exactions.

The paiment of theſe fines was called a pleſance as it were to pleaſe the K. withall, but ſ ſame diſpleaſed manie that were thus conſtreined to paie againſt their willes.

Moreouer, this yeare he cauſed ſeuentéene ſhires of the realme by waie of putting them to their fines to paie no ſmall ſummes of monie, for redéeming their offenſes, that they had aided the duke of Gloceſter, the earles of Arundell, and Warwike, when they roſe in armor againſt him. The nobles, gentlemen, and commons of thoſe ſhires were inforced alſo to receiue a new oth to aſſure the king of their fidelitie in time to come; and withall certeine prelats and other honorable perſonages, were ſent into the ſame ſhires to perſuade men to this paiment, and to ſée things ordered at the pleaſure of the prince: and ſuerlie the fines which the nobles, and other the meaner eſtates of thoſe ſhires were conſtreined to paie, were not ſmall, but excéeding great, to the offenſe of manie. Moreouer, the kings letters patents were ſent into euerie ſhire within this land, by vertue whereof, an oth was demanded of all the kings liege people for a further aſſurance of their due obedience, and they were conſtreined to ratifie the ſame in writing vnder their hands and ſeales.

The people confirme the oth of allegiance by writing ſealed.

Indirect dealings.

Moreouer they were compelled to put their hands and ſeales to certeine blankes, wherof ye haue heard before, in the which, when it pleaſed him he might write what he thought good. There was alſo a new oth deuiſed for the ſhiriffes of euerie countie through the realme to receiue: finallie, manie of the kings liege people were through ſpite, enuie, and malice, accuſed, apprehended, & put in priſon, and after brought before the conſtable and marſhall of England, in the court of chiualrie, and might not otherwiſe be deliuered, except they could iuſtifie themſelues by combat and fighting in liſts againſt their accuſers hand to hand, although the accuſers for the moſt part were luſtie, yoong and valiant, where the parties accuſed were perchance old, impotent, maimed and ſicklie. Whereupon not onelie the great deſtruction of the realme in generall, but alſo of euerie ſingular perſon in particular, was to be feared and looked for.

Abr.Fl. out of Thom.Walſ. pag.395.

¶ About this time the biſhop of Calcedon came into England, with letters apoſtolicall of admonition, that the faithfull and loiall of the land ſhould of their goods diſburſſe ſomewhat to the emperour of Conſtantinople, who was extremelie vexed and troubled by the Tartars, and their capteine called Morect. And to the intent that the péeres of the land might be made the more willing and toward to beſtow their contribution in this behalfe, the pope granted vnto all benefactors (trulie contrite and confeſſed) full remiſſion, and wrapped in his bitter cenſures all ſuch as hindered thoſe that were willing to beſtow their beneuolence in this caſe; conſidering, that although the emperour was a ſchiſmatike, yet was he a chriſtian, and if by the infidels he ſhould be oppreſſed, all chriſtendome was in danger of ruine; hauing in his mind that ſaieng of the poet full fit for his purpoſe,

Tunc tua res agitur paries cùm proximus ardet.

Abr.Fl. out of Thom.Walſ. pag.395.

¶ In this yeare in a manner throughout all the realme of England, old baie trées withered, and afterwards, contrarie to all mens thinking, grew gréene againe, a ſtrange ſight, and ſuppoſed to import ſome vnknowne euent.

Polydor.

¶ In this meane time the king being aduertiſed that the wild Iriſh dailie waſted and deſtroied the townes and villages within the Engliſh pale, and had ſlaine manie of the ſouldiers which laie there in gariſon for defenſe of that countrie, determined to make eftſoones a voiage thither, & prepared all things neceſſarie for his paſſage now againſt the ſpring. A little before his ſetting forth, he cauſed a iuſts to be holden at Windeſor of fourtie knights and fourtie eſquiers, againſt all commers, & they to be apparelled in greene, with a white falcon, and the queene to be there well accompanied with ladies and damſels. When theſe iuſts were finiſhed, the king departed toward Briſtow, from thence to paſſe into Ireland, leauing the queene with hir traine ſtill at Windeſor: he appointed for his lieutenant generall in his abſence his vncle the duke of Yorke: and ſo in the moneth of Aprill, as diuerſe authors write, he ſet forward from Windeſor, and finallie tooke ſhipping at Milford, and from thence with two hundred ſhips, and a puiſſant power of men of armes and archers he ſailed into Ireland. The fridaie next after his arriuall, there were ſlaine two hundred Iriſhmen at Fourd in Kenlis within the countie of Kildare, by that valiant gentleman Ienico Dartois, and ſuch Engliſhmen as he had there with him: and on the morrow next inſuing the citizens of Dublin inuaded the countrie of Obrin, and ſlue thirtie and three Iriſhmen.

Macmur.

The king alſo after he had remained about ſeuen daies at Waterford, marched from thence towards Kilkennie, and comming thither, ſtaied thereabout fourteene daies, looking for the duke of Aumarle that was appointed to haue met him, but he failed and came not, wherevpon the king on Midſummer euen ſet forward againe, marching ſtreight towards the countrie of Macmur the principall rebell in that ſeaſon within Ireland, who keeping himſelfe among woods with three thouſand right hardie men, ſeemed to paſſe little for any power that might be brought againſt him. Yet the king approching to the ſkirts of the woods, commanded his ſoldiers to fier the houſes and villages: which was executed with great forwardneſſe of the men of war. And here for ſome valiant act that he did, or ſome other fauourable reſpect, which the king bare to the lord Henrie ſonne to the duke of Hereford, he made him knight. ¶ This Henrie was after king of England, ſucceeding his father, and called by the name of Henrie the fift. There were nine or ten others made knights alſo at the ſame time.

Pioners ſet a worke to cut downe woods.

Moreouer, there were two thouſand & fiue hundred pioners ſet a worke to cut downe the woods, and to make paſſages through, and ſo then the Engliſhmen entred, and by force got through: for the Iriſhmen ſore feared the Engliſh bowes, but yet now and then they eſpieng their aduantage, aſſailed oftentimes Engliſhmen with their darts, and ſlue diuerſe that went abroad to fetch in forrage. The vncle of Macmur hauing a withie or with about his necke, came in and ſubmitted himſelfe, and likewiſe manie other naked and bare legged; ſo that the king ſeeming to pitie their miſerable ſtate, pardoned them, and afterward he alſo ſent vnto Macmur, promiſing that if he would come in and require pardon as his vncle had doone, he would receiue him to mercie: but Macmur vnderſtanding that for want of vittels, the king muſt needs retire within a ſhort time, he refuſed the kings offer. The king with his armie remaining in thoſe parts 11 daies, was in the end conſtreined to come backe, when all their vittels were ſpent: for more than they brought with them they could not get. They loſt manie horſſes in this iournie for want of prouiſion and forrage.

Macmur ſendeth to the K. offering a parlee.

The earle of Gloceſter.

As the king was withdrawne towards Dublin, marching through the countrie, in deſpite of his enimies, that houered ſtill about his armie, Macmur ſent to the king, offering to talke of an agreement, if it ſhould pleaſe him to ſend any noble man to meet him at a place appointed. The king herevpon commanded the earle of Gloceſter to take with him two hundred lances, and a thouſand archers, and to go to trie if he might by perſuaſion cauſe him to come in and ſubmit himſelfe. The earle went, and comming to talke with him, found him ſo obſtinate, that their parlee ſtreightwaies brake off: ſo taking leaue each of other, they departed, and the earle returned to the king, to aduertiſe him what he had doone and perceiued by the communication which he had had with Macmur.

Anno Reg. 23. He came to Dublin the 28 of Iune as Henrie Marl. ſaith.

The king was ſore offended with the obſtinatnes of the rebell, that would not agree otherwiſe: but ſo as he might remaine ſtill at libertie, without danger to ſuffer anie maner of puniſhment for his paſſed offenſes. Wherevpon the king after his comming to Dublin, and that the armie had reſted there, and in the countrie neere to the citie, for the ſpace of fifteene daies, he diuided his people into three parts, and ſent them abroad into the countrie to purſue the enimies and withall made proclamation, that who ſo euer could bring Macmur vnto his preſence, ſhould haue for his recompenſe a great reward: for he determined not to depart the countrie, till he had him either dead or aliue. But he knew full little then what incidents to hinder his purpoſed intention would after follow.

The duke of Aumarle.

The ſame daie that he ſent abroad his armie thus into three ſeuerall parts, the duke of Aumarle with an hundred ſaile arriued, of whoſe cōming the king was right ioifull; and although he had vſed no ſmall negligence in that he came no ſooner according to order before appointed, yet the king (as he was of a gentle nature) courteouſlie accepted his excuſe: whether he was in fault or not, I haue not to ſaie; but verelie he was greatlie ſuſpected, that he dealt not well in tarieng ſo long after his time aſſigned. But now whileſt the king reſted at Dublin, his people ſo demeaned themſelues, that the moſt part of the rebels, what by manhood and policie were ſubdued, and brought vnder ſubiection, and (as is to be thought) if no trouble had riſen in England to haue called him backe, he meant to haue rid vp the woods, and made ſome notable conqueſt at that time vpon the rebels that yet held out. Neuertheleſſe, during the time of his abode there, ſuch was the prowesſe of him and his, that the Iriſh were well tamed, and forced to ſubmit themſelues: and yet the kings power made no great ſlaughter of them, if it be true that Chriſt. Okl. ſaith, ſpeaking hereof in few words as after followeth:

In Angl. prælijs ſub Rich. 2.

The duke of Lancaſter ſolicited to expell king Richard, and to take vpon him the regiment.

Now whileſt he was thus occupied in deuiſing how to reduce them into ſubiection, and taking orders for the good ſtate and quiet gouernment of the countrie, diuerſe of the nobilitie, aſwell prelats as other, and likewiſe manie of the magiſtrats and rulers of the cities, townes, and communaltie, here in England, perceiuing dailie how the realme drew to vtter ruine, not like to be recouered to the former ſtate of wealth, whileſt king Richard liued and reigned (as they tooke it) deuiſed with great deliberation, and conſiderate aduiſe, to ſend and ſignifie by letters vnto duke Henrie, whome they now called (as he was in deed) duke of Lancaſter and Hereford, requiring him with all conuenient ſpeed to conueie himſelfe into England, promiſing him all their aid, power and aſſiſtance, if he expelling K. Richard, as a man not meet for the office he bare, would take vpon him the ſcepter, rule, and diademe of his natiue land and region.

He therefore being thus called vpon by meſſengers and letters from his freends, and cheeflie through the earneſt perſuaſion of Thomas Arundell, late archbiſhop of Canturburie, who (as before yée haue heard) had béene remooued from his ſée, and baniſhed the realme by king Richards means, got him downe to Britaine, togither with the ſaid archbiſhop, where he was ioifullie receiued of the duke and ducheſſe, and found ſuch fréendſhip at the dukes hands, that there were certeine ſhips rigged, and made readie for him, at a place in baſe Britaine, called Le port blanc, as we find in the chronicles of Britaine: and when all his prouiſion was made readie, he tooke the ſea, togither with the ſaid archbiſhop of Canturburie, and his nephue Thomas Arundell, ſonne and heire to the late earle of Arundell, beheaded at the Tower hill, as you haue heard. There were alſo with him, Reginald lord Cobham, ſir Thomas Erpingham, and ſir Thomas Ramſton knights, John Norburie, Robert Waterton, & Francis Coint eſquires: few elſe were there, for (as ſome write) he had not paſt fiftéene lances, as they tearmed them in thoſe daies, that is to ſaie, men of armes, furniſhed and appointed as the vſe then was. ¶ Yet other write, that the duke of Britaine deliuered vnto him thrée thouſand men of warre, to attend him, and that he had eight ſhips well furniſhed for the warre, where Froiſſard yet ſpeaketh but of thrée. Moreouer, where Froiſſard and alſo the chronicles of Britaine auouch, that he ſhould land at Plimmouth, by our Engliſh writers it ſéemeth otherwiſe: for it appeareth by their aſſured report, that he approching to the ſhore, did not ſtreight take land, but lay houering aloofe, and ſhewed himſelfe now in this place, and now in that, to ſée what countenance was made by the people, whether they meant enuiouſlie to reſiſt him, or fréendlie to receiue him.

Froiſſard.

Tho. Walſing.

When the lord gouernor Edmund duke of Yorke was aduertiſed, that the duke of Lancaſter kept ſtill the ſea, and was readie to arriue (but where he ment firſt to ſet foot on land, there was not any that vnderſtood the certeintie) he ſent for the lord chancellor Edmund Stafford biſhop of Exceſter, and for the lord treaſuror William Scroope earle of Wiltſhire, and other of the kings priuie councell, as John Buſhie, William Bagot, Henrie Gréene, and John Ruſſell knights: of theſe he required to know what they thought good to be doone in this matter, concerning the duke of Lancaſter, being on the ſeas. Their aduiſe was, to depart from London, vnto S. Albons, and there to gather an armie to reſiſt the duke in his landing, but to how ſmall purpoſe their counſell ſerued, the concluſion thereof plainlie declared, for the moſt part that were called, when they came thither, boldlie proteſted, that they would not fight againſt the duke of Lancaſter, whome they knew to be euill dealt withall.

The commõs denie to reſiſt the duke of Lancaſter.

The lord treaſuror, Buſhie, Bagot, and Gréene, perceiuing that the commons would cleaue vnto, and take part with the duke, ſlipped awaie, leauing the lord gouernour of the realme, and the lord chancellor to make what ſhift they could for themſelues: Bagot got him to Cheſter, and ſo eſcaped into Ireland; the other fled to the caſtell of Briſtow, in hope there to be in ſafetie. The duke of Lancaſter, after that he had coaſted alongſt the ſhore a certeine time, & had got ſome intelligence how the peoples minds were affected towards him, landed about the beginning of Julie in Yorkſhire, at a place ſometime called Rauenſpur, betwixt Hull and Bridlington, and with him not paſt thréeſcore perſons, as ſome write: but he was ſo ioifullie receiued of the lords, knights, and gentlemen of thoſe parts, that he found means (by their helpe) forthwith to aſſemble a great number of people, that were willing to take his part. The firſt that came to him, were the lords of Lincolneſhire, and other countries adioining, as the lords Willoughbie, Ros, Darcie, and Beaumont.

Additions to Polychron.

At his comming vnto Doncaſter, the earle of Northumberland, and his ſonne ſir Henrie Perſie, wardens of the marches againſt Scotland, with the earle of Weſtmerland, came vnto him, where he ſware vnto thoſe lords, that he would demand no more, but the lands that were to him deſcended by inheritance from his father, and in right of his wife. Moreouer, he vndertooke to cauſe the paiment of taxes and tallages to be laid downe, & to bring the king to good gouernment, & to remooue from him the Cheſhire men, which were enuied of manie; for that the king eſtéemed of them more than of anie other; happilie, bicauſe they were more faithfull to him than other, readie in all reſpects to obeie his commandements and pleaſure. From Doncaſter hauing now got a mightie armie about him, he marched forth with all ſpéed through the countries, comming by Eueſham vnto Berkelie: within the ſpace of thrée daies, all the kings caſtels in thoſe parts were ſurrendred vnto him.

The duke of Lãcaſters oth to the lords that aided him.

The duke of Yorke, whome king Richard had left as gouernour of the realme in his abſence, hearing that his nephue the duke of Lancaſter was thus arriued, and had gathered an armie, he alſo aſſembled a puiſſant power of men of armes and archers (as before yée haue heard) but all was in vaine, for there was not a man that willinglie would thruſt out one arrow againſt the duke of Lancaſter, or his partakers, or in anie wiſe offend him or his fréends. The duke of Yorke therefore paſſing forth towards Wales to méet the king, at his comming forth of Ireland, was receiued into the caſtell of Berkelie, and there remained, till the comming thither of the duke of Lancaſter (whom when he perceiued that he was not able to reſiſt) on the ſundaie, after the feaſt of ſaint James, which as that yeare came about, fell vpon the fridaie, he came forth into the church that ſtood without the caſtell, and there communed with the duke of Lancaſter. With the duke of Yorke were the biſhops of Norwich, the lord Berkelie, the lord Seimour, and other: with the duke of Lancaſter were theſe, Thomas Arundell archbiſhop of Canturburie that had béene baniſhed, the abbat of Leiceſter, the earles of Northumberland and Weſtmerland, Thomas Arundell ſonne to Richard late earle of Arundell, the baron of Greiſtoke, the lords Willoughbie and Ros, with diuerſe other lords, knights, and other people, which dailie came to him from euerie part of the realme: thoſe that came not, were ſpoiled of all they had, ſo as they were neuer able to recouer themſelues againe, for their goods being then taken awaie, were neuer reſtored. And thus what for loue, and what for feare of loſſe, they came flocking vnto him from euerie part.

The harts of the commons wholie bent to the duke of Lancaſter.

At the ſame preſent there was arreſted, and committed to ſafe cuſtodie, the biſhop of Norwich, ſir William Elmam, and ſir Walter Burlie, knights, Laurence Drew, and John Goloſer eſquiers. On the morow after, the forſaid dukes with their power, went towards Briſtow, where (at their comming) they ſhewed themſelues before the towne & caſtell, being an huge multitude of people. There were incloſed within the caſtell, the lord William Scroope earle of Wiltſhire and treaſuror of England, ſir Henrie Gréene, and ſir John Buſhie knights, who prepared to make reſiſtance: but when it would not preuaile, they were taken and brought forth bound as priſoners into the campe, before the duke of Lancaſter. On the morow next inſuing, they were arraigned before the conſtable and marſhall, and found giltie of treaſon, for miſgouerning the king and realme, and forthwith had their heads ſmit off. Sir

John

A politike madneſſe.

John Ruſſell was alſo taken there, who feining himſelfe to be out of his wits, eſcaped their hands for a time.

In this meane time, king Richard aduertiſed, how the duke of Lancaſter was landed in England, and that the lords, gentlemen, and commons aſſembled themſelues to take his part, he forthwith cauſed the lord Henrie, ſonne to the ſaid duke of Lancaſter, and the lord Humfrie, ſonne to the duke of Gloceſter, to be ſhut vp faſt in the caſtell of Trimme, and with all ſpéed made haſt to returne into England, in hope with an armie to incounter the duke, before he ſhould haue time to aſſemble his fréends togither. But here you ſhall note, that it fortuned at the ſame time, in which the duke of Hereford or Lancaſter, whether ye liſt to call him, arriued thus in England, the ſeas were ſo troubled by tempeſts, and the winds blew ſo contrarie for anie paſſage, to come ouer forth of England to the king, remaining ſtill in Ireland, that for the ſpace of ſix wéeks, he receiued no aduertiſements from thence: yet at length, when the ſeas became calme, and the wind once turned anie thing fauourable, there came ouer a ſhip, whereby the king vnderſtood the manner of the dukes arriuall, and all his procéedings till that daie, in which the ſhip departed from the coaſt of England, wherevpon he meant forthwith to haue returned ouer into England, to make reſiſtance againſt the duke: but through perſuaſion of the duke of Aumarle (as was thought) he ſtaied, till he might haue all his ſhips, and other prouiſion, fullie readie for his paſſage.

Out of maſter Dees French booke.

In the meane time, he ſent the earle of Saliſburie ouer into England, to gather a power togither, by helpe of the kings fréends in Wales, and Cheſhire, with all ſpéed poſſible, that they might be readie to aſſiſt him againſt the duke, vpon his arriuall, for he meant himſelfe to follow the earle, within ſix daies after. The earle paſſing ouer into Wales, landed at Conwaie, and ſent forth letters to the kings fréends, both in Wales and Cheſhire, to leauie their people, & to come with all ſpéed to aſſiſt the K. whoſe requeſt, with great deſire, & very willing minds they fulfilled, hoping to haue found the king himſelfe at Conwaie, inſomuch that within foure daies ſpace, there were to the number of fortie thouſand men aſſembled, readie to march with the king againſt his enimies, if he had béene there himſelfe in perſon.

But when they miſſed the king, there was a brute ſpred amongſt them, that the king was ſuerlie dead, which wrought ſuch an impreſſion, and euill diſpoſition in the minds of the Welſhmen and others, that for anie perſuaſion which the earle of Saliſburie might vſe, they would not go forth with him, till they ſaw the king: onelie they were contented to ſtaie fourtéene daies to ſée if he ſhould come or not; but when he came not within that tearme, they would no longer abide, but ſcaled & departed awaie; wheras if the king had come before their breaking vp, no doubt, but they would haue put the duke of Hereford in aduenture of a field: ſo that the kings lingering of time before his comming ouer, gaue opportunitie to the duke to bring things to paſſe as he could haue wiſhed, and tooke from the king all occaſion to recouer afterwards anie forces ſufficient to reſiſt him.

At length, about eightéene daies after that the king had ſent from him the earle of Saliſburie, he tooke the ſea, togither with the dukes of Aumarle, Exceſter, Surrie, and diuerſe others of the nobilitie, with the biſhops of London, Lincolne, and Carleill. They landed néere the caſtell of Barclowlie in Wales, about the feaſt of ſaint James the apoſtle, and ſtaied a while in the ſame caſtell, being aduertiſed of the great forces which the duke of Lancaſter had got togither againſt him, wherewith he was maruellouſlie amazed, knowing certeinelie that thoſe which were thus in armes with the duke of Lancaſter againſt him, would rather die than giue place, as well for the hatred as feare which they had conceiued at him. Neuertheleſſe he departing from Barclowlie, haſted with all ſpéed towards Conwaie, where he vnderſtood the earle of Saliſburie to be ſtill remaining.

K. Richard returneth out of Ireland, and landeth in Wales.

Additions to Polychron.

He therefore taking with him ſuch Cheſhire men as he had with him at that preſent (in whom all his truſt was repoſed) he doubted not to reuenge himſelfe of his aduerſaries, & ſo at the firſt he paſſed with a good courage: but when he vnderſtood as he went thus forward, that all the caſtels, euen from the borders of Scotland vnto Briſtow were deliuered vnto the duke of Lancaſter, and that likewiſe the nobles and commons, as well of the ſouth parts, as the north, were fullie bent to take part with the ſame duke againſt him; and further, hearing how his truſtie councellors had loſt their heads at Briſtow, he became ſo greatlie diſcomforted, that ſorowfullie lamenting his miſerable ſtate, he vtterlie deſpaired of his owne ſafetie, and calling his armie togither, which was not ſmall, licenced euerie man to depart to his home.

K. Richard in vtter deſpaire.

The ſouldiers being well bent to fight in his defenſe, beſought him to be of good chéere, promiſing with an oth to ſtand with him againſt the duke, and all his partakers vnto death: but this could not incourage him at all, ſo that in the night next inſuing, he ſtole from his armie, and with the dukes of Exceſter and Surrie, the biſhop of Carleill, and ſir Stephan Scroope, and about halfe a ſcore others, he got him to the caſtell of Conwaie, where he found the earle of Saliſburie, determining there to hold himſelfe, till he might ſée the world at ſome better ſtaie; for what counſell to take to remedie the miſchéefe thus preſſing vpon him he wiſt not. On the one part he knew his title iuſt, true, and infallible; and his conſcience cleane, pure, and without ſpot of enuie or malice: he had alſo no ſmall affiance in the Welſhmen, and Cheſhire men. On the other ſide, he ſaw the puiſſance of his aduerſaries, the ſudden departing of them whom he moſt truſted, and all things turned vpſide downe: he euidentlie ſaw, and manifeſtlie perceiued, that he was forſaken of them, by whom in time he might haue béene aided and relieued, where now it was too late, and too farre ouerpaſſed.

K. Richard ſtealeth awaie from his armie, and taketh the caſtell of Flint.

¶ This ſuerlie is a verie notable example, and not vnworthie of all princes to be well weied, and diligentlie marked, that this Henrie duke of Lancaſter ſhould be thus called to the kingdome, and haue the helpe and aſſiſtance (almoſt) of all the whole realme, which perchance neuer thereof thought or yet dreamed; and that king Richard ſhould thus be left deſolate, void, and in deſpaire of all hope and comfort, in whom if there were anie offenſe, it ought rather to be imputed to the frailtie of wanton youth, than to the malice of his hart: but ſuch is the deceiuable iudgement of man, which not regarding things preſent with due conſideration, thinketh euer that things to come ſhall haue good ſucceſſe, with a pleaſant & delitefull end. But in this deiecting of the one, & aduancing of the other, the prouidence of God is to be reſpected, & his ſecret will to be wondered at. For as in his hands ſtandeth the donation of kingdoms, ſo likewiſe the diſpoſing of them conſiſteth in his pleaſure, which the verie pagans vnderſtood right well; otherwiſe, one of them would neuer haue ſaid,

A ſpeciall note worthie to be well weied.

Hor. lib. car. 3. ode. 1.

Sir Thomas Perſie earle of Worceſter, lord

The earle of Worceſter leaueth the k. and fléeth to the duke.

ſteward of the kings houſe, either being ſo commanded by the king, or elſe vpon diſpleaſure (as ſome write) for that the king had proclaimed his brother the earle of Northumberland traitor, brake his white ſtaffe, which is the repreſenting ſigne and token of his office, and without delaie went to duke Henrie. When the kings ſeruants of houſhold ſaw this (for it was doone before them all) they diſperſed themſelues, ſome into one countrie, and ſome into an other. When the duke of Lancaſter vnderſtood that king Richard was returned forth of Ireland, he left the duke of Yorke ſtill at Briſtow, and came backe with his power vnto Berkleie; the ſecond daie he came to Gloceſter, and ſo to Ros, after to Hereford, where came to him the biſhop of Hereford, and ſir Edmund Mortimer knight. On the ſundaie following, he went to Limſter, and there the lord Charleton came to him. From thence he went to Ludlow, and the next daie to Shrewſburie, where he reſted one daie, and thither came to him ſir Robert Leigh, and ſir Iohn Leigh, and manie other being ſent from Cheſter, to treat with the duke of Lancaſter, for the citie and countie of Cheſter, that were now readie to ſubmit themſelues vnto him in all things.

where fortune fauoureth, thither the peoples fauour fléeth.

There came hither vnto him the lord Scales, and the lord Berdolfe, forth of Ireland, hauing béene ſpoiled of all they had about them in Wales, as they came through the countrie. From Shrewſburie, he kept on his iournie towards Cheſter, and lodging one night by the waie, in a towne there in the borders of Wales, he came the ſecond night to Cheſter, and ſtaied there certeine daies togither, making a iollie muſter of his armie there in ſight of the citie. The clergie met, & receiued him with proceſſion: he ſent forthwith for his ſonne & heire, & likewiſe for the duke of Gloceſters ſonne & heire, that were as yet remaining in Ireland, commanding them with all ſpéed to returne home into England. But the duke of Gloceſters ſonne, through miſchance periſhed, as he was on the ſeas to come ouer, for whoſe loſſe his mother tooke ſuch gréefe, that ſhortlie after through immoderate ſorow ſhe likewiſe paſſed out of this tranſitorie life.

The duke of Lancaſter comming to Cheſter.

In this meane time, king Richard being in the caſtell of Conwaie ſore diſcomfited, and fearing leſt he could not remaine there long in ſafetie; vpon knowledge had by his truſtie fréends Iohn Paulet, and Richard Seimour, of the dealings and approch of his aduerſaries, ſent the duke of Exceſter to talke with the duke of Lancaſter, who in this meane while had cauſed one of king Richards faithfull and truſtie fréends, ſir Piers a Leigh, commonlie called Perkin a Lée, to loſe his head, & commanded the ſame to be ſet vp, vpon one of the higheſt turrets about all the citie; and ſo that true and faithfull gentleman, for his ſtedfaſt faith, and aſſured loialtie to his louing ſoueraigne, thus loſt his life. There came to him about the ſame time, or ſomewhat before, the dukes of Aumarle and Surrie, the lord Louell, and ſir Iohn Stanleie, beſéeching him to receiue him into his fauour.

Out of maſter Dees books.

¶ By ſome writers it ſhould ſéeme, not onelie the duke of Exceſter, but alſo the duke of Surrie were ſent vnto duke Henrie from king Richard, and that duke Henrie ſtaied them both, and would not ſuffer them to returne to the king againe, kéeping the duke of Exceſter ſtill about him, and committing the duke of Surrie to priſon, within the caſtell of Cheſter. The king herewith went to Beaumaris, & after to Carnaruan: but finding no prouiſion either of vittels or other things in thoſe caſtels, no not ſo much as a bed to lie in, he came backe againe to Conwaie, and in the meane time was the caſtell of Holt deliuered to the duke of Hereford, by thoſe that had it in kéeping wherein was great ſtore of iewels, to the value of two hundred thouſand marks, beſides an hundred thouſand marks in readie coine. After this, the duke, with aduiſe of his councell, ſent the earle of Northumberland vnto the king, accompanied with foure hundred lances, & a thouſand archers, who comming to the caſtell of Flint, had it deliuered vnto him; and from thence he haſted forth towards Conwaie. But before he approched néere the place, he left his power behind him, hid cloſelie in two ambuſhes, behind a craggie mounteine, beſide the high waie that leadeth from Flint to Conwaie.

Holt caſtell deliuered to the duke.

Some write, that the archbiſhop of Canturburie and the earle of Weſtmerland went alſo with the earle of Northumberland to Conwaie.

This doone, taking not paſt foure or fiue with him, he paſſed forth, till he came before the towne, and then ſending an herald to the king, requeſted a ſafe conduct from the king, that he might come and talke with him, which the king granted, and ſo the earle of Northumberland paſſing the water, entred the caſtell, and comming to the king, declared to him, that if it might pleaſe his grace to vndertake, that there ſhould be a parlement aſſembled, in the which iuſtice might be had, againſt ſuch as were enimies to the common-wealth, and had procured the deſtruction of the duke of Gloceſter, and other noblemen, and herewith pardon the duke of Hereford of all things wherin he had offended him, the duke would be readie to come to him on his knées, to craue of him forgiueneſſe, and as an humble ſubiect, to obeie him in all dutifull ſeruices. The king taking aduiſe vpon theſe offers, and other made by the earle of Northumberland on the behalfe of the duke of Hereford, vpon the earles oth, for aſſurance that the ſame ſhould be performed in ech condition, agréed to go with the earle to méete the duke, and herevpon taking their horſſes, they rode forth, but the earle rode before, as it were, to prepare dinner for the king at Rutland, but comming to the place where he had left his people, he ſtaied there with them.

The earle of Northumberlands meſſage to the king.

The king leaueth Conwaie caſtell, and betaketh himſelfe to his enimies.

The king kéeping on his waie, had not ridden paſt foure miles, when he came to the place where the ambuſhes were lodged, and being entred within danger of them, before he was aware, ſhewed himſelfe to be ſore abaſhed. But now there was no remedie: for the earle being there with his men, would not ſuffer him to returne, as he gladlie would haue doone if he might; but being incloſed with the ſea on the one ſide, and the rocks on the other, hauing his aduerſaries ſo néere at hand before him, he could not ſhift awaie by any meanes, for if he ſhould haue fled backe, they might eaſilie haue ouertaken him, yer he could haue got out of their danger. And thus of force he was then conſtreined to go with the earle, who brought him to Rutland, where they dined, and from thence they rode vnto Flint to bed. The king had verie few about him of his fréends, except onelie the earle of Saliſburie, the biſhop of Carleill, the lord Stephan Scroope, ſir Nicholas Ferebie, a ſonne alſo of the counteſſe of Saliſburie, and Ienico Dartois a Gaſcoigne that ſtill ware the cogniſance or deuiſe of his maiſter king Richard, that is to ſaie, a white hart, and would not put it from him, neither for perſuaſions nor threats; by reaſon whereof, when the duke of Hereford vnderſtood it, he cauſed him to be committed to priſon within the caſtell of Cheſter. This man was the laſt (as ſaieth mine author) which ware that deuiſe, and ſhewed well thereby his conſtant hart toward his maiſter, for the which it was thought he ſhould haue loſt his life, but yet he was pardoned, and at length reconciled to the dukes fauour, after he was king.

A conſtant ſeruant.

But now to our purpoſe. King Richard being thus come vnto the caſtell of Flint, on the mondaie, the eightéenth of Auguſt, and the duke of Hereford being ſtill aduertiſed from houre to houre by poſts, how the earle of Northumberland ſped, the morow following being tueſdaie, and the nineteenth of Auguſt, he came thither, & muſtered his armie before the kings preſence, which vndoubtedlie made a paſſing faire ſhew, being verie well ordered by the lord Henrie Perſie, that was appointed generall, or rather (as we maie call him) maſter of the campe, vnder the duke, of the whole armie. There were come alreadie to the caſtell, before the approching of the maine armie, the archbiſhop of Canturburie, the duke of Aumarle, the earle of Worceſter, and diuerſe other. The archbiſhop entred firſt, and then followed the other, comming into the firſt ward.

The king that was walking aloft on the braies of the wals, to behold the comming of the duke a farre off, might ſee, that the archbiſhop and the other were come, and (as he tooke it) to talke with him: whervpon he forthwith came downe vnto them, and beholding that they did their due reuerence to him on their knees, he tooke them vp, and drawing the archbiſhop aſide from the reſidue, talked with him a good while, and as it was reported, the archbiſhop willed him to be of good comfort, for he ſhould be aſſured, not to haue anie hurt, as touching his perſon; but he propheſied not as a prelat, but as a Pilat. For, was it no hurt (thinke you) to his perſon, to be ſpoiled of his roialtie, to be depoſed from his crowne, to be tranſlated from principalitie to priſon, & to fall from honor into horror. All which befell him to his extreame hart greefe (no doubt:) which to increaſe, meanes alas there were manie; but to diminiſh, helps (God wot) but a few. So that he might haue ſaid with the forlorne man in the mercileſſe ſeas of his miſeries,

Vt fera nimboſo tumüerunt æquora vento,
In medijs lacera naue relinquor aquis.

¶ Some write (as before in a marginall note I haue quoted) that the archbiſhop of Canturburie went with the earle of Northumberland vnto Conwaie, and there talked with him: and further, that euen then the king offered, in conſideration of his inſufficiencie to gouerne, freelie to reſigne the crowne, and his kinglie title to the ſame, vnto the duke of Hereford. But forſomuch as thoſe that were continuallie attendant about the king, during the whole time of his abode at Conwaie, and till his comming to Flint, do plainelie affirme, that the archbiſhop came not to him, till this tueſdaie before his remoouing from Flint vnto Cheſter, it maie be thought (the circumſtances well conſidered) that he rather made that promiſe here at Flint, than at Conwaie, although by the tenour of an inſtrument, conteining the declaration of the archbiſhop of Yorke, and other commiſſioners ſent from the eſtates aſſembled in the next parlement, vnto the ſaid king, it is recorded to be at Conwaie, as after ye maie read. But there maie be ſome default in the copie, as taking the one place for the other.

But whereſoeuer this offer was made, after that the archbiſhop had now here at Flint communed with the king, he departed, and taking his horſſe againe, rode backe to meet the duke, who began at that preſent to approch the caſtell, and compaſſed it round about, euen downe to the ſea, with his people ranged in good and ſeemelie order, at the foot of the mounteins: and then the earle of Northumberland paſſing forth of the caſtell to the duke, talked with him a while in ſight of the king, being againe got vp to the walles, to take better view of the armie, being now aduanced within two bowe ſhootes of the caſtell, to the ſmall reioiſing (ye may be ſure) of the ſorowfull king. The earle of Northumberland returning to the caſtell, appointed the king to be ſet to dinner (for he was faſting till then) and after he had dined, the duke came downe to the caſtell himſelfe, and entred the ſame all armed, his baſſenet onelie excepted, and being within the firſt gate, he ſtaied there, till the king came forth of the inner part of the caſtell vnto him.

The king accompanied with the biſhop of Carleill, the earle of Saliſburie, and ſir Stephan Scroope knight, who bare the ſword before him, and a few other, came forth into the vtter ward, and ſate downe in a place prepared for him. Forthwith as the duke got ſight of the king, he ſhewed a reuerend dutie as became him, in bowing his knee, and comming forward, did ſo likewiſe the ſecond and third time, till the king tooke him by the hand, and lift him vp, ſaieng; Deere couſine, ye are welcome. The duke humblie thanking him ſaid; My ſouereigne lord and king, the cauſe of my comming at this preſent, is (your honor ſaued) to haue againe reſtitution of my perſon, my lands and heritage, through your fauourable licence. The king hervnto anſwered; Deere couſine, I am readie to accompliſh your will, ſo that ye may inioy all that is yours, without exception.

The dukes behauiour to the king at their meeting.

The dukes demand.

Meeting thus togither, they came forth of the caſtell, and the king there called for wine, and after they had dronke, they mounted on horſſebacke, and rode that night to Flint, and the next daie vnto Cheſter, the third vnto Nantwich, the fourth to Newcaſtell. Here, with glad countenance, the lord Thomas Beauchampe earle of Warwike met them, that had beene confined into the Ile of Man, as before ye haue heard; but now was reuoked home by the duke of Lancaſter. From Newcaſtell they rode to Stafford, and the ſixt daie vnto Lichfield, and there reſted ſundaie all daie. After this, they rode forth, and lodged at theſe places inſuing, Couentrie, Dantree, Northhampton, Dunſtable, S. Albons, & ſo came to London: neither was the king permitted all this while to change his apparell, but rode ſtill through all theſe townes ſimplie clothed in one ſute of raiment, and yet he was in his time exceeding ſumptuous in apparell, in ſo much as he had one cote, which he cauſed to be made for him of gold and ſtone, valued at 30000 marks: & ſo he was brought the next waie to Weſtminſter.

The king and the duke iournie togither towards London.

K. Richard ſumptuous in apparell.

As for the duke, he was receiued with all the ioy and pompe that might be of the Londoners, and was lodged in the biſhops palace, by Paules church. It was a woonder to ſee what great concurſſe of people, & what number of horſſes came to him on the waie as he thus paſſed the countries, till his comming to London, where (vpon his approch to the citie) the maior rode forth to receiue him, and a great number of other citizens. Alſo the cleargie met him with proceſſion, and ſuch ioy appeared in the countenances of the people, vttering the ſame alſo with words, as the like not lightlie beene ſeene. For in euerie towne and village where he paſſed, children reioiſed, women clapped their hands, and men cried out for ioy. But to ſpeake of the great numbers of people that flocked togither in the fields and ſtreets of London at his comming, I here omit; neither will I ſpeake of the preſents, welcommings, lauds, and gratifications made to him by the citizens and communaltie.

The dukes receiuing into London.

But now to the purpoſe. The next day after his comming to London, the king from Weſtminſter was had to the Tower, and there committed to ſafe cuſtodie. Manie euill diſpoſed perſons, aſſembling themſelues togither in great numbers, intended to haue met with him, and to haue taken him from ſuch as had the conueieng of him, that they might haue ſlaine him. But the maior and aldermen gathered to them the worſhipfull commoners and graue citizens, by whoſe policie, and not without much adoo, the other were reuoked from their euill purpoſe: albeit, before they might be pacified, they cõming to Weſtminſter, tooke maiſter Iohn Sclake deane of the kings chappell, and from thence brought him to Newgate, and there laid him faſt in irons.

A parlement in the kings name.

After this was a parlement called by the duke of Lancaſter, vſing the name of king Richard in the writs directed foorth to the lords, and other ſtates for their ſummons. This parlement began the thirtéenth daie of September, in the which manie heinous points of miſgouernance and iniurious dealings in the adminiſtration of his kinglie office, were laid to the charge of this noble prince king Richard, the which (to the end the commons might be perſuaded, that he was an vnprofitable prince to the common-wealth, and worthie to be depoſed) were ingroſſed vp in 33 ſolemne articles, heinous to the eares of all men, and to ſome almoſt incredible, the verie effect of which articles here inſue, according to the copie which I haue ſéene, and is abridged by maiſter Hall as followeth.

The articles obiected to king Richard, whereby he was counted worthie to be depoſed from his principalitie.

1 First, that king Richard waſtfullie ſpent the treaſure of the realme, and had giuen the poſſeſſions of the crowne to men vnworthie, by reaſon whereof, new charges more and more were laid on the poore cōmunaltie. And where diuerſe lords, as well ſpirituall as temporall, were appointed by the high court of parlement, to commune and treat of diuerſe matters concerning the common-wealth of the realme, which being buſie about the ſame commiſſion, he with other of his affinitie went about to impeach, and by force and menacing compelled the iuſtices of the realme at Shrewesburie to condeſcend to his opinion, for the deſtruction of the ſaid lords, in ſo much that he began to raiſe warre againſt Iohn duke of Lancaſter, Richard earle of Arundell, Thomas earle of Warwike, and other lords, contrarie to his honor and promiſe.

2 Item, that he cauſed his vncle the duke of Gloceſter to be arreſted without law, and ſent him to Calis, and there without iudgement murthered him, and although the earle of Arundell vpon his arreignment pleaded his charter of pardon, he could not be heard, but was in moſt vile and ſhamefull manner ſuddenlie put to death.

3 Item, he aſſembled certeine Lancaſhire and Cheſhire men, to the intent to make warre on the ſame lords, and ſuffered them to rob and pill, without correction or repreeue.

4 Item, although the king flateringlie, and with great diſſimulation, made proclamation throughout the realme, that the lords before named were not attached of anie crime of treaſon, but onlie for extortions and oppreſſions doone in this realme; yet he laid to them in the parlement, rebellion and manifeſt treaſon.

5 Item, he hath compelled diuers of the ſaid lords ſeruants and friends, by menaces & extreme pains, to make great fines to their vtter vndooing; and notwithſtanding his pardon, yet he made them fine anew.

6 Item, where diuerſe were appointed to commune of the ſtate of the realme, and the common-wealth thereof, the ſame king cauſed all the rols and records to be kept from them, contrarie to promiſe made in the parlement, to his open diſhonor.

7 Item, he vncharitablie commanded, that no man vpon paine of loſſe of life, and goods, ſhould once intreat him for the returne of Henrie now duke of Lancaſter.

8 Item, where this realme is holden of God, and not of the pope or other prince, the ſaid king Richard, after he had obteined diuerſe acts of parlement, for his owne peculiar profit and pleaſure, then he obteined bulles and extreame cenſures from Rome, to compell all men ſtreightlie to keepe the ſame, contrarie to the honour and ancient priuileges of this realme.

9 Item, although the duke of Lancaſter had doone his deuoire againſt Thomas duke of Norfolke in proofe of his quarrell; yet the ſaid king, without reaſon or ground, baniſhed him the realme for ten yeers, contrarie to all equitie.

10 Item, before the dukes departure, he vnder his broad ſeale licenced him to make atturnies to proſecute and defend his cauſes: the ſaid king after his departure, would ſuffer none atturnie to appeare for him, but did with his at his pleaſure.

11 Item, the ſame king put out diuerſe ſhiriffes lawfullie elected, and put in their roomes diuerſe other of his owne, ſubuerting the law, contrarie to his oth and honor.

12 Item, he borowed great ſummes of monie, and bound him vnder his letters patents, for the repaiment of the ſame, and yet not one penie paid.

13 Item, he taxed men at the will of him and his vnhappie councell, and the ſame treaſure ſpent in follie, not paieng poore men for their vittels and viands.

14 Item, he ſaid, that the lawes of the realme were in his head, and ſometimes in his breſt, by reaſon of which fantaſticall opinion, he deſtroied noble men, and impoueriſhed the poore commons.

15 Item, the parlement ſetting and enacting diuerſe notable ſtatutes, for the profit and aduancement of the common-wealth, he by his priuie friends and ſolicitors cauſed to be enacted, that no act then enacted, ſhould be more preiudiciall to him, than it was to anie of his predeceſſors: through which prouiſo he did often as he liſted, and not as the law did meane.

16 Item, for to ſerue his purpoſe, he would ſuffer the ſhiriffes of the ſhire to remaine aboue one yeare or two.

17 Item, at the ſummons of the parlement, when knights and burgeſſes ſhould be elected, that the election had béene full procéeded, he put out diuerſe perſons elect, and put other in their places, to ſerue his will and appetite.

18 Item, he had priuie eſpials in euerie ſhire, to heare who had of him anie communication; and if he communed of his laſciuious liuing, or outragious doings, he ſtraightwaies was apprehended, and put to a greeuous fine.

19 Item, the ſpiritualtie alledged againſt him, that he at his going into Ireland, exacted manie notable ſummes of monie, beſide plate and iewels, without law or cuſtome, contrarie to his oth taken at his coronation.

20 Item, where diuerſe lords and iuſtices were ſworne to ſaie the truth of diuerſe things to them committed in charge, both for the honor of the relme, and profit of the king, the ſaid king ſo menaced them with ſore threatenings, that no man would or durſt ſaie the right.

21 Item, that without the aſſent of the nobilitie, he carried the iewels, plate, and treaſure, ouer into Ireland, to the great impoueriſhment of the realme: and all the good records for the common-wealth, and againſt his extortions, he cauſed priuilie to be imbeſiled, and conueied awaie.

22 Item, in all leagues and letters to be concluded or ſent to the ſée of Rome, or other regions, his writing was ſo ſubtill and darke, that none other prince once beleeued him, nor yet his owne ſubiects.

23 Item, he moſt tyrannouſlie and vnprincelie ſaid, that the liues and goods of all his ſubiects were in his hands, and at his diſpoſition.

24 Item, that contrarie to the great charter of England, he cauſed diuerſe luſtie men to appeale diuerſe old men, vpon matters determinable at the common law in the court Martiall, bicauſe that there is no triall, but onelie by battell: wherevpon, the ſaid aged perſons, fearing the ſequele of the matter, ſubmitted themſelues to his mercie, whome he fined and ranſomed vnreaſonablie at his will and pleaſure.

25 Item, he craftilie deuiſed certeine priuie othes, contrarie to the law, and cauſed diuerſe of his ſubiects firſt to be ſworne to obſerue the ſame, and after bound them in bonds for keeping of the ſame, to the great vndoing of manie honeſt men.

26 Item, where the chancellor, according to the law, would in no wiſe grant a prohibition to a certeine perſon, the king granted it vnto the ſame, vnder his priuie ſeale, with great threatenings, if it ſhould be diſobeied.

27 Item, he baniſhed the biſhop of Canturburie without cauſe or iudgement, and kept him in the parlement chamber with men of armes.

28 Item, the biſhops goods he granted to his ſucceſſor, vpon condition, that he ſhould mainteine all his ſtatutes made at Shreweſburie anno 21, and the ſtatutes made anno 22 at Couentrie.

29 Item, vpon the accuſation of the ſaid biſhop, the king craftilie perſuaded him to make no anſwer for he would be his warrant, and aduiſed him not to come to the parlement, and ſo without anſwer he was condemned and exiled, and his goods ſeized.

Theſe be all the articles of anie effect, which were laid againſt him, ſauing foure other, which touched onelie the archbiſhops matter, whoſe working wrong king Richard at length from his crowne. Then for ſo much as theſe articles, and other heinous and deteſtable accuſations were laid againſt him in open parlement, it was thought by the moſt part, that he was worthie to be depoſed from all kinglie honor, and princelie gouernement: and to bring the matter without ſlander the better to paſſe, diuerſe of the kings ſeruants, which by licence had acceſſe to his perſon, comforted him (being with ſorrow almoſt conſumed, and in manner halfe dead) in the beſt wiſe they could, exhorting him to regard his health, and ſaue his life.

The king is perſuaded to reſigne the crowne to the duke.

And firſt, they aduiſed him willinglie to ſuffer himſelfe to be depoſed, and to reſigne his right of his owne accord, ſo that the duke of Lancaſter might without murther or battell obteine the ſcepter and diademe, after which (they well perceiued) he gaped: by meane whereof they thought he might be in perfect aſſurance of his life long to continue. Whether this their perſuaſion proceeded by the ſuborning of the duke of Lancaſter and his fauourers, or of a ſincere affection which they bare to the king, as ſuppoſing it moſt ſure in ſuch an extremitie, it is vncerteine; but yet the effect followed not, howſoeuer their meaning was: notwithſtanding, the king being now in the hands of his enimies, and vtterlie deſpairing of all comfort, was eaſilie perſuaded to renounce his crowne and princelie preheminence, ſo that in hope of life onelie, he agreed to all things that were of him demanded. And ſo (as it ſhould ſeeme by the copie of an inſtrument hereafter following) he renounced and voluntarilie was depoſed from his roiall crowne and kinglie dignitie, the mondaie being the nine and twentith daie of September, and feaſt of S. Michaell the archangell, in the yeare of our Lord 1399, and in the three and twentith yeare of his reigne. The copie of which inſtrument here inſueth.

A copie of the inſtrument touching the declaration of the commiſsioners ſent from the ſtates in parlement, vnto king Richard.

THis preſent indenture made the nine and twentith daie of September, and feaſt of ſaint Michaell, in the yeare of our Lord 1399, and the three and twentith yeare of king Richard the ſecond. Witneſſeth, that where by the authoritie of the lords ſpirituall and temporall of this preſent parlement, and commons of the ſame, the right honorable and diſcreet perſons heere vnder named, were by the ſaid authoritie aſſigned to go to the Tower of London, there to heare and teſtifie ſuch queſtions and anſwers as then and there ſhould be by the ſaid honourable and diſcreet perſons hard. Know all men, to whome theſe preſent letters ſhall come, that we, ſir Richard Scrope archbiſhop of Yorke, Iohn biſhop of Hereford, Henrie earle of Northumberland, Rafe earle of Weſtmerland, Thomas lord Berkeleie, William abbat of Weſtminſter, Iohn prior of Canturburie, William Thirning and Hugh Burnell knights, Iohn Markham iuſtice, Thomas Stow and Iohn Burbadge doctors of the ciuill law, Thomas Erpingham and Thomas Grey knights, Thomas Ferebie and Denis Lopeham notaries publike, the daie and yeere aboue ſaid, betweene the houres of eight and nine of the clocke before noone, were preſent in the cheefe chamber of the kings lodging, within the ſaid place of the Tower, where was rehearſed vnto the king by the mouth of the foreſaid earle of Northumberland, that before time at Conwaie in Northwales, the king being there at his pleaſure and libertie, promiſed vnto the archbiſhop of Canturburie then Thomas Arundell, and vnto the ſaid earle of Northumberland, that he for inſufficiencie which he knew himſelfe to be of, to occupie ſo great a charge, as to gouerne the realme of England, he would gladlie leaue of and renounce his right and title, as well of that as of his title to the crowne of France, and his maieſtie roiall, vnto Henrie duke of Hereford, and that to doo in ſuch conuenient wiſe, as by the learned men of this land it ſhould moſt ſufficientlie be deuiſed & ordeined. To the which rehearſall, the king in our ſaid preſences anſwered benignlie and ſaid, that ſuch promiſe he made, and ſo to do the ſame he was at that houre in full purpoſe to performe and fulfill; ſauing that he deſired firſt to haue perſonall ſpeach with the ſaid duke, and with the archbiſhop of Canturburie his couſins. And further, he deſired to haue a bill drawne of the ſaid reſignation, that that he might be perfect in the rehearſall thereof.

This promiſe he made at Flint rather than at Conwaie, as by that which goeth before it may be partlie coniectured.

After which bill drawne, and a copie thereof to him by me the ſaid earle deliuered, we the ſaid lords and other departed: and vpon the ſame afternoone the king looking for the comming of the duke of Lancaſter, at the laſt the ſaid duke, with the archbiſhop of Canturburie and the perſons afore recited, entered the foreſaid chamber, bringing with them the lords Ros, Aburgenie, and Willoughbie, with diuerſe other. Where after due obeiſance doone by them vnto the king, he familiarlie and with a glad countenance (as to them and vs appeered) talked with the ſaid archbiſhop and duke a good ſeaſon; and that communication finiſhed, the king with glad countenance in preſence of vs and the other aboue rehearſed, ſaid openlie that he was readie to renounce and reſigne all his kinglie maieſtie in maner and forme as he before had promiſed. And although he had and might ſufficientlie haue declared his renouncement by the reading of an other meane perſon; yet for the more ſuertie of the matter, and for that the ſaid reſignation ſhould haue his full force and ſtrength, himſelfe therefore read the ſcroll of reſignation, in maner and forme as followeth.

The tenor of the inſtrument whereby king Richard reſigneth the crowne to the duke of Lancaſter.

IN the name of God Amen: I Richard by the grace of God, king of England and of France, &c: lord of Ireland, acquit and aſſoile all archbiſhops, biſhops, and other prelats, ſecular or religious, of what dignitie, degree, ſtate, or condition ſo euer they be; and alſo all dukes, marqueſſes, earles, barons, lords, and all my liege men, both ſpirituall and ſecular, of what manner or degree they be, from their oth of fealtie and homage, and all other deeds and priuileges made vnto me, and from all manner bonds of allegiance, regalitie and lordſhip, in which they were or be bounden to me, or anie otherwiſe conſtreined; and them, their heires, and ſucceſſors for euermore, from the ſame bonds and oths I releaſe, deliuer, and acquit, and ſet them for free, diſſolued and acquit, and to be harmeleſſe, for as much as longeth to my perſon by anie manner waie or title of right, that to me might follow of the foreſaid things, or anie of them. And alſo I reſigne all my kinglie dignitie, maieſtie and crowne, with all the lordſhips, power, and priuileges to the foreſaid kinglie dignitie and crowne belonging, and all other lordſhips and poſſeſſions to me in anie maner of wiſe perteining, of what name, title, qualitie, or condition ſoeuer they be, except the lands and poſſeſſions for me and mine obits purchaſed and bought. And I renounce all right, and all maner of title of poſſeſſion, which I euer had or haue in the ſame lordſhips and poſſeſſions, or anie of them, with anie manner of rights belonging or apperteining vnto anie part of them. And alſo the rule and gouernance of the ſame kingdome and lordſhips, with all miniſtrations of the ſame, and all things and euerie each of them, that to the whole empire and iuriſdictions of the ſame belongeth of right, or in anie wiſe may belong.

And alſo I renounce the name, worſhip, and regaltie and kinglie highneſſe, clearelie, freelie, ſingularlie and wholie, in the moſt beſt maner and forme that I may, and with deed and word I leaue off and reſigne them, and go from them for euermore; ſauing alwaies to my ſucceſſors kings of England, all the rights, priuileges and appurtenances to the ſaid kingdome and lordſhips aboueſaid belonging and apperteining. For well I wote and knowledge, and deeme my ſelfe to be, and haue beene inſufficient and vnable, and alſo vnprofitable, and for my open deſerts not vnworthie to be put downe. And I ſweare vpon the holie euangeliſts here preſentlie with my hands touched, that I ſhall neuer repugne to this reſignation, demiſſion or yeelding vp, nor neuer impugne them in anie maner by word or deed, by my ſelfe nor none other: nor I ſhall not ſuffer it to be impugned, in as much as in me is, priuilie or apertlie. But I ſhall haue, hold, and keepe this renouncing, demiſſion, and giuing vp for firme and ſtable for euermore in all and euerie part thereof, ſo God me helpe and all ſaints, and by this holie euangeliſt, by me bodilie touched and kiſſed. And for more record of the ſame, here openlie I ſubſcribe and ſigne this preſent reſignation with mine owne hand.

Now forthwith in our preſences and others, he ſubſcribed the ſame, and after deliuered it vnto the archbiſhop of Canturburie, ſaieng that if it were in his power, or at his aſſignement, he would that the duke of Lancaſter there preſent ſhould be his ſucceſſour, and king after him. And in token heereof he tooke a ring of gold from his finger being his ſignet, and put it vpon the ſaid dukes finger, deſiring and requiring the archbiſhop of Yorke, ⁊ the biſhop of Hereford, to ſhew and make report vnto the lords of the parlement of his voluntarie reſignation, and alſo of his intent and good mind that he bare towards his couſin the duke of Lancaſter, to haue him his ſucceſſour and their king after him. ¶ All this doone, euerie man tooke their leaue and rerurned to their owne.

Upon the morrow after being tueſdaie, and the laſt daie of September, all the lords ſpirituall and temporall, with the commons of the ſaid parlement, aſſembled at Weſtminſter, there, in the preſence of them, the archbiſhop of Yorke, and the biſhop of Hereford, according to the kings requeſt, ſhewed vnto them the voluntarie renouncing of the king, with the fauour alſo which he bare to his couſine of Lancaſter to haue him his ſucceſſour. And moreouer ſhewed them the ſchedule or bill of renouncement, ſigned with king Richards owne hand, which they cauſed to be read firſt in Latine, as it was written, and after in Engliſh. This doone, the queſtion was firſt aſked of the lords, if they would admit and allow that renouncement: the which when it was of them granted granted and confirmed, the like queſtion was aſked of the commons, and of them in like manner confirmed. After this, it was then declared, that notwithſtanding the foreſaid renouncing, ſo by the lords and commons admitted and confirmed, it were neceſſarie in auoiding of all ſuſpicions and ſurmiſes of euill diſpoſed perſons, to haue in writing and regiſtred the manifold crimes and defaults before doone by king Richard, to the end that they might firſt be openlie declared to the people, and after to remaine of record amongſt other of the kings records for euer.

All this was doone accordinglie, for the articles which before yee haue heard, were drawne and ingroſſed vp, and there ſhewed readie to be read; but for other cauſes more needfull as then to be preferred, the reading of thoſe articles at that ſeaſon was deferred. Then forſomuch as the lords of the parlement had well conſidered the voluntarie reſignation (of king Richard, and that it was behouefull and as they thought) neceſſarie for the weale of the realme, to proceed vnto the ſentence of his depoſing, there were appointed by the authoritie of all the eſtates there in parlement aſſembled, the biſhop of ſaint Aſaph, the abbat of Glaſtenburie, the earle of Gloceſter, the lord Berkleie, William Thirning iuſtice, and Thomas Erpingham, with Thomas Graie, knights, that they ſhould giue and pronounce the open ſentence of the depoſing of king Richard. Wherevpon the ſaid commiſſioners taking counſell togither, by good and deliberate aduiſe therein had, with one aſſent agreed, that the biſhop of S. Aſaph ſhould publiſh the ſentence for them and in their names, as followeth.

The publication of king Ri*chards depoſing.*

In the name of God Amen. We Iohn biſhop of S. Aſaph, Iohn abbat of Glaſtenburie, Thomas earle of Gloceſter, Thomas lord Berkeleie, William Thirning iuſtice, Thomas Erpingham & Thomas Graie knights, choſen and deputed ſpeciall commiſſaries by the three ſtates of this preſent parlement, repreſenting the whole bodie of the realme, for all ſuch matters by the ſaid eſtates to vs committed: we vnderſtanding and conſidering the manifold crimes, hurts, and harmes doone by Richard king of England, and miſgouernance of the ſame by a long time, to the great decaie of the ſaid land, and vtter ruine of the ſame ſhortlie to haue beene, had not the ſpeciall grace of our God therevnto put the ſooner remedie: and alſo furthermore aduerting, that the ſaid king Richard by acknowledging his owne inſufficiencie, hath of his owne meere voluntee and free will, renounced and giuen ouer the rule & gouernance of this land, with all rights and honours vnto the ſame belonging, and vtterlie for his merits hath iudged himſelfe not vnworthilie to be depoſed of all kinglie maieſtie and eſtate roiall. We the premiſſes well conſidering by good and diligent deliberation, by the power, name, and authoritie to vs (as aboue is ſaid) committed, pronounce, decerne, and declare the ſame king Richard, before this to haue beene, and to be vnprofitable, vnable, vnſufficient, and vnworthie of the rule and gouernance of the foreſaid realms and lordſhips, and of all rights and other the appurtenances to the ſame belonging. And for the ſame cauſes we depriue him of all kinglie dignitie and worſhip, and of any kinglie worſhip in himſelfe. And we depoſe him by our ſentence definitiue, forbidding expreſſelie to all archbiſhops, and biſhops, and all other prelats, dukes, marqueſſes, erles, barons and knights, and all other men of the foreſaid kingdome and lordſhips, ſubiects, and lieges whatſoeuer they be, that none of them from this daie forward, to the foreſaid Richard as king and lord of the foreſaid realmes and lordſhips, be neither obedient nor attendant.

After which ſentence thus openlie declared, the ſaid eſtates admitted forthwith the forenamed commiſſioners for their procurators, to reſigne and yeeld vp vnto king Richard, all their homage and fealtie, which in times paſt they had made and owght vnto him, and alſo for to declare vnto him (if need were) all things before doone that concerned the purpoſe and cauſe of his depoſing: the which reſignation was reſpited till the morow following. Immediatlie as the ſentence was in this wiſe paſſed, and that by reaſon thereof the realme ſtood void without head or gouernour for the time, the duke of Lancaſter riſing from the place where before he ſate, and ſtanding where all thoſe in the houſe might behold him, in reuerend manner made a ſigne of the croſſe on his forhead, and likewiſe on his breſt, and after ſilence by an officer commanded, ſaid vnto the people there being preſent, theſe words following.

The duke of Lancaſter laieth challenge or claime to the crowne.

In the name of the Father, and of the Sonne, & of the Holie-ghoſt. I Henrie of Lancaſter claime the realme of England and the crowne, with all the appurtenances, as I that am deſcended by right line of the blood comming from that good lord king Henrie the third, and through the right that God of his grace hath ſent me, with the helpe of my kin, and of my freends, to recouer the ſame, which was in point to be vndoone for default of good gouernance and due iuſtice.

The demand of the archbiſhop of Canturburie to the commons.

Thom. Walſ.

The duke of Hereford placed in the regall throne.

After theſe words thus by him vttered, he returned and ſate him downe in the place where before he had ſitten. Then the lords hauing heard and well perceiued this claime thus made by this noble man, ech of them aſked of other what they thought therein. At length, after a little pauſing or ſtaie made, the archbiſhop of Canturburie hauing notice of the minds of the lords, ſtood vp & aſked the commons if they would aſſent to the lords, which in their minds thought the claime of the duke made, to be rightfull and neceſſarie for the wealth of the realme and them all: whereto the commons with one voice cried, Yea, yea, yea. After which anſwer, the ſaid archbiſhop going to the duke, and kneeling downe before him on his knee, addreſſed to him all his purpoſe in few words. The which when he had ended, he roſe, & taking the duke by the right hand, led him vnto the kings ſeate, the archbiſhop of Yorke aſſiſting him, and with great reuerence ſet him therein, after that the duke had firſt vpon his knees made his praier in deuout manner vnto almightie God. When he was thus placed in his throne to the great reioiſing of the people, the archbiſhop of Canturburie began a breefe collation, taking for his theme theſe words, written in the firſt booke of kings the ninth chapter; Vir dominabitur in populo, &c: handling the ſame, & the whole tenour of his tale to the praiſe of the king, whoſe ſetled iudgement, grounded wiſedome, perfect reaſon, and ripe diſcretion was ſuch (ſaid he) as declared him to be no child, neither in yeares, nor in light conditions, but a man able and meete for the gouernement of a realme: ſo that there was no ſmall cauſe of comfort miniſtred to them through the fauourable goodneſſe of almightie God, which had prouided them of ſuch a gouernor, as like a diſcreet iudge ſhall deeme in cauſes by skilfull doomes, and rule his ſubiects in vpright equitie, ſetting apart all wilfull pleaſures, and childiſh inconſtancie. This is a ſummarie of his oration. But becauſe the qualitie of this volume is ſuch, as that it hath ſet forth matters at large: I will laie downe the archbiſhops words, as they are recorded by Fabian in ample manner as followeth.

The archbiſhop preached.

The archbiſhop of Canturburie his oration, framed vpon this text, Vir dominabitur in populo, &c: written in the firſt booke of kings and ninth chapter.

Abr. Fl. out of Fabian, pag. 351.

These be the words of the high, and moſt mightie king, ſpeaking to Samuel his prophet, teaching him how he ſhould chooſe and ordaine a gouernor of his people of Iſraell, when the ſaid people aſked of him a king, to rule them. And not without cauſe may theſe words be ſaid here of our lord the king that is. For, if they be inwardlie conceiued, they ſhall giue vnto vs matter of conſolation and comfort, when it is ſaid that a man ſhall haue lordſhip and rule of the people, and not a child. For God threatneth not vs as he ſometime threatned the people by Eſaie, ſaieng: Eſa. 3. Et dabo pueros principes eorum, & effeminati dominabuntur eis, I ſhall (ſaith our Lord) giue children to be their rulers & princes, and weake or fearefull ſhall haue dominion ouer them. But of his great mercie he hath viſited vs, I truſt his peculiar people, and ſent vs a man to haue the rule of vs, & put by children that before time ruled this land, after childiſh conditions, as by the workes of them it hath rightlie appeared, to the diſturbance of all this realme; and for want and lacke of a man. For, as ſaith the apoſtle Paule ad Corinthos, 1. capite 14. Cum eſſem paruulus, loquebar vt paruulus, &c: quando autem factus ſum vir, euacuaui quæ erant paruuli, that is to ſay, When I was a child, I ſauored and ſpake as a child, but at the time when I came vnto the eſtate of a man, then I put by all my childiſh conditions.

The apoſtle ſaith, he ſauored and ſpake as a child, in whom is no ſtedfaſtneſſe, or conſtancie. For a child will lightlie promiſe, and lightlie he will breake his promiſe, and doo all things that his appetite giueth him vnto, and forgetteth lightlie what he hath doone. By which reaſon it followeth, that needilie great inconuenience muſt fall to that people, that a child is ruler and gouernour of: nor it is not poſſible for that kingdome to ſtand in felicitie, where ſuch conditions reigne in the head and ruler of the ſame. But now we ought all to reioiſe, that all ſuch defaults be expelled, and that a man, and not a child, ſhall haue lordſhip ouer vs. To whom it belongeth to haue a ſure rane vpon his toong, that he maie be knowne from a child, or a man vſing childiſh conditions: of whom I truſt I maie ſay, as the wiſe man ſaith in his prouerbs, Prouerb. 3. cap. Beatus homo qui inuenit ſapientiam, & qui affluit prudentia, that is to ſay; Bleſſed be the man that hath ſapience or wiſdome, and that aboundeth in prudence. For that man that is ruled by ſapience, muſt needs loue & dred our Lord God, and who ſo loueth & dreadeth him, it muſt conſequentlie follow that he muſt keepe his commandements. By force wherof he ſhall miniſter true iuſtice vnto his ſubiects, and doo no wrong nor iniurie to any man.

So that then ſhall follow the words of the wiſe man the which be rehearſed, Prouerb. 10. Benedictio Domini ſuper caput iuſti, os autem impiorum operit iniquitatem, that is to ſaie, The bleſſing of our Lord God ſhall light vpon the head of our king, being a iuſt and righteous man, for the toong of him worketh equitie and iuſtice; but the toong of the wicked & of ſinners couereth iniquitie. And who ſo worketh or miniſtreth iuſtice in due order, he not onlie ſafegardeth himſelf, but alſo holdeth people in a ſuertie of reſtfulnes, of the which inſueth peace and plentie. And therefore it is ſaid of the wiſe king Salomon, Eccleſ. 10. Beata terra cuius rex nobilis eſt, vel cuius principes veſcuntur in tempore ſuo; wich is to be vnderſtanded, that bleſſed & happie is that land, of the which the king or ruler is noble and wiſe, and the princes be bleſſed that liue in his time. As who would ſay, they may take example of him to rule and guide their ſubiects. For by the diſcretion of a noble and wiſe man being in authoritie, manie euils be ſequeſtred and ſet apart, all diſſemblers put to ſilence. For the wiſe man conſidereth and noteth well the great inconueniences which dailie now growe of it, where the child or inſipient drinketh the ſweet and delicious words vnaduiſedlie, and perceiueth not intoxication which they be mingled or mixt with, till he be inuironed and wrapped in all danger, as latelie the experience thereof hath beene apparent to all our ſights and knowledges, & not without the great danger of all this realme. And all was for lacke of wiſedome in the ruler, which deemed & taught as a child, giuing ſentence of wilfulneſſe and not of reaſon. So that while a child reigned, ſelfe-will & luſt reigned, and reaſon with good conſcience were outlawed, with iuſtice, ſtedfaſtneſſe, and manie other vertues.

But of this perill and danger we be deliuered by the eſpeciall helpe and grace of God, Quia vir dominabitur in populo, that is to ſaie, He that is not a child but perfect in reaſon. For he commeth not to execute his owne will, but his will that ſent him, that is to wit, Gods will, as a man vnto whome God of his abundant grace hath giuen perfect reaſon and diſcretion, to diſcerne & dœme as a perfect man. Wherfore not all onlie of this man we ſhall ſaie that he ſhall dwell in wiſedome, but as a perfect man and not a child, he ſhall thinke, and dœme, & haue ſuch a circumſpection with him, that he ſhall diligentlie fore-looke and ſee that Gods will be doone, & not his. And therfore now I truſt the words of the wiſe man, Eccleſiaſt. 10. ſhall be verified in our king: ſaieng, Iudex ſapiens iudicabit populum ſuum, & principatus ſenſati ſtabilis erit; that is (as ſaith the wiſeman) A wiſe and diſcreet iudge ſhall now dœme his people, and the dominion or lordſhip of a diſcreet wiſeman ſhall ſtand ſtedfaſt. Wherevpon ſhall then follow the ſecond verſe of the ſame chapter, ſaieng, Secundum iudicem populi, ſic & miniſtri eius, that is, Like as the head & ſoueraigne is repleniſhed with all ſapience and vertue, in guiding of his people, adminiſtring to them law, with due and conuenient iuſtice, ſo ſhall the ſubiects againward be garniſhed with awe and louing dread, and beare vnto him next God all honour, truth and allegiance.

So that then it may be concluded with the reſidue of the foreſaid verſes, Qualis rector eſt ciuitatis, tales & inhabitantes in ea, which is to ſaie, Such as the ruler of the citie is, ſuch then be the inhabitants of the ſame. So that conſequentlie it followeth, a good maſter maketh a good diſciple. And likewiſe an euill king or ruler ſhall loſe his people, & the cities of his kingdome ſhall be left deſolate and vnhabited. Wherefore thus I make an end. In ſted of a child wilfullie doing his luſt and pleaſure without reaſon, now ſhall a man be lord and ruler, that is repleniſhed with ſapience and reaſon, and ſhall gouerne the people by ſkilfull dœme, ſetting apart all wilfulneſſe and pleaſure of himſelfe. So that the word that I began with may be verified of him, Ecce quia vir dominabitur in populo. The which our lord grant, & that he may proſperouſlie reigne vnto the pleaſure of God and wealth of his realme, Amen.

The words of the elected king.

After the archbiſhop had ended, wiſhing that it might ſo come to paſſe, and the people anſwered, Amen; the king ſtanding on his feet, ſaid vnto the lords and commons there preſent: I thanke you my “ lords both ſpirituall and temporall, and all the ſtates
“ of this land, and doo you to wit, that it is not my will
“ that any man thinke, that I by the waie of conqueſt
“ would diſherit any man of his heritage, franches, “ or other rights, that him ought to haue of right, nor
“ to put him out of that which he now inioieth, and “ hath had before time by cuſtome or good law of this “ realme, except ſuch priuat perſons as haue bœne a-“ gainſt the good purpoſe, and the common profit of the realme. When he had thus ended, all the ſhiriffes and other officers were put in their authorities againe, to exerciſe the ſame as before, which they could not do whileſt the kings roiall throne was void.

Thom. Walſ.

Moreouer, a proclamation was made, that the ſtates ſhould aſſemble againe in parlement on mondaie then next inſuing, being the feaſt daie of ſaint Faith, which is the ſixt of October; and that the mondaie then next following, being the 13 of the ſame moneth, and the feaſt day of ſaint Edward the king and confeſſor, the coronation ſhould be ſolemnized, and that all ſuch as had to claime any ſeruice to be doone by them at the ſame by any tenure, they ſhould come to the White-hall in the kings palace, before the ſteward and conſtable of England, on ſaturdaie next before the ſame day of the parlement, and preſenting their petitions that were due & rightfull, they ſhould obteine that to them apperteined. Excuſe was alſo made on the kings behalfe, for calling of a parlement vpon ſo ſhort a warning, ſo as the knights and burgeſſes were not changed, but onelie appointed to aſſemble againe, as if the other parlement had rather bœne continued than diſſolued. The cauſe was alledged to be for eaſing of the charges that would haue riſen, if ech man had bœne ſent home, and new knights and burgeſſes called.

The coronation proclamed.

The parlemẽt

These things doone, the king roſe from his place, and with a chœrefull and right courteous countenance regarding the people, went to White-hall, where the ſame day he held a great feaſt. In the after noone were proclamations made in the accuſtomed places of the citie, in the name of king Henrie the fourth. On the morrow following, being wedneſdaie and firſt of October, the procurators aboue named repaired to the tower of London, and there ſignified vnto king Richard the admiſſion of king Henrie. And the aforeſaid iuſtice William Thirning, in name of the other, and for all the ſtates of the land, renounced vnto the ſaid Richard late king, all homage and fealtie vnto him before time due, in maner and forme as apperteined. Which renunciation to the depoſed king, was a redoubling of his grœfe, in ſo much as thereby it came to his mind, how in former times he was acknowledged & taken for their liege lord and ſoueraigne, who now (whether in contempt or in malice, God knoweth) to his face forſware him to be their king. So that in his heuines he might verie well haue ſaid with a grœued plaintiſe,

King Henrie ẏ fourth proclamed.

Heu quantæ ſortes miſeris mortalibus inſtant!
Ah chari quoties obliuia nominis opto!
O qui me fluctus, quis me telluris hiatus

T.Watſ. Amintas querela 5.

Thus was king Richard depriued of all kinglie honour and princelie dignitie, by reaſon he was ſo giuen to follow euill counſell, and vſed ſuch inconuenient waies and meanes, through inſolent miſgouernance, and youthfull outrage, though otherwiſe a right noble and worthie prince. He reigned two and twentie yeares, thrœ moneths and eight daies. He deliuered to king Henrie now that he was thus depoſed, all the goods that he had, to the ſumme of thrœ hundred thouſand pounds in coine, beſides plate and iewels, as a pledge and ſatiſfaction of the iniuries by him committed and doone, in hope to be in more ſuertie of life for the deliuerie thereof: but whatſoeuer was promiſed, he was deceiued therein. For ſhortlie after his reſignation, he was conueied to the caſtell of Leeds in Kent, & frõ thence to Pomfret, where he departed out of this miſerable life (as after you ſhall heare.) He was ſeemelie of ſhape and fauor, & of nature good inough, if the wickedneſſe & naughtie demeanor of ſuch as were about him had not altered it.

The noble houſe-keeping of king Richard.

Exceſſe in apparell.

all they haue to atteine thereunto. But ſuch miſfortune (or the like) oftentimes falleth vnto thoſe princes, which when they are aloft, caſt no doubt for perils that maie follow. He was prodigall, ambitious, and much giuen to the pleaſure of the bodie. He kept the greateſt port, and mainteined the moſt plentifull houſe that euer any king in England did either before his time or ſince. For there reſorted dailie to his court aboue ten thouſand perſons that had meat and drinke there allowed them. In his kitchen there were thrée hundred ſeruitors, and euerie other office was furniſhed after the like rate. Of ladies, chamberers, and landerers, there were aboue thrée hundred at the leaſt. And in gorgious and coſtlie apparell they excéeded all meaſure, not one of them that kept within the bounds of his degrée. Yeomen and groomes were clothed in ſilkes, with cloth of graine and ſkarlet, ouer ſumptuous ye may be ſure for their eſtates. And this vanitie was not onelie vſed in the court in thoſe daies, but alſo other people abroad in the towns and countries, had their garments cut far otherwiſe than had béene accuſtomed before his daies, with imbroderies, rich furres, and goldſmiths worke, and euerie daie there was deuiſing of new faſhions, to the great hinderance and decaie of the common-welth.

Ignorant prelats.

Moreouer, ſuch were preferred to biſhoprikes, and other eccleſiaſticall liuings, as neither could teach nor preach, nor knew any thing of the ſcripture of God, but onelie to call for their tithes and duties; ſo that they were moſt vnworthie the name of biſhops, being lewd and moſt vaine perſons diſguiſed in biſhops apparell. Furthermore, there reigned abundantlie the filthie ſinne of leacherie and fornication, with abhominable adulterie, ſpeciallie in the king, but moſt chéefelie in the prelacie, whereby the whole realme by ſuch their euill example, was ſo infected, that the wrath of God was dailie prouoked to vengeance for the ſins of the prince and his people. How then could it continue proſperouſlie with this king? againſt whom for the fowle enormities wherewith his life was defamed, the wrath of God was whetted and tooke ſo ſharpe an edge, that the ſame did ſhred him off from the ſcepter of his kingdome, and gaue him a full cup of affliction to drinke; as he had doone to other kings his predeceſſors, by whoſe example he might haue taken warning. For it is an heauie caſe when God thundereth out his reall arguments either vpon prince or people.

Thus haue ye heard what writers doo report touching the ſtate of the time and doings of this king. But if I may boldlie ſaie what I thinke: he was a prince the moſt vnthankfullie vſed of his ſubiects, of any one of whom ye ſhall lightlie read. For although (thorough the frailtie of youth) he demeaned himſelfe more diſſolutelie than ſéemed conuenient for his roiall eſtate, & made choiſe of ſuch councellors as were not fauoured of the people, whereby he was the leſſe fauoured himſelfe: yet in no kings daies were the commons in greater wealth, if they could haue perceiued their happie ſtate: neither in any other time were the nobles and gentlemen more cheriſhed, nor churchmen leſſe wronged. But ſuch was their ingratitude towards their bountifull & louing ſoueraigne, that thoſe whom he had chéeflie aduanced, were readieſt to controll him; for that they might not rule all things at their will, and remooue from him ſuch as they miſliked, and place in their roomes whom they thought good, and that rather by ſtrong hand, than by gentle and courteous meanes, which ſtirred ſuch malice betwixt him and them, till at length it could not be aſſwaged without perill of deſtruction to them both.

The duke of Glouceſter chéefe inſtrument of this miſchéefe, to what end he came ye haue heard. And although his nephue the duke of Hereford tooke vpon him to reuenge his death, yet wanted he moderation and loialtie in his doings, for the which both he himſelfe and his lineall race were ſcourged afterwards, as a due puniſhment vnto rebellious ſubiects; ſo as deſerued vengeance ſéemed not to ſtaie long for his ambitious crueltie, that thought it not inough to driue king Richard to reſigne his crowne and regall dignitie ouer vnto him, except he alſo ſhould take from him his guiltleſſe life. What vnnaturalneſſe, or rather what tigerlike crueltie was this, not to be content with his principalitie? not to be content with his treaſure? not to be content with his depriuation? not to be content with his impriſonment? but being ſo néerelie knit in conſanguinitie, which ought to haue moued them like lambs to haue loued each other, wooluiſhlie to lie in wait for the diſtreſſed creatures life, and rauenouſlie to thirſt after his bloud, the ſpilling whereof ſhould haue touched his conſcience ſo, as that death ought rather to haue béene aduentured for his ſafetie, than ſo ſauagelie to haue ſought his life after the loſſe of his roialtie.

But to let this paſſe to the conſideration of the learned: according to our order, I will ſhew what writers of our Engliſh nation liued in his daies, as we find them in Iohn Bales centuries. Firſt Henrie Bederic, otherwiſe ſurnamed of Burie, after the name of the towne where he is thought to haue béene borne, an Auguſtine frier; Simon Alcocke, Vthred Bolton a monke of Durham, borne in the borders of Wales beyond Seuerne; William Iordan a blacke frier, Iohn Hilton a frier Minor, Iohn Clipton a Carmelite frier in Notingham, Henrie Daniell a blacke frier and a good phyſician, Ralfe Marham, Iohn Marchelete a graie frier or cordelier as ſome call them, Thomas Brome a Carmelite frier of London, Iohn Bridlington borne in Yorkeſhire, William Thorne an Auguſtine frier of Canturburie, an hiſtoriographer, Adam Meremouth a canon of ſaint Paules church in London, that wrote two tretiſes of hiſtoricall matters, the one intituled Chronicon 40 annorum, and the other Chronicon 60 annorum; Simon Bredon borne in Winchcombe a doctor of phyſicke and a ſkilfull aſtronomer, Iohn Thompſon borne in Norfolke in a village of that name, and a Carmelite frier in Blacknie.

More, Thomas Winterton borne in Lincolnſhire, an Auguſtine frier in Stamford; William Packington ſecretarie ſometime to the Blacke prince an excellent hiſtoriographer, Geffraie Hingham a ciuilian, Iohn Botleſham borne in Cambridgeſhire a blacke frier, William Badbie a Carmelite frier, biſhop of Worceſter, and confeſſor to the duke of Lancaſter; William Folleuill a frier Minor borne in Lincolnſhire, Iohn Bourgh parſon of Collingham in Notinghamſhire a doctor of diuinitie, and chancellor of the Vniuerſitie of Cambridge; William Sclade a monke of Buckfaſt abbie in Deuonſhire, Iohn Thoreſbie archbiſhop of Yorke and lord chancellor of England, was admitted by pope Vrbane the fift into the college of cardinals, but he died before K. Richard came to the crowne, about the eight and fourtith yeare of king Edward the third, in the yeare of our Lord 1374. Thomas Aſhborne an Auguſtine frier, Iohn Aſtone an earneſt follower of Wickliffes doctrine, and therfore condemned to perpetuall priſon; Caſterton a monke of Norwich and an excellent diuine, Nicholas Radcliſe a monke of ſaint Albons, Iohn Aſhwarbie a diuine and a fauourer of Wickliffes doctrine, Richard Maidſtone ſo called of the towne in Kent where he was borne, a Carmelite frier of Aileſford.

Adde to theſe Iohn Wardbie an Auguſtine frier, and a great diuine; Robert Waldbie excellentlie learned as well in diuinitie as other arts, for the which he was firſt aduanced to a biſhoprike in Gaſcoigne, and after he was admitted archbiſhop of Dubline; William Berton a doctor of diuinitie, & chancellor of the Vniuerſitie of Oxford, and aduerſarie to Wickliffe; Philip Repington abbat of Leiceſter a notable diuine and defender of Wickliffe, Thomas Lombe a Carmelite frier of Lin, Nicholas Hereford a ſecular prieſt, a doctor of diuinitie, and ſcholer to Wickliffe; Walter Brit alſo another of Wickliffes ſcholers wrote both of diuinitie & other arguments, Henrie Herklie chancellor of the Vniuerſitie of Oxford, an enimie to Wickliffe, and a great ſophiſter; Robert Iuorie a Carmelite frier of London, and the twentith prouinciall of his order here in England; Lankine a Londoner, an Auguſtine frier, profeſſed in the ſame citie, a doctor of diuinitie, an aduerſarie to Wickliffe.

More, William Gillingham a moonke of ſaint Sauiours in Canturburie; Iohn Chilmarke a fellow of Marton colledge in Oxford, a great philoſopher and mathematician; Iohn Sharpe a philoſopher, and a diuine, wrote manie treatiſes, a great aduerſarie to Wickliffe; Richard Lauingham borne in Suffolke, and a frier of Gipſwich, an excellent logician, but a ſore enimie to them that fauoured Wickliffes doctrine; Peter Pateſhull, of whome ye haue heard before: it is ſaid that he was in the end conſtreined for doubt of perſecution to flie into Boheme; William Woodford a Franciſcane frier, a choſen champion againſt Wickliffe being now dead, procured thereto by the archbiſhop of Canturburie Thomas Arundell; Iohn Bromyard a Dominicke frier, both a notable lawyer & a diuine, a ſore enimie alſo to Wickliuiſts; Marcill Ingelne an excellent philoſopher and a diuine, one of the firſt teachers in the Vniuerſitie of Heidelberge, which Robert duke of Bauier and countée palantine of the Rhene had inſtituted about that ſeaſon; Richard Northall ſonne to a maior of London (as is ſaid) of that name, he became a Carmelite frier in the ſame citie; Thomas Edwardſon prior of the friers Auguſtines at Clare in Suffolke, Iohn Summer a Franciſcane frier at Bridgewater, an enimie to the Wickliuiſts; Richard Withée a learned prieſt & an earneſt follower of Wickliffe, Iohn Swafham a Carmelite frier of Lin, a ſtudent in Cambridge, who became biſhop of Bangor, a great aduerſarie to the Wickliuiſts.

Finallie, and to conclude, William Egumond a frier heremit of the ſect of the Auguſtins in Stamford; Iohn Tiſſington a Franciſcane frier, a mainteiner of the popes doctrine; William Rimſton or Rimington a moonke of Salleie, an enimie alſo to the Wickliuiſts; Adam Eſton well ſéene in the toongs, was made a cardinall by pope Gregorie the eleauenth, but by pope Vrban the ſixt he was committed to priſon in Genoa, and at the contemplation of king Richard he was taken out of priſon, but not fullie deliuered till the daies of Boniface the ninth, who reſtored him to his former dignitie; Iohn Beaufu a Carmelite of Northampton, procéeded doctor of diuinitie in Oxenford, and was made prior of his houſe; Roger Twiford aliàs Goodlucke, an Auguſtine frier; Iohn Treuiſe a Corniſhman borne, and a ſecular préeſt and vicar of Berklie, he tranſlated the bible; Bartholomew De proprietatibus rerum; Polychronicon of Ranulph Higden, and diuerſe other treatiſes, Raſe Spalding a Carmelite frier of Stamford; Iohn moone an Engliſhman borne, but a ſtudent in Paris, who compiled in the French toong the Romant of the Roſe, tranſlated into Engliſh by Geffrie Chaucer, William Shirborne; Richard Wichingham borne in Norffolke, and diuerſe other.

Thus farre Richard of Burdeaux, whoſe depriuation you haue heard; of his lamentable death hereafter, to wit, pag. 516, 517.

Henrie the fourth, couſine germane to Richard the ſecond, latelie depriued.

WHen king Richard had reſigned (as before is ſpecified) the ſcepter and crowne; Henrie Plantagenet borne at Bullingbroke in the countie of Lincolne, duke of Lancaſter and Hereford, earle of Derbie, Leiceſter, and Lincolne, ſonne to Iohn of Gant duke of Lancaſter, with generall conſent both of the lords & commons, was publiſhed, proclamed, and declared king of England and of France, and lord of Ireland, the laſt daie of September, in the yeare of the world 5366, of our Lord 1399, of the reigne of the emperour Wenceſlaus the two and twentith, of Charles the ſixt king of France the twentith, and the tenth of Robert the third king of Scots. After that king Richard had ſurrendered his title, and diſpoſſeſſed himſelfe (which Chr. Okl. noteth in few words, ſaieng:

New officers made.

King Henrie made certeine new officers. And firſt in right of his earledome of Leiceſter he gaue the office of high ſteward of England (belonging to the ſame earledome) vnto his ſecond ſonne the lord Thomas, who by his fathers commandement exerciſed that office, being aſſiſted (by reaſon of his tender age) by Thomas Perſie earle of Worceſter. The earle of Northumberland was made conſtable of England: ſir Iohn Scirlie lord chancellor, Iohn Norburie eſquier lord treaſuror, ſir Richard Clifford lord priuie ſeale. Forſomuch as by king Richards reſignation and the admitting of a new king, all plées in euerie court and place were ceaſed, and without daie diſcontinued, new writs were made for ſummoning of the parlement vnder the name of king Henrie the fourth, the ſame to be holden, as before was appointed, on mondaie next inſuing. Vpon the fourth day of October, the lord Thomas ſecond ſonne to the king ſat as lord high ſteward of England by the kings commandement in the White-hall of the kings palace at Weſtminſter, and as belonged to his office, he cauſed inquirie to be made what offices were to be exerciſed by anie maner of perſons the daie of the kings coronation, and what fées were belonging to the ſame, cauſing proclamation to be made, that what noble man or other that could claime anie office that daie of the ſolemnizing the kings coronation, they ſhould come and put in their bils cōprehending their demands. Wherupon diuers offices & fées were claimed, as well by bils as otherwiſe by ſpéech of mouth, in forme as here inſueth.

Curtana.

The earle of Summerſet.

The earle of Northumberland.

The Ile of Man.

Lancaſter ſword.

The earle of weſtmerland.

The duke of Norffolke.

Sir Thomas Erpingham.

The earle of warwike.

Sir william Argentine.

Iuon Fitzwarren.

The lord Furniuall.

Firſt, the lord Henrie the kings eldeſt ſonne, to whome he as in right of his duchie of Lancaſter had appointed that office, claimed to beare before the king the principall ſword called Curtana, and had his ſute granted. Iohn erle of Summerſet, to whom the king as in right of his earledome of Lincolne, had granted to be caruer the daie of his coronation, and had it confirmed. Henrie Perſie earle of Northumberland, and high conſtable of England, by the kings grant claimed that office, and obteined it to inioy at pleaſure. The ſame earle in right of the Ile of Man, which at that preſent was granted to him, and to his heires by the king, claimed to beare on the kings left ſide a naked ſword, with which the king was girded, when before his coronation he entered as duke of Lancaſter into the parts of Holderneſſe, which ſword was called Lancaſters ſword. Rafe erle of Weſtmerland, and earle marſhall of England, by the kings grant claimed the ſame office, and obteined it, notwithſtanding that the attornies of the duke of Norfolke, preſented to the lord ſteward their petition on the dukes behalfe, as earle marſhall, to exerciſe the ſame. Sir Thomas Erpingham knight exerciſed the office of lord great Chamberleine, and gaue water to the king when he waſhed, both before and after dinner, hauing for his fées, the baſon, ewer, and towels, with other things whatſoeuer belonging to his office: notwithſtanding Auberie de Veer earle of Oxenford put in his petitions to haue that office as due vnto him from his anceſtors. Thomas Beauchampe earle of Warwike by right of inheritance, bare the third ſword before the king, and by like right was pantler at the coronation. Sir William Argentine knight, by reaſon of the tenure of his manour of Wilmundale in the countie of Hertford, ſerued the king of the firſt cup of drinke which he taſted of at his dinner the daie of his coronation: the cup was of ſiluer vngilt, which the ſame knight had for his fées: notwithſtanding the petition which Iuon Fitzwarren preſented to the lord ſteward, requiring that office in right of his wife the ladie Maud, daughter and heire to ſir Iohn Argentine knight. Sir Thomas Neuill lord Furniuall, by reaſon of his manour of Ferneham, with the hamlet of Cere, which he held by the courteſie of England after the deceſſe of his wife, the ladie Ione deceſſed, gaue to the king a gloue for his right hand, and ſuſteined the kings right arme ſo long as he bare the ſcepter.

The lord Graie.

Great ſpurs.

The ſecond ſword.

The earle of Arundell.

The lord Reginald Graie of Ruthen, by reaſon of his manour of Aſhleie in Norfolke couered the tables, and had for his fées all the tableclothes, as well thoſe in the hall, as elſe-where, when they were taken vp; notwithſtanding a petition exhibited by ſir Iohn Draiton to haue had that office. The ſame lord Graie of Ruthen, bare the kings great ſpurs before him in the time of his coronation by right of inheritance, as heire to Iohn Haſtings earle of Penbroke. Iohn erle of Summerſet, by the kings aſſignement bare the ſecond ſword before him at his coronation, albeit that the ſaid lord Graie of Ruthen by petition exhibited before the lord ſteward demanded the ſame office, by reaſon of his caſtell & tower of Penbroke, and of his towne of Denbigh. Thomas earle of Arundell cheefe butler of England, obteined to exerciſe that office the daie of the coronation, and had the fées thereto belonging granted to him, to wit, the goblet with which the king was ſerued, and other things to that his office apperteining (the veſſels of wine excepted) that laie vnder the bar, which were adiudged vnto the ſaid lord ſteward, the ſaid earle of Arundels claime notwithſtanding.

The citizens of London.

Thomas Dymocke.

Baldwin Freuill.

The citizens of London choſen foorth by the citie, ſerued in the hall, as aſſiſtants to the lord cheefe butler, whileſt the king ſate at dinner, the daie of his coronation: and when the king entered into his chamber after dinner, and called for wine, the lord maior of London brought to him a cup of gold with wine, and had the ſame cup giuen to him, togither with the cup that conteined water to allay the wine. After the king had drunke, the ſaid lord maior and the aldermen of London had their table to dine at, on the left hand of the king in the hall. Thomas Dimocke, in right of his mother Margaret Dimocke, by reaſon of the tenure of his manor of Scriuelbie, claimed to be the kings champion at his coronation, and had his ſute granted; notwithſtanding a claime exhibited by Baldwin Freuill, demanding that office by reaſon of his caſtell of Tamwoorth in Warwikeſhire. The ſaid Dimocke had for his fées one of the beſt courſers in the kings ſtable, with the kings ſaddle and all the trappers & harneſſe apperteining to the ſame horſſe or courſer: he had likewiſe one of the beſt armors that was in the kings armorie for his owne bodie, with all that belonged wholie thereunto.

The lord Latimer.

William le Venour.

The barons of the cinque ports.

Iohn lord Latimer, although he was vnder age, for himſelfe and the duke of Norfolke, notwithſtanding that his poſſeſſions were in the kings hands, by his atturnie ſir Thomas Graie knight, claimed and had the office of almoner for that daie, by reaſon of certeine lands which ſometime belonged to the lord William Beuchampe of Bedford. They had a towell of fine linnen cloth prepared, to put in the ſiluer that was appointed to be giuen in almes; and likewiſe they had the diſtribution of the cloth that couered the pauement and floores from the kings chamber doore, vnto the place in the church of Weſtminſter where the pulpit ſtood. The reſidue that was ſpread in the church, the ſexten had. William le Venour, by reaſon he was tenant of the manor of Liſton, claimed and obteined to exerciſe the office of making wafers for the king the daie of his coronation. The barons of the fiue ports claimed, and it was granted them, to beare a canopie of cloth of gold ouer the K. with foure ſtaues, & foure bels at the foure corners, euerie ſtaffe hauing foure of thoſe barons to beare it: alſo to dine and ſit at the table next to the king on his right hand in the hall the daie of his coronation, and for their fees to haue the forſaid canopie of gold, with the bels and ſtaues, notwithſtanding the abbat of Weſtminſter claimed the ſame. Edmund chambers claimed and obteined the office of principall larderer for him and his deputies, by reaſon of his manour of Skulton, otherwiſe called Burdellebin Skulton, in the countie of Norfolke. Thus was euerie man appointed to exerciſe ſuch office as to him of right apperteined, or at the leaſt was thought requiſit for the time preſent. On mondaie then next inſuing, when the ſtates were aſſembled in parlement, order was taken, that by reaſon of ſuch preparation as was to be made for the coronation, they ſhould ſit no more till the morow after ſaint Edwards daie. On the ſundaie following, being the euen of ſaint Edward, the new king lodged in the Tower, and there made fortie & ſix knights of the Bath, to wit: thrée of his ſonnes, the earle of Arundell, the earle of Warwike his ſonne, the earle of Stafford, two of the earle of Deuonſhires ſonnes, the lord Beaumont, the lord Willoughbies brother, the earle of Staffords brother, the lord Camois his ſonne, the lord of Maule, Thomas Beauchampe, Thomas Pelham, John Luttrell, John Liſleie, William Haukeford iuſtice, William Brinchleie iuſtice, Bartholomew Rachford, Giles Daubenie, William Butler, John Aſhton, Richard Sanape, John Tiptoſt, Richard Francis, Henrie Perſie, John Arundell, William Strall, John Turpington, Ailmer Saint, Edward Haſtings, John Greiſleie, Gerald Satill, John Arden, Robert Chalons, Thomas Dimocke, Hungerford, Gibethorpe, Newport, and diuerſe other, to the number of fortie and ſix.

Knights of the Bath.

The lord maior of London.

On the morow being ſaint Edwards daie, and the thirtéenth of October, the lord maior of London road towards the Tower to attend the king, with diuerſe worſhipfull citizens clothed all in red, and from the Tower the king rode through the citie to Weſtminſter, where he was conſecrated, annointed, and crowned king by the archbiſhop of Canturburie with all ceremonies and roiall ſolemnitie as was due and requiſit. Though all other reioiſed at his aduancement, yet ſuerlie Edmund Mortimer earle of March, which was coſine and heire to Lionell duke of Clarence, the third begotten ſonne of king Edward the third, & Richard earle of Cambridge, ſonne to Edmund duke of Yorke, which had married Anne ſiſter to the ſame Edmund, were with theſe doings neither pleaſed nor contented: inſomuch that now the diuiſion once begun, the one linage ceaſſed not to perſecute the other, till the heires males of both the lines were cléerlie deſtroied and extinguiſhed.

The earle of March enuied the K. preferment.

At the daie of the coronation, to the end he ſhould not ſéeme to take vpon him the crowne and ſcepter roiall by plaine extorted power, and iniurious intruſion: he was aduiſed to make his title as heire to Edmund (ſurnamed or vntrulie feined) Crookebacke, ſonne to king Henrie the third, and to ſaie that the ſaid Edmund was elder brother to king Edward the firſt, and for his deformitie put by from the crowne, to whom by his mother Blench, daughter and ſole heire to Henrie duke of Lancaſter, he was next of blood, and vndoubted heire. But becauſe not onelie his fréends, but alſo his priuie enimies, knew that this was but a forged title, conſidering they were ſuerlie informed, not onelie that the ſaid Edmund was yonger ſonne to king Henrie the third, but alſo had true knowledge, that Edmund was neither crookebacked, nor a deformed perſon, but a goodlie gentleman, and a valiant capteine, and ſo much fauored of his louing father, that he to preferre him in marriage to the quéene Dowager of Nauarre, hauing a great liuelihood, gaue to him the countie palantine of Lancaſter, with manie notable honours, high ſeigniories, and large priuileges. Therefore they aduiſed him to publiſh it, that he challenged the realme not onelie by conqueſt, but alſo becauſe he by king Richard was adopted as heire, and declared by reſignation as his lawfull ſucceſſor, being next heire male to him of the blood roiall.

Edmund erle of Lancaſter vntrulie fained to be ſurnamed Crookebacke.

But to procéed to other doings. The ſolemnitie of the coronation being ended, the morow after being tueſdaie, the parlement began againe, and the next daie ſir John Cheinie that was ſpeaker, excuſing himſelfe, by reaſon of his infirmitie and ſickneſſe, not to be able to exerciſe that roome, was diſmiſſed, and one William Durward eſquier was admitted. Herewith were the acts eſtabliſhed in the parlement of the one & twentith yeare of king Richards reigne repealed and made void, and the ordinances deuiſed in the parlement holden the eleuenth yeare of the ſame king, confirmed, and againe eſtabliſhed for good and profitable. ¶ On the ſame daie, the kings eldeſt ſonne lord Henrie, by aſſent of all the ſtates in the parlement, was created prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earle of Cheſter, then being of the age of twelue yeares.

Sir John Cheinie ſpeaker of the parlement diſmiſſed, and William Durward admitted.

Acts repealed.

Acts confirmed.

Upon the thurſdaie, the commons came and rehearſed all the errors of the laſt parlement holden in the one and twentith yeare of king Richard, & namelie in certeine fiue of them.

1 Firſt, that where the king that now is, was readie to arraigne an appeale againſt the duke of Norfolke, he doing what perteined to his dutie in that behalfe, was yet baniſhed afterwards without anie reaſonable cauſe.

2 Secondlie, the archbiſhop of Canturburie, metropolitan of the realme, was forciudged without anſwer.

3 Thirdlie, the duke of Glouceſter was murthered, and after forciudged.

4 Fourthlie, where the earle of Arundell alledged his charters of pardon, the ſame might not be allowed.

5 Fiftlie, that all the power of that euill parlement was granted and aſſigned ouer to certeine perſons, and ſith that ſuch heinous errors could not be committed (as was thought) without the aſſent and aduiſe of them that were of the late kings councell, they made ſute that they might be put vnder arreſt, and committed to ſafe kéeping, till order might be further taken for them.

Thus much adoo there was in this parlement, ſpeciallie about them that were thought to be guiltie of the duke of Glouceſters death, and of the condemning of the other lords that were adiudged traitors in the forſaid late parlement holden in the ſaid one and twentith yeare of king Richards reigne. Sir John Bagot knight then priſoner in the Tower, diſcloſed manie ſecrets, vnto the which he was priuie; and being brought on a daie to the barre, a bill was read in Engliſh which he had made, conteining certeine euill practiſes of king Richard; and further what great affection the ſame king bare to the duke of Aumarle, inſomuch that he heard him ſay, that if he ſhould renounce the gouernement of the kingdome, he wiſhed to leaue it to the ſaid duke, as to the moſt able man (for wiſdome and manhood) of all other: for though he could like better of the duke of Hereford, yet he ſaid that he knew if he were once king, he would proue an extreame enimie and cruell tyrant to the church.

Fabian.

Sir John Bagot diſcloſeth ſecrets.

Henrie the fourth ſuſpected not to be well affected towards the church before his comming to the crowne.

It was further conteined in that bill, that as the ſame Bagot rode on a daie behind the duke of Norfolke in the Sauoy ſtréet toward Weſtminſter, the duke aſked him what he knew of the manner of the duke of Glouceſter his death, and he anſwered that he knew nothing at all: but the people (quoth he) doo ſay that you haue murthered him. Wherevnto the duke ſware great othes that it was vntrue, and that he had ſaued his life contrarie to the will of the king, and certeine other lords, by the ſpace of thrée wéeks, and more; affirming withall, that he was neuer in all his life time more affraid of death, than he was at his comming home againe from Calis at that time, to the kings preſence, by reaſon he had not put the duke to death. And then (ſaid he) the king appointed one of his owne ſeruants, and certeine other that were ſeruants to other lords to go with him to ſee the ſaid duke of Gloceſter put to death, ſwearing that as he ſhould anſwer afore God, it was neuer his mind that he ſhould haue died in the fort, but onelie for feare of the king, and ſauing of his owne life. Neuertheleſſe, there was no man in the realme to whom king Richard was ſo much beholden, as to the duke of Aumarle: for he was the man that to fulfill his mind, had ſet him in hand with all that was doone againſt the ſaid duke, and the other lords. There was alſo conteined in that bill, what ſecret malice king Richard had conceiued againſt the duke of Hereford being in exile, whereof the ſame Bagot had ſent intelligence vnto the duke into France, by one Roger Smart, who certified it to him by Piers Buckton, and others, to the intent he ſhould the better haue regard to himſelfe. There was alſo conteined in the ſaid bill, that Bagot had heard the duke of Aumarle ſay, that he had rather than twentie thouſand pounds that the duke of Hereford were dead, not for anie feare he had of him, but for the trouble and miſchéefe that he was like to procure within the realme.

The duke of Aumarle his anſwer vnto Bagots bill.

Iohn Hall a yeoman.

After that the bill had béene read and heard, the duke of Aumarle roſe vp and ſaid, that as touching the points conteined in the bill concerning him, they were vtterlie falſe and vntrue, which he would proue with his bodie, in what manner ſoeuer it ſhould be thought requiſit. Therewith alſo the duke of Exceſter roſe vp, and willed Bagot that if he could ſay anie thing againſt him to ſpeake it openlie. Bagot anſwered, that for his part he could ſay nothing againſt him: But there is (ſaid he) a yeoman in Newgat one Iohn hall that can ſay ſomewhat. Well then (ſaid the duke of Exceſter) this that I doo and ſhall ſay is true, that the late king, the duke of Norfolke, and thou being at Woodſtoke, made me to go with you into the chappell, and there the doore being ſhut, ye made me to ſweare vpon the altar, to kéepe counſell in that ye had to ſay to me, and then ye rehearſed that we ſhould neuer haue our purpoſe, ſo long as the duke of Lancaſter liued, & therefore ye purpoſed to haue councell at Lichfield, & there you would arreſt the duke of Lancaſter, in ſuch ſort as by colour of his diſobeieng the arreſt, he ſhould be diſpatched out of life. And in this maner ye imagined his death. To the which I anſwered, that it were conuenient the king ſhould ſend for his councell, and if they agréed herevnto, I would not be againſt it, and ſo I departed. To this Bagot made no anſwer.

Bagot and Hall brought to the barre.

The lord Fitzwater appealeth the duke of Aumarle of treaſon.

After this, the king commanded that the lords, Berkleie, and Louell, and ſix knights of the lower houſe, ſhould go after dinner to examine the ſaid Hall. This was on a thurſdaie being the fiftéenth of October. On the ſaturdaie next inſuing, ſir William Bagot and the ſaid Iohn Hall were brought both to the barre, and Bagot was examined of certeine points, and ſent againe to priſon. The lord Fitzwater herewith roſe vp, and ſaid to the king, that where the duke of Aumarle excuſeth himſelfe of the duke of Gloceſters death, I ſay (quoth he) that he was the verie cauſe of his death, and ſo he appealed him of treaſon, offering by throwing downe his hood as a gage to proue it with his bodie. There were twentie other lords alſo that threw downe their hoods, as pledges to proue the like matter againſt the duke of Aumarle. The duke of Aumarle threw downe his hood to trie it againſt the lord Fitzwater, as againſt him that lied falſelie, in that he had charged him with, by that his appeale. Theſe gages were deliuered to the conſtable and marſhall of England, and the parties put vnder arreſt.

Fabian.

Iohn Hall executed.

The duke of Surrie ſtood vp alſo againſt the lord Fitzwater, auouching that where he had ſaid that the appellants were cauſers of the duke of Gloceſters death, it was falſe, for they were conſtrained to ſue the ſame appeale, in like manner as the ſaid lord Fitzwater was compelled to giue iudgement againſt the duke of Gloceſter, and the earle of Arundell; ſo that the ſuing of the appeale was doone by conſtraint, and if he ſaid contrarie he lied: and therewith he threw downe his hood. The lord Fitzwater anſwered herevnto, that he was not preſent in the parlement houſe, when iudgement was giuen againſt them, and all the lords bare witneſſe thereof. Moreouer, where it was alledged that the duke of Aumarle ſhould ſend two of his ſeruants to Calis, to murther the duke of Gloceſter, the ſaid duke of Aumarle ſaid, that if the duke of Norfolke affirme it, he lied falſelie, and that he would proue with his bodie, throwing downe an other hood which he had borowed. The ſame was likewiſe deliuered to the conſtable and marſhall of England, and the king licenced the duke of Norfolke to returne, that he might arraigne his appeale. After this was Iohn Hall condemned of treaſon by authoritie of the parlement, for that he had confeſſed himſelfe to be one of them that put the duke of Gloceſter to death at Calis, and ſo on the mondaie following, he was drawne from the Tower to Tiburne, and there hanged, bowelled, headed, and quartered: his head being ſent to Calis there to be ſet vp, where the duke was murthered.

Iohn Stow. The requeſt of the commons.

Hall. A bold biſhop and a faithfull.

On wedneſdaie following, requeſt was made by the commons, that ſith king Richard had reſigned, and was lawfullie depoſed from his roiall dignitie, he might haue iudgement decréed againſt him, ſo as the realme were not troubled by him, and that the cauſes of his depoſing might be publiſhed through the realme for ſatiſfieng of the people: which demand was granted. Wherevpon the biſhop of Carleill, a man both learned, wiſe, and ſtout of ſtomach, boldlie ſhewed foorth his opinion concerning that demand; affirming that there was none amongſt them worthie or méet to giue iudgement vpon ſo noble a prince as king Richard was, whom they had taken for their ſoueraigne and liege lord, by the ſpace of two & twentie yeares and more; And I aſſure you (ſaid he) there is not ſo ranke a traitor, nor ſo errant a théef, nor yet ſo cruell a murtherer apprehended or deteined in priſon for his offenſe, but he ſhall be brought before the iuſtice to heare his iudgement; and will ye procéed to the iudgement of an anointed king, hearing neither his anſwer nor excuſe? I ſay, that the duke of Lancaſter whom ye call king, hath more treſpaſſed to K. Richard & his realme, than king Richard hath doone either to him, or vs: for it is manifeſt & well knowne, that the duke was baniſhed the realme by K. Richard and his councell, and by the iudgement of his owne father, for the ſpace of ten yeares, for what cauſe ye know, and yet without licence of king Richard, he is returned againe into the realme, and (that is worſe) hath taken vpon him the name, title, & preheminence of king. And therfore I ſay, that you haue doone manifeſt wrong, to procéed in anie thing againſt king Richard, without calling him openlie to his anſwer and defenſe. ¶ As ſoone as the biſhop had ended this tale, he was attached by the earle marſhall, and committed to ward in the abbeie of ſaint Albons.

The duke of Britaine.

Moreouer, where the king had granted to the earle of Weſtmerland the countie of Richmond, the duke of Britaine pretending a right thereto by an old title, had ſent his letters ouer vnto the eſtates aſſembled in this parlement, offering to abide ſuch order as the law would appoint in the like caſe to anie of the kings ſubiects. Wherevpon the commons for the more ſuertie of the intercourſe of merchants, beſought the king that the matter might be committed to the ordering of the councell of either of the parties, and of his counſell, ſo as an end might be had therein, which requeſt was likewiſe granted. After this, the records of the laſt parlement were ſhewed, with the appeales, & the commiſſion made to twelue perſons, to determine things that were motioned in the ſame laſt parlement. Héerevpon the commons praied that they might haue iuſtice Markham, and maiſter Gaſcoigne a ſergeant at the law ioined with them for counſell, touching the peruſing of the records, which was granted them, and day giuen ouer till the next morrow in the White-hall, where they ſat about theſe matters thrée daies togither.

K. Richard appointed to be kept in perpetuall priſon. Hall.

The earle of warwike.

On the morrow following, being the éeuen of Simon and Iude the apoſtles, the commons required to heare the iudgement of king Richard. Where vpon the archbiſhop of Canturburie appointed to ſpeake, declared how that the king that now is, had granted king Richard his life; but in ſuch wiſe as he ſhould remaine in perpetuall priſon, ſo ſafelie kept, that neither the king nor realme ſhould be troubled with him. It was alſo concluded, that if anie man went about to deliuer him, that then he ſhould be the firſt that ſhould die for it. After this, the commons praied that the lords and other that were of king Richards counſell, might be put to their anſwers for their ſundrie miſdemeanors, which was granted. On Wedneſday following, being the morrow after the feaſt of Simon and Iude, all the proceſſe of the parlement holden the 21 yéere of king Richards reigne was read openlie, in which it was found, how the earle of Warwike had confeſſed himſelfe guiltie of treaſon, and aſked pardon and mercie for his offenſe: but the earle denied that euer he acknowledged anie ſuch thing by word of mouth, and that he would proue in what manner ſoeuer ſhould be to him appointed. Therein was alſo the appeale found of the dukes of Aumarle, Surrie, and Exceſter, the marqueſſe Dorſet, the earles of Saliſburie and Gloceſter; vnto the which ech of them anſwered by himſelfe, that they neuer aſſented to that appeale of their owne frée wils, but were compelled thereto by the king: and this they affirmed by their othes, and offered to proue it by what manner they ſhould be appointed.

Sir water Clopton.

The lord Morlie appeleth the earle of Saliſburie.

Sir Walter Clopton ſaid then to the commons; If ye will take aduantage of the proceſſe of the laſt parlement, take it, and ye ſhall be receiued therevnto. Then roſe vp the lord Morlie, and ſaid to the earle of Saliſburie, that he was chiefe of counſell with the duke of Gloceſter, and likewiſe with king Richard, & ſo diſcouered the dukes counſell to the king, as a traitor to his maiſter, and that he ſaid he would with his bodie proue againſt him, throwing downe his hood as a pledge. The earle of Saliſburie ſore moued héerewith, told the lord Morlie, that he falſlie béelied him, for he was neuer traitor, nor falſe to his maiſter all his life time, and therewith threw downe his gloue to wage battell againſt the lord Morlie. Their gages were taken vp, and deliuered to the conſtable and marſhall of England, and the parties were arreſted, and day to them giuen till another time.

On mondaie following, being the morrow after All ſoules day, the commons made requeſt, that they might not be entred in the parlement rols, as parties to the iudgement giuen in this parlement, but there as in verie truth they were priuie to the ſame: for the iudgement otherwiſe belonged to the king, except where anie iudgment is giuen by ſtatute enacted for the profit of the common-wealth, which requeſt was granted. Diuers other petitions were preſented on the behalfe of the commons, part whereof were granted, and to ſome there was none anſwere made at that time. Finallie, to auoid further inconuenience, and to qualifie the minds of the enuious, it was finallie enacted, that ſuch as were appellants in the laſt parlement againſt the duke of Gloceſter and other, ſhould in this wiſe following be ordered. The dukes of Aumarle, Surrie, and Exceſter there preſent, were iudged to looſe their names of dukes, togither with the honors, titles and dignities therevnto belonging. The marqueſſe Dorſet being likewiſe there preſent, was adiudged to loſe his title and dignitie of marqueſſe; and the earle of Gloceſter being alſo preſent, was in ſemblable maner iudged to loſe his name, title and dignitie of earle.

Tho. Walſ.

Moreouer, it was further decréed againſt them, that they and euerie of them ſhould loſe and forfeit all thoſe caſtels, lordſhips, manors, lands, poſſeſſions, rents, ſeruices, liberties and reuenues, whatſoeuer had béene giuen to them, at or ſince the laſt parlement, belonging aforetime to any of thoſe perſons whom they had appealed, and all other their caſtels, manors, lordſhips, lands, poſſeſſions, rents, ſeruices, liberties, and reuenues whatſoeuer, which they held of the late kings gift, the daie of the arreſt of the ſaid duke of Gloceſter, or at any time after, ſhould alſo remaine in the kings diſpoſition from thenceforth, and all letters patents and charters, which they or any of them had of the ſame names, caſtels, manors, lordſhips, lands, poſſeſſions, and liberties, ſhould be ſurrendred vp into the chancerie, there to be cancelled. Diuerſe other things were enacted in this parlement, to the preiudice of thoſe high eſtates, to ſatiſfie mens minds that were ſore diſpleaſed with their doings in the late kings daies, as now it manifeſtlie appéered. For after it was vnderſtood that they ſhould be no further puniſhed than as before is mentioned, great murmuring roſe among the people againſt the king, the archbiſhop of Canturburie, the earle of Northumberland, and other of the councell, for ſauing the liues of men whom the commons reputed moſt wicked, and not worthie in anie wiſe to liue. But the king thought it beſt, rather with courteſie to reconcile them, than by cutting them off by death, to procure the hatred of their fréends and alies, which were manie, and of no ſmall power.

The hatred which the cõmons had cõmitted againſt the appellãts.

The earles Saliſburie his requeſt.

After that the foreſaid iudgement was declared with proteſtation by ſir William Thirning iuſtice, the earle of Saliſburie came and made requeſt, that he might haue his proteſtation entered againſt the lord Morlie, which lord Morlie riſing vp from his ſeat, ſaid, that ſo he might not haue; bicauſe in his firſt anſwer he made no proteſtation, and therefore he was paſt it now. The earle praied day of aduiſement, but the lord Morlie praied that he might loſe his aduantage, ſith he had not entered ſufficient plée againſt him. Then ſir Matthew Gournie ſitting vnderneath the king ſaid to the earle of Saliſburie, that Forſomuch as at the firſt day in your anſwers, ye made no proteſtation at all, none is entered of record, and ſo you are paſt that aduantage: and therefore aſked him if he would ſaie any other thing. Then the earle deſired that he might put in mainpriſe, which was granted: and ſo the earle of Kent, ſir Rafe Ferrers, ſir Iohn Roch, & ſir Iohn Dralton knights, mainpriſed the ſaid earle bodie for bodie. For the lord Morlie all the lords and barons offred to vndertake, and to be ſuerties for him; but yet foure of them had their names entered, that is to ſaie, the lords Willoughbie, Beauchampe, Scales, and Berkelie: they had day till the fridaie after to make their libell.

The lord Fitzwalter.

After this came the lord Fitzwater, and praied to haue day and place to arreigne his appeale againſt the earle of Rutland. The king ſaid he would ſend for the duke of Norffolke to returne home, and then vpon his returne he ſaid he would procéed in that matter. Manie ſtatutes were eſtabliſhed in this parlement, as well concerning the whole bodie of the common-wealth (as by the booke thereof imprinted may appeare) as alſo concerning diuerſe priuate perſons then preſentlie liuing, which partlie we haue touched, and partlie for doubt to be ouer-tedious, we doo omit. But this among other is not to be forgotten that the archbiſhop of Canturburie was not onelie reſtored to his former dignitie, being remooued from it by king Richard, who had procured one Roger Walden to be placed therein (as before ye haue heard) but alſo the ſaid Walden was eſtabliſhed biſhop of London, wherewith he ſeemed well content.

Moreouer, the kings eldeſt ſonne Henrie alreadie created (as heire to his father, and to the crowne) prince of Wales, duke of Cornewall, and earle of Cheſter, was alſo intituled duke of Aquitaine: and to auoid all titles, claimes, and ambiguities, there was an act made for the vniting of the crowne vnto king Henrie the fourth, and to the heires of his bodie lawfullie begotten, his foure ſonnes, Henrie, Thomas, John, and Humfrie, being named, as to whom the right ſhould deſcend ſucceſſiuelie by waie of intaile, in caſe where heires failed to any of them. By force of this act king Henrie thought himſelfe firmelie ſet on a ſure foundation, not needing to feare any ſtorme of aduerſe fortune. But yet ſhortlie after he was put in danger to haue beene ſet beſides the ſeat, by a conſpiracie begun in the abbat of Weſtminſters houſe, which, had it not beene hindred, it is doubtfull whether the new king ſhould haue inioied his roialtie, or the old king (now a priſoner) reſtored to his principalitie. But God (of whome the poet ſaith, had purpoſed a diſappointment of their coniuration, and therefore no maruell though the iſſue of their labours were infortunat by their flattering hope.

But now to make an end with this parlement. After that things were concluded and granted, ſo as was thought to ſtand with the ſuertie of the king, and good quiet of the realme, the king granted a free pardon to all his ſubiects, thoſe excepted that were at the murther of the duke of Gloceſter, and ſuch as had committed wilfull murther, or rape, or were knowne to be notorious theeues. And thoſe that were to take benefit by this pardon, were appointed to ſue forth the charters therof, betwixt that preſent and the feaſt of All ſaints next inſuing, and ſo was this parlement diſſolued. Immediatlie after, the king (according to an order taken in the ſame parlement, to giue to vnderſtand vnto all princes and countries about him, by what title and occaſion he had taken to him the kingdome) ſent ambaſſadors vnto them to ſignifie the ſame. Into Rome were ſent, John Treneuant biſhop of Hereford, ſir John Cheinie knight, & John Cheinie eſquier. Into France, maſter Walter Skirlow biſhop of Durham, and Thomas Perſie earle of Worceſter. Into Spaine, John Trenour biſhop of ſaint Aſaph, and ſir William Parre knight. Into Almanie the biſhop of Bangor, and two others.

Ambaſſadors ſent to forren princes.

The Scots in time of the late parlement, taking occaſion of the abſence of the northerne lords, and alſo by reaſon of great mortalitie that afflicted the northerne people that yeare, inuaded the borders, tooke the caſtell of Warke, that was aſſigned to the ſafe keeping of ſir Thomas Greie knight, who then was at the parlement, as one of the knights of the ſhire, by meanes of whoſe abſence, the enimies the ſooner (as is to be thought) obteined their deſire, and ſo kept that caſtell a certeine time, and finallie ſpoiled it, and ouerthrew it to the ground. Beſides all this, they did manie other miſcheefes in the countrie, to the vndooing of manie of the kings ſubiects. This yeare Thomas Mowbraie duke of Norffolke died in exile at Venice, whoſe death might haue beene worthilie bewailed of all the realme, if he had not beene conſenting to the death of the duke of Gloceſter. The ſame yeare deceaſſed the ducheſſe of Gloceſter, through ſorrow (as was thought) which ſhe conceiued for the loſſe of hir ſonne and heire the lord Humfrie, who being ſent for forth of Ireland (as before ye haue heard) was taken with the peſtilence, and died by the waie.

The ducheſſe of Gloceſter deceaſſeth.

But now to ſpeake of the conſpiracie, which was contriued by the abbat of Weſtminſter as cheefe inſtrument thereof. Ye ſhall vnderſtand, that this abbat (as it is reported) vpon a time heard king Henrie ſaie, when he was but earle of Derbie, and yong of yeares, that princes had too little, and religious men too much. He therefore doubting now, leaſt if the king continued long in the eſtate, he would remoue the great beame that then greeued his eies, and pricked his conſcience, became an inſtrument to ſearch out the minds of the nobilitie, and to bring them to an aſſemblie and councell, where they might conſult and commen togither, how to bring that to effect, which they earneſtlie wiſhed and deſired; that was, the deſtruction of king Henrie, and the reſtoring of king Richard. For there were diuerſe lords that ſhewed themſelues outwardlie to fauor king Henrie, where they ſecretlie wiſhed & ſought his confuſion. The abbat after he had felt the minds of ſundrie of them, called to his houſe on a day in the terme time, all ſuch lords & other perſons which he either knew or thought to be as affectioned to king Richard, ſo enuious to the proſperitie of king Henrie, whoſe names were, John Holland earle of Huntington late duke of Exceſter, Thomas Holland earle of Kent late duke of Surrie, Edward earle of Rutland late duke of Aumarle ſonne to the duke of Yorke, John Montacute earle of Saliſburie, Hugh lord Spenſer late earle of Gloceſter, John the biſhop of Carleill, ſir Thomas Blunt, and Maudelen a prieſt one of king Richards chappell, a man as like him in ſtature and proportion in all lineaments of bodie, as vnlike in birth, dignitie, and conditions.

What mooued the abbat of Weſtminſter to conſpire againſt the king.

The lords that conſpired againſt the duke.

The abbat highlie feaſted theſe lords, his ſpeciall freends, and when they had well dined, they withdrew into a ſecret chamber, where they ſat downe in councell, and after much talke & conference had about the bringing of their purpoſe to paſſe concerning the deſtruction of king Henrie, at length by the aduiſe of the earle of Huntington it was deuiſed, that they ſhould take vpon them a ſolemne iuſts to be enterpriſed betweene him and 20 on his part, & the earle of Saliſburie and 20 with him at Oxford, to the which triumph K. Henrie ſhould be deſired, & when he ſhould be moſt buſilie marking the martiall paſtime, he ſuddenlie ſhould be ſlaine and deſtroied, and ſo by that means king Richard, who as yet liued, might be reſtored to libertie, and haue his former eſtate & dignitie. It was further appointed, who ſhould aſſemble the people, the number and perſons which ſhould accompliſh and put in execution their deuiſed enterpriſe. Herevpon was an indenture ſextipartite made, ſealed with their ſeales, and ſigned with their hands, in the which each ſtood bound to other, to do their whole indeuour for the accompliſhing of their purpoſed exploit. Moreouer, they ſware on the holie euangeliſts to be true and ſecret each to other, euen to the houre and point of death.

When all things were thus appointed, the earle of Huntington came to the king vnto Windſore, earneſtlie requiring him, that he would vouchſafe to be at Oxenford on the daie appointed of their iuſtes, both to behold the ſame, and to be the diſcouerer and indifferent iudge (if anie ambiguitie ſhould riſe) of their couragious acts and dooings.
